The old Monroe doctrine was blending in with the new Pan Americanism. The Pan American policy proposed by Secretary Blaine in the 1880's contemplated not only friendly relations and Pan American conferences, but also a Pan American customs union and a Pan American railway, and common weights, measures, and coinage. His plan was never realized in its entirety, but at least a periodic conference of diplomatic representatives—the Pan American Conference—was instituted, and later a "Union of American States," maintaining a bureau at Washington. Pan Americanism developed mainly as an interchange of diplomatic amenities, of reciprocal assurances of good will rather than as the sort of economic federation Blaine had conceived. The idea prevailed that the United States and the Latin-American Republics should be a group of States cemented together by periodic conferences, by friendship, by a mutual regard for the peace of the Western Hemisphere. In this connection it may be noted that the United States increasingly assumed the rôle of arbitrator in disputes between Latin-American neighbors—between Costa Rica and Panama, between Chile and Peru, etc. What would happen if two South American nations should refer a dispute to the World Court and one of them refuse to accept the decision and resort to force, thereby incurring the penalties prescribed under the covenant, is an interesting and not altogether academic question, for such an incident would perhaps involve European intervention, contrary to twentieth-century versions of the Monroe doctrine.

Another significant phase of American policy is the principle that in Latin America orderly constitutional government must be maintained, as against revolutions and dictatorships. This was a basic principle in Wilson's Mexican policy. It was expressed by Wilson in his speech of January 6, 1916, when he advocated an agreement "That no state of either continent will permit revolutionary expeditions against another state to be fitted out on its territory, and that they will prohibit the exportation of the munitions of war for the purpose of supplying revolutionists against neighboring governments." It was reiterated by Mr. Hughes as Secretary of State. It would mean a ban on revolutions. It means that the United States insists on the practice of its own principle of constitutional government, whether the other American states are qualified for it or not. Yet, oddly enough, it has been disregarded by the United States in Haiti and Santo Domingo, where American marines have on occasion exercised a purely military dictatorship; Wilson aided the Constitutionalist revolution in Mexico; and no consistent attempt has been made to censor revolutions in South America. In a word, the principle is not to be taken too literally.

As regards economic matters, the affiliations of South America prior to the Great War were chiefly with Europe, particularly with England, for British capital built the South American railways, and British, German, and French shippers handled most of South America's foreign trade. It has been estimated that before the Great War about one-fifth of British overseas investments were in Latin America, and that the British holdings in South America amounted to about $3,000,000,000. But the war enabled the United States to obtain a larger share of South American commerce, and New York rivaled London as financial capital of South America.

The National City Bank and others established many branches in Hispanic America. North American investors bought South American bonds and sought South American concessions. Consider, for example, the case of Peru, to whose Government an American syndicate in 1925 loaned $7,500,000 at 7½ per cent interest. The New Jersey Standard Oil, operating through the International Petroleum Co. (Ltd.), gained control over 80 per cent of the oil production of the country. In 1925 the capital invested in Peru by the Standard Oil, the Cerro de Pasco Copper Corporation, the American Smelting & Refining Co., the Vanadium Corporation of America, and other American concerns amounted to about $100,000,000—a fairly considerable and rapidly increasing sum, although it was only one-third of the total foreign capital invested in Peru. It was estimated that the new South American loans and investments floated in the New York money market during the year 1926 would amount to no less than $400,000,000.

Toward the colossus of the north, some South American nations had long felt suspicion bordering on hositility. They resented the assumption by the United States of the rôle of protector and spokesman for the New World; they were irritated by the condescension with which North Americans so frequently dealt with South American affairs; above all, they were provoked by the "imperialism" of the United States in Mexico, Central America, and the Caribbean. One eminent Latin-American publicist wrote: "To save themselves from Yankee imperialism the American democracies would almost accept a German alliance or the aid of Japanese arms; everywhere the Americans of the north are feared." This is no doubt exaggerated; it represented the attitude of extremists; yet in its way it indicates the reaction of Latin American nationalism against North American imperialism.

Hoping to overcome hostile opinion in South America Wilson proposed the new version of the Monroe doctrine which has already been mentioned, and (on October 27, 1913) solemnly declared "that the United States will never again seek one additional foot of territory by conquest"; and Secretary Hughes repeatedly proclaimed that the United States had no imperialist aspirations, and indefatigable publicists have urged the substitution of a mutual guaranty for the Monroe doctrine, and much propaganda has been directed toward the conquest of South American friendship. The substitution of Pan American intervention for United States intervention, and of international financial receiverships for United States financial protectorates, in the region between the Equator and the United States, would perhaps keep order there more effectively, and conciliate South America, and therefore aid American trade with South America. But such a substitution will be possible only when public opinion in the United States divests itself of the spirit of domination, discards the "big stick" along with "dollar diplomacy" and learns to treat Latin-American nations as associates rather than protégés. The great obstacle is not material interests but a psychological factor, national pride—and national pride is the mother of imperialism.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. Haltigan, one of its clerks, announced that the House had passed the bill (S. 4566) authorizing the New York Development Association (Inc.), its successors and assigns, to construct, maintain, and operate a bridge across the St. Lawrence River near Alexandria Bay, N. Y.

The message also announced that the House had agreed to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 15430) continuing the powers and authority of the Federal Radio Commission under the radio act of 1927, and for other purposes.

The message further announced that the House had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendment of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 15089) making appropriations for the Department of the Interior for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1930, and for other purposes.

INVESTIGATION OF POWER COMPANIES

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, a few days ago, on February 26, I made some remarks in the Senate in regard to some developments that were taking place before the Federal Trade Commission in their investigation of the Power Trust. In the course of my remarks, in reading a letter that had been offered in evidence before the Federal Trade Commission, reference was made to the Montgomery Advertiser, published at Montgomery, Ala.

This morning I am in receipt of a letter from the editor of that paper in which he denies some of the assertions made in the letter and other extracts of evidence from which I read; and I think it but fair and just to the editor and the paper itself that I read into the RECORD his denial. It is written on the letterhead of the Montgomery Advertiser, Montgomery, Ala. The date is February 28, 1929:

Senator GEORGE W. NORRIS,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: There is not a line in the testimony of Leon C. Bradley to sustain your recent charge on the floor of the Senate that "editorials" written by Bradley appeared frequently in the Montgomery Advertiser, at the time when Bradley was editing a bulletin for certain utilities. I am amazed that a gentleman of your responsible position would comment so undiscriminatingly on the testimony of Bradley.

Neither Bradley nor any other outside man ever wrote an editorial for the Advertiser concerning utilities. There is not a line of testimony in Bradley's statement which even indicates that editorial propaganda was ever printed by the Advertiser. We have a feature called "The Passing Throng" in which interviews, personal sketches, and sometimes miscellaneous information are printed. At one time The Passing Throng appeared on the editorial page, but not as editorial matter; it had no relation to editorials then, and has none now, when it is being printed elsewhere in the paper. From time to time The Passing Throng did quote stuff from Bradley's "bulletin," but always with credit to that publication, as reference to our files shows.

Recently we reprinted a considerable number of these innocuous pieces of miscellany—none of which, I believe, referred to questions of public policy. There was no mystery about these articles; no reader was deceived as to their source. They consisted of miscellaneous, sometimes rather interesting stuff of the kind which has always appeared in newspapers. Only an idiot reading these articles could condemn them as dangerous propaganda.

Apparently you have been misled by dispatches written to the Thompson papers by one Hubert Baughn.

Then follow, Mr. President, several sentences in reference to Mr. Baughn, I am not going to read those, because they are rather slanderous, and attack Mr. Baughn rather severely. I do not know Mr. Baughn; I have never met him; but I am not going to be the means of giving publicity to an attack upon him by this editor.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, will the Senator permit me to say that I know Mr. Baughn, of Alabama. He is a very high-class gentleman, a man of very high character, and one of the best newspaper men in the service.

Mr. NORRIS. I thank the Senator for his interruption. That only strengthens my judgment that I ought not to read the attack made upon Mr. Baughn by the editor of this paper. He can make the attack if he wants to in his paper. I have no interest in such an attack. I am reading everything else in the letter to me except the language that seems to me to be rather slanderous against Mr. Baughn.

I will read the rest of the letter:

But what I particularly wish to impress upon you is that the Advertiser has never printed in its editorial columns even this harmless and innocuous stuff which Bradley told the Trade Commission about; nor did Bradley say that our editorials had ever been at his service. He referred specifically to an interview column; and you have my own assurance that his articles were printed with proper credit to their source.

Will you do the Advertiser the justice to read this letter into the RECORD?

Thanking you, I am, sincerely,

GROVER C. HALL,
Editor the Montgomery Advertiser.

Of course, I am glad, Mr. President, to give as much publicity to the editor's comment as was given to the articles referred to by him. These items and this evidence, as referred to by me, appear in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of February 26, 1929. They speak for themselves. I desire, however, to read the letter of Mr. Leon C. Bradley, who was the representative, I think it is conceded, of the power interests, and who was the author of the so-called propaganda articles which it was alleged appeared in the Montgomery Advertiser.

I read his letter the other day; and it is the statements in his letter to which I presume the editor of the Advertiser has reference and which he denounces as being untrue.

This letter is on file with the Federal Trade Commission, having been offered in evidence when Mr. Leon C. Bradley was subpœnaed and testified before the commission. The letter is a short one; and as a justification for what I said and what I had printed in the RECORD, I want to read that letter now, so that it may appear in the RECORD at the same place where the denial appears on the part of the editor of the Montgomery Advertiser.

This letter was written to Thomas W. Martin, president of the Alabama Power Co. of Birmingham, Ala., and reads as follows:

DEAR SIR: You will be interested in these two editorials from the Birmingham News of Saturday and Sunday.

Those were two editorials which he included in the letter, and which I have not seen, and which have not appeared in the RECORD.

Mr. Bradley goes on in this letter:

The only difference between these editorials and hundreds of others which have appeared in the Alabama newspapers since I have been conducting this bureau is that I had the name of the bureau mentioned in these so there could be no misunderstanding as to who had put them in.

I have always suggested to the newspapers wherever possible to avoid mentioning my name or the name of the bureau, as anyone who understands publicity and politics knows it is more effective if the article appears to the reader to emanate from the newspaper itself rather than from some utility source.

It might interest you to know that there have been more than 75 separate articles on the editorial page of the Montgomery Advertiser during the past 12 months regarding public utilities, which were taken verbatim from our news bulletin. The number in the weekly papers runs into hundreds.

I am constantly furnishing information and propaganda advantageous to the utilities, not only to newspapers and members of the public service commission but to other organizations as well. I also serve as a clearing house for Alabama utilities information for the National Electric Light Association and similar organizations.

Very truly yours,

LEON C. BRADLEY, Director.

This is the letter of the director to Mr. Martin, president of the Alabama Power Co.

Mr. President, I leave this dispute between Mr. Bradley and the editor of the Advertiser. If 75 of his articles appeared verbatim during the last five months in the Advertiser, the files of the Advertiser and the files of the director of the bureau of this Power Trust certainly will show what the facts are.

REPORT OF THE FEDERAL FARM LOAN BOARD

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. MCNARY in the chair) laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting, pursuant to law, the Twelfth Annual Report of the Federal Farm Loan Board for the Year Ended December 31, 1928, which was ordered to lie on the table.

REPORTS OF MEMBERS OF GRAIN-FUTURES EXCHANGES (S. DOC. NO. 264)

The PRESIDING OFFICER laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of Agriculture, transmitting, in response to Senate Resolution 40 of February 1, 1928, part 1 of a report concerning the effect upon producers of grain of the suspension of the requirement for the making of reports by members of grain-futures exchanges.

Mr. MAYFIELD. I ask unanimous consent that the report be printed, with illustrations, as a Senate document.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

FIRST DEFICIENCY APPROPRIATIONS

The Senate resumed the consideration of the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 15848) making appropriations to supply urgent deficiencies in certain appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1929, and prior fiscal years, to provide urgent supplemental appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1929, and for other purposes.

Mr. HARRIS. Mr. President, I have on all occasions supported the measure introduced by the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. MCKELLAR] in regard to the publication of income-tax returns. In fact, I think the RECORD will show that I introduced the first resolution providing for publication nine years ago, when I first came to the Senate.

Citizens of moderate means with only a small cottage and those so poor that they possess only a few household goods and wearing apparel of small value must make their tax returns to the tax officials and they are made public. If there is a mortgage on their property it is placed on the court records and is also made public. Why should men of great wealth be allowed to have their income-tax returns kept secret? Our Government should be just to rich and poor alike. The Secretary of the Treasury, one of the wealthiest men in the world, has always opposed publicity of income-tax returns. Our forefathers in framing the Constitution tried to prevent a man of great wealth from being made Secretary of the Treasury. My colleague in the Senate, the late Senator Thomas E. Watson, called this law to the attention of the Senate when Mr. Mellon was first appointed and showed plainly that Mr. Mellon was not eligible under the law to serve as Secretary of the Treasury, but he has served under Presidents Harding, Coolidge, and it is generally understood that he will serve under Mr. Hoover. I agree with my late colleague [Senator Watson] that under the law he is not eligible to hold this position and our people should respect this law as well as all others. We should not violate the law for the rich or poor.

In this deficiency appropriation bill conference report now before the Senate are a great many large, important items necessary to support the Government amounting to more than a hundred million dollars. The one relating to prohibition, the Senate amendment of which I am the author, carrying $24,000,000, was in conference between the Senate and House conferees for some time, and as agreed upon it allowed $3,000,000 for prohibition, lacking $22,000, besides the $250,000 for the investigation of prohibition enforcement as proposed by the Senator from Virginia.

This is not all that I and other Senators who supported the Senate amendment would like, but it is the best we could get the House to agree to. The deficiency bill contains so many important items for carrying on the affairs of the Government that we can not afford to defeat the bill just because the House would not allow us the full $24,000,000. I am glad that every member of the Georgia delegation in the House, as well as most of the Democrats in the House, supported my amendment for a larger appropriation to enforce prohibition.

The $3,000,000 we did get the House to agree to will go a long way toward helping the situation. A special session of Congress is to be called in about 30 days, and after the survey is made by commission appointed by President Hoover to investigate the enforcement of this law, if the President wants any additional funds, Congress will be in session, and we will grant whatever amount he asks.

I feel absolutely sure that the new President will ask us for additional funds. I believe that when Congress meets in December we will have a request from the President for at least $24,000,000 additional. It will require even more than this to properly enforce this law.

As I said, I shall accept this comparatively small amount because it is the very best we can get from the House, and I do not want to endanger the passage of this deficiency bill, containing so many other items, just because we could not get everything we wished in regard to the prohibition matter. However, I give notice that this fight to secure more money to enforce this law has just begun. The lack of enforcement of this law is causing a lack of respect not only for this law but all laws, and should be a matter of great concern to all good citizens even though they do not believe in the law.

Mr. President, while Secretary Mellon wrote letters to the committee opposing my amendment and, in my judgment, has not given this law a fair trial, I have great faith in the efforts that will be made by our President elect, Mr. Hoover. With his great ability as an organizer and his interest in the enforcement of this law, I believe, for the first time, it will be given a fair trial and that it will prove a success.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I do not wish to be considered as cricitizing the views expressed by the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. MCKELLAR] or the Senator from Alabama [Mr. HEFLIN]. I voted for the amendment of the Senator from Tennessee with regard to these refunds, and I would like to vote for it again. I am in entire sympathy with the desire of the Senator from Tennessee that Congress should have the fullest information with reference to these refunds, but I do not wish to have it appear that the Senate of the United States, consisting of Democrats as well as Republicans, has for the last six or eight years sat here and simply handed out to the Treasury Department whatever it asked for the payment of refunds, without any information or knowledge whatsoever, or any attempt to secure any information or knowledge whatsoever, as to the justice of those refunds or as to what was done with the money that has been so liberally voted.

For all of those years I have been a member of the Finance Committee, part of the time I was chairman of that committee, the balance of the time I have been the ranking Democrat upon that committee, and probably that committee more than any other committee of this body is charged with looking after not only the assessment and collection but the abatement and refunds of the taxes of the Federal Government.

To say that we have not made any effort to secure information, that we have not been in possession of any information, that we have voted blindly these appropriations, is, I think, to put the Senate of the United States and the Congress, the Democrats in both bodies as well as Republicans, in a false position.

Several years ago—I do not now recall how many—the Senate created a committee of which the senior Senator from Michigan [Mr. COUZENS] was the chairman. Upon that committee were two great Democrats, the late lamented Senator Jones, of New Mexico, being one. An abler, a more honorable, a more conscientious man has not sat in this Chamber since I have been a Member of the Senate for 28 years. Upon that committee also was the present junior Senator from Utah [Mr. KING], one of the most diligent men and thoroughgoing students and investigators in this body to-day, or at any time since I have been here.

That committee was invested with broad, sweeping powers to investigate this very question of refunds by the Treasury, to find out to whom they had been made, and the circumstances and conditions under which they had been made, and to report the result of their investigation to the Senate.

They were given authority to employ all necessary assistants, and to my knowledge they employed many able experts and lawyers to cooperate with them in that work. Those agents of the Senate were given authority to make the closest and most thoroughgoing investigation into every case about which there was any suspicion or question. They were engaged in that work for many, many months. Then the result was reported to the Finance Committee, was discussed in the Finance Committee, and finally reported to the Senate and given to the country.

I wish the Senator from Michigan [Mr. COUZENS] were in the Chamber.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, the Senator will be here, and expects to speak on this matter. He was called out a few moments ago.

Mr. BRUCE. Mr. President, may I interrupt the Senator to ask him a question?

Mr. SIMMONS. I am simply trying to relate some facts, not in a spirit of controversy at all——

Mr. BRUCE. I know that.

Mr. SIMMONS. But in justification of myself and the other members of the Finance Committee and the Congress.

Mr. BRUCE. I know the Senator has such a generous spirit that he would like to gratify my curiosity. He spoke of some individual as being a man of as lofty character as any with whom he has been associated in this body, and I did not catch the name.

Mr. SIMMONS. I spoke of the late Senator Jones, of New Mexico, who was a member of that committee.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Up to the time of his death.

Mr. SIMMONS. Until the time of his death he was a member of that committee. After that committee had made its investigation and its report the Senate and the House, in cooperation, established what is known as the Joint Committee on Internal Revenue, composed of five select members from the Committee on Finance of the Senate and five select members from the Committee on Ways and Means of the House of Representatives.

Senator Jones, of New Mexico, and myself were the Democrats upon that committee representing the Senate. The present chairman of the Finance Committee, the senior Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT], and two of his associates were the Republicans on the committee. That committee was invested with broad, sweeping powers to carry on work of the same character as had been carried on by the Couzens committee. The Couzens committee had investigated as to the past.

That committee was empowered to investigate all matters in the Department of the Treasury relating to internal-revenue taxation, especially the matter of refunds of taxes. Its powers were so broad and so specific that they could not be called into question. This committee was given authority to make any examination which it thought necessary in order to discharge the duties imposed upon it; and no hand in the Treasury could gainsay or stay such investigation.

That committee was authoribed to employ not only clerical but expert help; and it did employ and has continued in its service up to this good hour a very competent personnel. The duty of that personnel has been to carry out the instructions of the committee, and those instructions have required them to keep in close touch with all the Treasury decisions with reference to refunds and to report them back to the committee.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. SIMMONS. I yield.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Will that commission continue to exist from Congress to Congress?

Mr. SIMMONS. It is a continuing committee.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. So that there is no time fixed for terminating it?

Mr. SIMMONS. No limit fixed at all. It is alive to-day. It is functioning to-day. It made a very voluminous report to the last Congress. It has rooms in the House Office Building. Its personnel is at the bidding of any Member of the Senate who wants to ascertain anything with reference to its activities, or as to any internal-revenue matter in the Treasury Department. I think it has been very efficient, and I think it has discharged its duties very well.

So, Mr. President, the Senate has not been sitting idly by making no effort to ascertain and voting in the dark with reference to these matters.

I hold no brief for the Treasury Department. I am making no defense of it. I am not intending to antagonize the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. MCKELLAR] or the Senator from Alabama [Mr. HEFLIN]. I merely wish to have it understood that we have had these agencies engaged in this work. Whether they have done it thoroughly and completely I do not undertake to say, but so far as I have had an opportunity to know the members of the staff of the Joint Committee on Internal Revenue, they have done their duty and have with fidelity performed the service with which we have charged them.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, the Senator asked me who was appointed in the place of former Senator Jones of New Mexico who died. The Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. GERRY] was appointed in his place.

Mr. SIMMONS. We have not had a meeting since then that I have attended.

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator was ill.

Mr. SIMMONS. Part of the time I have not been able to attend the meetings.

Mr. SMOOT. Of course, it was on account of the Senator's illness and we all know that. The Senator has been a faithful member of that commission. I hold in my hand the annual report of the commission for the year 1927.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I wish to yield the floor. I merely wanted to exonerate myself and I wanted to exonerate those on this side of the Chamber and I wanted to exonerate the Senate itself from the charge that we have not at least tried to find out something about these matters.

Mr. MCKELLAR. I asked the Senator the other day for the report, and I understand it has been made now. I asked the Senator if a report had been made by the respresentatives of his commission, but according to the evidence the only two cases that have ever been brought to the official attention of the commission of which he speaks were the tobacco case and the Steel Corporation case. In both of those cases the chairman of the commission, Mr. HAWLEY, stated, as I recall the reports, that they had no power to say that the claim ought to be paid or ought not to be paid.

Mr. SIMMONS. But the facts were there in the report.

Mr. MCKELLAR. Oh, no; the facts were not put in. Statements of alleged facts from interested people were put in, but the facts never went before the commission.

Mr. HEFLIN. There was no record of the facts.

Mr. MCKELLAR. There was no record of the facts themselves unless it be in the report to which the Senator from Utah has referred.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Mr. President, may I suggest that the chairman of the commission at some time during the session explain how many employees are working for the commission, just what work they are doing from day to day, how much they are investigating into these refunds, and so on, in order that we may have a little more general information without reading the voluminous report to which the Senator from Utah has called attention.

Mr. SMOOT. I can say briefly in answer to the Senator from Massachusetts that all of the cases involving over and above a certain amount were referred to the joint commission, and the employees of that commission have made investigation of those cases.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. How many employees has the commission?

Mr. SMOOT. There are five, with Mr. Parker at the head.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I hope the Senator from Utah will later make a more complete explanation.

CONDITIONS IN PENNSYLVANIA COAL FIELDS

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. President, I have felt that I could not see this session of Congress closed without saying something with reference to the investigation which has been carried on by the Interstate Commerce Committee and subcommittees thereof with reference to the situation that has existed in the coal fields of Pennsylvania. This is particularly true in view of what has recently taken place there. Particularly I wanted to call the attention of the Senate to the situation in view of the fact that I see it has been announced in the newspaper that the present Secretary, Mr. Mellon, is going to be the Secretary of the Treasury under the new administration.

As the Senate will recall, the senior Senator from California [Mr. JOHNSON] introduced into this body Senate Resolution 105, providing for an investigation of conditions in the coal fields of West Virginia, Pennsylvania, and Ohio. This resolution instructed and authorized the Senate Committee on Interstate Commerce, or a subcommittee thereof, to make a thorough investigation into the conditions existing in the coal fields of the States just named. It was my privilege to serve as a member of the subcommittee and personally visit those coal fields and get first-hand knowledge of the social and economic conditions under which the miners were living, and likewise to learn what the reasons were, if any, why the consumers of the country were compelled to pay such high prices for coal. I shall not at this time review the situation in detail, but simply call the attention of the Senate to some of the outstanding facts brought out in the investigation which I trust will give proper reproach to the present coal situation in Pennsylvania.

In 1924 a joint conference of miners and operators of the central competitive field was held in Jacksonville, Fla., at which time a wage-scale agreement was reached which was to continue the then existing wage scale for three more years, expiring on March 31, 1927.

The Jacksonville agreement was signed by Mr. John A. Donaldson, the vice president of the Pittsburgh Coal Co., and Mr. J. M. Armstrong, the general manager of the Pittsburgh Coal Co.; yet almost before the ink was dry upon the contract this same company, which is the largest commercial producer of bituminous coal in the world, with a capacity of over 20,000,000 tons a year, and controlled by the Mellon interests, proceeded to repudiate this agreement and refused to be governed by it. This Mellon company was the first to repudiate this agreement. Notwithstanding the fact that President Coolidge had named Secretary Hoover, of the Department of Commerce, and Secretary Davis, of the Department of Labor, to intervene in behalf of the Government of the United States in an effort to reach this agreement, Secretary of the Treasury Mr. Andrew Mellon has not, as far as I am informed, ever attempted to interfere with the repudiation of this contract by the Pittsburgh Coal Co., which he controls.

Let me say to the Members of the Senate that the Pittsburgh Coal Co. and the Secretary of the Treasury, Andrew Mellon, are synonymous. Mr. Mellon is the Pittsburgh Coal Co. and the Pittsburgh Coal Co. is Mr. Mellon.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, may I interrupt the Senator?

Mr. WHEELER. I yield to the Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. NORRIS. I am wondering if the Senator was correct in that statement. I can see how the Pittsburgh Coal Co. is Mr. Mellon, but I can not agree with the Senator when he says Mr. Mellon is the Pittsburgh Coal Co. Mr. Mellon is a great deal more than the Pittsburgh Coal Co. He is several other companies.

Mr. WHEELER. That is true. Mr. Mellon is not only the Pittsburgh Coal Co. but the Aluminum Trust of America, and he is likewise several other companies, including the Gulf Oil Co., as well as many other large industrial concerns of that kind.

Mr. President, a short time ago the Senate of the United States was shocked, and very properly so, when it read in the newspapers that seven men had been shot down in the city of Chicago by gunmen. The Senate of the United States has on several occasions been shocked when one man has been murdered or his property has been destroyed in foreign fields. This body has been shocked, if you please, when some Chinese killed an American in China. The Senate of the United States has recently appropriated millions upon millions of dollars for the purpose of protecting life and property in foreign fields. We have just passed a bill giving to the Navy Department the money to begin the construction of 15 new cruisers, with the idea of protecting the property of American citizens and their lives in foreign fields. And yet, Mr. President, no one seems to be shocked, and the newspapers of the country do not seem to be shocked when brutal murders are carried on in the coal fields of Pennsylvania by the interests dominated, owned, and controlled by the Secretary of the Treasury, Mr. Mellon.

A shocking incident occurred there the other day. I wish to read about it from one of the local papers in Pittsburgh—the Pittsburgh Press. It is headed:

Governor probes miner's death. Wounded man beaten with poker, charge. Victim, helpless on floor, flailed by lieutenant, witness declares. Bar bent upon body. Others accused of jumping upon battered form in barracks at Imperial.

The article reads:

Governor Fisher to-day demanded a complete report of the brutal killing of John Bereskie, Tyre farmer-miner.

The governor's demand was directed at the Pittsburgh Coal Co., by whom three coal and iron policemen, accused by county detectives of having beaten Bereskie to death, were employed.

Governor Fisher's power in the case extends only to the revocation of the police commissions of the three men involved.

His demand for a report of the killing was made with the view of immediately revoking the officers' commissions if the facts warrant that action.

WILL NOT COMMENT

Until the report is received the governor will make no comment on the case, but when interviewed at Harrisburg to-day by The Press correspondent he was plainly quite concerned and angry about it.

Alleged to be implicated in the killing of Bereskie, W. J. Lyster, coal and iron police lieutenant, to-day was faced by his accuser.

Chief of County Detectives George W. Murren summoned John Higgins, a friend of the man beaten to death, to detective headquarters to repeat his story of the killing before Lyster.

According to Higgins, Lyster took an active part in the beating which resulted in Bereskie's death. Since his arrest Lyster has maintained complete silence.

REFUSES TO TALK

Lyster refused to talk when questioned yesterday by the sleuths after Higgins told the detectives the lieutenant beat Bereskie with a poker in the police barracks at Imperial.

Mrs. Anna Blussick, mother-in-law of Bereskie, her son Pete, and Patsy Caruso, a neighbor, gave their version of the killing to the authorities to-day.

Higgins and Bereskie were taken to the Imperial barracks from the home of Bereskie's mother-in-law, Mrs. Anna Blussick, at Santiago, by Watts and Slapikis, after, according to the officers, Bereskie attempted to stab Watts.

TELLS OF BEATING

After arriving at the barracks, according to the story Higgins told detectives, Watts called Lieutenant Lyster into the room. Higgins's story continues:

"He (Lieutenant Lyster) walked into the room, heard Watts's report, and began stripping off his clothes. He took off his clothes to his undershirt and said: 'I feel like a good workout!'

"The lieutenant walked to a coal box where he picked up a poker. He almost ran to John (the victim), who lay moaning on the floor. The poker swished through the air and struck John, who shrieked. The poker lifted and fell again and again until it was bent at the end.

"The lieutenant walked away a few feet and kicked the poker out straight again. While this was going on, Watts ran and jumped on John's chest, leaping there a couple of times. The poker was brought into play again after a little rest. It swished again and again and was straightened out for the second time.

CONFESSION DEMANDED

"They started jumping on John again. They kept it up, every once in a while, telling him to admit that he stabbed Watts. John couldn't even sign anything the way they were treating him. But they kept on kicking him, and jumping on his chest, stomach, and legs."

After beating Bereskie, according to Higgins, the officers turned them both over to Constable Ross Schaffer, of Glenfield, who had arrived at the barracks while Bereskie was being beaten. Schaffer said he saw the beating taking place and then he went into another room of the barracks and fell asleep, according to county detectives.

Higgins told detectives that Schaffer took Bereskie to the Sewickley Valley Hospital, where Bereskie died a short time later, and lodged him (Higgins) in the Leetsdale jail. Justice Margaret Morgan, of Sewickley, out of whose office Constable Schaffer operates, eld Higgins under $1,000 bond on a liquor charge at a hearing last night.

The entire affair was started, Higgins said, when Watts and Slapikis, both of whom were described as "half drunk," entered the Blussick home and engaged in an argument with Mrs. Blussick's son, Eddie. Higgins ordered the policemen and Eddie Blussick from the house.

Mr. President, I ask that the remainder of this article be inserted in the RECORD as part of my remarks.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

HELD FOR QUESTIONING

After the three had gone out, Mrs. Blussick shouted to Bereskie to save her son. Bereskie had been sitting in another room, reading. Carrying a miner's lamp, Bereskie started toward the officers and the Blussick boy. Suddenly, Higgins said, Watts shouted he had been stabbed and, pointing to Bereskie, said, "He did it," and started beating Bereskie with the butt end of a revolver.

Higgins also was lodged in the county jail. He will be questioned further to-day by District Attorney Samuel Gardner and Chief County Detective George W. Murren. Schaffer was released on his own recognizance.

Watts and Slapikis were lodged in the county jail by Deputy Coroner Harry Ewing, who made murder charges against them pending an inquest. Watts and Slapikis claimed that Watts defended himself when Bereskie attacked them with a knife when they were raiding the Blussick home.

WIRE GOVERNOR

Prominent Pittsburghers connected with the Pittsburgh branch of the American Civil Liberties Union telegraphed Governor Fisher to-day and insisted that he express himself.

The telegram was signed by Frederick Woltman, secretary of the Pittsburgh branch.

Woltman described the charges made by county detectives against the three coal policemen under arrest.

"The Pittsburgh branch of the American Civil Liberties Union insists that you express yourself on the coal and iron police system and take steps to eliminate it in order to assuage outraged public opinion," the wire said.

SERIES OF OUTRAGES

"This episode is the culmination of a long series of outrages endured by peaceful citizens of the State of Pennsylvania.

"It represents the activities of an un-American police system on which the State confers its authority without at the same time exacting its responsibility. We have already urged upon you an investigation of this system with a view of its elimination.

"These coal and iron policemen were commissioned by your office, even though they individually are responsible to the Pittsburgh Coal Co. Our committee holds your office responsible for the administration of this system or the elimination of its abuses."

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. President, the lieutenant who did the killing in this instance was not employed by the State of Pennsylvania; he was employed by the Pittsburgh Coal Co., a Mellon concern. His record shows, according to the evidence which I have, that he had previously been convicted of a crime, and likewise it shows that he had been carrying on in this same brutal manner for months in the Pittsburgh region.

I want to call attention in this connection likewise to some facts that were brought out during the hearings that were carried on as to conditions in the coal fields. I quote from the testimony of Mr. Philip Murray, international vice president of the United Mine Workers of America:

The Pittsburgh Coal Co. abrogated its contract with the United Mine Workers of America on August 10, 1925. Following the abrogation of this wage agreement with our organization, a statement was issued by Mr. W. G. Warden, chairman of the board of directors of the Pittsburgh Coal Co., in which he attempted to justify before the bar of public opinion the repudiation of his trade agreement with the United Mine Workers of America. In the course of this attempt he sought to impress the public mind with the idea that the economic situation, through which the coal industry was then passing, necessitated this arbitrary action on the part of his coal company, contending that the corporation could not produce coal at the Jacksonville wage rate and market it in competition with coal mined where lower wage scales prevailed, in States south of the Ohio River.

Despite this assertion on the part of Mr. Warden, the independent commercial producers of the Pittsburgh district continued to respect the terms of their contracts with the United Mine Workers of America until its legal expiration, March 31, 1927.

As I said a moment ago, the Pittsburgh Coal Co. is a Mellon concern; it is controlled by the Mellon interests. Mr. Mellon was a director and the guiding influence in that concern until he became Secretary of the Treasury. He then resigned, and his brother immediately took his place as the controlling head of that organization. The testimony continues:

Upon the expiration of our wage agreement, on March 31, 1927, the independent commercial producers of coal advocated a wage reduction, contending that it would be necessary to have their wages readjusted to a point that would enable them to compete with the coal then being mined by the Pittsburgh Coal Co.

They stated that they were not particularly alarmed about the competition coming from the States south of the Ohio River, but that their competitive situation was one that was the more serious within the district itself than regards the competition coming from States south of the Ohio River.

Following the strike the coal companies went into the field and employed their own policemen, and one of the policemen committed the crime which I have just narrated, which was one of the most brutal murders that has ever been committed in the history of this country.

In addition to the 4,000 commissions which were issued by Governor Fisher during the course of the strike to the coal companies to be used by the coal and iron policemen in the State of Pennsylvania—

This man Lyster, who so recently committed this crime, was one of these coal and iron police not under the jurisdiction of the State of Pennsylvania, but answerable only to the Pittsburgh Coal Co.

I want to call attention of the Senate to the evidence that was produced before the committee with reference to some of the things which went on in addition to this brutal murder. I quote further from Mr. Murray:

I speak with special reference to a strike breaker imported from the State of Georgia by the Pittsburgh Coal Co. On the third day after he arrived in camp he broke into a farmhouse, the farmer being absent, and ravished the wife of the farmer, killed her, and is now serving a 15-year sentence in the Western Penitentiary.

Also, with particular reference to a 15-year-old girl, who was abducted by a coal and iron policeman in the employ of the Pittsburgh Coal Co. at Arnold, and kept forcibly in the barracks of the coal and iron police at Arnold for five days without her family knowing where she was.

The members of the committee went out there and heard testimony not only of the mother of this girl, but likewise of reputable citizens of the community. While she was away she was brutally assaulted, the matter finally being brought to the attention of the Fayette County court, and a rather heavy sentence was imposed upon the coal and iron policeman.

Then our attention was called to an incident that occurred—where 300 shots from high-powered rifles were poured into the barracks of striking miners at Bruceton, many of them penetrating the walls and others going through the windows of the public school in that community, housing some 300 miners' children who were in attendance on the school at the time of the shooting.

Then there was the record of the case—of a 10-year-old girl who was taken from her home by a man named Stewart, at house 122, at Coverdale, Allegheny County, Pa., the property now of the Pittsburgh Terminal Coal Corporation; and that this young girl, a child, in fact, was assaulted by the strike breaker who had been imported from West Virginia. The child afterwards being brought to the home of Doctor Scott, where she underwent an examination and the doctor submitted a report showing that she had been raped.

A coal and iron policeman by the name of Sergeant Manney arrested Stewart and informed the company's office in charge of Vice President George Osler, of the Pittsburgh Terminal Coal Co., and also passed the information over to the captain of the coal and iron police, Mr. Freeman, that they had in custody a man named Stewart, a strike breaker, who had assaulted a young girl 10 years of age at house 122, Coverdale, and asking for advice as to what they ought to do. The said officer advised Sergeant Manney that under no circumstances should the public get to know that their strike breakers were committing crimes of this kind. They suggested, however, that he be arrested as a suspicious character.

Accordingly, the man was brought to the office of Squire Edmondston, at Mount Lebanon, Allegheny County, and charged with being a suspicious person. There he was fined $1 and costs and allowed to go.

Mr. President, these are just a very few of the numerous hideous crimes that have been committed by the coal and iron police in the Pittsburgh coal district, many of them by coal and iron police working for the Mellon interests, and, notwithstanding the protests from the pulpit by ministers in those communities, notwithstanding the fact that the leading citizens in those communities protested, the coal and iron police still were kept on duty by Mr. Mellon and his company, until there resulted, as I said a moment ago, the heinous crime, the account of which I read from the Pittsburgh newspaper.

It may be said that Mr. Mellon is not responsible for the coal and iron police system in Pennsylvania which has led to these frightful crimes, but let me call attention to the fact that at the present time the Legislature of the State of Pennsylvania has under consideration a bill to do away with the coal and iron police. I do not think that there is anybody on the other side of the aisle who will question that Mr. Mellon dominates the Legislature and the Republican Party of the State of Pennsylvania, and all Mr. Mellon would have to do would be to say to the legislature, "We want to do away with this system"——

Mr. MOSES. Mr. President——

Mr. WHEELER. I will yield in just a few moments. All he would have to do would be to say, "We want to do away with this system and to turn the police power of the State over to the State authorities, where it belongs," and it would be done. But, on the contrary, the Mellon interests, which dominate the State of Pennsylvania and the Republican Party in that State, are insisting and have been insisting that they should have control of the police force in these matters.

The president of the Pittsburgh Coal Co. issued a statement a short time ago in which he said he would not have any particular objection to abolishing the coal and iron police provided the police authorities of the State of Pennsylvania would take care of the liquor traffic. In other words, Mr. Mellon, who is the Secretary of the Treasury of the United States and under whose jurisdiction is the Prohibition Bureau for enforcing the prohibition law, apparently is unable to enforce the liquor laws in his own State of Pennsylvania and in his own coal camps without the aid of these coal and iron police, whose salaries are paid by the companies and who are answerable only to the Mellon company, or else he has not made any attempt to do so. I now yield to the Senator from New Hampshire.

Mr. MOSES. Mr. President, I do not want to take the Senator off the floor. I wanted to ask if he would yield to an interlude the purpose of which I am sure has his sympathy, and with the understanding that he may resume the floor at its conclusion.

Mr. WHEELER. I am going to yield the floor in just a moment.

Mr. MOSES. Very well.

Mr. WHEELER. The reason why I wanted to call these matters to the attention of the Senate was because of the fact that I feel the country ought to know something of what has been going on in the coal fields in Pennsylvania. They ought to know the kind of man whom they are going to have for the next four years as the Secretary of the Treasury of the United States. All during the investigations which have been conducted by the Interstate Commerce Committee never once has the Pittsburgh Coal Co., or Mr. Mellon, or any of his interests ever offered one single constructive idea to the committee to help it in its deliberations, but, on the other hand, his interests have constantly come before the committee denouncing everyone else, but never offering, I repeat, one constructive idea. I should like to direct the attention of the Senate and the country to many other aspects of this investigation, but feel that as the time is short I do not want to interfere in the closing hours of the session of important legislation which is pressing for consideration. I hope the legislature will act to do away with this system. The people of Pennsylvania should be interested; the people of the Nation are interested, as it affects us all. It is a violation of the fundamental principles upon which this Government is instituted.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania subsequently said: Mr. President, I understand that during the last two or three hours a number of references have been made to conditions in the mining regions of Pennsylvania.

I understand also that discussion has been had at great length about the functioning of the present provisions of law with regard to the Joint Committee on Internal Revenue Taxation, and the submission of details as to the refund of taxes to that committee.

I understand also that rather extensive attacks have been made upon the present Secretary of the Treasury with regard to those refunds.

All of these matters, Mr. President, are matters upon which I would like to address the Senate, but, so that the RECORD may not be misunderstood when read in the future, I would like to say that at the present time we are engaged in a last effort to reconcile the differences between the House and Senate conferees on the Army promotion bill, and I regard that effort as more important than any attempted eloquence on my part on these various subjects that have been under debate here.

I am making this statement now so that it may not seem that by silence I have acquiesced in the remarks which have been made.

RECESS

Mr. WATSON (at 2 o'clock and 37 minutes p. m.). I move that the Senate take a recess for a period not exceeding 30 minutes.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Indiana.

The motion was agreed to, and a recess was taken.

PRESENTATION OF SILVER TRAY TO THE VICE PRESIDENT

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, the Senate has paused during a very busy session to pay respect to its Presiding Officer, who is about to retire.

The functions of a presiding officer in any legislative assembly are in some respects quasi-judicial. This is substantially true of the duties of the President of the Senate of the United States. He is frequently called upon to construe the rules of this body in cases where sharp conflicts arise respecting their true application.

Every Senator knows the difficulty in harmonizing Senate precedents, many of them having been made by majority vote of the Senate in legislative emergencies and in times of excitement.

Mr. President, during the four years that you have served as Vice President, no instance is recalled in which your decision has been reversed on appeal by vote of the Senate. In this respect the record is without parallel. Remembering that on numerous occasions during these four years this Chamber has been the scene of fierce debates, participated in by skilled parliamentarians, it is surprising that you, being without judicial experience, have avoided successful challenge for error in decision.

It must be pleasing to you in this hour to be assured by one charged with some degree of responsibility by the Senators opposed to the political organization with which you have affiliated that only unlimited confidence in your impartiality has made such a triumph, such a record, possible.

No mere intelligence, however great, if influenced by partisan or personal favoritism, could produce such conclusive evidence of the respect and good will of the Democrats and Republicans with whom you have worked during the last four years.

Fairness and promptness have marked your conduct. Firmness and justice have characterized your decisions. This declaration is believed to express the conviction of every Senator.

To the tribute respecting the high standard of your official conduct, another should be added—a tribute which can not fail to inspire in your own breast sentiments of pride and gratification. You enjoy the friendship, the affectionate esteem, of all with whom you have been associated here—Members, officials, and employees of the Senate.

Clarity of thought, generosity of disposition, and decisiveness are indeed a fortunate combination of traits which have endeared you to us all.

Success in the realm of business had already crowned your efforts before you were elected Vice President of the United States. Following the World War, in which you served with distinction and courage, the Dawes Commission, of which you were permanent chairman, performed a service of distinct and permanent value to the world, and particularly to the nations of Europe.

As a present proof and a future reminder of the sentiments so imperfectly expressed in these remarks, the Members of the Senate, every one of them, have cheerfully contributed to a gift which is both useful and beautiful.

We present to you a silver tray, selected with especial thought of Mrs. Dawes, whose charm and modesty have won the love of everyone in official life in Washington, as well as of thousands in other spheres. [Applause.]

Mr. MOSES. Mr. President, the period of parting which is inseparable from public life comes here to us again, and with it brings a feeling of sadness which we do not attempt to disguise.

There is, to be sure, some sense of satisfaction as we reflect upon the friendships engendered by association here, upon the tasks in which we have been permitted to share, and upon the accomplishments which we have produced for the good of our country. These reflections of satisfaction, sir, will rest in our minds as we think of you, as we shall often in the days when you have gone from us in this Chamber.

We are not willing that the matter should rest in memory alone. We wish you to have from us a symbol of the affection and esteem with which we regard you and shall continue to regard you. We ask you, therefore, to take with you this gift, the glad offering of all the Members of the Senate. Let it be to you a reminder of those associations which the thought of the years, we trust, may make more tender and strong, and with it we ask you to take our warmest and constant wishes for length of years, infinity of happiness, and renewed opportunities for public service such as you have always rendered, and in which the fine and endearing qualities which have so cemented our friendships here shall be a signal element in all the years which remain to you. [Applause.]

The Chief Clerk (Mr. John C. Crockett) read the response of the Vice President, as follows:

Senators, I had intended to reply personally, but I find that I can not trust myself to do it.

My dear friends, you have done a very generous and kindly act. You have done me a great honor. I thank you from the bottom of my heart.

The Senate was called to order by the Vice President at 2 o'clock and 50 minutes p. m.

Mr. FESS. Mr. President, I move that the proceedings during the period of the recess be made a part of our record.

The motion was agreed to.

Managers on the part of the House.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, the report is generally approved in the Senate, and I ask for its immediate consideration. If the matter leads to any discussion at all I assure the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. WARREN] that I will ask that it be laid aside.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, I wish the Secretary would read the substitute offered for amendment No. 39.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The clerk will read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

In lieu of the matter stricken out and the matter inserted, insert the following: "or by condemnation under the provisions of the act of August 1, 1888 (U. S. C., p. 1302, sec. 257), whenever, in the opinion of the Secretary of the Interior, acquisition by condemnation proceedings is necessary or advantageous to the Government, such condemnation proceedings not to be resorted to for acquisition of lands in Acadia, Glacier, Grand Canyon, Great Smoky, Hot Springs, Platt, or Yellowstone National Parks not leased to others but occupied by the owner and used exclusively for residence or religious purposes by such owner."

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, while the solution arrived at by the committee of conference is by no means entirely agreeable to me, I feel constrained to withdraw any further opposition, and to consent, so far as I myself am concerned, to the adoption of the report as requested by the chairman of the conference committee on the part of the Senate.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, will the big trees be taken care of by this compromise? I wish to make certain that those who are interested in that matter will be entirely satisfied.

Mr. SMOOT. That is the case.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. The report gives the Secretary full power and authority to condemn any land within any of the parks, except those used exclusively for residence or religious purposes.

Mr. COPELAND. And on none of the lands to be exempted, as indicated, are the trees to which I have referred located?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. They are not. Moreover, Mr. President, certain reservations only are specified in the amendment, not including the Yosemite.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. MCNARY in the chair). The question is on agreeing to the conference report.

The report was agreed to.

FRENCH POLITICS IN THE WAR FOR AMERICAN INDEPENDENCE

Mr. REED of Missouri. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have inserted in the RECORD an account by General von Below in which he deals with the relations of the French Government to the American Revolution, and analyzes the connection of General Lafayette with the Revolutionary War. I regard this as a very interesting and fine analysis, and a splendid compilation of historical data.

There being no objection, the matter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD as follows:

FRENCH POLITICS IN THE WAR FOR AMERICAN INDEPENDENCE AND THE LEGEND OF LAFAYETTE

By Gen. Baron Hans von Below

In Geneva, where the League of Nations now confers as to how to establish "permanent peace" in the world, and at the same time is insisting upon the complete fulfillment of the treaties dictated by force resulting from the great World War, some of the delegates of different nations have already found the problems very difficult to solve, and some of them have even resigned from the league to avoid further complications.

The league has tried persistently to induce the United States to take part in their problems, but the latter, so far, has resisted these pressing invitations. What vital interest has America in the solution of century-old problems which still divide, and always will divide, European nations? The further America keeps herself from European politics the more advantageous for her mercantile and economic prosperity!

Flattering inducements are not wanting to tempt her to forsake her chosen way.

Blood shed together in a united cause on the battle fields of France, and further back the support of France in the Revolutionary War, are brought forward as cogent and compelling claims, which go so far as to demand the cancellation of debts contracted from America even before her entry into the war. France did not cease during and after the war to send generals and statesmen to the United States in order to influence the American masses in favor of her politics.

Speeches and articles of various orators and newspapers really create the impression that France and Lafayette had been the redeemers of America, and that France, unselfishly and solely to rescue America, had entered the Revolutionary War.

One can have full sympathy with another country, but one should not color the facts of the world's history. Politics should be of the head rather than from the heart. The great leaders of the American Revolution persistently followed this principle. They dedicated themselves to the welfare and freedom of their country. They utilized every material and intellectual means and took advantage of all political groups and affiliations, no matter how conflicting. It would be equivalent to belittling those great and clever men if one would accept the hard-fought-for liberty of America as a present of another nation.

History is a great teacher, and, therefore, it seems proper to investigate whether foreign political propaganda has not already begun to warp and prejudice the judgment of the American people. With the discovery of the new world and the new waterways great conquests and world colonizations began. The most powerful and intellectual nations, according to their strength and the need of emigration for their surplus populations, divided the parts of the world inhabited by uncivilized races. This century-old process has not yet ceased and will lead to further international complications following the usual course of history. When a colony has succeeded in establishing for itself, after hard struggles, a certain independence and prosperity, it is not inclined to resign the fruit of its labors to others. Such a newly created land has the natural desire for self-government. Therefore the whole of America, with the exception of small colonies, made themselves independent. Only Canada depends still partially on the motherland. The wish for self-government has had a large share in the establishment of the British Dominions. By means of the humiliating peace of Paris in 1763, France lost Canada and all her territories west of the Mississippi, and was restricted to a few small islands in the Caribbean. England had driven her old hereditary enemy from the shores of America. The effects of this peace are still perceptible to this day. After France was forced by England to abandon colonization in America, she felt compelled to seek other fields in Africa and in Asia.

As France, a century later, made her advance in the Sudan diplomatic entanglements, including those of Fashoda, nearly led to war. These difficulties were adjusted by secret treaties which gave England free hands in Egypt, and France in Morocco and Tunis. The two colonial rivals will find further entanglements in spite of the League of Nations, for altruistic phrases in politics serve only as means of propaganda for the masses and will not do away with complications of vital interests for nations. Everywhere in politics the "sacred egoism" peers through.

It is a historical fact that General Washington had his first experiences of war in the combat against France and her savage allies, the Indians, "spreading terror and desolation, when both invaded the western borders of Virginia." (Bancroft's Life of Washington, p. 23.) Franklin published a pamphlet, wherein he proved how dangerous it would have been had France been able to keep Canada with the unrestricted possession of the fur trade, and been able to provide her savage subjects with firearms. After the war of seven years concluded in 1763, the exchequer of England was exhausted, and she considered new taxations of her colonies as the best means of improving her finances. With this began her pressure upon the American Colonies. This pressure is too well known to need explanation. At first the Colonies had no intention of separating themselves from England; only as the pressure became always stronger and violated the self-respect of the Colonies, the latter determined on open resistance. It was a process which had to come, but which was hastened by the mistaken politics of England. There were men in England who foresaw the danger of such treatment of the Colonies, among them the elderly William Pitt especially. In his speech, which caused the withdrawal of the stamp act, he cried out prophetically, "Will you throw yourself in civil war now, while the whole house of Bourbon has united against you?"

France wished to upset the peace treaty of 1763. The reconquest of her former possessions in North America from her base in the West Indies, also the desire to weaken her hereditary foe, England, was the aim of France. With joy France saw how the conflict between England and her colonies grew. As long as this conflict did not promise an ultimate success of the colonies, the weakened forces of France did not allow her to take an active part. France could only aid the Colonies surreptitiously and endeavor to form, through secret negotiations, an alliance with Spain, which, through the loss of Gibraltar, would make her the natural ally against England.

This secret attitude of France can be dated from March, 1776, when Comte de Vergennes, Minister of Foreign Affairs of Louis the Sixteenth, received an optimistic report of the progress of the American Revolution. He influenced his King and also Spain for the secret support of the revolution and, in fact, Louis the Sixteenth authorized Beaumarchais to make the first loan of 1,000,000 livres to America; Spain followed and further credits were arranged. The banking house Hortaley & Co. in 12 months sent eight shiploads with all possible material of war, in part from the royal arsenals, to America. The royalist France did not dream of assisting a thoroughly republican movement as was that in America; such tendencies were against the, at that time, absolutism of France, and the precise policy pursued by the French Government toward the United States from 1776 on was shaped, not by philosphers but by professional diplomats. * * *

The principal foundation of England's might lay in her trade and maritime power. Were the American colonies lost, England would be bereft of the principal sources of her greatness, while, at the same time, the power of her adversary, the house Bourbon with its ambitions to enlarge its American colonies, would be increased. France's prestige had suffered through the aforesaid treaty of 1763; at the same time she had lost an amount of her influence in European politics. To reconquer her former power it was to her interest to weaken the position of England. After the French revolution, Napoleon resumed this policy and ended in St. Helena, a British island.

France foresaw that England's victory in the revolution would probably cost her the remainder of her western possessions, and would exclude her from further colonization in America. On the contrary, should the United States win, England's power would be considerably weakened. These considerations influenced the political decision of France, as she avowedly came to the side of America in the great contest against her historical foe, only when the first great victory of the United States at Saratoga, October, 1777, seemed to increase the prospect of a successful issue of the American arms.

The patriots of that time judge the French politics dispassionately. When Franklin in 1770 became aware that the French began to formulate a plan whereby France and Spain should foster discontent among England and her colonies, he wrote with reference to the French minister's Choiseul policy, "that the intriguing nation would like very well to blow up the goals between Britain and her colonies, but I hope we shall give them no opportunity."

The 1st of March, 1776, John Adams, speaking in Congress, cried out:

"Is it in the interest of France to stand neutral, to join Britain, or to join with the colonies?

"Is it not in her interest to dismember the British Empire?

"Will her dominions be safe if Britain and America remain connected?

"Can she preserve her possessions in the West Indies?

"In case a reconciliation took place between Britain and America would not all her islands be taken from her in six months?"

There exists a document by Comte de Vergennes, dated on the 13th of January, 1778, at a time when the United States had already fought for three years and had been successful by the surrender of Bourgoyne at Saratoga. In it he announces that now, while England tried to come to an understanding with the United States, there were two courses for the French politics—either to renounce any further support for America or enter the war at her side against England. In the first case he believed if America would come to an understanding with England it would probably mean the continual enmity of America against France. Such a union between the United States and England would probably deprive France of her West Indies and would destroy her entire commerce with those colonies.

For this reason Vergennes draws the conclusion that the glory, the dignity, and the great interest of France in the West Indies demanded that France should come out openly on America's side, so "that their independence should be her work."

Vergennes continues: "The advantages which will result are innumerable; we shall humiliate our natural enemy, a perfidious enemy, who never knows how to respect treaties or the rights of nations; we shall divert to our profit one of the principle sources of her opulence; we shall extend our commerce, our fisheries; we shall insure the possession of our islands; and, finally, we shall reestablish our reputation and shall resume amongst the powers of Europe the place which belongs to us * * * that whatever assistance we give the Americans, it will be equivalent to a declaration of war against Great Britain, and, second, that when war is inevitable, it is better to be beforehand with one's enemy than to be anticipated by him."

Thus France was to espouse the American cause and used for that purpose all her power, even if Spain should refuse to join her. In Beaumarchais Oeuvres complètes (Paris, 1835) exists a document which shows how England's threats against France influenced the stand of Vergennes. This French document says:

"What must the King (Louis XVI) have said to the last words of the idol and oracle of the British nation, Lord Chatham, who dragged himself to Parliament, there to expire exclaiming, "Peace with America and war with the House of Bourbon."

The King, well informed of the plan of the court of London and of the preparations which were the consequence of it, perceived that no more time was to be lost if he would prevent the design of his enemies. So Louis XVI and his minister, Vergennes, saw that France should lose no more time in bringing to naught the plans England had directed against her. All these considerations led to the alliance of France with the United States and to war between England and France.

These are historical facts, which are decidedly in contradiction with the allegation that the France of that time had entered the Revolutionary War only out of unselfish and idealistic motives to assist America in her struggle for freedom. Propaganda pamphlets, such as were widely distributed in America in 1917 to this effect, are comprehensible on account of the situation of that time, but are not in accord with historical facts.

The further politics of France, after the change of her constitution from monarchy to republic, was by no means friendly to America and almost led to war. When France, in 1798, challenged the United States by aggressive actions the Congress selected Washington again as commander in chief in the event of war with France. In spite of his 66 years Washington decided, after negotiations, to accept the post offered in case of necessity. He expressed himself to Colonel Hamilton: "I can not make up my mind yet for the expectation of open war; or, in other words, for a formidable invasion by France. I can not believe—although I think her capable of anything—that she will attempt to do more than she has done."

In June, 1798, he wrote to the President accepting the command in case of war. In this letter he writes about the French: * * * "for I can not bring it to believe, regardless as the French are of treaties and of the laws of nations, and capable as I conceive them to be of any species of despotism and injustice, that they will attempt to invade this country." In a further letter to President Adams, Washington expresses himself: "The conduct of the director toward our country; their insidious hostility to this Government, their various practices to withdraw the affection of the people from it, the evident tendency of their arts and those of their agents to countenance and invigorate opposition, their disregard of solemn treaties and the laws of nations, their war upon our defenseless commerce, their treatment of our ministers of peace, and their demands amounting to tribute, could not fail to excite in me sentiments corresponding with those my country has so generally expressed in their affectionate address to you." (Bancroft, Washington, p. 198–200.)

One sees the American statesman of that time judged the French politics very differently from those modern orators and politicians, who tried to subvert the facts of history to suit their propaganda service. People should learn and not forget how the great statesmen and patriots of the Revolutionary time judged the real events. The cooperation of the French army and navy forces in the Revolutionary War shows how even this participation was influenced by political considerations.

In fact the mutual operations of the United States and France often threatened to be shipwrecked. Only thanks to the tact and the wisdom of Washington, equally great as statesman and as general, the many frictions were overcome. He knew only one aim, and that was the accomplishment of the independence of his country, and this aim he followed in spite of many disappointments.

The first French fleet to support the mutual cause, consisting of 12 ships of the line and 5 frigates, with 834 cannon and a transport of 4,000 men, arrived on the 15th of April, 1778, on the Capes of Deleware under command of Comte d'Estaing. On board of his flagship traveled the French minister Gerard.

Washington had sent emissaries on board the flagship to communicate to d'Estaing plans for their mutual operations.

The English admiral, Lord Howe, who had transported Clinton's army to New York, anchored with his fleet south of Hook, across the narrow strip. He could oppose d'Estaing only with 9 ships, mounting 534 cannons. D'Estaing cast anchor opposite him and could not decide to attack the English Fleet. Greene (p. 150) says of this maneuver: "Mahan intimates that with Nelson or Farragut in d'Estaing's place, the result might have been very different. It is probable that if d'Estaing had smashed the British Fleet in New York and united his 4,000 soldiers with those of Washington on the north side of the Harlem River, Clinton's army would have been caught like rats in a trap and not a man would have escaped."

D'Estaing agreed now with Washington's emissaries a common action against Newport. Washington detached at once new formations of troops there, but they could only arrive 10 days after d'Estaing. The latter sailed on the 8th of August, 1778, in the Narraganset Bay to land his troops to unite with those of Washington.

When Lord Howe sailed after him with the English Fleet, d'Estaing decided to accept battle, but contrary to the protest of the American general, Sullivan, he did not land his 4,000 men but took them with him. A storm terminated the action of the opposing parties. The English returned to New York and d'Estaing to Newport.

The two land divisions were commanded by Lafayette and Greene. Both had urged d'Estaing to land his troops, but he refused and sailed with his ships and troops to Boston to repair his fleet. This attitude of the French admiral created bad blood. Washington, with his usual tact and calm reflection, tried, in the interest of the great cause, to smooth the irritated spirits. General Sullivan had issued an order to his troops expressing hope that America would be "able to procure with her own arms that which her allies refused to assist her in obtaining." (Greene, p. 152.) The consequence of this attitude of d'Estaing was that 5,000 men of Sullivan's militia left the service and went home, after hope for the expedition had failed. Sullivan's remaining troops retired on Washington's order.

D'Estaing, after having repaired his ships, sailed together with his 4,000 men to Martinique, West Indies.

Lord Howe sent at the same time 5,000 men to Santa Lucia. This meant renewing the old struggle between France and England for the West Indies.

Green asserts in his book that the French minister Gerard has probably influenced d'Estaing in his decisions. The French forces could have helped to finish the war for America, but it seemed that a quick termination of the war, without a French reconquest of Canada was not in the interest of French politics.

In October, 1778, Lafayette himself proposed the reconquering of Canada, and it seems that Congress favored the plan. The sober and clear judgment of Washington convinced its advocates that it was impossible. Therefore the plan was abandoned. In his far-sighted letter, dated November 14, 1778, Washington wrote:

"It is a maxim, founded on the universal experience of mankind, that no nation is to be trusted further than it is bound by its interests." Greene (p. 155) characterizes these words with "as true and as significant to-day as the day they were written."

The war continued. Washington turned to Gerard, to his successor and to d'Estaing himself, in order to persuade the latter to an operation against New York. All efforts were in vain. D'Estaing pursued his own war in the West Indies and the South. Finally, in October, 1779, he besieged Savannah, then held by the British, and after his attack was repulsed and he himself wounded, he sailed with his whole fleet and all his troops back to France.

Lafayette had returned to France in January, 1779. His presence in France signified a diplomatic mission of Washington. Together with Franklin he influenced the politics of Louis XVI in such a manner that France sent off another expedition, with the express orders to submit themselves to Washington. The French fleet was under the command of Rochambeau and consisted of seven vessels with a transport of 6,000 men, fully six regiments. This fleet landed at Newport on the 10th of June, 1780. The newly arrived Lafayette was sent to Rochambeau by Washington with written instructions for a mutual operation against New York.

An English fleet appeared before Newport and blockaded the French. A transport of 6,000 men under Clinton followed the English fleet to attack Newport.

Rochambeau thought himself menaced and begged Washington for aid to protect his 6,000 men. At once some thousand militiamen were sent to him from Rhode Island. These French troops of Rochambeau not only did not help the Americans in 1780 but, on the contrary, had to be protected by them.

Washington marched with his army to Kings Bridge. This clever maneuver forced Clinton to return with his troops to New York.

Only after Clinton had withdrawn from Newport the American militia could be sent home.

The far-sighted plan of Washington was based on the mastery of the seas, to cut off the English from their connections.

Though a big French fleet lay in the West Indies, Washington succeeded only in 1781 to put through his plan.

Rochambeau remained 11 months inactive at Newport.

During this time the United States ran risk of becoming exhausted, as they lacked everything. Mutinies broke out. Discontent manifested itself at the inactivity of the French ally.

In smoothing over these frictions Washington's talents were clearly shown.

At the request of Washington the Congress sent Washington's aide-de-camp, Colonel Laurens, to France to persuade Comte de Vergennes to make a loan of 6,000,000 francs in cash and two and one-half millions in war materials. This financial assistance was more valuable than that rendered by the French troops during the war. These debts were fully paid to France later by the struggling young Republic, without even a suggestion for a reduction or a thought of cancellation.

On the 22d of ———, 1781, Washington was informed that the French West Indies fleet under Comte de Grasse should unite with Rochambeau for a cooperation under Washington's orders.

This was the result of Franklin's and Lauren's diplomatic efforts at Paris. During the three years of alliance the help of France had chiefly consisted in moral and financial aid.

Washington arranged now at once with Rochambeau to march against New York.

Washington joined Rochambeau at White Plains. Previous to the appearance of the de Grasse's fleet before New York Washington could not undertake the attack against Clinton. As Washington learned that de Grasse had sailed with 29 vessels and more than 3,000 men for the Chesapeake Bay, he took the ingenious decision to abandon the operation against New York and to launch a blow against Cornwallis.

Finally the great moment had arrived for which Washington had waited so long.

As quickly as his decision was taken as quickly it was carried out. Comte de Grasse, contrary to the procedure of d'Estaing, landed his troops before attacking the English fleet to dispute the possession of the Chesapeake Bay. With the masterful operations of Washington against Cornwallis the military events of the war were terminated. After the surrender of Cornwallis Washington tried to persuade de Grasse to an operation against New York and the South. It was in vain. De Grasse insisted on returning to the West Indies. Washington remained at Williamsburg. Lafayette returned to France.

With this ended the participation of the allied French troops with the Americans.

The victory of Yorktown was the merit of Washington.

In 1905 the United States Senate published a list of the French combatants in the Revolutionary War. According to its declaration, the greatest number of French troops which had landed consisted of 8,400 men. The losses of these troops were at Savannah under d'Estaing, 637; and 186 under Rochambeau at Yorktown; 100 of the latter French losses were the result of the vigorous sortie Cornwallis made from Yorktown on the 16th of October, three days before his negotiations for surrender began.

This historical record of the activities of the French troops and naval forces in the Revolutionary War is no disparagement of their valor or of their leaders, but clearly indicates how the politics of the French Government directed and influenced the military operations and to what extent the French participation was undertaken in the national political interest of that country, rather than an unselfish interest in the struggle for independence by the new American Republic.

PROMINENT FOREIGNERS IN THE REVOLUTIONARY WAR AND THE LEGEND OF LAFAYETTE

With the outbreak of the Revolutionary War a great number of adventurers of various nations offered their services to the United States. Some experiences had with these volunteers were not happy ones. The Congress soon refused to enlist them, as the American officers felt bitterness, when they were outranked by foreigners, who did not even speak their language.

To understand the participation of foreigners in that war, one must represent to oneself the spirit of the time.

The European armies were armies of mercenaries. Soldiery was a business. It offered money and gave opportunity to see other lands.

The European armies of that time served more for dynastic interests of reigning houses than for national ones.

Who paid most, had the best armies. An exception was perhaps the army of Frederick the Great during the war of seven years.

Frenchmen served in Germany, Germans in France, Englishmen in Russia, Italians in Sweden, and so forth.

The officers recruited themselves nearly exclusively from the nobility of the countries. The noblemen fought for honor, glory, and money. War was their typical business; as it finished in one country, they went to another where there was another outbreak of hostilities, and so it happened often that they fought against their own country. So we find one of the later heroes of the Revolutionary War, General Baron De Kalb, serving first in the French Army, though he was a Bavarian, born in 1721 at Huettendorf in Bavaria.

The most prominent foreigners in the service of America were Marquis de Lafayette, Baron De Kalb, Baron von Steuben, Kosciusko, and Comte de Pulaski.

All these were engaged through the medium of France. France had always cultivated most militarism, and her politics, as we have seen, favored the struggle against England.

Of those five, the two most experienced and skilled officers were, without doubt, Steuben and Kalb. Both had taken part in the war of seven years, the former in the army of Frederick the Great and the latter in the French Army against Prussia and England.

Kosciusko, a Pole, was an experienced officer. Comte de Pulaski had left his country on account of revolutionary tendencies and had served in Turkey before coming over to join the American Army.

De Kalb and Pulaski died as heroes on the battle fields; Pulaski fell at the head of his troops in the assault of Savannah, the 9th of October, 1779, and De Kalb fell gloriously in the battle of Camden on the 16th of October, 1780.

Kosciusko distinguished himself in the war as an engineer officer and left America when the war was over with the rank of a brigade general.

Steuben, the most experienced of them all, joined the American Army on the 19th of February, 1778, at Valley Forge and was made inspector general of the Army. Even the enemies recognized the great merits of Steuben. He drilled the Army and took care of its recruiting. He is the author of the first drill book of the American Army. He distinguished himself in the war and served in it without interruption. After the war he remained in the Army and became an American citizen. He died in the State of New York, on the 26th day of November, 1794.

The youngest of these five foreigners was Marquis de Lafayette, who joined the army on the 6th of November, 1777, at the age of 19 years, naturally without military experience. Certainly his good will and the sacrifices he made, deserve the admiration and the gratefulness of the American people. But the historian has not to deal only with good will and, therefore, it is interesting to see by what deeds he contributed in fact to the success of the American Revolution. The masses of the American people honor still to-day the memory of Lafayette, as that of a great general, who helped by his sword to decide the war. This was not the case. Events and, first of all, Washington made him in spite of his youth and his lack of experience a political figure for the sake of the French alliance and the French support.

In this respect his attitude has to be appreciated.

The historian Kapp says in his book, published in 1858: "It is strange that the American people have accustomed themselves, in the course of time, to think Lafayette a great general, and even to put him as an equal at the side of Washington. His later life and, first of all, his visit to the United States in 1824 stimulated the interest for him. The grateful people have wrapped his effigy in a nimbus, and see in him one of the greatest heroes of the modern time."

Lafayette was a typical representative of the French nobleman of his time. Brought up in the atmosphere of French court life, he was vain and hungry for glory. He was captivated by the teachings of the philosophers of the school of the eighteenth century and was full of hatred against England, the hereditary enemy of France.

It was in 1777, at a dinner of Comte de Broglie at Metz, where the 19-year-old youth listened to the tales of the Duke of Gloucester, brother of King George III, of England, who described the struggle and the progress of the American arms against his country.

Under the influence of what he had heard, he returned to Paris and sought for an engagement for American service through the medium of Deane, the American agent. Deane and Franklin were already in negotiations with Comte de Vergennes to engage Baron De Kalb and 12 other French officers, so they engaged also the Marquis de Lafayette, having recognized well of what importance it was to engage a man so affiliated with the French court and society. They promised Baron De Kalb and Lafayette the ranks as major generals in the American Army. This high rank was promised by Deane to Lafayette on account of Lafayette's "zeal, his illustrious family, which would never permit him to join a cause without so high a commission, and on account of his connections."

The father-in-law of Lafayette and his whole family were opposed to the adventure and influenced the Government to issue an order to forbid his departure. The resistance was meant more seriously by his family than by the Government. Lafayette, as owner of a large fortune, bought the ship Victoire and started, with De Kalb and the other officers on board, from the Spanish port Las Pasages, near St. Sebastian. They landed near Charleston, S. C., where Lafayette sold the Victoire and her cargo.

Provided with means they all continued their travel on horseback and in carriages to Philadelphia.

Lafayette had sailed when substantial assistance from France was still extremely doubtful. This, together with the willing sacrifice of his fortune, show the great enthusiasm of the youth for the cause he had taken up.

It is to this noble enthusiasm that Lafayette owes his historical significance and his honorable place in history.

All he has done as general in the American Army as well as later on in the French Revolution is without importance.

Not yet 20 years old, without experience, not mastering the English language, and certainly not knowing the psychology of the American people, it was impossible that he could take a leading rôle as general. But he was considered the proper person to secure later French help and alliance.

Franklin, Washington, and the Congress recognized the significance of his employment, and so his rôle became at once more political than military. The Congress refused first the engagement of De Kalb, Lafayette, and their companions on account of the aforementioned unhappy experiences they had made with foreign officers, especially as Deane had promised them all higher ranks and to Lafayette even the rank as general. But finally Lafayette and De Kalb were engaged and promised the ranks as generals. The unusual commission as a brigade general for the young Lafayette was given by the Congress on "account of his zeal, his illustrious family, and connections." But the 12 French officers had to return to France. It speaks well for Lafayette's generosity that he paid part of the expenses for their return.

There is no doubt that Lafayette was endowed with a noble heart and character, though "the pure metal of self-devotion was somewhat alloyed with a love of fame and popular applause." (Lafayette, by Bayard Tuckerman.)

This latter was the result of his education and was strengthened by the high commission he received at the age of only 19 years. Lafayette joined the Army in July, 1777. January, 1779, he left the Army again to return to France to visit his family. He rejoined the Army in May, 1780. After the surrender of Cornwallis at Yorktown he left the service, and was back in France in January, 1782; so he served in the American Army all together three years.

Lafayette served on the staff of Washington, who appreciated his noble qualities of character and at the same time recognized the political importance of his mission. It was quite natural that this young Frenchman, whose post brought him so near to Washington and who was honored by the latter's friendship, became a fervent admirer of the great general. Washington placed Lafayette at the head of troops wherever he thought that the operation promised success. He suggested to Congress in December, 1777, the assignment of Lafayette to the command of a division, just as the latter attained the age of 20. In proposing Lafayette for such a place in spite of his youth and lack of experience Washington displayed great political foresight and worked together with Franklin, who, at Paris, prepared the alliance with France. After having joined Washington's staff Lafayette took part in the Battle of Brandywine, where he was wounded.

The first time Lafayette had an opportunity to lead troops independently was on the 19th of May, 1778, at Valley Forge. Washington had watched the expected evacuation of Philadelphia and had thrown Lafayette's division out as advance guard between the Schuylkill and Delaware Rivers. In selecting Lafayette, Washington intended to pay a compliment to France, but "within 48 hours Washington was in mortal dread lest the outcome might be anything but pleasing to France. Washington saw that the young marquis was in full retreat." (Greene, p. 140.) Clinton came quite near capturing Lafayette at Barren Hill. Thanks to Steuben's drill, the Army was in 15 minutes under arms, and Clinton did not attack, but retired to Germantown.

During the following operations up to the departure for France in January, 1779, Lafayette had no independent command of troops. He served either on the staff of Washington, was sent with missions, or served under generals like Lee and Sullivan. Under the latter he commanded two brigades when the French fleet of d'Estaing had sailed into Narraganset Bay. Lafayette tried to persuade d'Estaing to land his troops, but failed. Colonel Laurens wrote a letter to his father, the president of the Congress, putting the blame for the failure of the enterprise of d'Estaing on the differences of the national pride of the French and the ambition of Lafayette. "Marquis de Lafayette aspired to the command of the French troops in conjunction with the flower of Sullivan's army" and that "his private views withdrew his attention from the general interests." (Bayard Tuckerman, p. 92.)

It has been mentioned how in October, 1778, Lafayette proposed the reconquest of Canada. When this plan was refused as impossible and fantastic, Lafayette wrote in his letter to Washington with the permanent undertone that his "reputation and his glory was affected." So he put the latter higher than the cause. This was very different from the other foreign officers. One sees how Lafayette was far too young to judge the cause highly enough and to separate it from personal interests. In his letter of the winter of 1778–79, he expressed his desire to return to France to see his family again. This return to France was used masterfully by Washington and Franklin to keep up the enthusiasm of France for the cause of war.

In Paris the young marquis was the hero of the hour. At the court, in society, in cafés, and in theaters his deeds were lauded. Thus the marquis fanned the enthusiasm for the American struggle. His success flattered the national vanity.

The ground was already well prepared by Franklin and the result was the expedition of Rochambeau's fleet. Lafayette stayed over a year in France and then decided to return to America. He rejoined Washington on the 10th of May, 1781, at Morristown.

In the spring of this year Washington sent Lafayette to Virginia under command of General Greene. Washington expressed the motive of the mission: "As the success of the intended operation depends for the greater part on the cooperation of the French land and sea forces, political motives make the Marquis of Lafayette appear the adequate personage for a command."

Greene, therefore, nominated Lafayette as commander in chief in Virginia, though Steuben had already had the command and was highly appreciated by General Greene. To the latter and General von Steuben the Army owed its reorganization. The experienced Steuben put himself without resistance under the command of Lafayette in the interest of the great cause.

The Virginia campaign consisted of more or less guerrilla actions. Lafayette withdrew his troops when Cornwallis advanced. He accepted a fight at Jamestown on the 16th of July and was defeated. The following great operation against Cornwallis was directed by Washington. During the short siege of Yorktown Lafayette was at the head of a division, but had no opportunity for independent action or distinction.

General von Steuben was in command of the trenches of the siege when Cornwallis sent his first parliamentaires to open negotiations for the surrender. Lafayette appeared to replace him, but Von Steuben refused to leave his post in that moment as contrary to the usage of war. Lafayette was anxious to gain the glory of the surrender and brought the quarrel before Washington. The latter decided that Von Steuben was to remain at his place until the English flag had been brought down.

This was the last action of Lafayette in America. He returned to France, where he arrived January 17, 1782. He was then the most popular man in France. The French in their joy and exaggeration called him "Conqueror of Cornwallis" and the "Savior of America," together with Washington.

Bayard-Tuckerman writes of him (p. 151) that the popularity he enjoyed was a distinct misfortune to him, for it was inevitable that so much flattery gave him a false idea of his abilities.

Lafayette's further life shows the truth of it. Had he really been what he and his people believed him to be, he would have played the leading part in the coming Revolution of France, but there he failed. Lafayette had a childlike ignorance of human nature. He indulged in the mistaken judgment of Rousseau's and Voltaire's philosophy and confounded mob with nation. He apparently was too young and inexperienced to understand and exploit the great lessons of the American Revolution, and though he tried to imitate his admired teacher, Washington, he never really penetrated the latter's spirit. He was unable to understand the psychology of others, a quality which had distinguished Washington. The French Revolution saw Lafayette permanently in vacillation.

Partly he represented the cause of the people, and partly of the King. He had no clear conception of a constitution, and was inclined to allow any constitution.

After the French Revolution had begun his popularity called him to the post of the commander of the national guards. Without doubt, as such he showed valor, but he was unable to organize, and incapable of a really great task. Had he had the corresponding abilities, with his popularity, he could have carried away the masses, and made himself the leader of the nation.

After having resigned and retaken his place, and resigned again at the end of 1791, he was nominated commander of an army, with which he marched from Metz over Givet to Maubeuge. The Jacobin terrorists sent him commissioners who reached him at Sedan to announce the change of government. Lafayette ordered their arrest, as he saw that the Jacobins had seized the power unlawfully; but he was unable to continue his action against them. When the latter at Paris declared him a traitor, Lafayette failed in resolution. He abandoned his army, deserted, and went over to the enemy, who made him prisoner. He was kept prisoner for five years, at the fortresses Wesel, Hamburg, and Olmütz. By Napoleon's desire he was released in 1797, and then he lived in Holstein, at Hamburg, and at Utrecht. In 1799 he returned to France.

Napoleon liked to converse with Lafayette, as the latter had known Washington and Frederick the Great, and had seen so much of the world, but he had no post for him. Napoleon thought little of Lafayette. He spoke of him with little respect at St. Helena, and called him "un niais en politique" (a political simpleton). Had Lafayette had the ability required by a general, no doubt Napoleon would have made use of him. So the time of France's greatest glory saw him without employment. His son entered Napoleon's army, was twice wounded, and resigned as lieutenant.

In 1815, after Waterloo, Lafayette advanced the abdication of Napoleon. His action of that time is open to criticism, as Lafayette was not free from the responsibility for allowing the power to fall into the hands of Fouché, and for the humiliation of France.

Lafayette's further action is without importance. During the French Revolution of 1830 he was urged to accept again the position of commander of the national guards, and his last act was to take part in the overthrow of Charles X and the placing of Louis Philippe on the throne.

Of the many authors who have occupied themselves with Lafayette, the most objective one seems the historian Bayard-Tuckerman. He states in his preface: "Lafayette has suffered perhaps as much from the exaggerated praises from his admirers as from the bitter attacks from his enemies."

A noble character, not free from vanity, a man not above the average, whom Providence had guided through an agitated life—such was Lafayette. His visits in America in 1784 as guest of Washington, and 1824–25, when he traveled nearly for a whole year through the country, where he was fêted with the greatest hospitality, have augmented and exaggerated his glory.

In spite of all, the youth who once came to America to fight bravely for her cause will always inspire the young American with patriotic enthusiasm.

The historian, who has to judge not alone the good will but the deeds and facts, sees in Lafayette not the hero of the Revolutionary War but one of the heroes, and knows that many of them have achieved greater deeds owing to their riper experiences and greater abilities.

MILITARY MAN POWER OF DIFFERENT COUNTRIES

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD a table showing the size of the standing armies of the nations of the world and also showing the number of police, gendarmerie, frontier guards, treasury guards, territorial armies, and so on, which are really active troops and which are a part of the standing armies, as well as the trained reserve and untrained reserve in those countries.

I think that those who will look at these figures will find that in addition to the regular or standing army of those countries they have, in effect, another standing army ready for active service on a moment's notice. One country referred to in the table has 140,000 men in frontier guards, treasury guards, gendarmerie, and so on, so that when those are added to the size of the standing army we get the real figure of military man power of those countries.

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THE MISSISSIPPI VALLEY AND ITS DRAINAGE

Mr. FRAZIER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD an article by Carroll Livingston Riker on Control and Utilization of the Mississippi and the Drainage of Its Valley.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

CONTROL AND UTILIZATION OF THE MISSISSIPPI AND THE DRAINAGE OF ITS VALLEY

By Carroll Livingston Riker

FOREWORD

Nothing herein should be construed as an attack upon any legislation which provides means for holding floods under subjection as much as possible, until the completion of a proper project to that end.

WASHINGTON, March 1, 1929.

To the Congress:

The Riker spillway project for the control and utilization of the Mississippi River is a comprehensive, practicable undertaking which embodies no new or untried mechanical factors.

It has indisputable capacity to safely carry more than twice a 1927 flood from Cairo to the Gulf; and there are no disputable calculations involved, no new surveys required, which would prevent its immediate adoption by any competent unprejudiced board of engineers.

If it can be proven that this project contains one impracticable or inoperative mechanical factor, I will apologize and withdraw.

CARROLL LIVINGSTON RIKER,
Designing Mechanical Engineer.

PURPOSE OF THIS PAMPHLET

Is to prove by indisputable evidence:

That the adopted Jadwin project for flood control is impracticable and a vicious mechanical monstrosity which, if carried out, will have enormous initial cost, entail perpetual expense, will bring catastrophe unprecedented, and be a national engineering disgrace.

That the Riker spillway project for control and utilization of the waters of the Mississippi is practicable and will more than five times repay its cost in less than five years, with immense future benefits beyond present calculation.

That the Congress should cause a board embodying at least 11 competent, unprejudiced civilian engineers to examine and report upon the adopted Jadwin project, the Riker spillway project, and such other projects as it might determine, for control and utilization of these waters.

To this end support is asked for an amendment to the present law for flood control which will call for the appointment of a board to be composed of 11 competent, unprejudiced, civilian engineers of large experience to determine upon the proper project to be adopted for the control and utilization of the waters of the Mississippi River and the drainage of its alluvial valley and to supervise its construction, as will be presented by Senator FRAZIER to the Seventy-first Congress.

A MEMORIAL

The Jadwin adopted project, with compulsory alterations and modifications, will cost more than a billion dollars to complete, $10,000,000 annually to maintain, will inundate and practically destroy about $1,300,000,000 worth of property in the valley and jeopardize about $2,560,000,000 more, be the cause of other terrible catastrophes besides preventing an enhancement in value of property to the valley amounting to about $10,000,000,000 if a proper project be adopted in its stead; and eventually provide a monument of mud a thousand miles long to perpetuate the memory of the greatest mechanical monstrosity ever authorized by the Government of a Nation.

CONDEMNATION OF THE JADWIN PLAN BY THE COMMITTEE ON FLOOD CONTROL OF THE HOUSE

The following are verbatim quotations from the report submitted by the Hon. FRANK R. REID, of Illinois, chairman, from the Committee on Flood Control of Congress (to accompany H. R. 8219), March 29, 1928 (p. 16).

"ENGINEERING FALLACIES OF THE JADWIN PLAN

"(1) That it is lacking in engineering details and has not a sufficient factor of safety; (2) that it uses new and untried methods in the diversion of the flood waters; (3) that the 'fuse-plug' levees will not work and disaster will result; and (4) generally that it is not dependable and is not feasible from an engineering standpoint. The committee did not believe it probable that so many eminent engineers could all be wrong and therefore refused to accept the Jadwin plan as the project for the flood-control work.

"Instead of the Jadwin plan, if adopted by Congress, providing protection from the floods of the lower Mississippi Valley, it might result in a reoccurrence of a disaster like that of 1927."

Notwithstanding the above report from the only committee in Congress devoted exclusively to flood control, its advice was not accepted by the Seventieth Congress and a bill was rushed through the Senate practically without debate and on May 15, 1928, was approved by the President.

Had Congress adopted a resolution imploring the Almighty to send us a repetition of the recent Mississippi disaster it would have caused amazement; yet the Seventieth Congress appropriated hundreds of millions of dollars to support the Jadwin project, which will produce such repetition just as sure as the sun is to rise, unless the Almighty shall intervene.

WHAT IS TO BE DONE ABOUT IT?

It is the purpose of this pamphlet and the desire of many Senators and Representatives that the incoming Seventy-first Congress will amend the present law under which the Jadwin project for flood control was adopted, and that in its stead a project to be determined by a board composed in part of at least nine distinguished, unprejudiced civilian engineers shall be substituted.

FIRST CHAPTER OF REVELATIONS

While the Old Lady of the River (the Mississippi River Commission), Mother of "Levees Only," stood spellbound viewing her disaster of 1927, there unconstitutionally arose from beneath her skirts one Jadwin (also guilty), by fate Chief of Engineers, clad only in her tattered old shoes, supported by Army engineers whose opposition would mean resignation, and who as a self-constituted oracle, presented his death bed conversion from "levees only," "fuse plugs" as his panacea, to which the old lady demurred.

Ordered to a back seat and disrobed of her rights in order to cover his mechanical nakedness, both he and his fuse plugs received the most scorching rebuke ever administered by the Committee on Flood Control of the House to one holding his office. Finding the old lady had reached the forum before him, he claimed she had sneaked in through the back door, and while under interrogation by the chairman of the committee, he skedaddled.

The Frazier Senate Resolution 4477, Seventieth Congress, proposed to amend the present law for flood control under which the Jadwin project was hastily adopted, practically without any debate in the Senate, by the appointment of a board, incorporating at least nine unprejudiced civilian engineers of large experience, which would determine upon the plan to be finally adopted.

A DECLARATION OF WAR UPON THE ARMY ENGINEERS—BY THE COMMITTEE ON FLOOD CONTROL OF THE HOUSE

"The evidence presented to the committee consisting of official Government reports and documents, reports by State and local officials and testimony by witnesses proved the following conclusions:

"First. That the flood-control works heretofore constructed were neither adequate nor the right kind.

"Second. That they were not the right kind was the fault of the 'levees only,' policy of the Mississippi River Commission" (p. 4).

"Of all the engineers whose testimony is in the record, not one of them, aside from the Army engineers, was willing to approve the Jadwin plan in its entirety, and many of them pointed out fatal defects, as may be seen in their testimony" (p. 52).

"Fundamental doubts as to the technical soundness and efficacy of the plan submitted by General Jadwin was testified to by many engineers recognized by members of the committee, so it was necessary in the bill to create an organization competent to work out a dependable plan. The engineers best qualified by training and experience, as well as by personal experience fighting floods on the Mississippi River, objected to many of the engineering features of the Jadwin plan" (p. 16).

"The members of the committee were amazed to hear General Jadwin claim that he had exclusive authority to prepare plans for the flood control of the Mississippi River. * * * There is no law upon the statute book which authorizes the Chief of Engineers to call upon the Mississippi River Commission to submit to him its flood-control plans. Instead of the law as enacted by Congress being carried out, the Chief of Engineers took it upon himself to prepare a flood-control plan expending a large sum of money never appropriated by Congress in doing so, called upon the Mississippi River Commission to submit its plan to him, and received, suppressed it, and transmitted his own plan to Congress through the Secretary of War and the President. In fact, it was not until General Jadwin was called upon by the Committee on Flood Control of the House to transmit the Mississippi River Commission's report to it that the report saw the light of day, and when before the committee the general charged that the committee had received the commission's plan through the back door" (p. 47).

(The above are verbatim extracts from the report submitted by Hon. FRANK R. REID of Illinois, chairman of the Committee on Flood Control of the House, to accompany H. R. 8219, March 28, 1928, 70th Cong., 1st sess., Rept. No. 1072.)

CROSSING OF THE SWORDS

The author's sarcastic treatment of the general is due, in part, to his effort, when testifying before the Commerce Committee of the Senate, to make those gentlemen believe that the Riker Mississippi spillway should be treated as a river and not simply an outlet for flood water which it is, and when offered an opportunity to correct this misrepresentation, the correction was not made, nor in the revised statement of his testimony, in the published hearings of that committee, on page 652, part 3, February 11, 1928, which follows:

"General JADWIN. Mr. Chairman, Mr. Riker's project has been studied by him very carefully and it is very alluring in many ways, but we could not bring ourselves to recommend it, largely on quantitative grounds, and on the ground that the way that we believe the river wants to work, it does not incline to work very much in straight lines.

"Mr. RIKER. Mr. Chairman, may I reply to just one statement that General Jadwin makes that there is difficulty in the river maintaining a straight line? He assumes that this is a river. There must be no such association. * * * And if the Chief of Engineers reiterates his statement that the natural inclination of water in motion is to take other than a straight line, then he places himself in a position that I know he dare not put upon the record."

Such misrepresentations are not a prerogative of his office. The author has crossed swords with four of his predecessors in office and compelled them to execute the quick military movement "right about face" in a friendly way, and the author offsets his age by his experience in this effort to compel Maj. Gen. Edgar Jadwin, Chief of Engineers, United States Army, to perform the same movement or to resign

THE RIKER MISSISSIPPI SPILLWAY

Is an outlet for the flood waters of the Mississippi River—a strip of land about 3 miles wide, provided with a levee on each side having minimum heights of about 40 feet and extending through the lowest part of the valley in an almost straight line about 530 miles long from Cairo, Ill., to the Gulf of Mexico.

It would safely conduct to the Gulf twice the water that has ever passed through the Mississippi River, or through its alluvial valley.

It would effectively control the maximum heights of waters flowing down the river below Cairo and the maximum and minimum below Memphis.

This would practically prevent bank erosion, caving banks, and bar formation, thereby effecting better navigation from the Gulf to Cairo, and would permit the river to be bridged at frequent intervals.

While a flood twice that of 1927 was passing down the spillway there would be but little backwater in the Mississippi's tributaries, which would greatly increase their drainage ability and there would be no backwater in the valley.

It would so control the maximum flow in the Mississippi River that it could be dammed, thereby enabling it to be canalized, and its waters to be utilized for deep-water navigation and for power; it would also eliminate all backwater in confluent rivers and afford perfect drainage to the valley when twice a 1927 flood was passing through the spillway to the Gulf.

The tops of the spillway levees would afford two broad, practically straight and level roadbeds for highways and railroads from Cairo to the Gulf.

The light silt carried by the waters of the Mississippi River would be largely deposited where required within the spillway, or where desired nearby, while the heavy silt would be deposited in the most advantageous location for spoil banks near the river.

If the river be canalized, the heavy silt would be transported through what is termed the terraqueous conduit, consisting of a reinforced concrete tube about 12 feet in diameter, extending through the center of the spillway, practically from Cairo to the Gulf, by which this silt would be delivered to fill swamps, lagoons, and lowlands situated near the Gulf.

The cost of the Riker Mississippi spillway (including the right of way) completely equipped and ready for use within six years, would be $785,000,000

CANALIZATION AND POWER DEVELOPMENT OF THE MISSISSIPPI

When the Riker Mississippi spillway is completed it would be very advantageous for the Federal Government to canalize the Mississippi River and utilize it for navigation and power.

The canalization of the river would enable it to be maintained easily navigable for the largest vessels from the Gulf to Cairo and to utilize at least 10,000,000 of its latent horsepower, now pouring wastefully into the Gulf.

Canalization of the Mississippi River would reduce the average high-water level therein below the dams to about 15 to 25 feet above zero, or 35 to 45 feet below the tops of its present levees, when twice a 1927 flood was passing through the spillway.

Such canalization would thus enable its confluent rivers to drain millions of acres which their backwaters now overflow, and double or treble their capacity to drain their legitimate territory, largely because of their increased velocity, which, when properly directed, would straighten them and greatly deepen their channels.

TERRAQUEOUS CONDUIT

The terraqueous conduit is a reinforced concrete tube about 12 feet in diameter, extending through the center of the spillway for practically its entire length, with cross conduits at each dam.

When the river is canalized the heavy silt which it would deposit in lures at the river's bottom would be pumped and propelled by plants operated by electric power which would be provided by the power plants in the river to locations where desired for filling in, etc.

DETAILED PROFITS OF THE RIKER SPILLWAY PROJECT

PROFIT FROM THE PROTECTED DELTA

The following estimates of the increased value of well-protected land in the Delta valley of the Mississippi is based upon General Jadwin's estimate of $224 per acre as the present value of well-protected parts of that valley, and upon the assumption that perfect protection, thorough drainage of it and the neighboring lands, increased healthfulness because of the reduction in malaria and mosquitoes, the finest railroad transportation in the world, and port facilities on the Gulf, together with unlimited, low-priced electricity for power and other purposes, and the canalization of the river for ocean steamers to Cairo, will double the present value of that land. Nineteen million sixty-five thousand and six hundred acres at $224 per acre: Increased value: Estimated profits in five years, $4,270,694,400; estimated profits in 50 years, $4,270,694,400; interest, 45 years at 4 per cent (not compounded), $7,188,000,000.

PROFIT FROM THE UNPROTECTED DELTA

Basing this area also upon the statements of General Jadwin as 7,065,600 acres, and assuming its present value to be not more than $24 per acre, the enhanced value of this virgin land when drained and thoroughly protected, as it would be by the spillway, at $424 per acre, the appreciated value of the present protected Delta would be in five years, $2,995,814,400; estimated profits in 50 years, $2,995,814,400; interest, 45 years at 4 per cent (not compounded), $5,991,628,800.

PROFIT FROM THE ADJOINING TERRITORY

It is believed that the value of property in New Orleans, Baton Rouge, Natchez, Memphis, Cairo, and other cities and towns, together with near-by real estate on the east side of the river not subject to overflow, would double in value, as would also cities and lands in the valleys of the Red, Oquita, Arkansas, White, and St. Francis Rivers, due to the removal of Mississippi River backwater at their mouths, and estimating this area as equal to that of the entire alluvial valley, or 19,000,000 acres at $224 per acre, increased value would be, in five years, $4,256,000,000; estimated profits in 50 years, $4,256,000,000; interest, 45 years at 4 per cent (not compounded), $7,650,000,000.

PROFIT FROM POWER DEVELOPMENT OF THE MISSISSIPPI RIVER

The power which would be developed at the dams in the Mississippi River, based on its minimum flow, when a reservoir had been constructed above Bismarck on the Missouri River, is estimated to be not less than 10,000,000 horsepower, practically all of which would quickly be merchantable at $5 per horsepower annually. In five years the gross receipts would be $250,000,000; estimated profits in 50 years, $2,500,000,000.

When full reservoir control of the tributary streams to the Mississippi had been effected, the estimated minimum horsepower would be more than 15,000,000.

PROFIT FROM THE CANALIZATION OF THE MISSISSIPPI

It is expected that no lockage charge from Cairo to the Gulf would be exacted, and therefore no direct revenue can be estimated, but what would seem to be an equitable toll for such benefits would be 30 cents per ton, based upon 50,000 tons daily, would be $5,000,000 annually. Estimated profits for 5 years, $25,000,000; estimated profits for 50 years, $250,000,000.

PROFIT FROM THE RAILROADS

The estimated revenue from the 1,070 miles of railroad roadbed which the tops of the spillway levees would afford is estimated at $5,000,000 per year, or for the first 5 years, $25,000,000; estimated profits in 50 years, $250,000,000.

PROFIT FROM THE HIGHWAYS

The estimated value of the levee tops for highways for freight and pleasure vehicles (approximately 10,000 per day at 50 cents toll) would be, the first 5 years, $5,000,000; estimated profits in 50 years, $90,000,000.

PROFIT FROM THE TERRAQUEOUS CONDUIT

The value of the land formed by the silt, transported by the terraqueous conduit and deposited in lagoons and lowlands of the valley, more than 30,000 acres yearly at $400 per acre (based upon Jadwin's estimates), would be, for 5 years, $60,000,000; estimated profits in 50 years, $600,000,000.

PROFIT FROM THE CLIMATIC IMPROVEMENT

No estimate in dollars can at present be made of the climatic benefits which will follow the drainage of the Mississippi Valley, that saturated area being the trigger which causes the clouds to prematurely explode over it. As to the moneyed benefits to the Nation from such a climatic change in whole, or even in part, the author saith not, because to the many not familiar with the simple, irrefutable evidence which supports it, it will seem as but a dream, as did the small claims for electricity to him in his youth more than three score years ago, since developed beyond any dream.

Gross profit	11,877,508,800
Cost, interest, etc	1,875,000,000

All could be completed within nine years.

Large as these figures are, the increment due to improved climatic conditions and perfect security against flood are but partially included.

Pare these figures as you will. They still remain unprecedented.

Verbatim quotation from General Jadwin's project, submitted December 1, 1927, used as basis for above calculations.

FEATURES OF THE MISSISSIPPI VALLEY WHICH MAKE BOTH ITS DRAINAGE AND ITS FLOOD PROTECTION BY RIVER LEVEES AN IMPOSSIBILITY

The physical features of the Mississippi Valley below Cairo make control of the river by levees and the drainage of the valley an impossibility when undertaken in opposition to nature, as is the project of General Jadwin, recently authorized by Congress.

The alluvial valley of the Mississippi River extends almost straight and flat, as a gently declining flood plain, averaging more than 50 miles wide, with a fall of about 300 feet, in its length of 530 miles, from the junction of the Ohio River with the Mississippi at Cairo, to the Gulf of Mexico.

In its course between these points the Mississippi River meanders over 1,070 miles, or more than twice the length of its flood plain (the Mississippi Valley), and instead of passing through the lowest parts of the valley much of it now travels along the top of a ridge which sediment from its overflows has created.

Before man undertook to confine its waters by levees, its floods gently overflowed its banks and found their way by this flood plain to the Gulf of Mexico. To prevent this overflow and carry its flood waters by the river to the Gulf, levees have been constructed to confine them to the river. Recently the waters, so confined, have risen to an average of about 25 feet above the lowest part of the adjacent valley, and in many instances to much greater heights.

When the waters of the Mississippi are at such an elevation it is evident that they greatly handicap the drainage of the valley and of the river's tributaries.

The waters of the valley, thus confined, are termed "backwaters," which during ordinary floods now cover more than 6,000,000 acres and would still continue to do so, should General Jadwin's project work to his most sanguine expectations. If it should not, then more than 18,000,000 acres are subject to overflow at any time, accompanied by the probabilities of a disaster unprecedented.

The Jadwin levees, which are to be but 12 feet wide on top and but 1 foot above the highest predicted flood waters of this mighty river, present to everyone a great evident danger; but this evident danger is less than that from caving banks, and the least evident danger, that from the sand boil, is the greatest of them all, largely because it attacks the levee from beneath.

The sand boil is produced by flood waters in the river which are at an elevation above the land just outside the levee being forced through the porous strata beneath it, which eventually make a tunnel, causing the levee to suddenly collapse. The danger from the sand boil increases much faster than the increase in the elevation of the water in the river and the danger from these sand boils is greatly increased by the duration of the flood waters.

THE ABSURD JADWIN PROJECT WHICH CONGRESS HAS ADOPTED

The Jadwin project, which Congress has adopted, places its entire dependency for flood control along the Mississippi River, from Cairo to the Gulf, upon "levees only."

The Jadwin project would protect these levees from overflow by employing General Jadwin's so-called fuse plugs, which are weak levees to be situated at a number of places, and which he calculates the river will break through just before the adjacent levees are overflowed.

The uncontrolled and unknown quantity of the water passing through these river-controlled openings,, or crevasses in the river's levees, which General Jadwin would so create, General Jadwin precipitates into the valley, through which General Jadwin would provide flood ways for their passage to the Gulf.

At Bonnet Carre, which is 30 miles above New Orleans, General Jadwin provides his only gated, or man-controlled opening, for the release of flood waters.

General Jadwin provides about 20 miles of such fuse-plug openings, properly termed pop safety valves, for once they are opened either by man or by the river, man can not close nor control them until the river gives man its permission, a pagan-like, unnecessary, and foolish surrender of flood control to the river.

In the printed report of the Mississippi River Flood Control Board to the President, preceding the signature of General Jadwin, there appears on pages 12, 6, 7, and 4, respectively, the following statements:

"No plan is considered adequate which does not protect against the greatest flood predicted as possible."

"From Birds Point to New Madrid, Mo., the floodway provided by the adopted project will hold the maximum flood predicted as possible to 59 on the Cairo gauge and 1 foot below the proposed levee height. This will give a reasonable degree of safety to Cairo with its 15,000 inhabitants."

"From New Madrid, Mo., to the mouth of the Arkansas River, the adopted plan provides for raising levees to a grade line 1 foot above the superflood except opposite the backwater stage of the St. Francis and the White."

"A 1-foot free-board for such superflood which corresponds to a discharge of from 2,400,000 second-feet at Cairo."

None but an oracle could truthfully predict what is possible in the rainfall and other factors involved in this problem; "but fools step in where angels fear to tread."

The maximum, or greatest predicted possible flood which General Jadwin calls superflood, he states to be 2,400,000 second-feet at Cairo and this General Jadwin claims his levees, whose tops are to be but 1 foot above such a flood, will safely convey to the mouth of the Arkansas River without a break; while the report of Hon. FRANK R. REID, chairman from the Committee on Flood Control Seventieth Congress, first session, House of Representatives, report No. 1072, on page 347, quoting the Mississippi River Commission, shows that such estimate is 600,000 second-feet less than that which the Mississippi River Commission states as possible, but does not seem probable.

"As a basis for a new project, it was determined to set up a probable future maximum flow at Cairo. The discharge at Cairo in 1927 was approximately 1,800,000 second-feet. In determining how much larger flood should be provided for consideration was given to the fact that if to the maximum discharge of the Mississippi at St. Louis there was added the maximum discharges of the Wabash at Mount Carmel, the Ohio at Evansville, and the Tennessee at Florence, the total would aggregate over 3,000,000 second-feet.

"All of these combinations may be classified as possibilities, but it does not seem probable that rainfall sufficient to produce such coincident floods will ever occur."

It should be noted that the discharge of the river at Cairo in 1927 of approximately 1,800,000 second-feet, is more than 200,000 second-feet less than that which passed Cairo in 1912 and 1913.

It does not require an engineer to know that the word "possible," when used in this connection, is absurd, misleading, and calculated to deceive.

To show that General Jadwin fully understands the difference between the word "probability" and the word "possibility," as used in this description of the adopted project, paragraph 9, page 4, of his original pronunciamento is quoted below:

"Should Divine Providence ever send a flood of the maximum predicted by meteorological and flood experts as a remote probability but not beyond the bound of ultimate possibility," etc.

By the Jadwin project, the river's levees, about 1,000 miles long, are to be but 12 feet wide on top and to have a freeboard or height of about 1 foot above the level of the flood waters during the superflood which he states they will safely confline, or which are to be relieved by his pop-safety valves before the 1 foot of such soaked levee crown has given way.

Under such circumstances, it is quite evident that a windstorm blowing over a long reach in the river would engender a wave more than sufficient to overtop a levee with twice that freeboard.

It will also be evident that by such means, if the Jadwin fuse plugs should be in a protected place along the river banks, that the river may reject the location of the Jadwin fuse plug for a crevasse, and determine upon a location of its own—perhaps emptying its waters upon some town instead of into a flood way prepared by Mr. Jadwin.

After one of these Jadwin fuse plugs have been opened, Jadwin surrenders to the river all power to restrain the quantity or duration of its flow through it, until the flood in the river has subsided.

The river, in the interim, may choose such an opening in its side, for its future course through the valley, as it has some hundreds of times in the past.

The effect of the river's flood upon the size and character of these fuse-plug openings is governed by so many undeterminable factors that its exact effect is impossible to foretell; but what the effect of flood waters would be, even upon the more substantial parts of the levees, is concisely told by Colonel Potter, president of the Mississippi River Commission, on page 64 of report No. 1072, referred to:

"Colonel POTTER. If you start a flood over the top of any levee, it is going to tear that levee all to pieces."

It is into the hands of this man, General Jadwin, that the Congress of the United States has now intrusted much property and the lives of many citizens in the valley, and specifically those of Cairo. The expenditure of three hundred millions, as stated by General Jadwin, is more likely to be a billion five hundred million before the river is effectively held by revetment.

This engineering undertaking by its ignominious failure will place an ineffable stigma upon the engineering ability of the Army engineers, and if the Corps of Army Engineers have any regard for their prestige, of which they seem so jealous, it is time that their voices were raised in a chorus against the stultifying engineering assumptions of this General Jadwin who has happened to succeed to a high place in their ranks.

General Jadwin, from his high perch as Chief of Engineers, with an Army-constituted halo about him, as an oracle, on December 1, 1928, issued his original manifesto, announcing the birth of the "Jadwin plan," an abortive engineering monstrosity of 50 years' gestation, which Congress, for the honor of its country, should order to be smothered and buried as soon as possible very darkly at dead of night, with only the light of that halo to guide them.

If the Jadwin plan was the result of one deranged brain, it would be called pitiable; but as the Army engineers' conclusion, after 50 years' continuous failure under the hallucination of their goddess, "levees only," the only word which properly defines the Jadwin plan is "monstrosity."

The woeful want of knowledge concerning the basic, underlying, and fundamental laws of physics and their applications, misstatements, and misrepresentations of facts which General Jadwin, Chief of Engineers, United States Army, has exhibited, are stultifying. His revised statements at the hearings before the Committee on Commerce, United States Senate, on the 11th day of February, 1928, replying to the inquiry of the United States Senate concerning it, to be found in the appendix, will make that evident to anyone.

On September 29, 1914 (14 years ago), when the House had under consideration a river and harbor bill, and at which time H. R. 18169, embodying the Riker spillway project, practically as of now, was before Congress, the following statements by the author are to be found in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD. And how true his predictions then made were is proven by the flood of 1927.

"The plans of the United States Army engineers for control of the Mississippi River are the greatest engineering blunders which have ever been perpetrated upon a nation. These plans show that they do not understand the underlying first principles which naturally govern the flow of a river. If an advisory board of consulting engineers be appointed, who are not graduates of West Point, to investigate these plans and they use as data only that which is printed and officially indorsed by those Army engineers, they will certainly confirm the above statements after less than 24 hours of actual consideration.

"Thirty-four annual reports of the Mississippi River Commission concurred in by the various Chiefs of Engineers, United States Army, then acting, are mute witnesses against them that can never be effaced.

"They are now preparing a trap for the unconscious, confiding settlers in the valley of that river, which will terminate in a terrible catastrophe as certain as the sun is to rise, unless the present program be radically modified."

The succeeding 15 years, climaxed by the recent devastating flood of 1927, show that they were the greatest engineering blunders which had ever been perpetrated upon a nation, and time will verify the author's present statements and prove that the Jadwin plan is a monstrosity.

This pamphlet shows that the Jadwin plan embodies but a continuation of the antiquated, embalmed fallacies and lack of good judgment and foresight upon the part of the Army engineers who support it, which has caused one disaster after another in the valley for more than 50 years; and that the Jadwin plan, if carried out, will be the greatest national engineering abortion ever perpetrated upon a nation.

General Jadwin admits that he is unable to determine what his plan will cost, or the cost of maintenance; but other authorities estimate his plan may cost eventually more than $1,500,000,000 and more than $50,000,000 yearly for thorough upkeep. He further states that, should his plan work to the best possible advantage, there will be more than 6,000,000 acres of land in danger of overflow at all times from the fuse plugs of his levees, or from backwater, while should his plans not work to the perfection he expects (but others do not) there would be the greatest catastrophe this country has ever known.

Its great initial cost, that of continuous maintenance, inefficiency, and the property damages which General Jadwin shows and admits are sure to occur, even should his plan meet his most sanguine expectations, make its adoption without a full and competent inquiry as to whether there is a better plan, preposterous.

Under authority from Congress, General Jadwin, the Mississippi River Commission, and an engineer appointed by the President, have agreed upon a plan for control of this river hereinafter called the adopted Jadwin project. The plan they have adopted again depends only upon levees for protection, as has been the slogan of the Army engineers for the past 50 years. For many years they have continuously ridiculed suggestions for the use of controlled spillways by which an excess of water behind the levees, especially the height of the cap of a flood wave could be relieved, and the gates then closed. And in the place of such emergency relief, which could be under man's absolute control, they have substituted what General Jadwin calls "fuse plugs," which are stretches of levees made so tender and at such an elevation that they will let go or can be blown up at just the proper time and thereby relieve the situation, but without any power to close these openings until the flood is over, and the destruction which their uncontrolled volume and duration has inflicted upon the valley into which they empty has occurred.

That the Army engineers are incompetent to formulate a plan for control of the Mississippi compatible with the advances of mechanical engineering, is the consensus of practically every engineer who has given thought to this matter, and even Washington newspapers (who feel they must tread gingerly on Army toes) express that opinion. The following is reprinted from the Washington Post, April 1, 1928:

"The success or failure of flood control hinges upon the commission that is to be created. If this commission is composed of the best engineering ability in the United States, unhampered by preconceived notions and with ample power to adopt and execute any plan it may adopt, it will succeed in controlling the Mississippi. But if it is composed principally of Army engineers, who are more or less bound to follow old and discredited methods, or if it is fettered by a plan foisted upon it by Congress, it will fail, no matter how much money may be appropriated.

"Congress will merely retard and confuse this task if it adopts any plan in advance. It should create a strong commission, with extraordinary and ample powers, and charge it with the sole duty of controlling the floods of the Mississippi River. The question as to the method of control would be left entirely to the commission."

The Manufacturers Record, Baltimore, Md., April 19, 1928, states:

"In view of the sad failure of the Engineer Corps in the past to recognize that levees alone could not solve the problem—which they now freely admit—neither the country at large nor Congress can have full confidence in any plan which the Engineer Corps submits."

"The President has found himself in a most peculiar situation, which has developed in this fashion: Last December General Jadwin submitted to Congress his plan for control of the Mississippi floods which he estimated, would cost $296,400,000 for construction plus the costs of the rights of way. The States to be 'protected' by the plan were to pay for the rights of way plus 20 per cent of the $296,400,000, leaving a cost of $237,120,000 for the Federal Government's share. Since General Jadwin is the President's official advisor in such matters and since the cost figures he presented were so much lower than had been expected, the President indorsed the plan.

"But when civilian engineers came to examine the plan they found untried experiments, they found proposals considered unsound by able engineers experienced in river work, and expert testimony accumulated to overwhelming proportions in condemnation of the engineering features of the plan. Then the estimates of the cost of the rights of way, which General Jadwin had concealed by scattering them through the plan in fragments at wide intervals, were correlated, and it was found—and General Jadwin has admitted—that the rights of way necessary to his plan would cost over $1,000,000,000.

"Congress had upon its hands a plan which contained engineering features feared and distrusted by the States it proposed to protect; and Congress rightly concluded that it could not force the plan upon these States unless it would put upon the Federal Government full liability for damages resulting from a failure, in any future flood, of the Jadwin plan. Also, it found that the plan demanded of three Mississippi Valley States a contribution of approximately $1,250,000,000 while requiring of the Federal Government an expenditure of a little over $237,000,000. Since the contribution demanded of the States to be protected was manifestly absurd and impossible, it put all of the cost—approximately $1,500,000,000—upon the Federal Government.

"Further, all of this vast expenditure was proposed to be made in permitting the undiminished Mississippi floods to overflow half the lower valley by confining them between higher levees; while the thousands of miles of valleys of the Ohio, Missouri, Arkansas, and other tributaries, which would pay by far the larger part of the cost, would remain subject, as they now are, to devastation by the floods which, when combined, overflow the Mississippi Valley. So far as these rich valleys are concerned, they would remain to be protected after the outlay of $1,500,000,000 had been completed in the lower valley.

"This is the untenable position into which General Jadwin has gotten himself and his corps. No wonder Congress has repudiated him."

THE RIKER SPILLWAY PROJECT FOR CONTROL AND UTILIZATION OF THE WATERS OF THE MISSISSIPPI RIVER AND THE DRAINAGE OF ITS VALLEY, BASED UPON THE ABILITY OF THE RIKER MISSISSIPPI SPILLWAY TO CARRY SAFELY TO THE GULF TWICE THE FLOOD WATER THAT HAS EVER PASSED THROUGH THE MISSISSIPPI VALLEY

The spillway would consist of a strip of land about 3 miles wide, from which the buildings, trees (except their stumps), and other large obstructions had been removed, extending in an almost straight line about 530 miles long from near the junction of the Ohio with the Mississippi River at Cairo to the Gulf of Mexico, except from near the junction of the Red River with the Mississippi, whence to the Gulf it would be about 4 miles wide.

This spillway would pass through the lowest undrained swamps and almost entirely through the least valuable parts of the St. Francis, the Yazoo, Tensas, and Atchafalaya Basins of the Mississippi Valley, crossing the Mississippi River about 20 miles below Memphis and recrossing it about 20 miles above Vicksburg.

This spillway strip would be located in the center of a strip of land 5 miles wide, all of which would be purchased by the Federal Government from the States which it traversed at the upset price of $25 per acre, the States making their own settlements with the landowners. This land would become Federal property forever and remain free from all State taxation.

The narrow strip on each side of the spillway situated between it and the other property in the valley is hereinafter called the intervening territory.

This spillway strip, 3 miles wide, would be provided with a levee on each side having a minimum height of about 40 feet, a width at its base of about 300 feet, and at its top of about 130 feet, while the levees on each side of the 4-mile strip would be larger. These levee tops would afford a continuous, practically straight, and level roadbed for railroads and vehicular traffic from Cairo to the Gulf.

The earth from which these great levees would be built is procured from a ditch about 250 feet wide and 50 feet deep just outside the spillway, which parallels the levee at a distance of not less than 250 feet therefrom.

As the spillway would pass through the lowest parts of the valley, millions of acres on the outside of these ditches would drain their waters into them, and they being straight, and kept so by a new and inexpensive means, would have a capacity for carrying all the water which empties into them, as all the large rivers in the valley would empty directly into the Mississippi.

By these means millions of acres in the Mississippi Valley, which are now malaria-breeding swamps, would be drained into these ditches, as also many lagoons and other subaqueous lands, when they were filled in, as hereinafter described.

Great floating dredges should be employed to construct these levees, each cutting, such a ditch for its own flotation while placing the excavated materials into the levees.

These dredges would each have a discharge pipe about 9 feet in diameter, supported upon a series of railroad cars, traveling forward with the dredge upon a temporary series of short, parallel railroad tracks, and each dredge would have a dredging capacity of valley soil of not less than 250,000 cubic yards every 24 hours, and most of it would be so solid that as discharged it could be walked upon and remain standing in the levee.

Each of such dredges would have a greater capacity than that of any 100 dredges in existence for the delivery of such dredged material from the bottom of the ditch to the top of such levee over the intervening distance.

The inner side of each levee would be protected from erosion by a close and heavy growth of willows. The bottom of the spillway would be leveled by cleaning and plowing the high places and by then inducing the erosion therefrom and the matter suspended in the flood waters to be deposited in the low places when passing over them.

There would be about 10 reinforced concrete dams crossing the spillway, each would be provided with a continuous series of gates extending the full width of the spillway, and superimposed upon each dam would be a roadbed forming a bridge for railroad and vehicular travel across the spillway. There would be additional bridge crossings over the spillway, where required for travel, and roads across it at the spillway level, at convenient intervals for vehicular travel where there was no flood. The latter crossings would be of reinforced concrete and so constructed as not only to be uninjured by the floods but to function as eveners of the depth of flood waters passing through the spillway and to influence the deposit, where required, of matter passing over them.

The waters which during floods now pass through these basins of the Mississippi Valley as a shallow inundation, at times from 50 to 75 miles wide, would then be confined to this spillway strip about 3 miles wide, between its levees, except from where the spillway crossed the Red River, the spillway strip from that point to the Gulf of Mexico being about 4 miles wide between its levees; therefore the intervening territory would be less.

There would be many places where the height and other dimensions of these levees would be increased in such proportion, or with a proportionately greater base, as where they pass through a lake or lagoon, and in the Atchafalaya Valley about west of Baton Rouge, where there would be a stretch of levee exceeding a minimum height of 50 feet.

A reinforced concrete tube about 12 feet in diameter would extend through the center of both the 3-mile and the 4-mile spillways, for their entire length. Through it water, silt, sand, and gravel would be pumped from great, deep lures at several points in the bottom of the Mississippi River and elsewhere. This tube is hereinafter called the terraqueous conduit.

Material so pumped would be deposited in advance of the construction of the terraqueous conduit to a height of about 10 feet below the level of the levee tops, having a width on top of about 30 feet and a slope depending upon the character of the material pumped. Upon this levee so constructed, the terraqueous conduit would be embedded to a depth of about 10 feet.

By this means, the spillway would practically be divided into halves, thus permitting the examination of, or work upon either half, while the other was carrying an ordinary flood. By such division of the spillway, one half might be kept dry for years, while the other half was performing the functions of both.

Branches from this terraqueous conduit would extend as part of the concrete structure of the dams to each side of the spillway, through which the flow could be from or into the central spillway or across the same.

Boosters or propeller pumps would be employed at requisite places in the terraqueous conduit to maintain or accelerate the flow therethrough; and lures would also be provided in the spillway, for the removal of superfluous, heavy, or suspended matter deposited therein, which would be removed through the terraqueous conduit.

As soon as the Riker Mississippi spillway is completed, work upon the Mississippi River looking to its complete canalization should begin; first, by the construction of the master dams across the river; one just below the spillway's mouth near Cairo, one just below where the river is crossed by the spillway near Memphis, one below the recrossing near Vicksburg, and also one below where the river is connected with the spillway near Red River Landing or Morgan's Bend.

These master dams should be provided with gated control of the waters passing them down the river, also with locks for navigation, and with plants for the generation of electric power.

Several batteries of steam vacuum pumps, each battery having a common suction pipe about 8 feet in diameter, would connect with the bottom of the lures at least 100 feet deep, just above each master dam in the Mississippi River and at such other points as just below where the Arkansas River would empty into it, or at places in the spillway where there might be great accumulations of silt, and the discharge from these pumps would be into the terraqueous conduit.

Each dam in the spillway would effectively determine the height (or depth), and thereby the velocity of the water in the spillway between it and the preceding dam, whether the flow of the water in the spillway be a slight excess rejected by the master dams in the river or a flood twice that of 1927.

The lip or entrance to this spillway mouth would be practically level and about 6 miles long, thoroughly protected by reinforced concrete. When a flood as of 1927 was passing over it the water would be about 10 feet deep at the lower end, gradually increasing in depth to the upper end, and if it were swallowing a flood double that size it would be about 15 feet deep at the lower end, increasing in depth toward the upper end.

The gates in the first dam across the spillway below Cairo would control the height of the water passing over this lip. By increasing the depth of water at this dam and closing its gates the water at the lip of the spillway could be raised to the double flood level—15 feet deep—and very little pass down the spillways; while by lowering the height of the water at that dam by opening its gates such a velocity could be secured that a 1927 flood could be made to pass over the lip at a depth of 10 feet.

Similar concrete lips and dams would be placed across the spillway below where it crossed the Mississippi River, and where it crosses the Red River, also below where it connects with the Mississippi below Red River Landing.

There have been many estimates made, but a close determination of the area and the velocity of the Mississippi River during great floods never has and never can be made under past or present conditions. This is largely due to its quickly changing area and to the many centrifugal current actions engendered, especially by varying bank contours and sudden bar formations and eliminations, which cause its current to change very quickly at so many places in both its width and its depth, and vice versa. For these reasons all estimates of the river's flow which have been made are not closely dependable.

However, a rough comparison between the capacity of the spillway and that of the river can be made by estimating the river's area below Cairo as averaging when in flood one-half mile wide and 60 feet deep to within 1 foot of the top of the levees, and that of the spillway 3 miles wide.

The spillway, with a 10-foot depth of water passing through it, would have the same sectional area and the same capacity as the river at the same velocity; with 20 feet of water passing through the spillway it would have twice the sectional area and capacity at the same velocity, and with water 30 feet deep passing through the spillway at the same velocity as the river it would have three times that capacity. When the velocity of the water so passing through the spillway had twice the velocity of the river it would have six times its capacity, or more than twice the flood which General Jadwin predicts as possible.

One of the passes at the river's mouth should be provided with a center channel of restricted width, and all other passes or exits for the waters of the river should be closed.

By properly shaping and maintaining this pass as a jetty, it would quickly deepen the channel far out into the Gulf of Mexico, and the entrance to the pass would then be navigable for the largest vessels, and permit their passing at full speed.

Most of the light and all of the heavy silt and gravel would be removed from the river by the spillway, and by the lures situated in the Mississippi River near Cairo, Memphis, Vicksburg, and the Red River Crossing of the spillway and such other points in the river or the spillway as should be necessary. This material would be conveyed by the terraqueous conduit to places where required, so that there would be practically no filling in of the river or of the Gulf by its silt.

The amount of silt that is now carried by the Mississippi and delivered into the Gulf of Mexico yearly has been estimated by a number of supposedly competent authorities as averaging sufficient to cover 1,000 square miles 1 foot deep.

The canalization of the Mississippi River would limit the greatest possible flood height in the river to an average of more than 25 feet below the tops of its present levees for about 1,000 miles of its length. There would then be recovered from overflow along the river a very large area of most valuable land.

This area between the river's surface, when it shall be canalized, and the backsetting levees on the west, together with the area between such water level and the highlands on the east, constitutes an area estimated at about 4,000,000 acres, which is hereinafter called "riverside." This riverside would then become the most valuable land in the entire Mississippi Valley, as its increased value per acre would be at least $400. Such increased valuation of $1,600,000,000 would be greater than the cost of the spillway and the estimated cost of the canalization of the river and the terraqueous conduit, together with the purchase of the 1,750,000 acres of land required for the spillway strip estimated as not worth $24 per acre, or about $42,000,000.

The spillway levees are designed to have such height that when a Jadwin's greatest predicted flood was passing through the spillway, its waters would only rise to between 20 and 25 feet below its top, which is 130 feet wide, while those of the Jadwin project, according to his statements, would rise to about 1 foot above the top of his greatest predicted flood, and his levee is but 12 feet wide on top.

The soil of the Mississippi Valley where levees are to be built is generally of an alluvial nature, having little tenacity or power of adhesion, especially when wet, but has great capillary capacity, so that the Jadwin levee becomes easily saturated and so ready to erode or dissolve and float away that the least invitation of water in rapid movement against it to elope is accepted, to be quickly followed by a separation in some quiet spot.

The great weight in the levees of the spillway is such that it compresses this alluvial soil, both in the levee itself and the soil of the valley upon which the levee is built. Such pressure, together with the close willow growth which it is proposed to cultivate upon the inside of each levee, will effect a solidity and tenacity of the levee against erosion by the waters of the spillway passing through it, even at great velocity, that will prevent any such elopement of the soil with the water as is a feature of the Jadwin plan.

Some of the additional advantages which the Riker spillway project would produce are the benefits to be derived by the United States in case of war, which include the navigation of the river for the largest battleships or any other vessel now afloat to Cairo; the increased facilities for freight and passenger traffic from Cairo (almost the center of the United States) to the Gulf and vice versa, and incidentally the construction of vessels for ocean navigation at almost any point along the thousand miles of the river's length; the unequaled length of water surface and smooth landing fields for the landing of airplanes in time of peace or war, extending for 500 miles, if desired, free and clear from any obstructions.

The Hon. FRANK R. REID, in one of his communications to Congress upon flood control, makes the following statement:

"The need of the Mississippi as a carrier of United States and foreign commerce, the havoc wrought to interstate commerce, and the interference with the United States mail when uncontrolled; the increase to the National Treasury when industry is not stopped, the safety of life and property, and the promotion of the general welfare, * * * to these might be added one thing that would be worth all the cost—national defense. No foreign foe can ever conquer us as long as navigation is kept open on the Mississippi."

It would prevent interruption of United States mail in case of floods, which the Jadwin plan would cause.

The thorough drainage which the Riker spillway project would effect in the valleys and surrounding country, according to many authorities (including Army engineers), would undoubtedly lessen the rainfall in the valley, and the moisture then retained in the clouds passing over that valley would travel toward the foothills of the Rocky Mountains, because once having escaped the chilling, condensing tendency of the moisture-laden valley they would move westward under the ascending influence of the heated areas to the west; they would then rise and their moisture be condensed as rain by the cooler, upper strata of the atmosphere over those heated thirsty sands, instead of over a valley saturated by the cold flood waters of the Mississippi from the north, from its backwaters, and its own continuous rains.

The construction of the proposed Missouri River reservoir above Bismarck, N. Dak., capable of retaining a 30-day flood of the river, would so regulate its flow that instead of its flood waters, as now, bringing down millions upon millions of tons of alluvium or silt, according to the Army engineers, to be eventually deposited in the Gulf, there will be a great decrease. Any that there might be from the Missouri, the upper Mississippi, or the Ohio, would be removed from the great lures at the spillway mouth near Cairo, and transported by pumping and electrically driven boosting to such points between there and the Gulf of Mexico as might be required for filling in of old river beds and lagoons, and specifically for raising the surface of those lands in the Atchafalaya Valley which are now undrainable because of their slight elevation above the Gulf, or are under certain conditions overflowed by the Gulf.

It is proposed to construct a great ocean terminal with warehouses for the reception of ocean freights in transit, where solid trainloads of grain or other gross freight could be unloaded in a very short time and thereby remove the present expense incident to terminals which delay such unloading. Starting with untrammeled surroundings as would be possible here, the safest, most easily approached, and the most economical freight terminal in the world could be constructed at a nominal cost.

That the author is competent to express an opinion on that subject, and how it should be done, is borne out by his past experience, and shown by the following letter from the late General Goethals, the constructor of the Panama Canal, and who at the date of his writing of the letter below, was the consulting engineer for the Port of New York Authority.

GEORGE W. GOETHALS & CO. (INC.),
New York, March 30, 1921.

Mr. CARROLL L. RIKER,
East Falls Church, Va.

DEAR MR. RIKER: The plans for an international terminal transportation and shipbuilding undertaking, outlined in your recent letter to Senator WESLEY JONES, a copy of which I have read, appeals so favorably to me, that I should be willing to afford them my personal support and the engineering support of my corporation.

Sincerely yours,

GEO. W. GOETHALS.

TIME AS A FACTOR—TIME PROVES ADVICE REJECTED BY ARMY ENGINEERS FOR 13 YEARS WOULD HAVE AVERTED 1927 DISASTER

The Riker Mississippi spillway and ramifications, with their mechanical details, have been before Congress and the Army engineers for the past 15 years.

On April 21, 1913, the United States Board of Flood Control pronounced this plan "most interesting and fascinating," and later requested that details be furnished at the earliest possible moment.

Five days thereafter House Resolution 4296 was introduced, and on July 31, 1914, H. R. 18169, Sixty-third Congress, was introduced, which in its 68 pages gave full details of the Riker spillway project and the method of its construction, with its controlling gates, its dams, locks, power plants, etc., for the control and utilization of the waters of the Mississippi River.

On December 6, 1927, Senator FRAZIER introduced Senate Joint Resolution 7, which in its 84 pages embodies the Riker Mississippi spillway plan introduced 15 years ago, together with interlocking plans, for control and utilization of the waters of the Mississippi River and its tributaries, from Montana to the Gulf.

As war was declared in Europe on August 1, 1914, the day following the introduction of the House resolution of July 31, 1914, the bill was not given the consideration by Congress at that time which otherwise it might have received, but the president of the Mississippi River Commission and the Chief of Engineers, United States Army, were specifically made acquainted with its contents.

The only direct comment ever made by either of them, as far as ascertained, was that the levees were amply sufficient, or would shortly be made so, to fully protect the Mississippi Valley from any flood that might occur, and Col. C. McD. Townsend, then president of the Mississippi River Commission, sent the author a printed copy of an address made by him at Memphis, Tenn., September 26, 1913, containing the following:

"The Mississippi River Commission has explained with great detail in its reports its reasons for relying on levees for protecting the country from overflow, but they appear to be unknown not only to the country at large, but to many who reside in the Mississippi Valley and are most vitally interested in the problem.

"I therefore consider it proper to appear before you, accept the invitation of the illustrious speaker who preceded me, and state briefly reasons for rejecting the various methods of flood control, other than levees, which have been suggested.

"I also believe that the effect of outlets in reducing flood heights is not as great as is popularly supposed. The last flood, however, clearly demonstrated that wherever there was a large crevasse, which is but another name for outlet, the river ceased to rise."

It is surprising that even the then "last flood" should have clearly demonstrated to him the supposedly elementary fact that it was difficult to add without addition or subtract without reduction.

"And another lesson to be derived from this flood is that if you are going to reduce flood heights by this means, you must also control your outlet."

It is not surprising that it should have required more than 60 years of the Army engineers' experience with the river, for the commission and its president to have learned the lesson that this particular flood seems to have been required to teach them.

"Another serious objection to an outlet is the difficulty in regulating the velocity with which the water will flow through it at varying heights of the main stream.

"If it is so constructed that it will discharge at a greater velocity than the river itself, there is danger of its enlargement to such an extent as to divert the greater part of the flow down it, and transfer the main stream itself into an outlet; and if, on the other hand, it discharges at a lower velocity, it will tend to fill with sediment."

There is no engineering difficulty in maintaining a gated outlet for flood waters of the Mississippi River, which would regulate the quantity and the velocity of the water flowing through such outlet.

"Under these conditions it was necessary for the commission to establish a grade line for levee construction, and they announced a provisional grade, which was neither as low as many persons considered ample, nor as high as others thought necessary. This grade was generally accepted as a line to build to, the ultimate grade to which levees were to be constructed to be afterwards determined by observation.

"This was a most happy solution of the problem, as was forcibly demonstrated during the last flood, during which less than 1 per cent of the length of the levee line was destroyed."

This was, indeed, an amazing engineering solution of the problem; as 1 per cent of the levee's length is more than 10 miles, it would be an outlet more than sufficient to let out five times all the water in the river.

It will be remembered, however, that with this "most happy solution of the problem" before him, General Jadwin was unable to see the benefits of an outlet until after the city of New Orleans had forcibly demonstrated at Caernarven during the recent flood that subtraction did reduce. Though all the engineers in the country might advocate controlled spillways, it would be heresy for a Chief of Engineers to accept any suggestions that his predecessors had turned down, and he therefore, instead of committing such an unpardonable offense, has substituted what no one has ever before conceived, what he terms "fuse plugs," sections of the river's levees purposely made so tender that when the flood has reached a predetermined height they are expected to let go (or be blown up) and thereby create an uncontrolled crevasse which will relieve the river.

As an argument against plans for control of the Mississippi River being determined by other than Army engineers, it is stated by their supporters that it would affect "their prestige" before the world; whereas, if they be permitted to execute the Jadwin plan, their prestige, of which the past has already deprived the Army engineers, will be converted into criminal responsibility in the eyes of the world.

When Congress realizes the seriousness of the deception which the Jadwin plan would practice upon it, as it ultimately will, the author's plain statement of facts and caustic handling of that plan will be pardoned.

CONTROL OF THE MISSOURI, ITS MASTER DAM, AND RAMIFICATIONS—HOW THEY WILL TRANSFORM THE MISSOURI RIVER FROM AN UNCONTROLLABLE FLOOD BREEDER INTO A PRICELESS ASSET

Probably nowhere in the world is there existent a better opportunity for checking a river's flood by the construction of a great reservoir to receive it, than exists near the headwaters of the Missouri River, just north of Bismark, N. Dak.

On the premises Senator FRAZIER and the author examined various sites for dam and finally located the site for the master dam hereinafter described (which was afterwards indorsed by survey), and which is referred to in the following letter of the late Governor Sorlie, of North Dakota, to the builder of the Panama Canal, General Goethals (also deceased) just before his death.

STATE OF NORTH DAKOTA,
OFFICE OF THE GOVERNOR,
Bismarck, October 19, 1927.

Gen. GEO. W. GOETHALS,
40 Wall Street, New York, N. Y.

MY DEAR GENERAL GOETHALS: We are very much interested in North Dakota in an engineering problem which has been presented to us by Mr. C. L. Riker, and which has been partially worked out by him.

Is it possible for you to come here to look this project over so that we might have your opinion as to its feasibility, practicability, and the cost of construction of the dam? I hope it may be possible for you to come to North Dakota immediately.

We are expecting to go before Congress to ask for appropriations covering this project.

Very truly yours,

A. G. SORLIE.

The physical features of the Missouri River Valley below the junction of the Yellowstone with that river are such that they make its flood control and fitness for navigation impossible when undertaken by the present methods, but by the construction of a great master dam across this river in North Dakota where nature has provided a site for it and for a great reservoir, its flood control, navigation, and power production become not only possible and practicable but inexpensive and alluring beyond first conception.

To control this river so as to maintain navigation with its varying currents and floods has been the duty of the United States Army engineers for more than half a century, but because they have spent many millions of dollars in their senile petty combats with nature and have failed is no reason it can not be done, when nature is cooperated with and her great provisions to that end are embraced.

To this end, the first step is a great master dam across the Missouri River just below the junction of the Little Missouri with it, capable of impounding water to a depth of 150 feet. This would produce a lake or reservoir extending to Williston, near the Montana line, about 138 miles long, averaging about 2 miles wide and which would contain about 500,000,000,000 cubic feet of water or amply sufficient to make nearly uniform, or to otherwise control, the flow of this river, which would then be absolutely under man's control at this point.

As proposed, this dam would reach to a height of 210 feet above the present river level and could impound water 200 feet deep if required, which would increase the contents of the lake to about 1,000,000,000,000 cubic feet, and extend it to the Montana line.

This dam would be composed of clay, sand, and silt pumped into position somewhat as was the dam at Gatun, Canal Zone, and would contain nearly 100,000,000 cubic yards, upon a foundation of stiff clay. (The author twice visited the Canal Zone and examined both the substrata and the placing of the material in the dam, at the request of General Goethals, upon the suggestion of Gen. Peter C. Hains, Chief of Engineers, United States Army.)

This earth would be placed in the dam by great floating dredges of the most improved construction at a very low cost, probably by the dredges previously used upon the Riker Mississippi spillway; and they could complete the work in less than one-fourth of the time and less than one-fourth of the cost which would be required to provide a dam made of concrete or of masonry having equal capacity, strength, and safety.

The earth required would be dredged from above the dam, which would be about 2 miles long, about one-half mile wide across its base, and about 300 feet wide across its top, which would be about 210 feet above the present river level; the slope of its banks would be about 1 to 7.

The most dangerous feature in an earthen dam is an overflow, especially over a dam of this height. This would be eliminated and instead an overflow would be provided at a distance of a mile or more from the dam by a spillway detour around it about 2 miles long, which the topography of the country has already practically provided.

Great steel tubes, thoroughly incased in reinforced concrete, would extend through this dam to the power plants, which would be situated on the lower face. These tubes under the great head or pressure would have an aggregate area sufficient to pass at least twice the normal flow of the river, so that an excessive amount of water behind the dam would be relieved before the height of the spillway overflow was reached.

It is proposed to have a marine railway over this dam capable of raising and lowering boats of 750 tons displacement between the river and the surface of the lake above it, and vice versa.

Railroads and other roads, gas, water, electric, and other utilities could pass over this dam, occupying, if needed, most of its flat top or crest, which would be about 300 feet wide.

The immense body of water restrained by this master dam calls for an integrity that can not be questioned.

This would be accomplished by an asphaltum-covered plate, or boiler iron, or steel in the form of a great apron, wall, or core, extending through the center of the dam for its whole length and height.

This metal core would be embedded in reinforced concrete about 12 inches thick, securely tied through the steel plate by anchor bolts. The concrete provision to supplant the metal plate in centuries to come, when the steel may have rusted away, and also effect a drainage which will prevent water settling against the metal core on the lake side.

It is believed that this master dam would be invulnerable as against anything that might occur, and that it would fully protect the Missouri Valley below it from the water it confined.

An earthquake that would render the neighboring hills asunder would not cause a dangerous rupture in the sheet-steel wall, but it would simply yield to the water's pressure at the point of rupture and confine the flow to such a gap slightly enlarged.

The quantity of water impounded by this master dam would be greater than that confined by any other reservoir made by man.

The system, including the master dam and its subsidiary dams along the river to St. Louis, would generate more power than any other power plant in existence. The system would permit 7-foot draft navigation from St. Louis to Montana. Full canalization later would supply sufficient depth for much deeper draft.

After completion of the master dam, it would be practicable by use of the four mammoth dredges proposed for it to construct the dam near the South Dakota line so as to restrain water 45 feet deep, and to canalize the river as described; to fill the old bends to above the present river surface by its own action, as work proceeded, and to dredge a new straight channel for the river as described, in less than four years and at a very low total cost.

The four large dredges, when handling river silt with the aid of great electric power derived from the master dam, should each handle at least 200,000 yards of material every 24 hours. Placing their joint output at half that amount or 400,000 yards per day, the 400,000,000 yards to be dredged could be moved in less than four years.

SOME OF THE ADVANTAGES RESULTING FROM THIS DAM

Instead of the annual spring flood caused by the melting of the snow in the headwaters of the Missouri and the Yellowstone sweeping down to the Mississippi in an irresistible volume, it would be restrained by this dam, and this now destructive volume of water and mud would be liberated in any desired quantity, to be determined by man, and not by the elements; and as a stream of crystal pure water. It would enable the Missouri to be made a navigable river of uniform flow, and with its sisters, the Ohio and Mississippi, when also improved, form the greatest inland freight highway in the world.

Lake Dakota, formed by this master dam, would afford deep-water navigation for about 140 miles above this dam or nearly to the Montana line and deep-water navigation below the master dam to the Mississippi River could be effected by a system of by-plane canalization, as follows:

The river's bottom just below the master dam should be deepened to about 40 feet below the level of the present river bottom for a width of about 700 feet and straightened by the same pumping dredges that had made the master dam. This depth would gradually decrease until at a few miles below Bismarck it would meet the backwaters of another dam at Fort Rice, forming Little Dakota Lake.

Below this dam the river bottom would be again lowered and the same by-plane system employed as just described, lowering the bottom of the river until this deepened channel met the backwaters of another dam in South Dakota, and this method of by-planing should be continued until it reached the Mississippi.

The size of the facilities for handling boats over the master dam has been limited to 750 tons displacement for safety only, but the facilities for passing the lower dams can be of any size, type, or kind desired.

By thus lowering the bed of the river below each dam the inclination of the river bed would be lessened from about 8 inches to about 2 inches to the mile and the current velocity reduced from a maximum of 8 miles per hour to a uniform velocity of about 2 miles. Boats drawing 10 feet of water, displacing not more than 750 tons, could then navigate this river at full speed north or against the current without pilot from the Mississippi to Montana, and tows of considerable size and length, fully as large as those now on the Ohio and Mississippi, could do the same.

The river channel thus lowered and deepened would afford drainage for much bottom land now useless, and the material thus dredged from deepening and straightening these channels would be ample to fill most of the vacated old river channels.

The channel width, depth, and velocity of current are based upon an assumed controlled average yearly flow of 30,000 second-feet at the line between North and South Dakota. This figure is obtained from the best reliable, available data, which, however, is very meager; and although the Army engineers have had control of this river for more than an average man's lifetime, there are no records of this river's flow obtainable based upon any premise that is reliable and no map of the river is obtainable made later than 1895, while the large-scale maps of the river below North Dakota are not to be had at all until they are reprinted at purchaser's expense.

Under these circumstances it was impracticable for the author to formulate plans for any specific, comprehensive improvements below the North Dakota line.

Although the power which would be developed at the master dam and by the fall of the water at the canalization dams between the master dam and the Mississippi River amounts to millions of steady horsepower, it would be quickly in demand at a premium for commercial and domestic use, but it is believed that a large part of it should be used to pump water from the river for irrigation purposes beyond the immediate watershed through which the river travels.

Instead of permitting this 30,000 second-feet of water to flow into the sea for every second of time in the future as it has in the past, the thirsty soil of the States through which it passes should be enabled to retain it as far as possible by all practicable means.

When it is considered that these wasted waters are constantly pouring into the sea, it is evident that the rainfall, snow, or other moisture which continuously provides this flow must initially come from the sea. If this rainfall is just sufficient to maintain the flow continuously, it is evident that by retaining a part of this flow to fill by irrigation and otherwise some of the near-by thirsty soils of the States through which this river passes, that it would soon begin to change the climatic conditions somewhere as to moisture. To those who object to the water of this river being used for irrigation purposes in such volume as would actually and appreciably reduce its flow at its junction with the Mississippi when inaugurated, it should be apparent that, should every drop now passing into the Mississippi be used for irrigation in these thirsty States, that ultimately the lacking water in the parched soil would be replenished, the water table rise at least to its previous level, and the springs again begin to flow; also that the water which would then be evaporated would fall in greater volume near by to reenforce the present rainfall.

JADWIN'S REPLY TO THE SENATE

The following letter from General Jadwin to the President of the Senate is in reply to a request by the Senate for "a report upon the merits of the Riker Mississippi spillway" is taken verbatim from the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD:

WAR DEPARTMENT,
OFFICE OF THE CHIEF OF ENGINEERS,
Washington, April 28, 1928.

The PRESIDENT OF THE SENATE,
Washington, D. C.

SIR: Referring to the resolution passed by the Senate April 25, 1928, requesting the Chief of Engineers to report to the Senate upon the merits of the Riker Mississippi spillway plan for flood control, I attended the hearing of the Committee on Commerce on February 11, 1928, and heard Mr. Riker describe to the committee his Mississippi spillway plan for flood control. My comments thereon are printed on pages 652 and 653 of the hearings before the Committee on Commerce, United States Senate, Seventieth Congress, first session, part 3.

On April 16 I examined the model of the Riker spillway plan on exhibition in the basement of the Senate Office Building.

Flood ways for the relief of the main river below the mouth of the Arkansas are essential for flood control of the Mississippi if the maximum possible flood is to be protected against. But flood ways in the St. Francis or Yazoo Valleys are not an essential part of the plan and would result in claims for damages as lands have not been subject to overflow frequently in recent years.

The levees proposed along the Riker flood ways are, in my opinion, too high for safety, and the estimated cost for the whole project, $785,000,000, is too low. The low unit cost for earthwork is out of line with the experience of contractors and of the Government on work of a similar nature. The dredge proposed by him for use in building these levees is of a design that has not been proved. Drainage of the alluvial valley itself would be expensive and unsatisfactory, as most of the water would have to be pumped. The proposed dams would be expensive and uncertain in their operation. There are other matters of hydraulics and engineering, such as capacity and velocity of flow in the spillway and erosion of the bed and banks of the spillway, that are open to objection, as, for example, the natural slope of the ground from Red River to the Gulf of Mexico is very small, and a cleared flood way 3 miles wide with such a small slope will have insufficient capacity to carry the water brought to it from above, and therefore more water would be thrown down the main Mississippi River and pass New Orleans than can be carried in its channel between existing levees.

In general the plan would involve much greater costs than are necessary to a sound solution and can not be depended upon to secure the desired results.

Respectfully,

EDGAR JADWIN,
Major General, Chief of Engineers.

All of the above statements made by General Jadwin, except those which specifically refer to the Riker Mississippi spillway (which are disproved below) are disproved by well-known facts, the printed conclusions of the Committee on Flood Control of the House, those of the Mississippi River Commission, a host of civilian engineers and the presentation herein.

His statement that "the low unit cost of earthwork is out of line with the experience of contractors and the Government on work of a similar nature" has no foundation whatever in fact, because there never has been any work of a similar nature having one-hundredth part its magnitude. His opinion that the earthwork or levee cost of the Riker Mississippi spillway is too low is no doubt based upon his experience with an ass and a scoop placing earth in a river levee, or the inability of his giant Mississippi River sand suckers to accomplish it at any cost. As this work can be done by many other means than that proposed by the author at the price named, and as many builders of large earth-handling machinery would contract to construct machinery which would accomplish this work at the price named by the author (30 cents per cubic yard), he does not propose to disclose the design of the dredges which he would construct. Suffice it to say, however, that they can perform this work at a great deal less than that price and that they have the support of "precedent" (which is the deity of the Army engineers), both in filling in the Potomac Flats (the Speedway) at 50 per cent of the estimated cost by the Army engineers and of the appropriation therefor, in the baring of miles of bedrock of the Rio Grande in New Mexico, and in use elsewhere.

The Jadwin project will not aid the drainage of one acre of land in the entire Mississippi Valley, but Jadwin admits it will cover millions of acres with backwater should his project work to his most sanguine expectations. The Riker Mississippi spillway will aid the drainage of every acre in the valley, will not allow one acre to be covered with backwater, and the very small amount of pumping required will be performed by power derived from the flood waters themselves passing through the spillway. If the river be canalized, there will not be an acre subject to backwater and all the rivers confluent with the Mississippi will find it ready to receive their discharges at an elevation below its bank-full stage, thereby doubling and trebling the discharge and drainage capacity of those rivers when a largest Jadwin-predicted possible flood was passing through the valley.

The Riker levees referred to average about 50 feet high and 300 feet on the base, 3 miles apart, built on the surface of a practically level valley. The Jadwin levees can not be made high because of insecure foundations on river banks, lack of available material, river erosion, etc., not one of which objections are even tenable in the case of the permanent supersafety levees of the Riker Mississippi spillway.

By the growth of small willows along the inner banks of the levees and larger willows extending out a few hundred feet therefrom, bank erosion would be practically eliminated, and as the spillway would not be in continuous operation, an impairment of its banks or erosion of its bottom could be cared for when dry.

The criticism of the proposed dams of reinforced concrete, with steel gates controlled by man, could come only from one Maj. Gen. Edgar Jadwin, fortified by his fuse plugs, or gates of mud, which he places not in the power of man to control but unconditionally in the power of the river itself, both to open and to close.

The Riker Mississippi spillway is about 90 miles long from Red River to the Gulf and is straight as an arrow. The Mississippi River is 300 miles long and crooked as a snake. The spillway would have twice the area and average three times as much fall as the river in every mile of its length, and at the same velocity the discharge would be more than twice that of the Jadwin-predicted possible flood. It will require a dam at the Gulf of Mexico and another in the valley to check its velocity to twice that of the river, with four times its capacity.

SUMMARY OF THE BENEFITS FLOWING FROM THE RIKER MISSISSIPPI SPILLWAY PROJECT

No one to-day can foresee all the benefits to this country which would be derived from an absolute control of all the flood waters flowing through the Mississippi Valley. Many of them which are inconceivable to-day will be evident to future generations.

The Mississippi Valley is the very heart of the country, the Mississippi River the great artery, and the tributaries of the Mississippi the veins of this country. Its valley would be the agricultural center, its river banks would be the manufacturing and commercial center, and the Father of Waters the center of inland navigation and transportation, and when harnessed with his tributaries, their power, the greatest on earth, would be nationally available.

The plans herein submitted are believed to be the royal soivent for all the great and many of the small difficulties which have impeded previous efforts to control and utilize these rivers; and the near future will see these plans carried out and their ability to quickly repay their cost be demonstrated.

The plans presented will be found to incorporate no new, untried principle; they embody only constituent aggregations of simple units for producing which ample facilities exist, which careful engineering analysis would support, and their construction quickly demonstrate. The amount and the value of the power which could be economically developed by proper reservoiral and through conservation of the waters of the Mississippi and its tributaries near their sources thus increasing the minimum flow of the Mississippi when needed, is almost beyond comprehension.

The area which the spillway would occupy, 5 miles wide, extending mostly through the lowest part of the present swamps of the Mississippi Valley, would be less than the area that is embraced within the levees of the Mississippi River and the highlands which restrain it, and which territory would then become the most valuable in the valley and a profitable and attractive place in which to produce, manufacture, and to live.

In the description of the Riker Mississippi spillway project every effort has been made to avoid ambiguity, and especially to avoid the typical Jadwin straddle. Various estimates which supposed authorities have made concerning the amount of alluvium which the Mississippi deposits in the Gulf vary greatly, and at their best are only a guess; nevertheless, by means of the terraqueous conduit which the project incorporates, provision is made to handle the maximum. In such event it would take less than a man's lifetime to convert most of the low-lying part of the Atchafalaya Valley into a veritable Garden of Eden, at an elevation that would afford drainage and protection from high water in the Gulf.

If the report of the Committee on Flood Control (which is the only committee in Congress devoted exclusively to flood control) upon the merits of the Jadwin project is not sufficient to cause Congress to appoint a board of competent, unprejudiced engineers to determine upon a better project, it is to be hoped sufficient amplification will be found in the previous statements.

All other plans for flood relief have raised the question as to who shall pay the cost. If the United States should issue 4 per cent bonds for its construction, redeemable in 50 years, they could be quickly amortized. While the great improvement of the land values is an indirectly collectable asset, there would be directly collectable charges alone, if made, amply sufficient to quickly amortize the bonds. This is shown by the balance sheet presented herein.

The author has spent about $10,000 to present Congress with an ocular demonstration of the Riker Mississippi spillway project in the construction of the model exhibited under running water in the basement of the Senate Office Building, and to his knowledge there has never been an unfavorable comment made upon it by anyone (including all the engineers who have visited it during the past year), except by the Chief of Engineers, United States Army. The author has endeavored to present in the foregoing a sufficient description of the Riker Mississippi spillway project, both technical and otherwise, to enable the engineer or the layman to fully understand its simplicity and its engineering details; also the absurdity of and the danger which will result should the Jadwin adopted project be carried out.

Congress has expressed itself as incompetent to determine upon a plan for flood control of the Mississippi River, but in order that legislation might be quickly enacted for the reconstruction and strengthening of the levees to commence at once which could only be done under the management and control of the Army engineers, who now have all the machinery and organization to effect such a purpose, many Members of both Houses supported the bills as reported from the Senate and House committees who would not have voted for the bill as afterwards amended, whereby the determination of the project to be adopted was also practically placed in the hands of the Chief of Engineers.

The education of the Chiefs of Engineers of the United States Army has not been such as to qualify them as experts upon large engineering undertakings, especially any for which there is no actual precedent. The education which is obtained at the Military Academy at West Point, or later at the War College specifically fits them for engineering connected with the military affairs of this country and it is a well-known fact that much of the education and experience of Chiefs of Engineers, in other than military engineering, is obtained from Government contractors; this necessarily dwarfs their experience to precedent. Their incapacity to deal with the problem of the Mississippi River is shown by reoccurring disasters for more than half a century and is officially shown by the report of the Committee on Flood Control of the House.

There should be a board to determine upon the plan to be adopted and to supervise its execution to consist of at least 11 civilian engineers, personally disinterested in any plan, or unprejudiced in favor of or against any plan, of whom 2 should be hydraulic engineers, 2 mechanical engineers, 1 civil engineer, 2 engineers expert in concrete and steel construction, 2 expert in the construction of locks and dams, 1 in the construction of machinery for the movement of earth, and 1 electrical engineer.

The Riker Mississippi spillway project embodies vast construction in iron and steel, locks, power plants, and electric generators, largely consisting of great aggregations of well-known factors; and the author for one would be unwilling to submit his plans to a board composed of Army engineers or civilian engineers whose horizon and large engineering experience is principally bounded by the levees of the Mississippi River. Details imparting the author's experience of more than half a century, and plans worked out to their finest details, which would cover at least a month to fully discuss, will not be submitted by him to be passed upon by those whose engineering experience is limited to the leveed banks of the Mississippi River or by the precedent derived from experience with the River Poe, the Dnieper, or the Yangtze-kiang.

(Several estimates of different well-protected parts of the Delta valley result in an average price per acre of $224 when towns and all property, such as houses, roads, railroads, land, etc., are included. The total area of the valley originally subject to overflow is 29,790 square miles, or 19,065,600 acres, 12,000,000 acres of which is usable. This 12,000,000 acres at $224 per acre is worth about $2,688,000,000. Adding the probable value of New Orleans would bring this sum up to about $3,500,000,000. Movable property added would make it something like $5,000,000,000.)

APPENDIX

The author explained the Riker Mississippi spillway as presented in Senate Joint Resolution 7, Seventieth Congress, introduced by Senator FRAZIER, December 6, 1927, to both the Committee on Flood Control of the House and the Commerce Committee of the Senate. And General Jadwin was specifically invited both by the author and by Senator JONES, chairman of the Senate committee, to be present and ask questions as the project was explained.

Senator FRAZIER had written Mr. SINCLAIR, of the Committee on Flood Control of the House, to qualify the author as an expert, and presented a copy of that letter for the same purpose to the chairman of the Commerce Committee of the Senate when the Riker Mississippi spillway was before it.

"Senator FRAZIER. Mr. Chairman, I do not care to take the time to make any statement, but I have here a copy of a letter that was published in the House hearings in regard to Mr. Riker's qualifications that I should like to have printed in your record without taking the time to read it.

"The CHAIRMAN. All right."

"Mr. Riker's career as an engineer eminently qualifies him to formulate plans for flood control, as represented by the Riker spillway project; and all engineers to whom it has been presented within my knowledge have unqualifiedly indorsed it.

"To show that he is not a novice in matters of flood control in the Mississippi Valley, I would draw your attention to the fact that his plans for the Riker spillway project were presented to the United States Board of Flood Control in 1913, which board on April 21 of that year pronounced this project 'most interesting and fascinating,' and later requested that full details of it be furnished at the earliest possible moment; thereafter, on April 25 of the same year, H. R. 4296 was introduced, and on July 31, 1924, H. R. 18169, Sixty-third Congress, second session, was introduced, which gave in its 68 pages full details for such spillway project respecting the Mississippi below St. Louis. It will be noted that July 31, 1914, was the day before the declaration of the Great War in Europe, and H. R. 18169 was not given the consideration by Congress at that time which otherwise it might have had.

"I would also draw your attention to statements in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, on page 15984 of volume 51, part 16, second session, Sixty-third Congress, concerning Mr. Riker.

"On September 29, 1914, when the House had under consideration a river and harbor bill, and at which time H. R. 18169, embodying the Riker spillway project, was before Congress, Hon. JAMES A. FREAR, of Wisconsin, referred to the prediction which Mr. Riker made at that time that a terrible catastrophe would be certain to follow if the program of the Army engineers relative to the control of the Mississippi River was not radically modified. Mr. FREAR, in his discussion of this matter at that time, said in part:

"A strong, fearless man who has a long list of accomplishments to his credit, and who has frequently pointed to me the disastrous Mississippi River policy now being undertaken by the Government, is Mr. Carroll L. Riker, of Brooklyn, an engineer of large experience in the waterway work.

"Mr. Riker is a mild-mannered man, who, however, does not mince words when he says in a statement made to me:

"'The plans of the United States Army engineers for the control of the Mississippi River are the greatest engineering blunders which have ever been perpetrated upon a nation. These plans show that they do not understand the underlying and first principle which naturally governs the flow of a river.

"'If an advisory board of consulting engineers be appointed who are not graduates of West Point to investigate these plans, and they used as data only that which is printed and officially indorsed by those Army engineers, they would certainly confirm the above statement after less than 24 hours of actual consideration.

"'When the engineering profession have had their attention specifically drawn to the facts connected with the present plans of the Army engineers, for control of this river it will entail a national engineering disgrace that is unavoidable. Thirty-four annual reports of the Mississippi River Commission, concurred in by the various Chiefs of Engineers, United States Army, then acting, are mute witnesses against them can never be effaced. There is not one word that can be uttered in extenuation of these blunders which have been perpetrated by these engineers upon the citizens of the United States for a lifetime. They are now preparing a trap for the unconscious, confiding settlers in the valley of that river which will terminate in a terrible catastrophe as certain as the sun is to rise unless the present program be radically modified.'

"As far back as 1870 he was an owner in the steamboat Huguenot, engaged in a Government contract to carry stone to the Black Island breakwater. The same year he designed the hull of the steamboat Castleton, for more than 30 years the fastest boat of her length and breadth that plied the waters of New York Bay. Again, in 1886, he designed, built, and, in partnership with Joseph Cummings, president of the Morris & Cummings Dredging Co., owned the Riker dredging pump which filled in the Potomac flats now known as the Speedway, at about half of the estimated cost and of the amount appropriated—a description of which is given in the report of the Chief of Engineers, herewith sent you.

"The Riker dredging pump which filled in the Potomac flats below Long Bridge, now known as the Speedway, at 50 per cent of the estimated cost by the Army engineers, and of the appropriation made therefor, after the original contractor, Rittenhouse Moore, had failed when using ordinary appliances, is referred to in the Annual Report of the Secretary of War for the Year 1886, in volume 2, part 2, Appendix J, commencing on page 780 at the bottom of said page, and ending at the top of page 782 thereof.

"The suction and discharge pipes were each 36 inches in diameter in the apparatus used on the flats, and one stone weighing 1,300 pounds was pumped through it and forced out on the flats. At another time an old iron safe 25 by 16 by 14 inches was pumped out.

"Under favorable circumstances the pump discharged about 1,500 cubic yards per hour, and comparatively little delay was experienced from breakage of machinery after it got fairly in operation.

"It should be noted that the Government-rated output of this dredging pump has never since been approached, and Mr. Riker states its maximum output as at the rate of more than 90,000 cubic yards of solid material per day, 30 feet above the Potomac's level, more than ten times the output to that elevation of any other pump ever constructed, and his plans now contemplate a dredging plant for the construction of the levees on each side of his spillway having an average daily capacity of more than 500,000 cubic yards.

"A patent for a steam-vacuum dredging pump was granted to him April 9, 1872, and for more than 17 years, while Mr. Cummings's partner, he was consulting engineer for the Morris & Cummings Dredging Co., then the largest dredging concern in the world. He surveyed and estimated for them upon work which they did in Sabine Pass, Galveston, Charleston, Savannah, Norfolk, New York, Boston, etc., and surveyed the harbor of Habana, Cuba. This company dredged the approaches to St. Petersburg, Russia, and he made surveys and estimates for the proposed work at the mouth of the River Seine, France. The Riker water-tube boiler, installed in the tugboat Greenvill, was the first water-tube boiler tested by the United States, at the port of New York, and the only instance of a boiler being allowed higher pressure at its second inspection.

"Mr. Riker was placed in command of the steamship St. Paul when ashore, and superintended her removal from the beach of Long Branch, as also of the steamship Otranto from the Fire Island beach.

"He is believed to be the only man without a license who was permitted to handle an ocean steamship in the waters of the channels of New York Harbor, that vessel being the British steamship State of Alabama, which was also the only vessel that ever flew a foreign flag while working in American water on a United States Government contract.

"Mr. Riker visited Panama twice at the instance of General Hains, in charge of the filling of the Potomac flats, and of General Goethals in respect to the dam at Gatun, and other engineering matters connected with the canal, prepared plans for the improvement of New York lower bay, which General Goethals, then consulting engineer for that port, indorsed.

"Mr. Riker's studies respecting ocean currents, which were carried on in the Mediterranean, the Atlantic, and the Pacific Oceans, enabled him to determine the present accepted cause therefor.

"Jetties designed and placed in the Magdalina River, United States of Colombia, by him near Barranquilla, saved the buildings of the Bolivar Ice & Lumber Co., which he constructed, as also the town, from destruction by that river.

"From my personal observation, extending more than 15 years, including the recent flood, I believe Mr. Riker is thoroughly familiar with the situation there and fully competent to deal with the Mississippi flood problem, and more.

"LYNN F. FRAZIER."

"Senator FRAZIER. Now, Mr. Riker will be glad to explain this spillway proposition of his and will be glad to have any of the engineers ask questions.

"The CHAIRMAN. At his suggestion I asked General Jadwin to come up, and I understand that he will welcome questions from General Jadwin as he proceeds to explain his project. As it is an engineering proposition, I think it is very well for General Jadwin to ask questions if he desires to do so.

"Mr. RIKER. Mr. Chairman, if I have any statements that the engineers of the Mississippi River Commission or Chief of Engineers would like to question me about, I would be very glad to answer them. It may be that I have been misunderstood. If so, I would like to have an opportunity to explain it or discuss it, and I say further that I make my presentation on the ground that I have no retractions to make. I have no modifications, or changes which I will be compelled to make. I have studied this thing for about 20 years, with an experience, that when my past is reviewed in that prospectus or the letter which the Senator has presented, you will see has been somewhat diversified.

"The CHAIRMAN. I would say that Mr. Riker stated that he would be glad to have the Army engineers here to ask him any questions, and I have asked General Jadwin to be here. If there is any question that General Jadwin feels like asking, he is at liberty to do so.

"Senator FLETCHER. I would like to ask General Jadwin, to begin with about that proposal, how he thinks it would operate.

"General JADWIN. Mr. Chairman, Mr. Riker's project has been studied by him very carefully and it is very alluring in many ways, but we could not bring ourselves to recommend it, largely on quantitative grounds, and on the ground that the way that we believe the river wants to work, it does not incline to work very much in straight lines. The estimate was about $775,000,000, on the assumption that those flood ways would carry the velocity that Mr. Riker assumed. He assumes 20 feet a second. Our calculations indicate that we would have difficulty in getting over 2 feet a second through there, which is only about one-tenth of the velocity that he assumes. You can get a little check on that when you recall that the maximum flow of water in the river itself when it is 80 feet deep is rarely up to 10 feet a second.

"Then also we were somewhat afraid of those earthen dams up to a height of 70 feet. We feel that the average of 18, and a super of 30, which has already been obtained, is of questionable safety, on the foundation that exists there. It was largely matters of that kind that caused us to feel that if this plan was practical, it would run very much higher in cost than the plan we recommend. We have a river-side flood way, running for a few miles below Cairo. Mr. Riker continues that straight on down to the St. Francis Basin, and puts a flood way in there forever. That will cost a good deal more than a shorter flood way, so that there are no further questions that we think of that we want to ask. If the committee desires to ask us any questions, we are entirely at your service.

"Mr. RIKER. Mr. Chairman, may I reply to just one statement that General Jadwin makes that there is difficulty in the river maintaining a straight line? He assumes that this is a river. There must be no such associations. It is simply like a gutter from the eaves to carry off the water. It is a spillway—not used all of the time—and the statement that a river is not supposed to take a straight course I defy him to put in plain language, for this reason: There is no force in existence, except that of centrifugal force, or the force of straight direction, which increases as the square of its velocity, and where a river starts in a certain direction it is its natural course to be as straight as an arrow, and it is only impediments that force it out of its straight course. In fact, there is not the least little disposition to deviate from a straight course.

"I know what I am talking about and I am ready to demonstrate it; and if the Chief of Engineers reiterates his statement that the natural inclination of water in motion is to take other than a straight line, then he places himself in a position that I know he dare not put upon the record.

"The CHAIRMAN. Are there any other questions of Mr. Riker?

"Mr. RIKER. I am through, unless there is some other assertion that I have made that the engineers would like to question me about. I should be pleased to answer any questions any member of the committee or anyone else interested in the matter cares to ask me.

"The CHAIRMAN. No one desires to ask any other questions.

THE CASE OF JACKSON BARNETT

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD an article from Latta's Fortnightly Review entitled "The Case of Jackson Barnett," together with a letter addressed to the Senate Committee on Indian Affairs by E. B. Meritt, Assistant Commissioner of Indian Affairs.

There being no objection, the article and letter were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From Latta's Fortnightly Review]

THE CASE OF JACKSON BARNETT—A FORMER FIRST ASSISTANT SECRETARY OF THE INTERIOR WRITES FOR READERS OF THE FORTNIGHTLY REVIEW HIS VIEWS OF THIS REMARKABLE INDIAN CASE

By Alexander T. Vogelsang

In the Review of January 25, I note an article entitled "The Indian Commissioner in Hot Water," which is devoted to a discussion of the celebrated Jackson Barnett case, wherefore I am moved to make a few observations thereon.

Let me say in the beginning that I have no personal acquaintance with Jackson Barnett, Mrs. Barnett, Commissioner Burke, nor anyone else involved in the business.

From 1916 to 1921 I occupied the position of First Assistant Secretary of the Interior under Secretaries Lane and Payne, and during that time had considerable contact with the Indian Bureau, then under Commissioner Cato Sells.

I always understood Jackson Barnett to be a Snake Indian by birth, but a member of the Creek Tribe by adoption. I was advised that when the lands of the Creek Nation were allotted in severalty, Barnett refused to make selection and declined any allotment, claiming that he and his ancestors had roamed that country from time immemorial, that all his life he had hunted and fished thereon without let or hindrance, that he expected to so continue, and that he declined to limit his liberty to any specific portion of the tribal land. Because of his refusal, and in order that the allotment books might be closed, the last remaining and apparently worthless tract of 160 acres was arbitrarily allotted to him.

Subsequently, oil discovery was made and it was found that the Barnett allotment was the center of a wonderful oil pool and he suddenly became the wealthiest Indian in America. Barnett was allowed the sum of $250 a month for his support and maintenance, which was ample and even far beyond his simple needs. He lived in a little cabin by a creek where he drowsed and fished in contentment. During the war the department invested a million or more of his funds in Liberty bonds.

I well remember the day in 1920 when Commissioner Sells burst into my office, a picture of consternation, and announced that Barnett had been abducted and married. We believed at first that it was the result of a conspiracy engineered by some active and alert member of the legal profession in Oklahoma, for it was a common expression in our office that he was a poor lawyer in the Indian territory who could not arrange a profitable marriage or who did not have concealed somewhere "out in the sticks" an heir to every rich Indian in the State.

IF CONSPIRACY, THEN IT IS COMMON

However, as I understand it, this marriage has been thoroughly investigated during the past eight years, and it has been found that the lady in the case is no more guilty of conspiracy than are any of the others of her sex who have in the past and even in the present, through the marriage bond, riveted their charms upon a rich man. Indeed Judge Pollock, United States District Judge for the Eastern District of Kansas, in dismissing the suit instituted by the Department of Justice against an attorney for the recovery of a fee that he is said to have received through Mrs. Barnett, said, "Now, the fact is, if Anna Laura wanted Barnett for her husband, she had a right to go out and get him if she could, and as they are for all the purposes of this case at least lawfully married, nothing can be done about that in this litigation in this court." Thus it would seem that the marriage was lawful, firm, and fixed.

I also recall that before his marriage Barnett and the Bureau of Indian Affairs were pestered and besought for contributions from various churches and charitable institutions, and no doubt such beseechment has continued ever since.

It is conceded on all sides that since her marriage Mrs. Barnett has been a true, faithful, and attentive wife, and has conferred many of the attributes of higher civilization upon her husband.

I understand the law of Oklahoma to be that upon the death of the husband, the wife inherits one-half of his estate, unless he should make a will giving her more or less.

Several years ago the Barnetts agreed to dispose of about $1,100,000 of his money by giving one half to the wife and the other half to the American Baptist Society for the benefit of Bacone College and the Murrow Orphan Home at Muskogee, both institutions devoted to the education and care of Indians; this latter half to be deposited with the Equitable Trust Co. of New York and the income thereof to be paid to Barnett during his life and at his death to pass to these two institutions. Of Mrs. Barnett's half, $200,000 was deposited in the Riggs National Bank, of Washington, with the proviso that the income thereof should go to Barnett during his lifetime. In other words, so far as these funds were concerned, Jackson was assured of an income from the trusts of $27,500 annually, and he was not financially denuded, as will appear.

Under the Creek agreement the restrictions upon him would expire in 1931, and unless extended he would not thereafter have any protection from the Government, and this may have influenced the making of the trust agreements.

A FAIR DISPOSITION OF WEALTH

Aside from the trusts and the funds retained by Mrs. Barnett in her own right, Barnett now has over $500,000 in bonds, securities, and money, and also his allotment, which still produces $1,000 per month in royalty. The income from these sources is sufficient to make his monthly income in excess of $5,000 or more than $60,000 annually. So it would appear that if the trusts and transfers above referred to shall stand, Barnett will still have free for his further disposition more than a half million dollars, plus an annual income exceeding $60,000.

On the whole, it seems to me that an entirely unreasonable clamor has been raised over this man's affairs. Surely it is not wrong for a husband to give any part of his estate to his wife if it be done not in fraud of creditors. Surely no uneducated Indian could make better disposition of a large fund than Barnett has attempted for the benefit of the Indian college and orphan home. It may well be doubted if the various lawyers engaged in overturning the trusts and transfers are actuated by entirely altruistic motives.

Some of them may believe that pickings are better in an estate of several million dollars than in one only exceeding a half million. If the efforts to destroy the trust in favor of the college and orphan home are successful, what better use can Barnett make of the money? He can not possibly use any part of the principal, nor can he even reasonably consume the income.

For its efforts to defeat the college and the orphanage the bar will be amply rewarded, because, as I am advised, the United States court in New York made an allowance to the attorneys for the "next friend" of 25 per cent of the moneys, including accumulated interest, held by the trust company, which, together with $10,000 additional allowance for expenses and $7,500 to the "next friend" personally, will, if eventually paid, aggregate about $190,000. Surely this is a high price for "next" or any other kind of friendship and is an extreme penalty for Barnett's estate to pay for his effort to make a sensible, proper, and beneficial distribution of a part of his surplus funds.

The article in question states that a quarter of a million dollars has been paid in attorney and guardian fees since Barnett's marriage. I am assured that this is not true and that only a small amount has been paid from his funds, the expense of the litigation in the New York case having been borne entirely by the American Baptist Society; but if the fees allowed by the New York court are paid finally, of course, the statement is approximately correct.

THE PIKES AND BUZZING FLIES

Macaulay says in Virginia:

"Where'er ye shed the honey, the buzzing flies will crowd;
Where'er down Tiber garbage floats the greedy pike ye see."

I have always thought these lines singularly apposite to the affairs of rich Indians. The greedy pike and the buzzing flies are ever about them. In the Barnett case, all things considered, it seems to me that the disposition which Barnett and his wife have attempted to make has a tendency to defeat rather than to encourage the "pikes" and the "flies." I think any white citizen should be congratulated on making similar disposition of his surplus funds.

Oklahoma is not a stranger to judicial nor to legislative spectacles, but I feel sure she will witness a star performance if Barnett dies with all his estate intact except what his "next friends" and their attorneys have stripped off. The wife, if she survives, will get her share perhaps, but the remainder will be scattered to the four winds and the charitable uses to which the owner now desires to devote a large part of it, will get nothing.

As I stated in the beginning, I am entirely unacquainted with the Barnetts, the Indian Commissioner, the trust companies, or the Baptists, and I hold no brief for any of them. But, in my judgment, none of them should be in hot water on account of this transaction. That treatment should be administered to the greedy pikes, the buzzing flies, the busybodies who are engaged in this mephitic scramble to defeat a wise and beneficial disposition of surplus moneys.

UNITED STATES DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR,
OFFICE OF INDIAN AFFAIRS,
Washington, March 2, 1929.

Hon. LYNN J. FRAZIER, Chairman,
Hon. BURTON K. WHEELER,
Hon. W. B. PINE,
Hon. ELMER THOMAS,
Senate Indian Investigation Committee.

MY DEAR SENATORS: In compliance with your oral request of yesterday while before your committee, that I submit to you from time to time my personal views regarding needed constructive improvements in the Indian Service, I wish to take this opportunity of thanking you for this evidence of your confidence. I promise to give you the benefit of my nearly 25 years of careful study of the Indian problem and my intimate knowledge of all phases of this subject after personal visits to nearly all the Indian schools and reservations. I wish it distinctly understood, however, that these are my personal views, submitted in accordance with your request, and in no way commit or bind the Indian Bureau or the Interior Department.

My first thought is to impress the committee with the bigness of the Indian problem, its many complications involving 350,000 Indians, 225,000 of whom are restricted, consisting of about 200 tribes speaking 58 different languages, living on 190 reservations, scattered over 26 different States, with quite varied problems for each reservation, administered under about 2,500 different laws and 300 treaties, involving Indian property, individual and tribal, valued at about $1,600,000,000, and the Indian country covering an area as large as all the New England States and the State of New York combined.

Speaking from an experience of over 35 years in the Government service, I say with confidence that there is no other bureau in the Government service so difficult to administer, which needs such a broad knowledge of so many different, complicated, and difficult subjects, which requires so much patience, human understanding, and sympathy. It is also well to understand and fully appreciate that Congress has a responsibility and a duty equal to that of Indian Service officials and employees in the handing of the Indian problem. Indian Service officials are too frequently criticized for doing things they are required to do because of legislation enacted by Congress or failing to do things they should do because Congress has not passed laws that should be enacted or furnished funds that should be provided to relieve the condition of the Indians and improve Indian administration generally. Also, the Indian Service is frequently criticized for not asking for appropriations when, as a matter of fact, the Indian Bureau has submitted the needed estimates, but under the Budget system those estimates have not been transmitted to Congress. Senator THOMAS has recently had printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD (see pp. 4368 to 4371, both inclusive, CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of February 26, 1929) information showing that during the past two years the Indian Bureau has prepared estimates totaling more than $12,000,000 that have not been transmitted to Congress, and under the Budget system we are not permitted to ask for $1 of those $12,000,000 before a committee of Congress. The foregoing is not intended as a criticism of Congress or the Bureau of the Budget or the Budget system, but as a plain statement of fact that must be known and appreciated if there is to be a fair and just understanding of the difficulties of the Government's Indian problem.

With this preliminary statement I wish to submit the following concrete suggestions:

1. Take the Indian Service entirely out of politics. It is a human problem requiring long years of study and experience, and faithful employees should not be harassed with the threats of grafters and cheap politicians with the change of each administration. The average life of Commissioners of Indian Affairs has been three years, and no man can get even a smattering superficial knowledge of the vast Indian subject in three years. These frequent political changes bring about untried and often impractical policies resulting in harm to the Indians and which are destructive of good administration by keeping the office and field force marking time waiting for new developments following each change of administration. Adopt the Canadian Indian plan of having tried, experienced, and permanent Indian Service leaders and policies.

2. Allow appropriations of approximately $25,000,000 a year instead of an average of about $15,000,000 so that the Indian work can be carried on effectively and efficiently with satisfaction to the Indians, Indian Service employees, the Congress, and the country at large.

3. Give us at least $350 per capita in our appropriation for Indian schools instead of $260 per capita so that we can run our Indian schools on a more efficient basis, feed the children with a larger variety of food, equip our school dormitories with adequate furniture and other necessities, provide sufficient equipment for industrial instruction, increase the grades of our day schools to the sixth grade, and provide more day schools so that young children can be educated up to the sixth grade near their homes; so that reservation boarding schools can have the grades increased to the ninth; and so that we can provide more twelfth-grade high schools. Also, so that we can have the instructors and equipment to teach more fully and efficiently practical industrial courses.

4. Provide reimbursable appropriations so as to advance money to worthy and ambitious Indian boys and girls who have completed their courses in our Indian schools so that they may take college courses to equip them for their chosen life work.

5. Provide an adequate appropriation, to be immediately available, to put in proper repair all of our Indian school and agency buildings, including adequate water supply, sewerage, and toilet and lighting systems.

6. Provide an adequate appropriation, to be immediately available, to properly furnish and equip our schoolrooms, dormitories, and shops. Our schools are sadly in need of these improvements.

7. The Indian Service very much needs at least 25 more hospitals, 5 of them to be located in Oklahoma among the Five Civilized Tribes, and 10 additional tuberculosis sanatoria, and these hospitals and sanatoria should be supplied without further delay. There is also needed money to replace a large number of old and inadequately constructed and equipped hospitals with modern, adequate hospital buildings and equipment.

8. We need now at least 200 additional field and hospital nurses, the field nurses to be provided with automobiles and other necessary equipment and supplies along medical lines.

9. We need at once a much larger trained force of medical experts on trachoma, also tuberculosis experts. Our service is woefully lacking in these experts on trachoma and tuberculosis, who should be furnished with cars and proper and adequate medical equipment. Trachoma and tuberculosis is so prevalent among Indians as to require the immediate attention of Congress.

10. We need at least 50 more good doctors, provided with automobiles and adequate medical equipment to supply the medical requirements of the Indians.

11. We need several sanatorium schools, so as to provide for the tubercular Indian children now out of school, and who are living in the inadequate homes of their parents, without proper food, clothing, or medical attention, and who are transmitting the disease to other members of the family. This is an urgent need that should be immediately provided for by Congress.

12. Providing employment for Indian girl graduates of our nurse-training schools on Indian reservations under the guidance of trained public-health nurses.

13. We need at once an appropriation to purchase dairy cows, provide adequate dairy barns and feed, so that we can furnish at least 1 quart of milk per day for all our Indian school children.

14. We need at once a large reimbursable appropriation, to be made immediately available, to provide for the construction of new homes for Indians or to improve old homes by providing wooden floors, additional windows, and some necessary furniture and household equipment. The bad home and living conditions of Indians has much to do with the sickness and high death rate of Indians. A real campaign for better homes for Indians requires money to make it successful and effective.

15. We need a much larger reimbursable appropriation for industrial assistance to Indians who want to begin or enlarge their industrial activities, but are handicapped because of lack of funds.

16. We need an appropriation, to be immediately available, to provide for an Indian employment force to find jobs for Indians. We have too many idle Indians on reservations who could become self-supporting and independent if they were properly placed in suitable jobs away from the reservation.

17. Much of the reimbursable appropriations now charged to Indians for roads, bridges, and irrigation work should be charged off. It has been for about 15 years the policy of Congress to make the appropriations in reimbursable form when it was known that there was little chance of these appropriations being reimbursed. For example, the Fort Peck and Blackfeet and other Indians of Montana should be relieved of much of the reimbursable charges for irrigation, all the irrigation appropriations made reimbursable by the retroactive act of 1914 should be wiped off the books, the California irrigation charges should be greatly reduced, the Pima, Pueblo, Navajo, and other bridge-reimbursable items should be charged off, also much of the reimbursable appropriations charged against the Pueblo and Navajo Indians should be reduced or charged off entirely. These reimbursable appropriation items are the cause of much dissatisfaction among the Indians and the basis of unjust criticism of the Indian Service. There are many millions of dollars of reimbursable appropriations that might well be entirely eliminated and the Indians relieved of this indebtedness that they can never repay.

18. Legislation is needed to wind up the tribal affairs of the Five Civilized Tribes and dispose of the tribal property of these Indians. Also there is need for changes in the probate and other laws affecting the property of the Indians of the Five Civilized Tribes.

19. Legislation is needed to more adequately regulate law and order on Indian reservations. The present laws are wholly inadequate and are resulting in harm to the Indians. This legislation is an urgent necessity.

20. We need more and better equipped and paid educational leaders to supervise and conduct our Indian schools and bring them up to a higher and more modern standard of efficiency.

21. We need more and better equipped and paid industrial leaders so as to provide more efficient industrial leadership for our Indians. There is a great opportunity for the industrial awakening of the Indians. There should be definite, well-planned industrial programs worked out for each reservation suitable to the needs and conditions of that particular reservation, which should be adhered to without regard to changes in superintendents and other employees. The Indians are now ready for this industrial awakening, but the right industrial inspirational leaders are required and there should be provided adequate reimbursable appropriations for the farming and stock-raising activities of the Indians.

22. There should be the closest cooperation with local, county, and State agencies and with other branches of the Federal Government with the view of receiving all of the technical and helpful assistance possible in handling the Indian problem, but it is my judgment that Congress at least for several years to come should recognize the fact that the Indian problem is a Federal obligation and should make its appropriations and enact laws affecting the Indians with that end in view.

23. The numerous Indian laws should be codified, brought up to date, obsolete laws eliminated, and the laws simplified and reduced regulations of the Indian Service made available to all persons handling the Indian problem.

24. Indian councils or business committees should be organized on each reservation, and these selected representatives of the Indians should be recognized by the superintendent and consulted freely and the views and wishes of the Indians should be more fully considered and the plans of the Indian Service carefully explained, so that much cause for complaint because of lack of knowledge of plans and intentions would be removed and closer cooperation brought about through mutual understanding and unity of purpose.

25. Every Indian tribe having a prima facie claim against the Government should have an opportunity to submit their claims to the Court of Claims with the right of either side to appeal to the Supreme Court under a properly worded jurisdictional act. The sooner these claims are adjudicated the nearer we will be to the final settlement of the Indian problem.

26. Continue to prohibit the use of jails at Indian schools, and not permit any severe punishment for infraction of rules, but emphasize the practice of withholding privileges as a deterrent so as to insure good conduct of Indian school children.

27. A careful study should be made of the status of the New York Indians, and their jurisdiction should be definitely settled. These Indians are wards of the Government, yet the Federal Government at this time exercises but little jurisdiction, and they are now largely under the jurisdiction of the State of New York. This conflicting and indefinite jurisdiction has brought about inevitable dissatisfaction, and these Indians are entitled to the consideration and relief of Congress.

28. Specific reimbursable appropriations should be obtained to enable the Pima Indians to put in cultivation within the next three or four years the 40,000 acres of additional irrigable lands made available by reason of the construction of the Coolidge Dam on the San Carlos Reservation. We have worked out a definite program for this purpose, and if we can obtain the required appropriations from Congress, this 40,000 acres of land will be actually under cultivation within a few years.

29. Make it clear to all Indians that the Government does not intend to interfere with their customs, traditions, or religion; also their ceremonial dances, so long as they keep within the bounds of reason and do not transgress moral laws.

30. Encourage Indians to have local Indian organizations for self-improvement. An example of constructive improvements and benefits to the Indians may be cited in the holding annually of the Pueblo and Navajo Councils. No doubt councils could be held with profit among other Indians similar to the Navajo and Pueblo Councils.

31. There is an urgent need in the Indian Office at Washington for about 15 additional stenographers and clerks so as to keep the work of the office current.

32. Established community bathhouses and laundries in thickly populated Indian communities with spare room for reading and community meeting purposes with the idea of developing social-service work and the community spirit.

33. Trained social-service workers are needed on each Indian reservation as home demonstration agents to improve home and community conditions. These home demonstration agents, if properly trained in social-service work, could materially improve the home and living conditions of the Indians.

34. We need more trained and expert advisors to the Commissioner of Indian Affairs along educational, agricultural, stock raising, medical, and social-service lines so as to make surveys, reports, and recommendations to the Commissioner of Indian Affairs and to assist in bringing about closer cooperation with local, State, and other Federal agencies in handling the Indian problem.

35. Change the existing allotment laws and do not make further allotments on Indian reservations under the present laws for the reason that under these laws Indians are gradually losing possession of their lands. Personally I am strongly opposed to the allotment of the Menominee, Red Lake, Pueblo, Navajo, and other unallotted Indians in the Southwest at this time and under existing laws.

36. We need a large gratuity appropriation each year to build and maintain roads on Indian reservations and at the same time furnish employment to Indians.

37. Enact legislation for relief of Indians who are wards of the Government but who do not reside on Indian reservations. Under the comptroller's decision we are unable to extend relief to these Indians who often are in need of assistance and are worthy of the help of the Federal Government.

38. Eliminate as much paper work as possible, reduce wherever practicable correspondence, and place more responsibility upon the local superintendents. We are endeavoring at this time to work out a feasible plan along this line.

39. Increase the capacity of the Sequoyah Orphan Training School from 300 to 500, so as to provide for 200 additional Indian orphan children in Oklahoma. After a personal visit to this school I worked out the details for this increased capacity and we will be glad to furnish this information to your committee.

40. Be conservative in the issuance of patents in fee and certificates of competency, but allow young educated able-bodied Indians with small degree of Indian blood an opportunity to handle their property free from Government supervision. Also allow other Indians full opportunity, consistent with their best interest, to handle their property and develop business experience while their lands are held in trust.

The foregoing by no means includes all of the constructive requirements of the Indian Service. These suggestions are necessarily general in form, and if it is the wish of the committee we will be glad to draft necessary legislation, with justifications therefor, to carry the foregoing constructive suggestions into effect. It will require an appropriation, preferably in lump-sum form, amounting to approximately $15,000,000, to supplement existing appropriations for the Indian Service to carry out the suggestions herein made, which would very greatly increase the efficiency of the Indian Service and would be a good investment for the Federal Government. Hereafter, in my judgment, there should be an annual appropriation of approximately $25,000,000 if we are to run the Indian Service on the efficient basis that will meet the approval of the Congress, Indian Service officials, and friends of the Indians.

If it is the wish of your committee, I will submit in more detail the constructive needs of every Indian school and reservation. This necessarily will require some time and considerable work. Better still, I will take pleasure in going with the committee to the various schools and reservations and pointing out to the committee on the ground the constructive needs of our Indian schools and reservations. I wish each member of the committee to feel free to request any information they desire and we will endeavor to cooperate in every way possible to see that full information is furnished in regard to our Indian activities.

While the foregoing suggestions indicate considerable need for additional funds for the Indian Service, in closing I wish to emphasize that the funds now appropriated by Congress are being economically, judiciously, and efficiently administered, and it is my judgment that more has been accomplished for the Indians of this country and there has been greater progress among the Indians during the past eight years than ever before in a similar period of time during the more than 100 years of Federal jurisdiction in handling the Indian problem in this country, and what is more important, we have laid the foundation for a still greater progress during the immediate years to come. With the help of your committee and the Congress this progress can be intensified and made permanent and outstanding. We bespeak your earnest assistance and cooperation in this great constructive work in behalf of the American Indian.

Cordially yours,

E. B. MERITT,
Assistant Commissioner.

ENTRY OF CERTAIN ALIENS TO THE UNITED STATES—CONFERENCE REPORT

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the following conference report:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the House to the bill (S. 5094) making it a felony with penalty for certain aliens to enter the United States of America under certain condition in violation of law having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the Senate recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the House, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the matter proposed to be inserted by the House amendment insert the following:

"That (a) if any alien has been arrested and deported in pursuance of law, he shall be excluded from admission to the United States whether such deportation took place before or after the enactment of this act, and if he enters or attempts to enter the United States after the expiration of 60 days after the enactment of this act, he shall be guilty of a felony and upon conviction thereof shall, unless a different penalty is otherwise expressly provided by law, be punished by imprisonment for not more than two years or by a fine of not more than $1,000, or by both such fine and imprisonment.

"(b) For the purposes of this section any alien ordered deported (whether before or after the enactment of this act) who has left the United States shall be considered to have been deported in pursuance of law, irrespective of the source from which the expenses of his transportation were defrayed or of the place to which he departed.

"(c) An alien subject to exclusion from admission to the United States under this section who is employed upon a vessel arriving in the United States shall not be entitled to any of the landing privileges allowed by law to seamen.

"(d) So much of section 3 of the immigration act of 1917 (U. S. C. title 8, sec. 136 (j)) as reads as follows: 'persons who have been reported under any of the provisions of this act, and who may again seek admission within one year from the date of such deportation, unless prior to their reembarkation at a foreign port or their attempt to be admitted from foreign contiguous territory, the Secretary of Labor shall have consented to their reapplying for admission' is amended to read as follows: 'persons who have been excluded from admission and deported in pursuance of law, and who may again seek admission within one year from the date of such deportation, unless prior to their reembarkation at a place outside the United States or their attempt to be admitted from foreign contiguous territory the Secretary of Labor has consented to their reapplying for admission.'"

(e) So much of section 18 of the immigration act of 1917 (U. S. C. title 8, sec. 154) as reads as follows: "or knowingly to bring to the United States at any time within one year from the date of deportation any alien rejected or arrested and deported under any provision of this act, unless prior to reembarkation the Secretary of Labor has consented that such alien shall reapply for admission, as required by section 3 hereof" is amended to read as follows: "or knowingly to bring to the United States any alien excluded or arrested and deported under any provision of law until such time as such alien may be lawfully entitled to reapply for admission to the United States." The amendment made by this subsection shall take effect on the expiration of 60 days after the enactment of this act, but the provision amended shall remain in force for the collection of any fine incurred before the effective date of such amendment.

"SEC. 2. Any alien who hereafter enters the United States at any time or place other than as designated by immigration officials, or eludes examination or inspection by immigration officials, or obtains entry to the United States by a willfully false or misleading representation or the willful concealment of a material fact, shall be guilty of a misdemeanor and, upon conviction, shall be punished by imprisonment for not more than one year or by a fine of not more than $1,000, or by both such fine and imprisonment.

"SEC. 3. An alien sentenced to imprisonment shall not be deported under any provision of law until after the termination of the imprisonment. For the purposes of this section the imprisonment shall be considered as terminated upon the release of the alien from confinement, whether or not he is subject to rearrest or further confinement in respect of the same offense.

"SEC. 4. Upon the final conviction of any alien of any offense under this act in any court of record it shall be the duty of the clerk of the court to notify the Secretary of Labor, giving the name of the alien convicted, the nature of the offense of which convicted, the sentence imposed, and, if imprisoned, the place of imprisonment, and, if known, the place of birth of such alien, his nationality, and the time when and place where he entered the United States.

"SEC. 5. Terms defined in the immigration act of 1924 shall, when used in this act, have the meaning assigned to such terms in that act."

And the House agree to the same.

That the House recede from its amendment to the title of the bill.

HIRAM W. JOHNSON,
WILLIAM H. KING,
DAVID A. REED,
COLE L. BLEASE,
HENRY W. KEYES,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

ALBERT JOHNSON,
BIRD J. VINCENT,
GEO. J. SCHNEIDER,
A. J. SABATH,
Managers on the part of the House.

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. President, at the opening of the session this morning I asked the concurrence of the Senate in the conference report that was submitted yesterday and printed in the RECORD at page 4872 by the House and the Senate conferees on Senate bill 5094, known as the Blease bill. At that time the Senator from Alabama [Mr. HEFLIN] asked that the matter be continued briefly. I am now advised that he has examined the conference report, and that he accepts it. The Senator from South Carolina [Mr. BLEASE] has so advised me.

Mr. BLEASE. That is correct, Mr. President.

Mr. JOHNSON. I ask that the Senate agree to the conference report.

The report was agreed to.

CHARLESTOWN SAND & STONE CO.

Mr. BRUCE. Mr. President, yesterday or the day before the Senator from California [Mr. SHORTRIDGE] made a request of one of his brother Senators that he should do something, I forget now just what, and then he added with his happy gift for apt quotation:

Give Ajax light and Ajax asks no more.

I wish to say that if the Senate will only do me the favor to take up and consider and pass, in case there is no discussion, a bill which has just been placed upon the calendar, then under the circumstances that surround me at the present time, in the closing hours of my senatorial life, I think I can safely promise the Senate that I will trouble it no more.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. What is the bill?

Mr. BRUCE. It is House bill 11659, for the relief of the Charlestown Sand & Stone Co., of Elkton, Md.

The bill was passed by the House, it came over to the Senate, and has been favorably reported by the Senate Committee on Claims to the Senate. There is no opposition to it so far as I know.

The object of the bill is simply to make good to the claimant losses inflicted on it during the World War by extraordinary freight rates and other burdens.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Mr. President, I hope the Senator's request will be granted.

Mr. KEYES rose.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, it will require only a moment to dispose of the bill. Under the circumstances I hope no objection will be made.

Mr. KEYES. I simply wanted to be sure that the unfinished business is protected.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. MCNARY in the chair). This will not displace the unfinished business.

Mr. BRUCE. I will withdraw the request if there is any discussion.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, which was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay to the Charlestown Sand & Stone Co., of Elkton, Md., out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $12,385.99 in full settlement of the additional freight charges and the increased cost of labor and materials incurred by said company in the fulfillment of the requirements of the United States engineer office under the contract of August 23, 1917, for furnishing and delivering cement, sand, and gravel (or broken stone) to Fort Saulsbury, Del., for the construction of gun and mortar batteries.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

COLUMBIA RIVER BRIDGE AT ENTIAT, WASH.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair lays before the Senate a bill from the House of Representatives.

The bill (H. R. 17122) to extend the times for commencing and completing the construction of a bridge across the Columbia River at Entiat, Wash., was read twice by its title.

Mr. JONES. A similar bill was reported from the Senate Committee on Commerce yesterday, and placed on the calendar. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the House bill.

There being no objection, the House bill was considered as in Committee of the Whole and was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the times for commencing and completing the construction of the bridge authorized by the act of Congress approved June 2, 1926, to be built by Fred H. Furey, his heirs, legal representatives, and assigns, across the Columbia River at Entiat, Wash., are hereby extended one and three years, respectively, from the date of the approval hereof.

SEC. 2. The right to alter, amend, or repeal this act is hereby expressly reserved.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the similar bill, Senate bill 5888, on the calendar, will be indefinitely postponed.

PAY OF RETIRED AVIATORS

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. President, I have been requested by the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. REED] and several friends, officers of the American Legion, to say a few words with regard to the so-called pioneer aviators' bill, which came over from the House some months ago and was not acted upon by the Senate Committee on Military Affairs. The provisions of that bill were later put on a Senate bill granting the privilege to the President of the United States to award the distinguished flying cross to visitors to the United States who distinguished themselves by extraordinary achievement in an aerial flight. There was no objection to that bill either in the Senate or in the House committee, but the House committee chose to amend it by adding as a section the bill known as the pioneer aviators' bill, which they had previously reported. That bill and the amendment are now in conference. I am not one of the conferees, but I have been asked by the conferees to say in a few words to the Senate what I said to the conferees more at length, speaking on behalf of quite a number of pilots in the Army who felt that it was very unwise that the bill should pass.

The reasons, briefly, are that, in the first place, the bill takes a very small number of aviators, not more than six or seven, in the active service in the Army, and permits them to have flying pay to the extent of 75 per cent of their regular pay, instead of the 50 per cent allotted to all regular flying officers of the Army. In the old days military aviators were all given a 75 per cent increase of pay. During the World War a great number of our aviators, with half a dozen exceptions, were reserve military aviators, so called, and received a 50 per cent increase for flying pay. After the World War the Congress decided that a 50 per cent increase for flying pay was proper for all of them. Consequently, that has been the rule ever since, except for three or four favored ones. This measure is an effort to change that provision for the benefit of a very small group of aviators who began flying early and all of whom, with one or two exceptions, gave up flying due to its extra hazardous nature and did not come back into the service until the time of the World War, but have remained since. It is felt by a number of the aviators in the Army that if any were given this privilege it should be those who came into flying in the early days and remained continuously in that hazardous service during all the time of its greatest difficulty.

The second feature of the bill to which objection is made is that it permits a few aviators to be retired immediately, placed on the retired list, and granted 75 per cent of their flying pay just as if they had continued flying. The Senate Committee on Military Affairs have felt that this was a most dangerous innovation; that to give flying pay to retired officers was not in accordance with the desire of Congress when it awarded flying pay to those actively engaged in flying.

Those are the reasons why some officers have opposed the bill and why I was asked to oppose it before the conferees.

RELATIONS WITH CHINA

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. President, I should like to speak for just a moment on our greatly improved relations with China and the Far East, especially China.

Senators will remember that a few days ago we ratified a new treaty with China granting China full rights with regard to their tariff. This has had an extremely favorable effect in China on our relations with the Chinese. To-day I received word from Shanghai, the largest business city in China, that one of the great clubs of Shanghai, the American Club, had at last opened its doors to Chinese membership. This is an epoch-making event in the relations between the white races and the yellow races. Nowhere in India or China have prominent social clubs controlled by members of the Anglo-Saxon race ever before admitted Asiatics to membership.

It is said by those best informed that this action on the part of the American Club in Shanghai will have more to do with cementing friendly relations between the Chinese and our citizens than any other single action that has been taken in recent years.

I hope very much that the time may come in the not distant future when we may realize that the gentlemen of China and the gentlemen of India and the gentlemen of Japan are just as gentle and just as well bred and just as courteous as the gentlemen of America. I hope that the day may not be far distant when in recognition of the character of those races and their civilization they may be accorded equal privileges under the immigration quota with the other races and nations of the world with whom we are on friendly terms.

REIMBURSEMENT OF STATE OF NEVADA

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President, there was some discussion earlier in the day with regard to a notice which I gave a few days ago to move to reconsider the vote by which the second deficiency appropriation bill passed the Senate.

Some time ago I introduced a resolution to have the Comptroller General restate the amount due the State of Nevada for the employment of soldiers during the Civil War. In response to that report the Comptroller General stated there is now a balance due of $595,076.53. A bill was then introduced by my colleague the junior Senator from Nevada [Mr. ODDIE], reported favorably by the Judiciary Committee, which passed the Senate and went to the House.

Under the belief that there might not be time for action upon the Senate bill in the House my colleague offered an amendment to the second deficiency appropriation bill providing the money to pay that account. The Committee on Appropriations declined to receive it upon the ground that it was a private claim and had to go to the Claims Committee. The amendment was then offered upon the floor by my colleague and a point of order made upon the same ground. There is no question in my mind that the point of order should have been overruled, although it was sustained. It was not a private claim; it was for money due the State of Nevada under an act of Congress authorizing the enlistment of soldiers by the State and a subsequent act of Congress approving the legislative act of the Territory of Nevada, which provided the money to enlist them.

Therefore on day before yesterday I gave notice that I would move to reconsider the vote by which that appropriation bill had passed. I am very happy to say, because I have no desire to delay the passage of the appropriation bill, that the House has just passed Senate bill 5717 authorizing the payment of this account. I withdraw the notice which I gave. I feel perfectly confident that at the next session of Congress the distinguished chairman of the Committee on Appropriations of the Senate will see that this last act of Congress with reference to the matter is carried out by an appropriation.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, I take this occasion to thank the Senator from Nevada and assure him it was only on the ground that it was a private claim that the item was barred from the deficiency appropriation bill. That was the reason which caused us to omit it from the bill. I shall be very glad to assist the Senator in any way I can.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 15848) making appropriations to supply urgent deficiencies in certain appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1929, and prior fiscal years, to provide urgent supplemental appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1929, and for other purposes.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, before a vote is taken on the conference report on the deficiency bill I want to reiterate what I said a little while ago, that there is no testimony before the Senate in any particular case of a refund of taxes that will inform any Senator intelligently as to the facts in the case in question. There is no testimony before the Senate that will justify any Senator in voting for a single refund to anybody listed for refunds by the Secretary of the Treasury. It is one thing to have a volume with names in it giving the amount refunded opposite the names, but it is quite another thing to have a volume with each case set forth in it, together with the testimony in that case and the judgment entered in the case. I challenge any Senator to show me such a record.

Mr. President, I want the RECORD to show the facts about this legislation. With the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. MCKELLAR], I have fought here for six years or more to have this system changed; and I am now going to give notice that hereafter there must be submitted a list of the names, the amounts to be refunded, and the reason for the refunds in every instance, together with testimony that will justify this body in acting favorably.

Mr. COUZENS. Mr. President, because of the long and persistent opposition of the Secretary of the Treasury to any reform in the method of paying tax refunds or to any legislation which will bring about more efficient and satisfactory methods in the administration of the Bureau of Internal Revenue, it seems that we will have to continue to suffer from maladministration in that bureau. The same statement as applying to the Bureau of Internal Revenue also applies to the Bureau of Prohibition and to the refinancing of the Government's debts. The department reeks with inefficiency. The Secretary of the Treasury is either dishonest or gullible, because such conditions could not continue to exist for a period of eight years without any substantial results in reforming present methods if he were alive to the situation.

I hesitate to take up the time of the Senate at this late hour in the present administration of the Treasury Department, but from all of the reports we receive that administration is to continue. It seems, from press reports, that we are going to continue to have the same sort of administration in the Treasury Department, the greatest department of the Government, that we have had for a period of eight years. No effort on the part of anybody has been able to change the methods employed there in conducting the Government's business; and, as every Senator knows, on every occasion when a tax bill or a deficiency bill or other appropriation bill providing for a tax refund has come before the Senate, an amendment has been attached in this body providing a better method of making such refunds and throwing safeguards around payments. The Senate and the body at the other end of the Capitol have repeatedly made appropriations for tax refunds running into the hundreds of millions and aggregating billions of dollars without any competent testimony as to the necessity for such appropriations or for the purpose to which they were to be devoted. When the first deficiency bill, the conference report on which is now before us, was under consideration in the Senate no figures were submitted to show how the appropriation of $75,000,000 for tax refunds was to be expended. We were to be satisfied with the mere statement that that amount of money was to be appropriated to refund taxes which had been erroneously or illegally collected. No evidence had ever been submitted, no evidence is now before us, that the money that is proposed to be refunded has been illegally or improperly collected. We are asked to take the judgment of some one else as to that. No matter what sort of amendment, imposing restrictions and reservations, we have attached to the appropriation, or revenue bills, or attempted to attach to them, the amendment has been taken out in conference at the instigation of the Secretary of the Treasury.

The Senator from Tennessee [Mr. MCKELLAR] this morning went into considerable detail with respect to the amendment which was adopted by the Senate when the first deficiency bill was passed by this body. After that amendment had been adopted by the Senate the Secretary of the Treasury wrote to the chairman of the Appropriations Committee [Mr. WARREN] a letter in which he opposed that amendment. It was merely a continuation of the previous opposition which he has shown toward all such amendments. He offered no constructive suggestions which would enable Congress to enact legislation insuring that information would be furnished it as to how the tax refunds are arrived at or the policies or precedents used in arriving at them.

I wish to quote from the letter which the Secretary of the Treasury wrote to the chairman of the Appropriations Committee under date of January 29, 1929, as it appears on page 2973 of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD:

THE SECRETARY OF THE TREASURY,
Washington, January 29, 1929.

MY DEAR MR. CHAIRMAN: I submit the following for your consideration in connection with the Senate amendment to the first deficiency appropriation bill providing as follows:

"That no part of the funds herein appropriated for tax refunds where the claim is in excess of $10,000 shall be paid out except upon hearings before any committee or officer in the department conducting the same, which hearings shall be open to the public, and the decision shall be a public document."

The portion of the amendment which provides for public hearings is open to serious objection. In the judgment of the responsible officials of this department, this proposal is not consistent with sound administrative practice.

In order that the effect of the proposal may be clearly seen and the necessity for it correctly estimated, let me review briefly the usual procedure on a claim for refund.

After a claim for refund is filed by a taxpayer it regularly goes to the office of the revenue agent in charge in the taxpayer's district and is assigned to an agent for examination. Conferences are held with the taxpayer or his representative, the necessary examinations of the taxpayer's books and papers made, and a report prepared. This report is then reviewed in the office of the revenue agent in charge and is finally submitted to the revenue agent in charge. Further conferences in his office may be held. If he approves, the papers are forwarded to the Income Tax Unit in Washington and assigned to an auditor for complete review and consideration. The auditor's conclusion must then be reviewed and approved by his superiors before a final decision is reached. Frequently further conferences with the taxpayer or his representative are necessary. If the claim is in excess of $50,000, the entire file is sent to the general counsel's office and there assigned to a special group for another complete review and again conferences may be held with the taxpayer at this stage. The work of the attorney or attorneys who make this review is then submitted to the head of the division, and, if approved, then to the general counsel or one of his assistants for final approval.

In that connection I should like to raise the point that only one general counsel passes upon a claim. No matter how much controversy there may be between subordinates in the department, on all claims in excess of $50,000 the general counsel has the final say as to whether or not the claim shall be allowed. There is no review. He may entirely disagree with all his subordinates, but the records are sealed; they are not open to public inspection or to any review outside of the Treasury itself. So in effect the whole Treasury Department in the matter of large tax refunds is dominated by the chief counsel and his organization. It is evident, as the volumes of testimony which I have on my desk indicate very clearly, that after a decision has been rendered no subordinate is in a position to upset that decision or to question it without serious risk to his own official position. So, notwithstanding the long list of supposed checks which are placed upon the allowance of refunds, there is no opportunity for anybody to object to the final decision because it is all under one head.

It might be compared with a bank examination or with an examination of a corporation's books. No board of directors of a bank or a trust company or a corporation is willing to take its own auditor's review of the actions of the corporation or the conduct of its business, particularly if that board intends to submit such statements to public inspection or for the purpose of obtaining credit. There is no other department in the Government where there is not an audit by the Comptroller General or some outside organization, but in the Treasury Department there is no external audit or examination whatsoever. So, notwithstanding the Secretary's contention that many steps are required to be taken before a refund can be made, it is obvious that the refunds can be controlled without regard to the record.

Further on the Secretary, in his letter to the chairman of the committee, says:

In every important case the file and recommendations go to the commissioner's office, where the commissioner or one of his assistants reviews the case. In addition, if the amount allowed is in excess of $75,000, the general counsel, before transmitting the file of the commissioner prepares a complete statement of the case, which is submitted to the Joint Congressional Committee on Internal Revenue Taxation and the matter held in abeyance for the 30-day period provided by law.

At some later time in my address I want to draw attention to the Joint Congressional Committee on Internal Revenue provided for in the 1926 revenue act and to point out how that joint committee has not functioned and is not now functioning and, so far as Congress is concerned, has been valueless. The joint committee have obtained some results in the relations between themselves and the Treasury Department, but there has been no report made to the Congress as the result of the establishment of that joint committee. Quoting further from the Secretary's letter:

During that time the staff of the joint congressional committee examines the claim, and, if they have any doubt as to the propriety of its allowance, present their views, either by letter or conference, to the general counsel's office for reconsideration.

It will thus be seen that no claim is allowed as a result of the action of one or two individuals, but that on the contrary every claim has to run the gantlet of thorough and complete audits, examinations, and legal review by a staff of competent men, certain of them especially chosen and trained for this work. It is my opinion that this system completely and adequately protects the Government's interests.

With this picture of the procedure in mind it is difficult to see the exact point at which a public hearing could properly be injected. Surely the Congress would not contemplate a requirement that all these proceedings be open to the public, including the initial conference of the revenue agent in the taxpayer's office in his examination of the books?

Of course no Senator who has offered any of the amendments in regard to tax refunds contemplated any such ridiculous procedure. Such amendments have all provided for a final review and final hearing, but have made no provision for any intermediate hearing.

Continuing to read:

Each of the subsequent proceedings are steps in the department's efforts to reach a correct conclusion by ordinary administrative practices. There is no point in the procedure for formal arguments and the presentation of evidence as in a court of law or before the Board of Tax Appeals.

That is a statement contrary to the facts, because in these volumes of testimony taken before the special committee appointed by the Senate to investigate the Internal Revenue Bureau reference after reference is made to hearings and to conferences with groups of the Bureau of Internal Revenue, together with the taxpayer or his attorneys. To the extent that there may not be any stenographic report made of these hearings the Secretary is undoubtedly correct, and that is one of the weaknesses of the present system. There are no stenographic reports of what takes place in these conferences, and there is no record to look up hereafter to determine what was said or done. That is one of the great weaknesses of the present method of settling these tax cases, as is evidenced by the volumes of testimony that we have.

Continuing to read:

The record consists of evidence submitted from time to time by the taxpayer, frequently in affidavit form with his claim and sometimes furnished at a later point in the form of further affidavits and documentary proof; of facts obtained by the revenue agent from examinations of the taxpayer's books and papers; at times of reports of agents of the intelligence unit; and frequently of reports of engineers sent to make examinations of the condition or value of tangible property. The conferences consist of informal discussions of the facts thus established and the application of the law thereto. The record in each case is necessarily an accumulation of work extending frequently over a long period of time.

That is undoubtedly true; but all we have ever required in any of these amendments put in in the Senate is that this accumulation of records on which they base their conclusions may be open to examination either by the Joint Committee on Internal Revenue Taxation or by the public, as the case may be. The Senator from Tennessee [Mr. McKELLAR] suggested the Board of Tax Appeals the last time we had this bill up, and at that time his proposal seemed wholly impracticable because of the accumulation of work.

The Secretary continues to say:

It is misleading to speak of the present procedure as a secret one. Conferences between the only persons who have any real interest in the matter should not be called secret simply because the idly curious are not privileged to be present.

That statement is so perfectly absurd that I should be surprised if it were made by a schoolboy. It is perfectly obvious that the public has an interest in all of these tax matters. It is perfectly obvious that the more of these tax refunds, the more of these tax credits, the more of these abatements there are, the higher the tax rate is on all the rest of the public; and to say that anyone outside of the Government representatives and the taxpayer himself is actuated by idle curiosity because he has an interest in these tax cases is absurd. The idea that the taxpayer and a representative of the Government are the only persons at interest is the statement of a child, because, as a matter of fact, the whole people of the Government are interested, and they are represented only by two or three clerks at modest salaries. That is the extent to which the Government is represented, and that is the kind of representation and that is all the representation that the Secretary thinks the Government of the United States is entitled to, and that is the only interest he thinks we should have—the interest between two or three clerks and the taxpayer. I submit that two or three clerks in the Treasury Department can not represent the public or the Government of the United States.

Every taxpayer is interested. Must a person who is interested in his taxes be "idly curious"? He has a monetary, a very real interest; and to say that the public which is interested is only "idly curious" is to say the ridiculous.

The Secretary continues to say:

or because the procedure does not permit the divulgence of facts of interest only to the taxpayer and the Government—

A repetition of the absurdity that only the taxpayer and the Government are interested in these facts—or because it does not authorize the presence of tax experts seeking information of interest to possible prospective clients or to competitors of the taxpayer.

Now, we will see just how absurd that is.

Every time a taxpayer is assessed by the Treasury Department and resists the assessment, he must either negotiate with the Government and secure an abatement, or he must appear before the Board of Tax Appeals or before the Federal courts. What happens when an assessment is made against a taxpayer which he resists and which the department refuses to concede? He appeals to the Board of Tax Appeals or he appeals to the Federal court. As a matter of fact, the joint congressional committee says there are 18,000 cases pending before the Board of Tax Appeals, and that the cases are being filed at the rate of 600 a month.

Let us see how many of these people are willing to go and expose all of their records when they have a pecuniary interest. When they want to secure a refund, when they want to secure an abatement, they have no objections whatsoever to exposing these records that the Secretary so jealously guards. They are perfectly willing to submit everything to the Board of Tax Appeals or to the Federal courts, all of which becomes a public record.

We can look at Docket No. 7216 before the Board of Tax Appeals in the case of R. Hoe & Co. In that case they submitted a complete story of patents, the value of these patents, and all the intricacies of their business, for the purpose of securing $95,000. So the taxpayer, when he has a financial interest, is not jealous of his patents or the intricacies of his business. He is perfectly willing to expose them to the world. That is one case; and I have lists of other cases where companies have gone before the Board of Tax Appeals and submitted their records to prevent an assessment or to secure a refund.

So if in these cases which in the judgment of the Treasury Department must go to the Board of Tax Appeals or a Federal court the taxpayers must expose all of their records, why are the records of those who do not have like cases so sacred? Why must they all be kept secret? Why must a man who is required to go to court by the Treasury Department expose all his records, and why must the records in all other cases in which the Treasury Department settles with the taxpayer be considered as secret and private?

We can take Docket No. 6926, the Deltox Grass Rug Co. case. That case contained a complete story of patents, the values placed on them, and all of their intimate business relations.

We can take Docket No. 7519, the H. B. Smith Machine Co. There they tell the whole story of their stock ownership, their relationship to investors, and every other detail of their business, when, as a matter of fact, there was only $10,000 involved.

We can take Docket No. 9368, the American Steel Co. It tells of its trade relations with its subsidiaries and the history of its business, all for the sum of $46,000, which was involved in the suit.

There is before the Court of Claims a whole group of subsidiaries of the General Motors Co. They are laying bare the story of their patents and business relations. The affairs of the Perlman Rim Co., the Delco Light Co., and others of their subsidiaries are all submitted to the Court of Claims, because they have a monetary interest.

In these cases there is no sacredness about the secrets of their business. There is no sacredness about their financial relations; but when the settlement is made in the Treasury Department all of these so-called trade secrets, all of these details of business administration must be regarded as secret, and the public has no interest whatsoever in them, because anyone who does is "idly curious"!

The Secretary continues in this letter:

There is a real purpose accomplished by the provisions of the act forbidding such disclosures. While certain large corporations may publish from time to time their balance sheets, there are many smaller taxpayers, particularly new and struggling corporations, whose business could be ruined, for the disclosure of their financial position would frequently encourage unfair business practices designed to eliminate them from the field and possibly permit competitors to take advantage of perhaps a temporarily weak condition.

That statement coming from a banker is the most absurd I ever heard, because there is not a business organization, there is not a banker, there is not a financier, there is not anyone who knows anything about business who does not know that he can go to the trade agencies or to the banks with which he is doing business and find out the financial status, the earnings, and the condition of any corporation in the United States. The Secretary knows this. The Secretary is advancing that specious argument for the purpose of beguiling Congress into making these appropriations for the purpose of making refunds at will to those to whom he chooses to make them.

It is silly to think that anybody is going to be ruined because we let other persons see the financial statement or the earnings of some corporation which makes a return to the Treasury Department.

When a taxpayer wants anything out of the Treasury, when he wants an abatement, there is no hesitancy about his exposing all of these records.

The Secretary continues:

In addition it would reveal secret formulæ—

There is nothing in a tax-return statement that makes a taxpayer reveal any secret formulæ. I defy any one to present a tax return of any corporation in which there is a question requiring him to divulge or disclose his secret formulæ. My colleague [Mr. VANDENBERG] suggests that perhaps the Secretary means the secret formulæ by which the taxpayer secures the refund. That is probably correct.

Then the Secretary goes on to say:

In addition it would reveal secret formulæ, secret trade processes, and vital statistics, such as costs of production.

I again ask the Secretary to produce any tax form published by the Treasury Department that requires the taxpayer to disclose his costs of production. I defy him to produce any form which requires a corporation to submit any vital statistics.

The Secretary continues:

Furthermore, it must be borne in mind that taxable net income is an arbitrary figure—

I will agree with that.

often having but slight relation to the true business income of the concern and seldom any relation to the financial condition or standing of the taxpayer.

Why, certainly. That is what I am contending. The mere return showing his earnings is not a criterion as to his financial standing. His financial standing may be as strong as the Rock of Gibraltar, and yet he may have had a poor year in earnings.

That would not in any way affect his financial standing, because he happened to have one year of poor returns. The Secretary said:

Taxable net income may be greatly in excess of, or much less than, true income.

You can put any kind of interpretation you like on that. I continue:

The publication, therefore, of taxable net income would necessarily be misleading.

That is a specious argument. No one has asked in any amendment that we publish the taxable net income. No proponent of these amendments from time to time has ever suggested that the net incomes be published. That is just an argument to mislead the public. All the proponents of these amendments in this legislation have ever contended for is that these records be public records and accessible to the public, just the same as a tax return in a State or a municipality is public property and accessible to the public.

As I said before, the tax returns of Senators in their municipalities, or the tax returns of corporations with the secretaries of state, are public records, and accessible to those who choose to go and look at them. That is all we request under this system, that these records be made public records, and there is always an attempt to confuse the public mind by attempting to have the public think that the proponents of this legislation want the income-tax statements published in the newspapers. The newspapers themselves have helped to create that sort of absurd theory of what we mean by these returns being public records. They continue to say that we are curiosity seekers, that we are idly curious, that we want all these records published in the press, and that has been responsible for creating the public opinion that these records should not be public records, and that the secrecy that exists should continue to exist. There never was a case in my public experience where the people were so misled as to what the proponents of this legislation wanted.

The Secretary continues:

It might destroy public confidence in a well-managed business.

How could you destroy public confidence in a well-managed business? If a business is well managed, the records will show that it is well managed. The Secretary said:

It might destroy public confidence in a well-managed business, or might unfortunately establish an unjustified confidence in the minds of creditors or investors.

That is so absurd that if the whole matter were not serious, one would have to laugh over it, because it is not suspected that creditors or investors are so gullible that they rely upon some public statement to justify their confidence or lack of confidence. Any careful investor, any careful creditor, gets the facts, and he has many agencies through which he can get the facts. The fact that these returns were public records in the Treasury Department would have no effect whatever on the public confidence or lack of confidence in any corporation.

The Secretary says:

Particularly would this be probable, since the publication of the figures would necessarily be incomplete and fragmentary.

No one asks for the publication of the figures. No one has requested it. No amendment we have offered has suggested any such absurd thing. I continue to read from the Secretary:

Taxpayers should be permitted to contribute to the revenues of the Government and adjust their tax liabilities without being forced to disclose their business affairs and policies, of interest only to competitors and the curious, and without being subjected to the risk of improper and unwarranted deductions.

There may be some truth in that, if all of these hundreds of thousands of returns, with the complete data, were published in the press of the country, which no one suggested and no one wants, and which, of course, no newspaper would undertake to do. The Secretary says:

Furthermore, in cases involving the so-called special assessment provisions, the decision rests upon the data secured from competitors' returns, and these companies could rightly object to publication of the figures when they have no pending claim.

No one suggests any publication of any statement; but it is perfectly obvious that the taxpayer ought to know, when he gets a special assessment, what sort of competitors he is being compared with, so as to get this average assessment called "special assessment."

For the above reasons I respectfully urge that the provision for a public hearing on these matters be eliminated.

Whether the final decision of the department should be made a public document of record presents a somewhat different problem, though it would seem such action is open to most of the objections above enumerated. At the present time all the larger cases are formally presented to the joint congressional committee, and all the records of the department relating to refunds are at all times open to the scrutiny of the members of that committee and their agents. What more effective safeguard can be provided?

The Secretary concludes his letter to the chairman of the committee, as follows:

I am sending similar letters to Senator SMOOT, chairman of the Committee on Finance, Congressmen ANTHONY and WOOD of the House Committee on Appropriations, and Congressman HAWLEY, chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means and the Joint Committee on Internal Revenue Taxation.

That is just a continuation of the Secretary's fight and persistency in keeping from Congress all of the information that Congress ought to have in making appropriations of billions of dollars for refunds.

Not only that, but Congress, in fixing the tax rates, in lowering them, and in all probability having to raise them in a very short time, has no figures whatever, no statement, no facts, from which they may judge the methods of the Treasury Department in allowing these enormous abatements, refunds, and credits.

This matter has been before Congress for many years. For five years we have been endeavoring to straighten out this tangle. As the Senate knows, a special committee was appointed by resolution of the Senate, of which the senior Senator from Indiana [Mr. WATSON] was first chairman, and later I had the honor to be, which went very extensively into the workings of the Internal Revenue Bureau. We pointed out in these many volumes the incompetency, the inefficiency, and the favoritism existing in the department.

As the result of that effort, when the 1926 tax valuation came before Congress, the Finance Committee, of which three or four of our special committee were members, invited some of the staff of the special committee before it, and we went into discussions at length to show the weaknesses of the department, and endeavored to get some remedial legislation.

The outcome was, as most Senators will remember, that incorporated in the 1926 act was section 1203, which provided for the Joint Congressional Committee on Internal Revenue Taxation. Section 1203 reads as follows:

SEC. 1203. (a) There is hereby established a joint congressional committee to be known as the Joint Committee on Internal Revenue Taxation (hereinafter in this section referred to as the "joint committee"), and to be composed of 10 members as follows:

(1) Five members who are members of the Committee on Finance of the Senate, three from the majority and two from the minority party, to be chosen by such committee; and

(2) Five members who are members of the Committee on Ways and Means of the House of Representatives, three from the majority and two from the minority party, to be chosen by such committee.

(b) No person shall continue to serve as a member of the joint committee after he has ceased to be a member of the committee by which he was chosen, except that the members chosen by the Committee on Ways and Means who have been reelected to the House of Representatives may continue to serve as members of the joint committee, notwithstanding the expiration of the Congress. A vacancy in the joint committee shall not affect the power of the remaining members to execute the functions of the joint committee, and shall be filled in the same manner as the original selection, except that (1) in case of a vacancy during an adjournment or recess of Congress for a period of more than two weeks, the members of the joint committee who are members of the committee entitled to fill such vacancy may designate a member of such committee to serve until his successor is chosen by such committee, and (2) in the case of a vacancy after the expiration of a Congress which would be filled by the Committee on Ways and Means, the members of such committee who are continuing to serve as members of the joint committee may designate a person who, immediately prior to such expiration, was a member of such committee and who is reelected to the House of Representatives, to serve until his successor is chosen by such committee.

This is where I want to lay emphasis:

(c) It shall be the duty of the joint committee—

(1) To investigate the operation and effects of the Federal system of internal-revenue taxes.

Whether the committee has done anything of that sort we have no report.

(2) To investigate the administration of such taxes by the Bureau of Internal Revenue or any executive department, establishment, or agency charged with their administration;

(3) To make such other investigations in respect of such system of taxes as the joint committee may deem necessary;

(4) To investigate measures and methods for the simplification of such taxes, particularly the income tax;

(5) To publish, from time to time, for public examination and analysis, proposed measures and methods for the simplification of such taxes, and to make to the Senate and the House of Representatives, not later than December 31, 1927, a definite report thereon, together with such recommendations as it may deem advisable; and

(6) To report, from time to time, to the Committee on Finance and the Committee on Ways and Means and, in its discretion, to the Senate or the House of Representatives, or both, the results of its investigations, together with such recommendations as it may deem advisable.

As a member of the Finance Committee of the Senate I find no report has ever been made to that committee, and I doubt whether any has ever been made to the Ways and Means Committee of the House.

(d) The joint committee shall have the same right to obtain data and to inspect returns as the Committee on Ways and Means or the Committee on Finance, and to submit any relevant or useful information thus obtained to the Senate, the House of Representatives, the Committee on Ways and Means, or the Committee on Finance. The Committee on Ways and Means or the Committee on Finance may submit such information to the House or to the Senate, or to both the House and the Senate, as the case may be.

No committee action has been taken, so far as I am able to find, by the tax commission, by the Finance Committee of the Senate, or by the Ways and Means Committee of the House to report any of their findings after the passage of this law in 1926.

(e) The joint committee shall meet and organize as soon as practicable after at least a majority of the members have been chosen, and shall elect a chairman and vice chairman from among its members and shall have power to appoint and fix the compensation of a clerk and such experts and clerical, stenographic, and other assistants as it deems advisable.

(f) The joint committee, or any subcommittee thereof, is authorized to hold hearings and to sit and act at such places and times, to require by subpœna or otherwise the attendance of such witnesses and the production of such books, papers, and documents, to administer such oaths, to take such testimony, to have such printing and binding done, and to make such expenditures as it deems advisable. The cost of stenographic services in reporting such hearings shall not be in excess of 25 cents per hundred words. Subpœnas for witnesses shall be issued under the signature of the chairman or vice chairman.

The other paragraphs contain provisions with reference to the members not receiving any extra compensation and providing that the expense of the committee is to be paid out of the contingent funds of the two Houses.

Mr. President, I submit that Congress adopted this means in an effort to correct all of the evils that were disclosed by the committee which investigated the Bureau of Internal Revenue. It passed this law expecting that the joint commission would do the things that the special committee had been doing in the way of investigating the administration of the department and for determining the advisability of the many credits and refunds that were made. By hearsay and by inquiry I have learned that they have done some very good work, but I also submit that they have absolutely no authority whatsoever. The Secretary lays emphasis on the fact that before these large refunds are made the records must be sent down to the joint tax commission for investigation and they must remain there 30 days before payment is made. But I submit that when the committee has protested settlements based on these papers, the Treasury Department has gone ahead and made them anyway. That shows what a farce the whole effort of Congress has been to secure any reliable control over the disbursements of moneys by refunds or to control abatements and credits which have been given to the corporations and individuals.

In the first deficiency bill that went to conference and which was held up in conference for such a long time was contained the amendment proposed by the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. McKELLAR]. I want to draw attention to the language in the amendment adopted by the Senate and which went to conference, and the form of agreement which comes back in the conference report. The amendment which the Senate placed in the first deficiency bill provided:

That no part of the funds herein appropriated for tax refunds, where the claim is in excess of $10,000 shall be paid out except upon hearings before any committee or officer of the department conducting the same, which hearings shall be open to the public and the decision shall be a public document.

When the conference report came back to the Senate we found that the conferees had changed this language to read:

Provided, That no part of the foregoing appropriation shall be used to pay any refund of any income or profit tax pursuant to a claim allowed under the enactment of this act in excess of $20,000.

The conferees raised it to $20,000. I submit they had no authority to raise it to $20,000. I submit that that amount was not mentioned in either House, and they had no right to put in the amendment agreed upon anything that was not in the amendment of either House.

I want to point out next the language which is used. The purpose of it is very obvious. It is provided that "The refund shall not be made pursuant to a claim allowed after the enactment of this act." It is months since this list of $75,000,000 was sent down here by the Budget for an appropriation to pay claims for refunds. It was contended, as I understand, before the Appropriations Committee that they did not know at that time where this money was going, that the appropriation was to pay claims that would be settled in the future. I do not believe that statement. I believe they knew then the claims that they were going to allow, otherwise they would not have been able to estimate the $75,000,000. I contend that since that time many claims have been allowed for which the $75,000,000 will be used and, therefore, will not come under the act because the provision is "the profits tax pursuant to the claim allowed after the enactment of this act." Of course, this act will probably not be signed until Monday, and by that time, in all probability, all of the $75,000,000 will be allowed in refunds and, therefore, all claims having been allowed, they will not come under the amendment.

The agreement between the conferees contained this language:

Other than payments in cases in which a suit in court or a proceeding before the Board of Tax Appeals has been or shall be instituted, or payments in cases determined upon precedents established in decisions of courts or the Board of Tax Appeals.

Who determines whether a precedent has been established? The same secret agencies that determine all the tax refunds, the same secret agencies that determine all abatements, the same secret agencies that determine all credits, will determine in making these refunds whether a precedent has been established by a decision of the Board of Tax Appeals or by a decision of the court. So we are placed in the perfectly silly and absurd position which we occupied before we ever enacted the provision.

Then the provision continues:

Unless a hearing has been held before a committee or official of the Bureau of Internal Revenue and the decision of the Commission of Internal Revenue in such refund allowance in cases of $20,000 shall be a public record.

Of course the decision is a public record. Every time they publish a list, as a matter of fact, of the refunds made that is a decision in itself. But assuming that that is taking a rather limited view of the situation and assuming that they would be required to give us more than a mere statement of a refund, it is a perfectly simple matter for the general counsel of the Bureau of Internal Revenue to say, "I have examined the papers in such and such a case and my decision is that a refund of $50,000 is justified," and that would be the decision and that would be all we are entitled to. The absurdity of the proposition is so apparent that I would rather see nothing in the bill than such a ridiculous provision.

Mr. President, in view of the lateness of the session I do not want to take up any more time of the Senate to discuss the matter. I just want to express the hope that our new President will take some interest in seeing that a proper method of checks and balances is established so this absurdity can not be persisted in.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, the senior Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS], who for the moment is absent from the Chamber, had a good deal to say about the present commission for internal revenue taxes doing its full duty. The representative of that commission is Mr. Parker, whose proof was taken by me in the hearings.

Mr. Parker is a very competent man, I think, and here is what Mr. Parker had to say about the duties of that commission in so far as the tax refunds are concerned:

Senator MCKELLAR. In other words, you are powerless under this?

Mr. PARKER. The statute gave us no power, but we went further than that. I had a conference with Judge Green, who was chairman of the committee at that time, and we went over it very carefully, and we wanted to do whatever Congress intended. We did not think that it was the intent of Congress to say that we had no duties, and we concluded that probably Congress intended that we should examine these refunds and find out the general cause of them, so that it could be informed as to why these amounts were expended and how. That was one purpose.

Another purpose was for the committee itself in its work to keep in touch, not only in general with tax matters, but specifically to find how the law worked, and to see the practical application of the various provisions of the act.

And, third, we thought that it was proper to make to the Bureau of Internal Revenue certain comments, criticisms, or suggestions in regard to these particular cases.

Now, in general, it was agreed between Judge Green and myself that no definite statement of approval or disapproval was required—and that if we raised certain issues to the bureau it was thought that they would cooperate and that they would examine that case again on those issues that we raised. Having raised the issues we thought that our duties were accomplished under the act.

Meaning in any tax-refund case—

Senator MCKELLAR. Now, let me ask you: Did you approve of the settlement by which $26,000,000 was returned to the United States Steel Co.?

Mr. PARKER. Just as I stated, we did not approve or disapprove; but we looked over the case. Mr. Chesteen, chief examiner, looked over the case. We went into the principal issues and one issue was about consolidated returns, that is, consolidated invested capital. The bureau very frankly admitted that they were in a dilemma about that computation, that the decisions of the courts, the Board of Tax Appeals, and their own regulations were in conflict. The result was that they had to make a settlement of that issue as best they could. It is admitted that it does not follow exactly any one of the three rules.

Now, Mr. President, I wish to say about this that the Joint Committee on Internal Revenue Taxation by the statement of its executive officer admits it has no power to pass upon tax refunds; and it has not done so. The power has been taken out of the provision creating the joint committee. It was emasculated in conference when that matter was up nearly two years ago, just as the power of this amendment was taken out of it by the conference. So, it seems to me that this bill ought to be sent back to conference; we ought to vote down the conference report; and I hope the Senate will do so. If we are going to vote on the conference report now, I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. COUZENS. Mr. President, what is the question?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. EDGE in the chair). The question is upon agreeing to the conference report on House bill 15848.

Mr. COUZENS. I ask the Senator from Tennessee if he is going to ask for a separate vote on amendment No. 15 or permit the vote to be taken on the bill in its entirety?

Mr. MCKELLAR. We can not ask for a separate vote; we have to vote on the conference report as a whole. If the report should be rejected that would send it back to conference, when the conferees can again meet and insert a real provision in the bill if they desire to do so. I desire the conference report voted down, and I hope Senators will vote it down and send it back to the conference committee in order that the conferees may bring in another report containing an effective provision, which will properly safeguard the payment of tax refunds. Ample time remains to do that.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, of course, as Senators very well know, there can not be a separate vote on any provision of the conference report. The vote must be "yea" or "nay" on agreeing to the report.

Mr. BRATTON. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry. In what form is the question to be taken?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the conference report. The clerk will call the roll.

The Chief Clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. GEORGE (when his name was called). I have a pair with the senior Senator from Colorado [Mr. PHIPPS], but I am advised that if present he would vote as I expect to vote on this question. I am, therefore, at liberty to vote. I vote "yea."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania (after having voted in the affirmative). I transfer my pair with the Senator from Delaware [Mr. BAYARD] to the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. GILLETT] and let my vote stand.

The result was announced—yeas 66; nays 16, as follows:

SENATOR THOMAS F. BAYARD

Mr. HASTINGS. Mr. President, the name of Bayard will on the 4th of March next disappear from the rolls of the Senate. I think it quite worth while at this time to call to the attention of the Senate the fact that the senior Senator from Delaware [Mr. BAYARD] is the fifth distinguished person of the same name and the same family who has represented the State of Delaware in the United States Senate.

James Asheton Bayard, sr., the great-grandfather of the present Senator, served in the United States Senate from November 13, 1804, to March 3, 1813, when he resigned. He had also served in the House of Representatives in the Fifth, Sixth, and Seventh Congresses. He was a member of the commission which negotiated the treaty of Ghent, signed December 24, 1814. He had declined the appointment of minister to France, tendered by President John Adams in 1801, and also declined the appointment to Russia, tendered by President James Madison in 1815.

This Senator Bayard had two sons who served in the United States Senate—Richard Henry Bayard, from June 17, 1836, to September 19, 1839, when he resigned to become chief justice of Delaware, and again from January 12, 1841, to March 3, 1845. This son was a great-uncle of the present Senator. The other son was James Asheton Bayard, jr., who served as United States Senator from Delaware from March 4, 1851, to January 29, 1864, and again from April 5, 1867, to March 3, 1869. This son was the grandfather of the present Senator.

Probably the most distinguished member of this family was Thomas Francis Bayard, sr., who served in the United States Senate from March 4, 1869, to March 6, 1885, when he resigned to become Secretary of State in the Cleveland administration. He was also a member of the Electoral Commission created to decide the contest in the presidential election of 1876. He was ambassador to Great Britain from 1893 to 1897. This was the father of the present Senator, THOMAS FRANCIS, BAYARD, JR., who is now about to retire after a service here of a little more than six years.

To this remarkable record must be added this additional fact: The grandfather of the original Senator Bayard, Richard Bassett, served in the United States Senate from March 4, 1789, to March 3, 1793.

It will be observed that there have been four Bayards in direct line serving in this body—the present incumbent, his father, his grandfather, and his great-grandfather. In addition to that there were a great-uncle by the name of Bayard and a great-great-grandfather, Senator Bassett.

I doubt whether any family from any State has any such record of public service anywhere, and I am quite sure there is no record which compares with this in a body as important as that of the United States Senate.

Senator BAYARD married Miss du Pont, another one of those old and distinguished families of Delaware. The Du Pont family is also prominent in the public service of this country. In the history of the Army and Navy the name of Du Pont is prominent, and two members of that family also have served as United States Senators from the State of Delaware—Henry A.

du Pont and T. Coleman du Pont. Senator and Mrs. BAYARD have five children, and this record will show that eight of their ancestors served in the United States Senate from the little State of Delaware.

What a wealth of inheritance this is! And at the same time what a responsibility such a distinguished ancestry places upon these children!

It has been no freak of fortune which has made a record like this; there has been a real substance back of it all. Greater opportunities may have come to some in this list that make them stand out bolder than others, but no man in the Senate, and I doubt any man or woman in Delaware, will doubt but that THOMAS F. BAYARD, Jr., has conscientiously and with fidelity performed his duties as a United States Senator, and I am sure as he leaves this Chamber he carries with him the good wishes of every Senator here from the oldest in the service to the youngest.

SETTLEMENT OF CLAIMS AGAINST THE UNITED STATES

Mr. McMASTER submitted the following report:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 9285) entitled "An act to provide for the settlement of claims against the United States on account of property damage, personal injury, or death," having met, after full and free conference, have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the Senate recede from its amendment numbered 7.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate numbered 1, 2, 3, 4, 5, 6, 8, 9, 10, 11, 12, 13, 14, 15, 16, 17, 18, 19, 20, 21, 22, 23, 24, and 25, with two related amendments, as follows: On page 8, line 25, and page 9, line 1, strike out the following: "if the claim accrued after April 6, 1925"; on page 19, strike out in lines 19, 20, and 21, the following: ", and except that any claim accrued after April 6, 1925, but prior to the passage of this act, may be filed within one year after the passage of this act"; and the Senate agree to the same.

Mr. NORBECK submitted the following report:

That the Senate recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the House and agree to the same with amendments as follows: In line 2 of the matter inserted by said amendment, after the word "when," insert the following: "a quantum, satisfactory to the Secretary of the Interior, of," and at the end of section 4 of said amendment add the following: ": Provided, That in advance of the fulfillment of the conditions herein the Secretary of the Interior may grant franchises for hotel and for lodge accommodations under the provisions of this section"; and the House agree to the same.

REPRESENTATIVE HOMER W. HALL

Mr. NORRIS. I wish to call up a joint resolution passed by the House which was transmitted to the Senate to-day.

The joint resolution (H. J. Res. 434) to appoint HOMER W. HALL a member of the subcommittee of the Committee on the Judiciary, established under House Joint Resolution 431 to inquire into the official conduct of Grover M. Moscowitz, United States district judge for the eastern district of New York, was read twice by its title and considered as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. NORRIS. The Senate passed a House joint resolution the other day permitting the subcommittee of the Committee on the Judiciary of the House to operate during the recess after the adjournment of the present Congress. One of the members of that subcommittee has died since we passed the joint resolution, and this simply names Mr. HALL in place of the deceased member.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

TRIBUTE TO RETIRING SENATORS—COMMITTEE APPOINTMENT

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, the friends of the Senator from Delaware [Mr. BAYARD], particularly those on this side of the Chamber—and every Senator who sits on this side is his friend—feel keen appreciation for the tribute just paid to the Senator from Delaware by his colleague [Mr. HASTINGS]. It is a most extraordinary and unusual circumstance in the proceedings of the Senate. The Senator who has just spoken is allied with the majority party, the party that dominates the business of the Senate. The senior Senator from Delaware throughout his life has been a faithful member of the Democratic Party. Speaking without regard to partisan alignment, the State of Delaware has been ably represented by the Senator who will retire on the 4th of March, Mr. BAYARD. He has been uniformly courteous, always kind and generous, and exceptionally able in the performance of his duties.

May I take just a moment to refer to the fact that by the chances of politics, and the misfortunes of political warfare, a number of Senators will not serve in this body following the 4th of March, at least until their constituents rectify the mistakes they made in the last election and vote to return them here. Among them are the cultured Senator from Maryland [Mr. BRUCE], the faithful and diligent Senator from New Jersey [Mr. EDWARDS], the loyal and painstaking Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. GERRY], the genial and able Senator from Texas [Mr. MAYFIELD], and the brilliant Senator from West Virginia [Mr. NEELY].

There have been times when, in the heat of debate, feeling has run high in the Senate; but on occasions like this those times are forgotten. I think we may all join in a brief and just tribute to these Members who have so well performed their duty.

There is another Senator who has sat by my side during the last few years who is voluntarily leaving the United States Senate. Recent times have not brought to this body an abler, more determined, more eloquent, or faithful Senator than the senior Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED]. Aggressive by nature, unyielding in his assertion of principle, he commands the respect and the confidence of all of his colleagues.

A few days ago he asked to be relieved from service on a special committee of the Senate, the select committee charged with the investigation of campaign expenditures in senatorial primaries and elections. No action was taken on his request at the time it was made. The duties which that committee has been called upon to perform have been in their nature arduous and somewhat disagreeable. Under the leadership of the Senator from Missouri, the committee has performed its duties in a spirit of fidelity to the highest traditions and the undying glory of this great body.

I now ask unanimous consent that the Senator from Missouri may be relieved from further service on the select committee, and that the Chair, at his convenience, appoint a Member to succeed the Senator from Missouri.

I thank the Senate for its courteous consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. McNARY in the chair). Without objection, the senior Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED] will be relieved from further service on the select committee. At a later date the Presiding Officer of this body will appoint his successor.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, the request made at that time by the Senator from Missouri had another part to it. Technically speaking, the suggestion made by the Senator from Arkansas is correct. The Chair under the original resolution will appoint the successor of the Senator from Missouri; but I take it that we should pay further respect to the Senator from Missouri for the work he has done as chairman of the committee if we complied with his further request, which was that the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON] should succeed him on the committee.

I ask unanimous consent that that be done, and that the Senator from Arkansas be appointed to succeed the Senator from Missouri as chairman of the special committee.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Nebraska asks unanimous consent that the Senator from Arkansas [Mr.

ROBINSON] be appointed to succeed the Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED] as chairman of the special committee. Is there objection? The Chair hears none; and the Chair appoints the Senator from Arkansas in place of the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, the service required is not an easy one. It will be impossible for anyone to fill the place vacated by the Senator from Missouri. I would not accept this assignment if it were made under other conditions; but, under the circumstances, I will attempt to serve.

SECOND DEFICIENCY APPROPRIATIONS

Mr. WARREN submitted the following report:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 17223) making appropriations to supply deficiencies in certain appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1929, and prior fiscal years, to provide supplemental appropriations for the fiscal years ending June 30, 1929, and June 30, 1930, and for other purposes, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

And the Senate agree to the same.

The commission or the board of alternates may authorize the disbursement of funds, approved for disbursement by either of them, directly through a disbursing agent appointed or designated by the commission for that purpose, or may authorize such disbursing agent to advance funds to the insular treasury for effecting approved disbursements"; and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 31: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 31, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: After the word "Congress)," where it appears in such amendment, insert the following: "fiscal years 1929 and 1930," and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 32: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 32, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the sum named in said amendment insert "$100,000"; and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 45: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 45, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the sum "$12,000,000," in said amendment, insert the following: "$7,400,000, to be allocated in equal amounts to each vessel and"; and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 53: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 53, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: Restore the matter stricken out by said amendment, amended to read as follows:

"BUREAU OF PROHIBITION

"Narcotic enforcement: For an additional amount for the enforcement of the acts relating to narcotics, including the same objects specified under this head in the act making appropriations for the Treasury Department for the fiscal year 1930, $200,000."

And the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 61: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 61, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In line 3 of the matter inserted by said amendment, strike out "$185,000" and insert "$150,000"; and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 67: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 67, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In line 13 of the matter inserted by said amendment, after the article "a," insert the following: "laboratory and"; and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 58: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 58, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: At the end of the matter inserted by said amendment, strike out the period and insert the following: ": Provided, That no part of this appropriation shall be available for demonstration work in rural sanitation in any community unless the State, county, or municipality in which the community is located agrees to pay one-half the expenses of such demonstration work"; and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 74: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 74, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the matter inserted by said amendment, insert the following:

And the Senate agree to the same.

"SHORT TITLE

"This act may be cited as the 'second deficiency act, fiscal year 1929.'"

And the Senate agree to the same.

F. E. WARREN,
HENRY W. KEYES,
LEE S. OVERMAN,
CARTER GLASS,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

WILL R. WOOD,
LOUIS C. CRAMTON,
JOSEPH W. BYRNS,
Managers on the part of the House.

Mr. WARREN. I move the adoption of the report.

Mr. BROOKHART. Mr. President, I shall occupy but a few moments. I ask the chairman of the committee if this is the bill that rejected the employees' pay amendment adopted by the Senate?

Mr. WARREN. It is the bill which contained the proposition coming from the House to cover deficiencies for the current year; and also the proposition made by the Senator from Iowa; both of which in the end were cut out of the bill because it was not considered that the conferees could give the matter sufficient time to bring out a bill that would be satisfactory perhaps to the Senator himself, and certainly not to all.

Mr. BROOKHART. Mr. President, of course I regret that this amendment had to be rejected, especially since everybody seemed to agree to its justice. Unfortunately, other propositions were improperly tied to it, and that was what prevented the agreement.

On the merits of this proposition there can be no doubt. These are the underpaid employees. We had a proposition presented from the House calling for a reduction of certain salaries. It is not due to anything coming from the Senate. Objections to that situation grew out of action by the House in the original bill.

The Senate accepted the provision in the House bill a year ago as to those increases, and later a ruling of the Comptroller General seemed to aggravate the situation to some extent.

Whether those positions should be reduced or not, there is no doubt that these advances voted by the Senate should have been made. Now they can not be made. I regret that that is so and promise that the future will bring this matter to an issue, and, I hope, a successful issue.

Yesterday Doctor COPELAND, the Senator from New York, said that a man lives on one-third of what he eats, and the doctors live on the other two-thirds. Mr. President, we will have to say to the Government employees, instead of the advances to which they are justly entitled they must eat less and save doctors' bills.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the conference report.

The report was agreed to.

SALT CREEK OIL LEASES

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, I rise to submit some observations upon an address made some days ago by the chairman of the Committee on Public Lands and Surveys [Mr. NYE] in relation to the report submitted to the Senate by certain members of that committee concerning the so-called Salt Creek royalty oil contracts.

Although the report is frequently referred to as the Walsh report, and perhaps properly enough so, seeing that it was prepared and submitted by me to the committee, it will bear repetition that it is signed and approved by 7 of the 15 members of the committee, 1 of the members of the committee, it is understood, being ill and unable to participate in the work of the committee. It is quite proper here to observe that that is the only report which has been submitted to the Senate with respect to that feature of the work of the committee. Indeed, it is the only report which was submitted to the committee itself, save for a single exception.

A report was prepared and submitted to the committee by the Senator from Illinois [Mr. GLENN], but if my information is correct, he found it impossible to get any other member of the committee to concur with him in that report. It was the second draft made by the Senator from Illinois, the first having been shown to contain some errors of fact of more or less consequence, and it was subsequently withdrawn by him.

I want to remark, in this connection, that the chairman of the committee is in substantial agreement with the report submitted to the Senate, which all agree contains an accurate, substantial, and full statement of the facts developed by the committee.

The chairman of the committee agrees that the Department of the Interior is open to censure for the part it had in this transaction. The right to censure the Department of Justice is, however, questioned by him. The only objection, so far as the Department of the Interior is concerned, is that the censure of the report is too severe. That that is the attitude of the chairman will be gathered from the following extracts from his address. Referring to what he thought was the possibility of preparing a report which would have substantially the unanimous support of the committee, he said, as appears on page 3508 of the RECORD:

> Such a report, in the face of committee findings, would not have been, with my aid and consent, one necessarily free from criticism of the Departments of Justice and Interior, which are involved in this controversy, but it would most assuredly be devoid of that measure of censure which has been accorded in the Walsh report.

Again he said, as appears at page 3509:

> I am ready to agree that care and diligence were assuredly lacking on the part of the solicitor of the department when the matter was submitted to him. It appears first that he did not give the matter more than passing consideration, but close study of the record would lead one to believe that when the solicitor was asked for an opinion on the question of renewal, though the solicitor offered his opinion on the following day he had in fact given the matter study through several days and was thus prepared to render such opinion as he did upon very short notice. I feel, too, that care and diligence were lacking in a degree when Secretary Work failed to avail himself of the advice of the office of the Attorney General before renewing the contract. While it is problematical, in the absence of positive protest based upon the lack of conformity between the successful Sinclair bid and the advertisement for bids, that the office of the Attorney General would have reached any other conclusion at that time than was reached by the Interior Department, it does seem to me that the great and prominent attention which was nationally given to the question of the Sinclair deals, and the magnitude of the amount involved in the contract and its intended renewal, would have prompted a man occupying the place of Secretary of the Interior to have utilized in the fullest the available advice of the Justice Department in connection with any matter in which the Sinclair interests were involved, and this no matter how apparent the rights of parties concerned might have been on the face of the contract or other agreement.

At page 3511 the Senator is reported as saying:

> I believe that censure is owing the Secretary of the Interior, censure is owing the Solicitor of the Interior Department, but, in all fairness to them, the facts ought to be brought out to show that there has been nothing brought into the record to indicate that there was anything unworthy or unclean in the motives which moved them when they were engaged in this transaction.

The following is found at pages 3515 and 3516:

> Mr. WALSH of Montana. I have paid what I think is a just tribute to Mr. Kenyon's opinion of October 8 or October 10, but I would like to inquire of the Senator from North Dakota if he thinks that Mr. Kenyon discharged his full duty when he never called the attention of either Colonel Donovan or the Attorney General to the request of the Department of the Interior for an opinion, and does the Senator think Mr. Kenyon is entirely free from blame when he never even looked at the authorities which eventually convinced him that Kem was right?
> Mr. NYE. No, Mr. President; I do not think I could so argue, not by any manner of means; but I am not unmindful of the fact that Mr. Kenyon and Mr. Chandler were brought into this case last March and were given a specific duty to perform. When the case came to them, I think I can understand how they felt and why they felt that it was sent to them primarily as a matter of information which they were to mill over.
> Mr. WALSH of Montana. Let us take the questions one at a time. Colonel Donovan learned of this matter from a newspaper while he was in the State of New Mexico, some four months after the case went to the department. Does the Senator think that Mr. Kenyon discharged his duty when for four months he did not even mention to Colonel Donovan that the letter addressed to Colonel Donovan asking an opinion had come to his attention?
> Mr. NYE. Mr. President, I could not severely criticize Mr. Kenyon for that.
> Mr. WALSH of Montana. That was not the question I asked. Kenyon, in the Department of Justice, received a letter addressed to Colonel Donovan requesting an opinion from the Department of the Interior and did not even look at the authority cited and did not call Colonel Donovan's attention to it for four months. I ask the Senator if he thinks that is not subject to reprehension?
> Mr. NYE. Yes; I think that is subject to criticism. I believe the unfortunate thing all the way through is the lack of understanding on the part of Kenyon and Chandler as to angles of the question that were quite thoroughly removed from the duties which were directly before them.

Mr. President, it will appear, then, that the chairman of the Committee on Public Lands and Surveys agrees that the Secretary of the Interior is subject to censure, he agrees that the Solicitor of the Department of the Interior is subject to censure, he agrees that the subordinates in the Department of Justice to whom this matter was entrusted are subject to censure. Yet it appears that he is unable to concur in the simple declaration of the report joined in by seven members of the committee to the effect that—

> It is the judgment of this committee that both departments are open to censure for the manner in which the feature of the public business herein canvassed was handled.

The Senator is unable to concur in this report because, he says, there is an implication in it that there is some dark secrecy in the matter. Thus, at page 3509 he said:

> It is unfair to cause one to believe that the content of these renewal clauses in the contract was kept a dark secret.

At page 3511:

I think the conclusion that has been drawn as a general thing from the report submitted by the Senator from Montana has been the conclusion, first of all—I have not gathered that myself so directly as others have, but it has been drawn nevertheless—that the content within the contract which went to the Sinclair people of the option to renew was kept a dark and a great secret through all of these years, from the time it was entered into until within the last year, when all the evidence indicates that that was not the case at all; that there was never any effort made to conceal it; that the department gave out the information, gave out the contract and information about it, to all who might make inquiry for it. That it was not noted, that it was not observed, perhaps is not at all surprising.

At page 3515:

The Walsh report at least implies that an understanding existed between the Department of the Interior and the Department of Justice which would delay any action looking to cancellation of the contract.

On page 3516:

Let it be further noted that if the attitude of the Department of Justice was in any measure a part of a suggested conspiracy of silence, as is certainly implied by the report, then I must, by joining in this report, admit myself in some measure a party to the conspiracy.

Mr. President, the only portion of the report to which that objection can possibly have reference is this simple paragraph:

The protestant—

That is, the White Eagle Refining Co.—

The protestant had no knowledge of the existence of the option clause in the Sinclair Co.'s contract until learning of the fact through newspaper reports of the renewal, nor did it have any information that the renewal was under consideration by the Department of the Interior, there having been no notice given either generally or specifically of either fact.

Mr. NYE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I yield.

Mr. NYE. The Senator refers to that one portion of his report as if it were the only portion of the report considered in the manner in which he has stated; but the Senator overlooks the fact that he made a part of his report which was presented to the Senate, a reprint of an article from the New York World in which the conspiracy charge is injected, and since it was printed and made a part of the report I think it altogether fair to assume that the implication of there having been something in the nature of a conspiracy of silence was well founded on my part.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, I might as well advert to that now. What was said by me in the New York World is obviously no part of the report of the committee or of the seven members of the committee who submitted the report; but I am perfectly willing that the Senate should know all about that statement made in the New York World article by myself.

It will be borne in mind that in the early part of the year Messrs. Kenyon and Chandler were sent to me by the Department of Justice to confer with me about the institution of proceedings for the cancellation of the contract upon the ground, as it was then understood, of fraud existing in the contract and not because of any legal imperfection in the contract itself. They came to confer with me. Subsequently they appeared before the committee and attended its hearings. Meanwhile, on the 27th day of April, 1928, there came before the Department of the Interior this protest upon the part of the White Eagle Refining Co., with a brief in support of that contention by Mr. Kem, a very able lawyer.

We continued our hearings until we finally concluded the work of the session. I heard nothing further from these gentlemen, although they had in their possession this protest with the supporting brief. I heard nothing at all about it until the latter part of the month of September, 1928. Meanwhile, according to the story told me by Mr. Kem, who came clear out to the city of Helena from Kansas City to interview me about the matter and enlist my interest in getting something done about the matter, he conveyed to me the information that this protest had got to the Department of the Interior on the 27th day of April; likewise that in the month of June he had taken this matter up with the chairman of the committee in Kansas City; likewise he had twice called the Assistant Secretary of the Interior over the telephone from Kansas City in order to endeavor to ascertain what was being done about the matter and to promote action upon his protest. He learned that the matter had been turned over as early as the month of June to the Department of Justice.

Being unable to secure any action with respect to the matter from either department he had enlisted the activity of Senator CAPPER, of the State of Kansas, who had written to the Department of Justice for information about the matter. He showed me a copy of a letter in answer to Senator CAPPER, which gave him no information at all. Senator CAPPER likewise asked for a copy of the opinion of the Solicitor of the Department of the Interior with respect to the matter and got no copy of the opinion. In that situation of affairs, in the month of September Mr. Kem came clear out to my home and having concluded, from a very hasty study of the authorities cited by him, that the contract should have been set aside, I inquire if it was not probable there was something in the nature of a conspiracy of silence between the two departments.

Mr. NYE. Mr. President——

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I yield.

Mr. NYE. I am sure the Senator did not mean to leave the impression here that Mr. Kem had called upon me during my presence in Kansas City in June.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I perhaps misspoke. The president of the company, represented by Mr. Kem, as I understand it, called on the chairman of the committee.

Mr. NYE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for me to explain just what occurred at that time?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Certainly.

Mr. NYE. During my presence in Kansas City the vice president of the White Eagle Oil Co. came to my room in the hotel and laid before me verbally the contention which was his at that time, rather vague, of the right of the White Eagle Oil Co. to expect a better concession and a better opportunity than had been afforded them. He recited to me at that time the provisions of law and decisions of courts which would indicate that the White Eagle Oil Co. was right in its contention that there was no right on the part of the Secretary of the Interior to renew or, in the first place, to grant an option in connection with the Sinclair oil royalty contract. I made no note of the matter, but he was to write me at my home in North Dakota, which, so far as I know, he never did. In other words, the matter was never followed up by me.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I regard this matter as relatively unimportant. What I said in the article printed in the New York World is here of no particular importance. I am discussing the report made by seven members of the committee, and I have simply diverted to give the facts in relation to that matter. The paragraph to which I had adverted is the only part of the report which gives any color of justification for the statement that I have charged that there was any conspiracy between the two departments.

But, Mr. President, there is another feature of the address to which I feel impelled to refer, showing a misapprehension on the part of the Senator from North Dakota of one of the basic facts in the case. He is laboring under the impression obviously that the lack of conformity between the advertised proposal for bids and the bids themselves and the contract that was entered into was a late discovery. As a matter of fact, it was known from the beginning by everyone who had anything at all to do with the transaction that the lack of conformity existed. Thus, at page 3509 of the RECORD is the following.

The contract was renewed by Secretary Work on February 20, 1928, after bond had been provided, after the requested renewal had been approved by the Director of and others connected with the Geological Survey, the Solicitor for the Interior Department, and the First Assistant Secretary, and after every opportunity had been given those who protested against the petition to present reasons why the contract should not be renewed. Again, let it be noted that the point of lack of conformity between the advertisement and the contract had not then been raised.

All of this time, be it noted, the point of the lack of conformity between the advertisement for bids and the content of the Sinclair contract had never been directly raised nor did it come then to the minds of Kenyon and Chandler, who considered the submission to them of the complaint of the White Eagle Oil Co. only more material which they would have to thoroughly study in connection with their fraud case.

The first thought concerning this lack of conformity between the proposal and the bid of Sinclair occurred to Donovan or Kenyon not earlier than September 15.

Again:

After the 15th of September, the point of lack of conformity between the proposal for bids and the bid of the Sinclair people first came to the mind and attention of Kenyon and Donovan, or both, and Donovan ordered everything else dropped in favor of an intense study of this lone point.

On the same page:

Mr. President, it was not a newspaper nor any member of the committee that brought about the cancellation of this contract. It was almost alone the work of Kenyon and Donovan, undertaken after they had found, in September, the possibility of canceling the contract on the ground that the contract did not conform with the proposal for bids. It was not a matter of five or more months between the time that this specific point was brought to the attention of the Department of Justice and the time when the order of cancellation was issued, but, instead, only four or five weeks.

Mr. President, when this matter was originally submitted for the consideration of the Solicitor of the Department of the Interior, the matter which had his special attention was the lack of conformity between the advertised proposals and the bids which were offered in response thereto, and the contract which was entered into. It was upon that ground that the Solicitor of the Interior Department held that this was a private sale by the Secretary of the Interior and not a public sale in response to an advertised proposal.

I read from the memorandum opinion of Newman and Patterson. After reciting the facts and after reciting that the contract entered into did not conform to the advertised proposals or to the bids, in that the advertised proposal said nothing whatever about the granting of an option to purchase, recalling the fact that the bids offered to take 10,000 barrels a day and that that feature was eliminated in the contract in consequence of such negotiations, recalling the fact that the bid was a day late in arriving, recalling the fact that the contract was made to the Sinclair Crude Oil Purchasing Co. and not to the Mammoth Oil Co., which was the bidder—all these things were dismissed because it was said this was a private sale and lack of conformity was of no consequence whatever. I read from the opinion:

This bid—

That is, the Mammoth bid—

was found to be the best bid. From a consideration of the bids themselves and an analysis thereof by the Bureau of Mines, it seems certain that this finding was justified. The other bids were therefore rejected. But the Mammoth Oil Co. bid was not accepted. As submitted it, too, was rejected, and in lieu thereof a private sale made of all royalty oil in the Salt Creek Field to the Sinclair Crude Oil Purchasing Co.

In the letter of Mr. Finney, which is found in the hearings at page 435, we find the following, the letter being addressed to Mr. Phelan:

You perhaps overlooked the statement in the third paragraph of said letter that advertisement for bids for the sale of this royalty oil was had, bids submitted but none accepted, and that thereafter private sale was made.

Accordingly, he argued that the sale was valid notwithstanding the contract did not conform to the advertised proposals or to the bid. In Mr. Finney's testimony, at page 433 of the hearings, we have the following:

The impression made on my mind was that when Mr. Fall made his sale for five years, with the option of renewal for another five years, that it would still be within the maximum period fixed in the advertisement.

Senator WALSH. That would be entirely immaterial if it were a private sale.

Mr. FINNEY. Well, put it this way, that the public is not misled or anything because he did not advertise it for 10 years and then make a private sale for 20 years.

Senator WALSH. Do I understand you now to say that if a private sale was made the advertised proposal became entirely irrelevant?

Mr. FINNEY. Well, in a sense it would, but from the standpoint of the bidder he might be misled.

Senator WALSH. That fact would not in anywise buttress upon the sale, would it?

Mr. FINNEY. I think that shows good faith.

Senator WALSH. But, legally, it would not affect the situation.

Mr. FINNEY. Not legally.

Senator WALSH. So that the basis of the legal right to do it was this: That it was a private sale and he had the right to make this stipulation for renewal in the contract in a private sale?

Mr. FINNEY. Now, to be frank, there is no record that I have been able to find that he formally, in writing, rejected these 12 or 13 bids.

Senator WALSH. Well, in writing or otherwise.

Mr. FINNEY. Except by implication.

Senator WALSH. There is no record that he did so; no record that he in fact did reject all bids.

Mr. FINNEY. No, sir.

The testimony of Mr. Patterson, at page 383 of the record, is as follows:

Senator WALSH. What was the general character of the contention made at that time by Mr. Phelan?

It will be borne in mind that it was on the protest of Mr. Phelan that the matter was referred to the Solicitor of the Interior Department—

Mr. PATTERSON. If was a little hard to understand just what it was, because he went back a considerable way in it. He thought the contract had not been honestly entered into. I think that was one of his contentions; and there was, in one conversation with him, talk about something of the contract we had with the Shipping Board.

Senator WALSH. You really can not now tell us why he objected to it?

Mr. PATTERSON. Yes; then he objected to it because the contract, as let, was not according to the bid and the advertisement.

Senator WALSH. In what respect?

Mr. PATTERSON. Well, he claimed there was a variance. He did not point it out to us, but he claimed it was not according to the bid and the advertisement.

May I invite the attention of the Senator from North Dakota? I am now reading from the testimony of Mr. Patterson, which is found on page 383 of the record.

Senator WALSH. So that feature of the thing was called to your attention by Mr. Phelan?

Mr. PATTERSON. Yes, sir.

Senator WALSH. As early as the spring of 1927?

Mr. PATTERSON. Well, it was some time shortly prior to the time of the Newman memorandum.

So, Mr. President, it will be understood that from the very beginning this feature of the matter was under consideration by the officers of the department, but they obviated the effect of this lack of conformity by insisting that the sale was a private sale and not a public sale; and yet when the matter was finally gone into by Kenyon & Chandler, they pointed out by letters written by Fall, by letters written by the Sinclair Crude Oil Purchasing Co., and by letters written by the Mammoth Oil Co., that they all regarded the sale as a public sale made in pursuance of the advertised proposals.

Another suggestion in the address of the Senator, to which some little attention might be paid, is that there was no formal request of the Department of Justice for an opinion from that department pursuant to the statute, but that is not in conformity with the testimony. I read what is said about that at page 3514 of the RECORD in the address of the Senator from North Dakota as follows:

Section 304, referred to, stipulates it will be noted, that the head of any executive department may require the opinion of the Attorney General. Mr. Finney was not the head of any executive department. Consequently, I am caused to feel that the section of law to which the Walsh report refers is not at all applicable to this particular inquiry, the request coming from the Department of the Interior over the signature of the Assistant Secretary, and that the Department of Justice upon receiving the letter had no reason to believe that the request was for an opinion in keeping with the statute referred to.

Mr. President, this whole business was transacted by Mr. Finney as the Assistant Secretary of the Interior and as the Acting Secretary of the Interior. The complaint I make, so far as Doctor Work is concerned, is that he turned the whole matter over to his subordinates and his own part was purely perfunctory. But the letter was, as a matter of fact, addressed to Colonel Donovan, who, as everybody recognizes, for the last four years has been the real head of the Department of Justice and the acting Attorney General. But, in any event, it operated to hold up this transaction, because when Kem called Mr. Finney over the telephone and asked when action might be expected upon the protest of the White Eagle Refining Co. he was told that the whole matter had been turned over to the Department of Justice for an opinion. Mr. Finney has exactly the same idea about it. I read the letter by which the matter was submitted to the Department of Justice for an opinion:

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR,
Washington, April 27, 1928.

Hon. WILLIAM J. DONOVAN,
Assistant to the Attorney General,
Department of Justice.

MY DEAR COLONEL: I inclose herewith for your information and such advice as you may see fit to give me, a protest filed against the renewal of the contract for sale of royalty oils in Salt Creek with the Sinclair Crude Oil Purchasing Co. The protestant, the White Eagle Oil & Refining Co., has a small refinery at Casper, and bases its protest strictly upon a legal contention, as you will note.

I also inclose a memorandum opinion prepared by our solicitor, in which he disagrees with protestant's contention, and holds that the Sinclair contract is a binding one, at least in so far as the contentions of protestant are concerned.

Very truly yours,

E. C. FINNEY,
First Assistant Secretary.

No reply coming as late as August, 1928, the letter of Mr. Finney having been transmitted on the 27th day of April preceding, on the 28th day of August, Mr. Finney wrote as follows:

The honorable ATTORNEY GENERAL.
(Attention Mr. Donovan.)

DEAR MR. ATTORNEY GENERAL: On April 27, 1928, I forwarded to the Department of Justice a communication from the White Eagle Oil & Refining Co. relative to an option of renewal in a contract for the sale of royalty oils in Salt Creek for an opinion and advice. This department is receiving numerous requests for information as to what action will be taken in the matter and would like to have information as to the status which you can give me at this time.

Very truly yours,

E. C. FINNEY.

So that Mr. Finney evidently treated it as an ordinary formal request from one department of the Government to another for an opinion to guide the requesting department in its official acts. So that matter seems to be disposed of by the record.

As I have pointed here, the chairman of the committee seems to think that the Secretary of the Interior is subject to censure only because he did not call upon the Attorney General for an opinion in this case. At page 3509 of the RECORD he has the following to say:

As to the readiness of Secretary Work to leave the matter to those officials in his department who were charged with specific duties in connection with such matters, I feel that the Secretary did what is generally done in such cases and that far less blame than is implied in the rejected report attaches to him because of that course. That the Secretary did not doubt the necessity of renewal is not strange, in view of the fact that there was utter absence of any protest against the renewal based upon the ground that the original contract with Sinclair was invalid, since its terms did not comply with the advertisement for bids—or upon the ground that the Secretary had no right to grant an option, and it was this ground which formed the final basis for cancellation of the contract.

In other words, it is conceded, Mr. President, that the Secretary of the Interior turned over this whole matter to his subordinates, and he is in a way excused upon the ground that that is the ordinary thing to do in such cases. I deny that it is the ordinary thing to do in such cases. If this were a mere matter of whether a certain homesteader had lived upon his land the requisite time, or had cultivated the requisite area during a specific time, or any of such ordinary routine matters that engage the attention of the Department of the Interior, the Secretary would be entirely justified in allowing his subordinates to handle the matter; and when the final decision came in attaching his signature to whatever decision was made or opinion was written; but I deny, when a question of giving a contract to the Sinclair interests involving $35,000,000 comes before the Department of the Interior, that that may be shunted off onto some subordinates and the Secretary excuse himself for dereliction in the matter by endeavoring to throw all responsibility onto his subordinates.

Mr. NYE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. MCNARY in the chair). Does the Senator from Montana yield to the Senator from North Dakota?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I yield.

Mr. NYE. I have agreed with the Senator that the Secretary of the Interior ought to have exhausted all available sources of information before entering into this contract or before renewing it; but the Senator speaks of a $35,000,000 deal. Mr. President, back in 1920, when the entire Salt Creek field was involved and when the rights and titles were being granted, complaints were made in a much greater degree than they were made at the time of the renewal of this contract; and yet I will point out to the Senator that the Secretary then did not seek the advice of the Attorney General of the United States, though the stakes then were many times greater than those which were involved in the renewal contract.

I do not recite this to excuse in any way the Secretary for not seeking the advice of the Attorney General with relation to the renewal of that contract, but merely to point out that such a thing is done; that this is not the first time that it has been done; that if it was not commendable on the Secretary's part last year to grant the renewal, then certainly it was not commendable that the Secretary of the Interior in 1920 should have granted these extensive rights in the Salt Creek field without taking the advice of the Attorney General of the United States.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, there is no difference between the Senator from North Dakota and myself with respect to that aspect of the case. We both agree that the Secretary was guilty of a dereliction in not seeking the advice of the Attorney General in this particular matter. But I am directing your attention now to another feature of it; that is to say, reposing the whole matter in the discretion and judgment of his subordinates in the Interior Department—the Assistant Secretary of the Interior, the Solicitor of the Department of the Interior, the members of the Board of Review in the Department of the Interior—without ever having the particular matter in his own mind at all; because, Mr. President, there is not a scintilla in this record to show that the Secretary of the Interior ever gave five minutes of thought to this subject. There is not an item in the record to show—and he was interrogated fully about the matter—that he ever read the protest of Phelan or of Williams, or that he ever read the protest of the White Eagle Refining Co. There is not a scintilla to show that he ever read the opinion of Newman and Patterson. He absolutely turned over the whole thing to his subordinates, and was oblivious of everything that transpired, as this record shows. That is what I complain about. His delinquencies extend to both features of it.

Mr. President, as indicative of the character of attention that this important subject had from the Secretary of the Interior, I read from page 287 of the record, as follows: Reference is made to the protest of the White Eagle Refining Co., and a letter which had been received from that company upon that subject. Doctor Work was asked:

Do you recall this letter, Doctor?—

That was the original protest of the White Eagle Refining Co.—

Mr. WORK. No. I remember it coming through, but not in detail. That was because of its transfer to the Department of Justice for their opinion.

Senator WALSH. Well, do you have in mind that the protestant put his protest upon the ground that the option clause in the contract was void, and therefore you had no authority to renew?

Mr. WORK. I have not got that in mind. Upon receipt it was transferred to the Department of Justice for their opinion. I did not go into it at that time.

Senator WALSH. Have you now in mind, Doctor, that that was the position taken; you do not know what position they took?

Mr. WORK. I do not have it in mind. That was about two months after the contract had been signed. When that protest came in it was forwarded to the Department of Justice, without any study on my part, certainly.

Senator WALSH. I am asking you whether you have it in mind that that is the position that was taken by the White Eagle Oil & Refining Co.?

Mr. WORK. I do not know whether I learned it then or since; I rather think I learned it since.

Senator WALSH. You now think that is the position they took?

Mr. WORK. I assume that is true.

In other words, Mr. President, this important protest of the White Eagle Oil & Refining Co. that resulted eventually in the cancellation of this contract, the Secretary tells us, he did not know a thing about; that he never read it; that he had no idea at that time what the nature of the objection to the contract thus made by that company was.

Mr. President, I have said all that I care to say about this matter. In it, Secretary Work occupied the position and played the part that Secretary Denby played in the leasing of the naval oil reserves. It is not charged against him by me or, so far as I know, by anyone else, that he knowingly did anything wrong. It is charged that he was ignorant of the whole affair; that he was negligently ignorant when he ought to have been fully informed; that he exhibited a callous disregard of the public interest in this matter and of his duty to the public in the responsible position that he occupied so gross as to be entirely inexcusable, and so flagrant that it can not be overlooked consistently with the obligation of this body to the people of the country.

As to the Department of Justice, I submit that a delay of five months on the opinion requested of that department, every day involving a loss to the Government of the United States of a thousand dollars, if it admits of any excuse at all, is, upon the facts disclosed in this record, entirely without excuse.

I do not care to specify, further than I already have done, as to the particular officials in the Department of Justice who are open to censure; but there is no man who can stand on this floor and justify a delay of anything like five months upon a simple request for an opinion concerning the validity of this contract upon the grounds upon which it was assailed in the protest on file in the Department of the Interior. It is not inappropriate to say, however, that after it was hidden in the files of the Department of Justice for four months, without ever being brought to the attention of the responsible head of that department, it came to the attention of Colonel Donovan on the 28th day of August, 1928; and it was almost two months after that time before an opinion such as was requested was furnished.

INTER-AMERICAN HIGHWAY OR HIGHWAYS

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I ask permission to submit a report from the Committee on Foreign Relations, and I ask unanimous consent for its present consideration. If there is any debate, I will not urge it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The report will be received, and the bill will be read by the Secretary.

The legislative clerk read the joint resolution (H. J. Res. 355) authorizing the appropriation of the sum of $50,000 to enable the Secretary of State to cooperate with the several governments, members of the Pan American Union, in furthering the building of an inter-American highway or highways.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Idaho asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of the joint resolution. Is there objection?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the joint resolution.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

EXTENSION OF ARBITRATION CONVENTION OF MAY 2, 1908

Mr. SWANSON. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent, as in open executive session—the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] and myself both agreed upon this in the committee—to renew for one year the arbitration treaty with the Netherlands, known as the Root treaty, that will expire in a few days.

There being no objection, the following agreement was ratified, as in open executive session:

The Government of the United States of America and Her Majesty the Queen of the Netherlands, desiring to extend further the period during which the Arbitration Convention concluded between them on May 2, 1908, and extended by the Agreement concluded between the two Governments on May 9, 1914 and further extended by the Agreements concluded by the two Governments on March 8, 1919 and February 13, 1924, shall remain in force, have respectively authorized the undersigned to wit:

Frank B. Kellogg, Secretary of State of the United States of America; and

Dr. J. H. van Roijen, Envoy Extraordinary and Minister Plenipotentiary of Her Majesty the Queen of the Netherlands in Washington, to conclude the following Agreement:

ARTICLE I

The Convention of Arbitration of May 2, 1908, between the Government of the United States of America and Her Majesty the Queen of the Netherlands, the duration of which by Article III thereof was fixed at a period of five years from the date of the exchange of ratifications, which period, by the Agreement of May 9, 1914, between the two Governments was extended for five years from March 25, 1914, and was extended by the Agreement between them of March 8, 1919, for the further period of five years from March 25, 1919, and by the Agreement of February 13, 1924, for the further period of five years from March 25, 1924, is hereby extended and continued in force from March 25, 1929, for the further period of one year or until within that year a new arbitration convention shall be brought into force between them.

ARTICLE II

The present Agreement shall be ratified by the President of the United States of America, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate thereof, and by Her Majesty the Queen of the Netherlands, and it shall become effective upon the date of the exchange of ratifications, which shall take place at The Hague as soon as possible.

Done in duplicate in the English and Dutch languages at Washington this 27th day of February, 1929.

CALUMET RIVER BRIDGE

The bill (H. R. 17237) to extend the times for commencing and completing the construction of a bridge across the Calumet River at or near One hundred and thirtieth Street, Chicago, Cook County, Ill., was read twice by its title.

Mr. DENEEN. Mr. President, that is a bridge bill. I ask unanimous consent for its immediate consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

THE MERCHANT MARINE

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, I have here resolutions adopted by the Middle West Foreign Trade and Merchant Marine Conference relating to the merchant marine. They are short, and I ask that they may be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the matter referred to was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Resolutions adopted by Middle West Foreign Trade and Merchant Marine Conference, auspices of the Middle West Foreign Trade Committee in cooperation with Export Managers' Club of Chicago (Ill.) Manufacturers' Association, and the Bureau of Foreign and Domestic Commerce

CHICAGO, ILL., November 19 and 20, 1928.

PURPOSE OF THE CONFERENCE

It is hereby declared to be the purpose of the Middle West Foreign Trade and Merchant Marine Conference to develop the foreign trade of the Middle West through all proper means to the end that the Middle West may participate in the foreign trade of the Nation to the fullest extent and upon equality of opportunity so far as that is possible.

Our distance from the sea being approximately a thousand miles greater on the average than any nation with which we compete, and our own seaboard markets nearer to foreign markets in point of freight costs than much of our own territory, transportation becomes a major consideration of this conference.

THE AMERICAN MERCHANT MARINE—TRADE ROUTES

We stand unreservedly for an American merchant marine adequately equipped with vessels of suitable types, efficiently maintained, and operated on dependable schedules.

We believe all shipping services now being operated, both by private enterprise and by the Government, are essential and should be maintained. The trade routes that have been established to the various ports of the world by the United States Shipping Board have been and are of the greatest value to American commerce and are essential to the maintenance and further development of that commerce, as well as to our national defense. It would be a disaster to our commerce and our national defense if these trade routes were abandoned or inadequately maintained.

We believe it desirable to have the merchant marine privately owned and operated and we favor such aids, both direct and indirect, as the Government may be able to properly extend to accomplish this. The Jones-White bill, known officially as the merchant marine act, 1928, is a constructive measure and was earnestly supported by the members of this conference.

This measure provides aids that if equitably distributed should enable the gradual transfer of Government lines to the local private companies, insures the necessary replacement of vessels to properly maintain the lines, and directs the proper maintenance of all Government lines until they can be transferred to private companies in accordance with the provisions of our merchant marine laws.

The Shipping Board and the Post Office Department in cooperation are endeavoring to administer the provisions of the Jones-White law in a manner to extend the benefits of this law to all sections of our country and we commend them for the progress made.

We commend the United States Shipping Board for the constant improvement made in our shipping services; for its policy in operating these services through private American companies having the support of the local communities served by those companies; for its policy in carrying out the spirit of our laws in properly distributing the services in a manner to best serve the interests of our ports and communities; and for its policy in effecting the transfer of lines to private enterprise only when it is clearly demonstrated such transfer will result in insuring the "adequate, regular, certain, and permanent service," directed by the law.

We commend the efforts being made by the United States Shipping Board to improve its contracts with the managing operators of its services to the end that these operating companies shall be given more responsibility and shall properly share in the results of the operations, to enable these private companies to test their ability to become successful owners of their lines and to enable the Shipping Board to do away with the greater part of the large overhead employed in the management of our shipping services.

APPROPRIATIONS

Our Senators and Representatives are urged to advocate and support the continued appropriation annually of funds sufficient to insure the proper maintenance of all our steamship services.

MONOPOLIES—CONSOLIDATIONS

We are opposed to a monopoly in American shipping, and we urge the Congress and the United States Shipping Board to prevent such a monopoly. We are likewise opposed to a consolidation of lines in a manner to concentrate our shipping services at a very few ports. In reaching foreign markets it is to the interest of agriculture, industry, and mining as a whole to have the benefit of the largest number of the available ports with reasonably adequate service, and it is to the interest of inland transportation, car supply, and distribution to utilize all available ports and ocean services.

RAILROAD RATES

We favor the maintenance of railroad rates on foreign commerce between the Middle West and the ports on a basis to make all outlets available on fair and equitable terms. We strongly condemn the efforts being made by certain carriers and eastern interests to destroy the great benefits afforded by the readjustments of railroad rates between the Middle West and the southern ports put into effect in and subsequent to 1919.

SUPPORT OF AMERICAN SHIPS

The standard of service now maintained by the Shipping Board and private companies with American-flag ships is superior or at least equal to that afforded by foreign-flag lines serving United States ports and these American lines should receive the whole-hearted support of American shippers and receivers.

INDUSTRIAL COMPANIES v. COMMON CARRIERS

The best interests of commerce will be served if our shipping lines are owned and managed by common carriers and not by industrial companies. The products of industrial companies operating shipping lines have an unfair advantage over the products of other industrial companies compelled to use these lines. Railroad lines are not permitted to be owned and operated by industrial companies, and the same rule should be applied to shipping lines. We urge the United States Shipping Board to keep in mind this fact in the disposal of lines to private companies.

PROTECTION OF AMERICAN LINES

For several years the Congress of the United States has wisely provided in the annual Shipping Board appropriation bill what is commonly known as a "fighting fund." This fund is expressly provided for the purpose of enabling the Shipping Board to take back and operate any line sold to a private American company which such company is unable to maintain on account of unfair foreign-flag competition or other reasons. Rather than make it necessary for the purchasing company to exhaust its own resources and then lose its vessels, we feel this provision should be liberalized to the extent of permitting the Shipping Board in its own discretion to aid the purchasing company so that it would not be necessary for the service to be returned to the Shipping Board and thus retard the establishment of our services in the hands of our local private companies.

INLAND WATERWAYS

We commend the progressive attitude of the Federal Government in developing transportation upon the inland waterways of the Middle West, thereby furnishing to the exporters and importers of this section another means of economical access to the ports of the world. We urge the fullest possible development of joint rates between the water carriers and the railroads, and that the needed additional equipment for the Inland Waterways Corporation, for which appropriation was authorized by the last Congress, be made available at the earliest possible moment, that the needs of the shippers for this low-cost transportation service may be more adequately cared for.

LOAD LINES ON VESSELS

The Congress of the United States has had under consideration for several years legislation to establish load lines below which vessels shall not be loaded. Such legislation has passed one of the Houses of Congress on several occasions. We favor such load-line legislation as may be necessary to insure a reasonable degree of safety to both passengers and cargo.

UNITED STATES BUREAU OF FOREIGN AND DOMESTIC COMMERCE

We commend the United States Bureau of Foreign and Domestic Commerce for the practical and effective export trade promotion service it is rendering.

PARCEL POST—CUBA

We wish to go on record as being in favor of legislation which will bring about a reinstatement of parcel-post intercourse between the United States and Cuba. The lack of such legislation excludes a very large number of United States exporters from the Cuban market to the distinct detriment of United States commerce with the island Republic.

PRAYERS OF THE CHAPLAIN

Mr. MOSES. Mr. President, I submit a resolution, which I ask to have read, following which I shall ask unanimous consent for its immediate consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The resolution will be read.

The resolution (S. Res. 346) was read, considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to, as follows:

Resolved, That the prayers offered by the Rev. ZeBarney T. Phillips, D. D., Chaplain of the Senate, at the opening of the daily sessions of the Senate during the Seventieth Congress be printed as a Senate document.

WILLIAM H. CHAMBLISS

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, I present an additional affidavit of Capt. William H. Chambliss, which I ask to have printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the matter referred to was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Affidavit, February 27, 1929, in support of bill S. 2274

In presenting the following notes to Senator HEFLIN for publication in the RECORD, I stand ready to exhibit to any or all Senators the file of fraud bills and graft bills by which Haeberle, protégé of Carr, Flanory, and Beck held up and robbed the Lake Elkwood at Rio de Janeiro, of her $200,000 cargo.

WILLIAM H. CHAMBLISS.

Sworn to and subscribed before me this 27th day of February, 1929.

[SEAL.] CHARLES F. PACE,
Notary Public, District of Columbia.

My commission expires February 18, 1931.

CONGRESS HALL HOTEL,
Washington, D. C., February 27, 1929.

MY DEAR SENATOR HEFLIN: In support of Senate bill 2274, favorably reported by the Committee on Claims, it will interest the Senate to hear what the acting consul at Rio did with the $200,000 cargo and provision stores on the Lake Elkwood after he grabbed the ship October 8, 1919. Here is what A. T. Haeberle, acting consul and favorite of the undersecretaries of State did with all.

Having fortified himself with his own false "survey" reports, mentioned in the second part of my affidavit printed February 26, Haeberle sold the whole shipload to Henrique Lage, his ship repair man, for $86,000, which was less than half market value.

I promptly made charges of fraud against Haeberle then and there, and I filed my charges personally with American Ambassador Edwin V. Morgan, and requested Mr. Morgan to forward the charges to Washington and supply Haeberle with a copy.

I personally sent copies to the United States Shipping Board and the Kerr Steamship Line, of which Kermit Roosevelt was an official.

The Shipping Board and the Kerr Line, my ship's New York agents, upheld me for opposing Haeberle's crooked acts, but the Undersecretaries of State upheld Haeberle and accepted his false reports as true.

They permitted Haeberle to sit as "judge" and try himself and take all of the testimony of his aides at Rio, with whom he whacked up the graft he made out of the fake sale to Lage of my $200,000 cargo for $86,000.

Every affidavit and witness offered by Haeberle in his defense was paid for—every man testifying was a member in some way of the band of hold-up men employed by Haeberle, Price, and Lage, his aides. The Undersecretaries of State knew the fraud that Haeberle was practicing, yet they upheld the fraud.

And for revenge on me the Undersecretaries of State have for nine years hurled the whole brute force of the Secretary of State's office at me; sending out the most vindictive letters to block and dam up all channels of justice and prevent me from getting work at my only profession, navigation. That malignant attitude of the State Department has influenced shipowners to refuse me employment. All American shipowners and operators of ships are afraid to offend the Undersecretaries of State by employing me. Thus has the Secretary of State's office blacklisted me for punishment, because I opposed a crook in the Consular Service named Aminius T. Haeberle.

Please print this as a part of my affidavit, sworn to before a notary public.

WILLIAM H. CHAMBLISS.

The object and motive of the Undersecretaries of State in forcing the United States Shipping Board to post my name on the black list for no more employment, which all steamship companies recognize as an order to not employ me in any job, was revenge in its meanest form.

I, having opposed and exposed a crook in the consular outfit of the Latin American Bureau, had to be crushed for the good of the Government. And the surest way to crush me was to block me from getting work and shut off my bread and butter, in the Russo-Mexican way; and that is what the State Department Undersecretaries have done. All of their reports about me being dictated to please Aminius T. Haeberle, a crook in the Consular Service. They sent the same reports that Senator KING got to other Senators, and also to my wife to weaken me by breaking up my home.

Now, gentlemen of the Senate, when our State Department is infested with persons low enough to resort to such czarism, for revenge—sending false reports to a man's wife to try to intimidate her—they did intimidate my wife and made an invalid of her and turned her hair gray. I ask you, the highest body of 96 men on earth, to take action. Do something to free the State Department. I myself have been a loyal Navy man 40 years. My record is good; my service speaks for itself. And I ask fair play from the Senate and Congress who alone have power to free us from domestic enemy czars hidden behind the Secretary of State's desk, using his great signature and his letter paper and his rubber stamps for revenge.

God bless HEFLIN and all the Senators.

WILLIAM H. CHAMBLISS.

Mr. NYE. Mr. President, it is not my intention at this time to endeavor to answer the thoughts expressed by the Senator from Montana this afternoon or to say more than this:

Upon the occasion of the debate upon this question two weeks ago I had quite fully determined that the matter was ended. However, at the time I did prepare a report which I was going to seek to make the majority report of the committee. Then, upon being further convinced that the matter was to rest just as it had been left at that time, I ceased polling the members of the committee upon the question and only submitted to them copies of the report.

In view of the fact that it appears this afternoon that this play, as I call it, has not been ended, I am going to ask unanimous consent to have printed the report which I now send to the desk, not as a majority report, because the majority of the members of the committee have not had an opportunity to concur in it. I can say, however, that such members as have had it submitted to them—five in number—have concurred in it.

I ask unanimous consent to have this report printed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection?

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, is the Senator publishing the names of the members of the committee who signed the statement?

Mr. NYE. I shall be glad to announce at this stage that the Senators who concur in this report are the Senator from Oregon [Mr. MCNARY], the Senator from Nevada [Mr. ODDIE], the Senator from Vermont [Mr. DALE], the Senator from Illinois [Mr. GLENN], and myself. Whether other members of the committee desire to do so or not, I do not know at this stage; but it is, of course, their privilege to voice their wishes in relation to the matter.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the report will be printed.

J. EDWARD BURKE

Mr. BINGHAM and Mr. NORRIS addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Connecticut.

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. President, I shall be glad to yield to the Senator from Nebraska if he desires.

Mr. NORRIS. I desire to ask the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. NYE] a question, but I presume I can not do so unless he has the floor.

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. President, I merely wish to state that yesterday, when we were on the calendar, the Senator from Utah [Mr. KING] objected to Order of Business 2024, House bill 3047, under a misapprehension. He has since told me that he has no objection to its passage. It is a private bill, a claim for an amount of money paid in pursuance of a judgment entered upon a plea of nolo contendere under certain provisions of an act later found to be unconstitutional.

I ask unanimous consent that the bill may be considered and passed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. 3047) for the relief of J. Edward Burke.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

BOARD OF VISITORS TO PHILIPPINE ISLANDS

Mr. KING. Yesterday the bill (H. R. 16877) providing for the biennial appointment of a board of visitors to inspect and report upon the government and conditions in the Philippine Islands, was taken up for consideration and I objected to it. I finally consented that it might be passed and that to-day I would enter a motion to reconsider, if I desired, and that the bill should be held here upon the table. I desire now to enter a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed. The bill is still here.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The motion to reconsider will be entered.

POTOMAC RIVER BRIDGE NEAR GREAT FALLS

The PRESIDING OFFICER laid before the Senate the amendments of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 4721) to extend the times for commencing and completing the construction of a bridge across the Potomac River at or near Great Falls, and to authorize the use of certain Government land, which were, on page 2, lines 1 and 2, to strike out "In constructing the said bridge the said company" and insert in lieu thereof "The Great Falls Bridge Co., its successors and assigns"; on page 2, line 2, after the word "is," to insert "hereby"; on page 2, line 5, to strike out "carry to completion the construction of" and insert in lieu thereof "construct, maintain, and operate"; and on page 2, line 5, after the word "bridge," to insert "and its approaches, and as may be approved by the National Capital Park and Planning Commission."

Mr. SWANSON. The amendments of the House are merely verbal and make no material change in the bill as it passed the Senate. I move that the Senate concur in the House amendments.

The motion was agreed to.

EXECUTIVE SESSION

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Under the unanimous-consent agreement entered into earlier in the day the Senate will now go into executive session; the galleries will be cleared and the doors closed.

The doors were closed, and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After 50 minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened.

ENLARGEMENT OF CAPITOL GROUNDS

Mr. KEYES. I ask to have the unfinished business laid before the Senate and proceeded with.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business—House bill 13929.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 13929) to provide for the enlarging of the Capitol Grounds.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. Farrell, its enrolling clerk, announced that the House had agreed to the amendment of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 13936) to amend the second paragraph of section 4 of the Federal farm loan act, as amended.

The message also announced that the House had passed the following bills, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate:

H. R. 16874. An act authorizing the Commissioner of Prohibition to pay for information concerning violations of the narcotic laws of the United States;

H. R. 17126. An act authorizing C. N. Jenks, F. J. Stransky, L. H. Miles, John Grandy, and Bruce Machen, their heirs, legal representatives, and assigns, to construct, maintain, and operate a bridge across the Mississippi River at or near Savanna, Ill.;

H. R. 17208. An act to extend the times for commencing and completing the construction of a bridge across the Missouri River at or near Niobrara, Nebr.;

H. R. 17218. An act authorizing the State Highway Commission, Commonwealth of Kentucky, to construct, maintain, and operate a bridge across the Ohio River at or near Maysville, Ky.;

H. R. 17262. An act authorizing H. L. Cloud, his heirs, legal representatives, and assigns, to construct, maintain, and operate a bridge across the Canadian River at or near Francis, Okla.;

H. R. 17311. An act to extend the time for completing the construction of a bridge across the Mississippi River at or near Cairo, Ill.; and

H. R. 17322. An act to amend the act approved June 22, 1926, entitled "An act to amend that part of the act approved August 29, 1916, relative to the retirement of captains, commanders, and lieutenant commanders in the line of the Navy."

MISSISSIPPI RIVER BRIDGE, CAIRO, ILL.

Mr. DENEEN. I ask that the bill for completing the bridge at Cairo, Ill., be laid before the Senate.

The bill (H. R. 17311) to extend the time for completing the construction of a bridge across the Mississippi River at or near Cairo, Ill., was read twice by its title.

Mr. DENEEN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the bill be taken up and passed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

HOUSE BILL REFERRED

The bill (H. R. 17322) to amend the act approved June 22, 1926, entitled "An act to amend that part of the act approved August 29, 1916, relative to the retirement of captains, commanders, and lieutenant commanders in the line of the Navy," was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

MISSISSIPPI RIVER BRIDGE, SAVANNA, ILL.

The bill (H. R. 17126) authorizing C. N. Jenks, F. J. Stransky, L. H. Miles, John Grandy, and Bruce Machen, their heirs, legal representatives, and assigns to construct, maintain, and operate a bridge across the Mississippi River at or near Savanna, Ill., was read twice by its title.

Mr. DENEEN. I ask unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, I desire to ask the Senator whether a similar Senate bill has been reported to the Senate during this session?

Mr. DENEEN. I have not had time to look it up. The bill has just come in.

Mr. JONES. We do not usually pass such House bills unless that is the case.

Mr. DENEEN. I can check up on it. I will withdraw the request for the present.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. May the Chair say that if we pass the House bill we can later indefinitely postpone the Senate bill, or leave it on the calendar to die at the end of the session.

Mr. JONES. But we do not usually pass such a bill from the House unless there is a similar bill on the Senate Calendar, or reported to the Senate. It has not had the consideration of any committee. That is creating a precedent.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator now addressing the Chair is the chairman of the committee. Possibly he can enlighten the Senate about the matter.

Mr. JONES. I have no recollection of any such report.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be referred to the Committee on Commerce, and may be recalled——

Mr. JONES. I suggest that the Chair keep it on the table.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be returned to the table.

Mr. DENEEN. I am very sure a similar Senate bill was considered by the committee.

OHIO RIVER BRIDGE, MAYSVILLE, KY.

The bill (H. R. 17218) authorizing the State Highway Commission, Commonwealth of Kentucky, to construct, maintain, and operate a bridge across the Ohio River at or near Maysville, Ky., was read twice by its title.

Mr. SACKETT. Mr. President, that is the same bill that appears on the calendar as Order of Business 2096, Senate bill 5878, on which there is a favorable report. I ask that the House bill be substituted for the Senate bill and passed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. 17218) authorizing the State Highway Commission, Commonwealth of Kentucky, to construct, maintain, and operate a bridge across the Ohio River at or near Maysville, Ky.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, Senate Bill 5878 will be indefinitely postponed.

CANADIAN RIVER BRIDGE, FRANCIS, OKLA.

The bill (H. R. 17262) authorizing H. L. Cloud, his heirs, legal representatives, and assigns, to construct, maintain, and operate a bridge across the Canadian River, at or near Francis, Okla., was read twice by its title.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. Mr. President, an identical bill is on the Senate Calendar, Senate Bill 5881. I ask unanimous consent that the House bill may be substituted for the Senate bill, and that it may have immediate consideration.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. 17262) authorizing H. L. Cloud, his heirs, legal representatives, and assigns, to construct, maintain, and operate a bridge across the Canadian River, at or near Francis, Okla.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, Senate bill 5881 will be indefinitely postponed.

ORDER OF BUSINESS

Mr. GLASS obtained the floor.

Mr. NYE. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from North Dakota will state it.

Mr. NYE. I understand that by unanimous consent unobjected bills on the calendar are next in order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That unanimous-consent agreement has not been entered into.

Mr. KING. There is no such understanding.

Mr. SMOOT. It was carried out last night.

Mr. NYE. Then, Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Virginia yield to the Senator from North Dakota?

Mr. GLASS. I shall be through in a moment.

Mr. NYE. I should like to submit a proposed unanimous-consent agreement.

Mr. KING. I call for the regular order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Virginia yield for that purpose?

Mr. GLASS. I do not, Mr. President.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Virginia declines to yield.

SENATOR GEORGE P. M'LEAN

Mr. GLASS. What I have to say will be concluded in a moment.

Mr. President, in the course of the proceedings to-day the minority leader took occasion to pay very suitable tribute to those Members of the Senate on this side of the aisle who have been retired momentarily from public life, or who of their own choice have retired from the Senate. It occurs to me that some word of tribute ought to be paid to a distinguished Senator on the other side of the aisle who is voluntarily retiring from this body and with whom I have now for nearly nine years been most agreeably associated on the Committee on Banking and Currency. I have reference to the senior Senator from Connecticut [Mr. McLEAN].

It affords me peculiar pleasure to say that in my 18 years of service on the Banking and Currency Committee of the House of Representatives, and the kindred service of nearly 9 years on the Banking and Currency Committee of the Senate, I never encountered any man in either body of the Congress who seemed to be more earnestly and conscientiously devoted to public duty than this distinguished Senator from Connecticut. Always courteous, always kindly, always intelligently informed as to matters brought before his committee for consideration, I regarded his retirement from the chairmanship of the committee as a distinct loss to the Senate and to the country.

I was so impressed with that conviction that I personally appealed to him to reconsider his decision. It was only due to ill health that he would not respond to those appeals of his associates. I consider that his retirement from the Senate is a loss to the country, and I do not know that ever before in my public career have I entertained such an attachment or such personal affection for any man with whom I have been associated, notwithstanding he and I belong to different political parties. From our intercourse, and from our cooperation in legislative matters, no human being could ever have supposed that our political affiliations were not the same, and it is with a feeling of great sadness that I consider the retirement of this worthy and altogether capable public man.

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. President, on behalf of the people of Connecticut I want to express to the Senator from Virginia [Mr. GLASS] our very warm thanks for this unusual tribute to come across the aisle from one of the most distinguished Senators on the other side, whose record as a public servant we all know has been one of the most marked of any in this country.

The people of Connecticut did all they could to keep his friend and our distinguished statesman in this body. By public and unanimous resolution of the convention of the party of which he was a member he was in a most unusual manner told that the nomination would be his without the slightest opposition on the part of any one, and that it was the universal hope of the State that he would again serve them, but he gave it as his unalterable desire to retire from the public service after having served as governor and as Senator for nearly a quarter of a century.

It is our belief that we have lost an able, an ardent, and a loyal advocate of the State, and that our friends in the United States have lost the services of one of their most distinguished statesmen, who voluntarily retires into private life on Monday next.

MERRILL ENGINEERING CO.

Mr. KEYES obtained the floor.

Mr. STEPHENS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from New Hampshire yield to the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. KEYES. I yield.

Mr. STEPHENS. I would like to have the present consideration of Order of Business No. 2097, House bill 10817, for the relief of the Merrill Engineering Co. It is a House bill, and there is a favorable report from one of the departments. It carries no appropriation. It simply relates to procedure in the trial of a case that is either pending or will be pending soon in the Federal court in Mississippi. It simply affects the suit to this extent. For reasons thought by the department to be good it is believed that a certain provision of the contract should not constitute a defense, and it is stated that the suit will go on, and that if it is found that the party entitled to judgment should have judgment despite this matter, then the department said it should not interfere with him in this matter.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Calendar 2097.

Mr. STEPHENS. It appropriates no money; it simply gives this party the right to appear in court.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. SMOOT. I would like to read the report before I consent to the consideration of the bill.

Mr. STEPHENS. The report is very brief. Will the Senator permit me to read from it?

Mr. SMOOT. Just let it be passed over temporarily.

Mr. STEPHENS. There is danger that I may not have a chance to get it up again. There was a favorable report from the committee and a recommendation from the department.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. NORRIS. I just came into the Chamber. What is the question?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The pending business is the Plaza bill, the question being on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the committee.

The Senator from Mississippi has asked unanimous consent for the consideration of order of business 2097, a House bill. Is there objection?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

UNDERSECRETARY, DEPARTMENT OF LABOR

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. Mr. President, will the Senator from New Hampshire yield to me for a request that will lead to no debate?

Mr. KEYES. I am willing to do so if it will not lead to debate.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. Yesterday when order of business 1857, Senate bill 5614, creating the positions of Undersecretary and two Assistant Secretaries in the Department of Labor, was reached, it was objected to, I believe, by the Senator from Utah [Mr. KING]. It is a proposition to abolish two positions in the Department of Labor and create one, to abolish two positions of assistants to the Secretary, and create one position of Assistant Secretary, who can discharge the duties of the two, according to the head of that department, and who will be paid a salary approximately one-half of what the two assistants are paid.

Mr. NORRIS. It is a proposition, in other words, to make one blade of grass grow where two grew before?

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. The Senator may put it that way. It is recommended to me as the result of a promise made by the Secretary that as soon as he could dispense with one of these employees, he would do it, and he agreed to let us know so that we might abolish one position.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill has heretofore been amended by the Senate. Is there objection to resuming the consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the Senate as in Committee of the Whole resumed the consideration of the bill, which was read, as amended, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That effective April 1, 1929, there shall be in the Department of Labor an additional secretary, who shall be known and designated as Third Assistant Secretary of Labor and shall be appointed by the President. The Third Assistant Secretary shall perform such duties as shall be prescribed by the Secretary of Labor or required by law, and in case of the death, resignation, absence, or sickness of both the Assistant Secretary and Second Assistant Secretary shall, until a successor or successors are appointed or such absence or sickness shall cease, perform the duties devolving upon the Assistant Secretary by reason of section 177, Revised Statutes (5 U. S. C. 4), unless otherwise directed by the President, as provided by section 179, Revised Statutes (5 U. S. C. 6).

SEC. 2. That there is hereby authorized to be appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, such sums as may be necessary to pay the salary of the Third Assistant Secretary of Labor for the fiscal years 1929 and 1930, in accordance with the classification act of 1923, as amended.

SEC. 3. The act of March 4, 1927, entitled "An act creating the offices of assistants to the Secretary of Labor," is hereby repealed, effective April 1, 1929.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

BANK TAXATION

Mr. NORBECK. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD a report of the Minnesota Interim Commission on bank taxation, issued January 10, 1929.

There being no objection, the report was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

REPORT OF THE MINNESOTA INTERIM COMMISSION ON BANK TAXATION, JANUARY 10, 1929

Hon. W. I. NOLAN, President of the Senate.

The commission appointed pursuant to chapter 382 of the session laws of 1927 submits the following report:

Your commission was created because of an emergency precipitated by two decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States in First National Bank v. Hartford (71 L. ed. 530) and Minnesota v. First National Bank of St. Paul (71 L. ed. 535), rendered March 21, 1927, declaring void taxes on national banks levied pursuant to the same method and under laws in force in this State for more than 50 years past.

National banks since their creation have been held to be instrumentalities of the Federal Government, and may only be taxed by the States wherein they are located in the precise manner authorized by Congress. Since the national bank act was passed in 1864, and until 1923, the Federal statute permitted States to tax national banks only upon the value of the shares thereof. The statute authorizing the States to so tax banks (sec. 5219, R. S. U. S.) limits the State in taxing shares of national banks so that the taxes "shall not be at a greater rate than is assessed upon other moneyed capital in the hands of individual citizens of such State coming into competition with the business of national banks."

This limitation upon the taxing power of the States was evidently designed to protect national banks from discrimination by the States by taxing their competitors, the State banks, at a lower rate than national banks, thus forcing the latter out of existence. State banks are the only real competitors of national banks. But the Supreme Court of the United States held that individual investors in mortgages or notes, bonds or other like intangibles, when substantial in amount, constitute moneyed capital in competition with national banks, and therefore declared that the Minnesota taxes on national-bank stock were void because the mortgage registry tax rate and the tax rate on money and credits were fixed by the Minnesota laws at a lower rate than the ordinary personal property tax rate applied to bank stock and all other personal property.

In 1907 Minnesota passed the mortgage registry tax law, taxing mortgages at the low rate of 25 cents per $100. This rate was afterward reduced to 15 cents per $100 when the debt matured in five years or less, and 25 cents per $100 if the debt ran for a longer period. In 1911 the money and credits tax act was passed, taxing money on deposit, notes, bonds, etc., not secured by mortgage at a rate of 3 mills on the dollar. Prior to the passage of these low rate tax acts, such property practically escaped taxation because of its elusive character. It was found impossible to reach it for reasons which are clearly set out in

It was because the rates on mortgages and money and credits were lower than the ordinary tax rate applied to bank stock that national bank taxes in Minnesota were declared void.

The decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States referred to were rendered near the close of the legislative session of 1927, and with a view of correcting the situation so that the State of Minnesota and its taxing districts could legally tax bank stock, bills were introduced proposing the repeal of the mortgage registry tax and money and credits tax laws. The effect of such repeal would be that such property would become taxable at the ordinary personal-property rate, and it was hoped that thereby the situation with reference to the taxation of national-bank stock would be corrected.

The bankers of the State of Minnesota, both State and national, regarded the proposed repeal of the mortgage registry and money and credits tax as highly detrimental to the business and financial interests of the State. It was a matter of common knowledge that such repeal would drive capital out of the State and would result in virtual confiscation of investments made by citizens of the State. The bankers appointed a committee and proposed to the legislature that a special commission be appointed to study the bank-tax situation, the tax laws of the State, and the Federal laws and decisions, in the hope that legislation could be recommended which would permit the mortgage registry and money and credits tax laws to remain upon the statute books of the State and at the same time permit the State to tax National and State banks in a fair and equitable manner.

The bankers proposed if such a commission were appointed they would agree to pay taxes upon national banks assessed in the usual manner upon the value of the stock, as had been done for more than half a century prior to such decisions. Two hundred and sixty-four out of the two hundred and seventy-one national banks of the State signed an agreement to pay such taxes for the years 1927 and 1928. Accordingly the legislature did not pass the bills repealing the mortgage registry and money and credits tax laws, but did pass the act creating this commission, and, among other things, provided it should be the duty of the commission "to make a study of the tax laws of this State, with particular reference to those relating to the taxation of mortgages, money and credits, shares of stock of banks, trust companies, mortgage loan companies, and investment companies, and take steps in cooperation with the authorities of other States if possible, toward such remedial legislation by Congress in relation to the taxation of shares of stock of national banks, as is for the best interests of the people of the State of Minnesota, and to make report of its work and recommendations to the next regular or special session of this legislature." The act also provided that it should be the duty of the attorney general and the Minnesota Tax Commission to assist and cooperate in the work, and appropriated $7,500 for the expense of the commission and for the employment of necessary assistance.

The commisison organized on the 21st day of May, 1927, by the election of officers, and proceeded to study the situation. On May 24, 1927, the commission had a conference with the committee appointed by the State bankers' association. The commission then undertook and pursued an intensive study of the tax laws of Minnesota, of all the States of the United States, and the Federal laws and decisions for the purpose of determining how other States were affected by the decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States and to determine what might be done to meet the situation. The work of compiling and studying tax laws of other States occupied practically all of the time until the fall of 1927, and was very painstakingly and accurately done by Mr. J. G. Armson, of the Minnesota Tax Commission.

After a very careful study of the laws of the other States, the Federal laws, and decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States this commission came to the conclusion that the most practical and effective way in which national banks could be fairly taxed by the States was not by amending or repealing State laws but by procuring Congress to amend section 5219, Revised Statutes of the United States, by removing some of the restrictions and limitations therein. In this opinion the attorney general and all the members of the Minnesota Tax Commission concurred. We found that it was not within the power of this or any other State to pass any legislation which would grant adequate relief.

It was then, and is now, our opinion that the only protection needed to safeguard national banks from adverse tax legislation is to limit the States in taxing national banks so that the rate shall not be greater than that imposed by the State banks. It is not practicable, nor even possible, to so shape State tax laws so as to tax every individual investment or form of business which in a theoretical sense may be in competition with national banks at the same rate as national banks. In a sense, every loan made by an individual, whether it be a school-teacher buying a bond or a widow investing in a mortgage, is in competition with the business of national or State banks, so far as loaning money is concerned. But there is a fundamental difference between a business institution which receives deposits in a community, ranging from $1 up to many thousands in amount and which money owned by individuals or corporations can not be used as commercial or other loans by the owners, but the bank gathering in these deposits from all sources is enabled by its banking organization to transform these otherwise idle credits into commercial and other loans. The deposits become assets of the bank, upon which the bank pays little or no interest and is enabled to loan out at a considerable margin of profit. No other form of business is a real competitor of a bank except another bank, and there is no fairer limitation upon the power of the States to tax national banks than that to limit the rate of tax upon a national bank so it shall not be higher than that imposed upon a State bank.

Prior to 1923 the only method by which the States were allowed to tax national banks was by a tax upon the value of the shares thereof. In 1923 Congress authorized two other methods—

1. A tax upon the net income of the national banks; and

2. A tax upon the dividends as individual income received by a stockholder. In 1926 the States were authorized to tax national banks by an excise tax measured by their net income.

But the acts provided that any tax by any one of these methods would be in lieu of all other taxes, and that the rate of tax, whether upon income or by the excise method, could not be higher than the rate assessed upon other financial corporations, nor higher than the highest of the rates assessed by the taxing State upon mercantile, manufacturing, and business corporations doing business within its limits.

Your commission carefully considered the alternative methods of taxing national banks provided in the Federal law, and concluded that the same were not practicable, constitutional, nor in any wise adapted to Minnesota or to any other State raising the great bulk of its taxes for State and local purposes by a tax upon the value of the property therein. In this opinion the attorney general of the State and the Minnesota Tax Commission concurred.

Immediately upon the organization of your commission there was started a voluminous correspondence with tax commissions, other tax officials and officials and persons interested in the subject of bank taxation in other States, for the purpose of interesting all such persons and officials in the situation which confronted Minnesota and which affected the other States in a very similar manner, and for the further purpose of securing opinions from other tax officials as to the best course to be pursued to meet the situation.

In the month of October, 1927, the National Tax Association held its annual meeting in Toronto, Canada. Members of the Minnesota Tax Commission and Assistant Attorney General Youngquist attended such conference, together with the chairman of your commission. Meetings were arranged, attended by representatives of 36 States, having a like interest in the bank-tax situation. After discussing the matter of an amendment to section 5219, R. S. U. S., at each of such meetings, a resolution was adopted that subdivision 1–B of section 5219, R. S. U. S., should be amended so as to read as follows:

"In the case of a tax on said shares, the tax imposed shall not be at a greater rate than is assessed upon other moneyed capital used or employed in the business of banking."

A committee was also appointed to represent all of the States interested in securing a proper amendment to section 5219, the members of which committee were as follows:

George H. Sullivan, chairman	Minnesota
M. D. Lack	California
J. V. Benton	Virginia
Henry F. Long	Massachusetts
C. P. Link	Colorado
George Vaughan	Arkansas
Wm. H. Blodgett	Connecticut
Milbank Johnson	California

In November, 1927, a meeting was had at the capitol in St. Paul, which was attended by Minnesota Congressmen as follows: Representatives GOODWIN, NEWTON, MAAS, ANDRESEN, and KNUTSON, Attorney General Youngquist and members of the tax commission were present. After a full discussion it was unanimously agreed that section 5219 should be amended so as to provide that States should be limited in taxing national banks so that they could not be taxed at a higher rate than State banks.

Through the efforts of the commission a bill was introduced in the House of Representatives by Representative GODFREY G. GOODWIN, providing for the amendment of section 5219, so that the tax on national banks should be no greater than the rate imposed on State banks. A similar bill was introduced in the Senate by the Hon. PETER NORBECK, of South Dakota, chairman of the Committee on Banking and Currency of the Senate.

The commission with the cooperation and assistance of the attorney general and the Minnesota Tax Commission prepared a printed brief showing the necessity for pressing the above legislation, to which was annexed the compilation of bank tax laws of other States herein referred to, by which it was shown that 43 States were affected as Minnesota is in reference to taxation of national banks.

A number of conferences were had between representatives of this commission and a committee of the State Bankers' Association in the month of January, 1928, and prior thereto. In these conferences the entire situation was discussed and the question of amending section 5219, so as to limit State taxation of national-bank stock at a rate no higher than the rate on State banks, was proposed by the commission. The representatives of the bankers agreed to the principle that banks, both State and National, should bear the same relative burden of taxation as borne by property used in business and owned by corporations generally, but they strongly objected to the proposed amendment. They argued that such an amendment would place national banks and State banks in a class by themselves for taxation and that all banks would thereby become the target for adverse legislation. The bankers insisted that they be placed in some classification, members of which should be drawn from all classes in the community. However, when the commission later proposed to amend the Goodwin bill by adding a further limitation thereto, that the tax rate should not be higher than the rate imposed upon real estate used for mercantile or other like business purposes situate in the same taxing district with the bank, the bankers strenuously opposed such amendment.

It is significant that the committee representing the State Bankers Association have suggested no formula or language for an amendment to section 5219 which would carry out the principle agreed to by them. They have objected to every suggestion made by this commission or other public officials. The American Bankers Association have likewise failed to offer any constructive suggestion or proposition to carry out the principle of equality of tax burden. In fact, in hearings upon the bills before committees of Congress and in the conference on the subject of bank taxation, the committees representing the State Bankers Association and the American Bankers Association, their counsel and representatives, have opposed any and every amendment to section 5219. There is a single exception to the foregoing statement, which is that Hon. T. D. O'Brien, made the suggestion at the hearing before the Senate committee in Washington, and elsewhere, that he favored an amendment to section 5219 which would have the effect of permitting the States to tax mortgages at low rates and still continue to tax bank stock at a higher rate. The only proposition that has ever been made by the State Bankers Association or the American Bankers Association, is that Minnesota adopt the so-called excise plan authorized by section 5219, which provides for an excise tax measured by the net income of national banks.

The hearing on the Norbeck bill before the Senate Committee on Banking and Currency was held February 23, 24, and 29, 1928. The commission was represented at such hearing by the chairman, Senator George H. Sullivan, Senators Blanchard and Larson, and Hon. O. K. Dahle, of the house; Mr. J. G. Armson, of the Minnesota Tax Commission; and Assistant Attorney General Youngquist. The following persons made arguments in favor of the bill:

Hon. Theodore Christianson, governor, Minnesota.
Hon. G. A. Youngquist, attorney general, Minnesota.
Hon. George H. Sullivan, commissioner chairman, Minnesota.
Milbank Johnson, M. D., California.
Hon. Paul G. Eger, assistant attorney general, Michigan.
Hon. Mark Harrison Wight, assistant attorney general, Washington.
Hon. Maxwell A. O'Brien, assistant attorney general, Iowa.
Hon. L. F. Whittemore, State bank commission, New Hampshire.
Hon. Henry F. Long, commissioner, Massachusetts.

The only persons appearing in opposition were bankers and their attorneys. The arguments and statements in behalf of and against the bill were printed in full as S. 1573.

At the close of the hearings on the Senate bill it was deemed advisable by the commission, the attorney general and the Minnesota Tax Commission, to secure the services of Mr. Patrick J. Ryan, of St. Paul, who had acted as special counsel for the State of Minnesota in many important tax cases in the Supreme Court of the United States, and accordingly Mr. Ryan proceeded to Washington and remained there for a considerable time for the purpose of promoting the passage of the Norbeck and Goodwin bills.

Notwithstanding the diligent and strenuous efforts of Representative GOODWIN, it was found impossible to secure a meeting of the House Committee on Banking and Currency until May 10, 1928, at which time the commission was represented at the hearings by the chairman and Mr. Patrick J. Ryan, special counsel. The following representatives of the various States interested were present and argued for the bill:

George H. Sullivan, Minnesota.
Patrick J. Ryan, Minnesota.
D. H. Davenport, California.
Marvin Arnold, California.
W. E. Evans, California.
L. F. Whittemore, New Hampshire.
J. P. Carleton, New Hampshire.
Harry A. Metcalf, Michigan.
John H. Leenhouts, Wisconsin.
S. H. Chase, Washington.
Harry W. Scott, Nebraska.
Clarence Smith, Kansas.
F. H. Moore, Alabama.
John H. Mooring, Alabama.
James H. Stewart, Montana.
Prof. S. E. Leland, Kentucky.
Oscar Leser, Maryland.
John M. Rose, Arkansas.

The hearing is reported and printed as H. R. 8727. Again the bankers and their counsel opposed the passage of the bill and opposed any and every amendment to section 5219. The representatives of the States clearly pointed out that under the existing provisions of section 5219, no State could legally tax national banks upon the ad valorem basis, nor upon any of the other alternative methods provided therein. The bankers and their counsel insisted that the States could and should tax banks on the so-called excise-tax plan on the net income of banks.

Congress adjourned without any action being taken by the committees of the House or Senate, and up to the present time no report has been made by either of said committees.

The annual meeting of the National Tax Association was held in Seattle, August 27–31, 1928, and it was deemed advisable that your commission be represented at such meeting. Accordingly the chairman and Mr. Ryan attended the conference; members of the Minnesota Tax Commission were also present. The conference was attended by representatives of State tax commissions, other taxing officials, and by numerous representatives and counsel for the American Bankers Association, and bankers from many parts of the United States.

At this conference the Minnesota representatives succeeded in holding several meetings of representatives of the States interested in securing an amendment to section 5219, and, as a result, a nation-wide organization of such officials was organized under the name of Association of States on Bank Taxation, the object of which association is to promote some reasonable amendment to section 5219 which will permit the States to tax property of national banks on a fair and equitable basis.

The officers of such association are:

George H. Sullivan, Stillwater, Minn., president.
Oscar Leser, Baltimore, Md., vice president.
John H. Leenhouts, Milwaukee, Wis., secretary.
James H. Stewart, Helena, Mont., treasurer.

In the month of November, 1928, at the request of the secretary of the Minnesota Bankers' Association, a meeting was had at the State capitol, attended by a committee on behalf of the State bankers' association, by members of this commission, the attorney general, and tax commission. The avowed object of the meeting, as expressed by the bankers, was to see if some compromise could not be agreed upon with this commission which it could recommend to the legislature to govern the taxation of national banks in Minnesota, pending the adoption by Congress of an amendment to section 5219. The representatives of the bankers urged that the excise-tax plan be recommended, and this commission, the attorney general, and the Minnesota Tax Commission definitely rejected such plan. The reasons for this will appear later herein.

On November 17, 1928, the State bank commissioner, Mr. Veigel, made public his annual report to the governor, in which he advocated the adoption by the State of Minnesota of the excise tax on net income of national and State banks.

On the 20th day of November at the conference of governors held at New Orleans Gov. Theodore Christianson delivered a notable speech in favor of the amendment of section 5219 as provided in the Goodwin bill and expressed his opposition to the excise tax on the net income plan. This speech has been printed and will be attached to the report of the Minnesota Tax Commission, and seems to us to be an unanswerable argument in favor of the Goodwin bill. It should be read by all who desire to be informed upon the bank-tax question.

The foregoing is a mere outline of the activities of the commission and suggests the magnitude of the task committed to this commission and which is now before not only the State of Minnesota but all the States of the United States.

The situation has been somewhat clarified since your commission was appointed. At that time it was deemed possible for the State of Minnesota and other States to correct the situation by repealing the mortgage registry and money and credits tax laws, and attempting to tax such intangibles on the ad valorem basis by applying thereto the ordinary personal-property tax rate. However, students of the problem even then saw that the logical effect of the decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States in the Minnesota and Wisconsin cases would be to render the ad valorem tax on national-bank stock invalid under any system which attempted to tax mortgages and moneys and credits at the ordinary tax rate. The Supreme Court of the United States decided taxes upon national-bank stock invalid because of the lower rates of taxation applied to mortgages and money and credits, and the logic of such decisions is that failure to tax that character of property would have the same effect. In other words, if mortgages and money and credits are not taxed at all, or if such property escapes taxation the effect would be to render all taxes upon national-bank stock void.

All taxing authorities agree that no State can reach any substantial part of debts secured by mortgages or money and credits for taxation, if such property be taxed at the ordinary rate, so that if the State of Minnesota, for instance, should repeal the mortgage-registry tax and the tax on money and credits, nevertheless its attempt to tax bank stock would be held void because of the impossibility of taxing mortgage debts and money and credits at the same rate as other personal property. The futility of attempting to tax mortgage debts and money and credits in any other way except at low rates is thoroughly considered and analyzed in Chapter XII of the report of the Minnesota Tax Commission for 1928.

That such failure to tax debts secured by mortgages and money and credits would have the effect of rendering taxes upon national banks void has since been decided by the United States District Court for the District of Oregon in the case of Brotherhood Cooperative National Bank v. Hurlburt (26 Fed. (2d) 957), which decision was followed in the case of Roberts v. American National Bank of Pensacola (115 Sou. 263 (Fla.).

As your commission views the question there is no way open to the Legislature of the State of Minnesota to enact any law, or to repeal any law or series of laws, so as to provide for legally taxing national banks in any manner whatsoever, except to tax the stock of national banks upon the value thereof at the mortgage-registry tax rate, which amounts to 3 cents per year per $100 of value, or three-tenths of a mill per annum per dollar. This would virtually leave such bank stock untaxed.

There remains to be considered the method permitted by section 5219, the so-called excise tax on net income plan offered by the bankers. We do not believe that this plan can be adopted in the State of Minnesota without violating the Constitution, and if it could, we do not believe such system is fair or practicable. The other two methods permissible under section 5219, namely to include dividends upon national-bank stock in the taxable income of the owner thereof, or to tax national banks on their net income are neither legal, fair, nor practicable, as applied to Minnesota and to most of the other States.

The situation which confronts the State of Minnesota, and 43 other States of the Nation is—

a. Such States may legally tax bank stock only at such low rate as may be applied to intangibles of the money and credits class or to debts secured by mortgages; or

b. The States may adopt an income or excise tax based upon net income of national banks; or

c. The States must forego all legal taxation of national banks until Congress in its wisdom sees fit to amend section 5219, so as to permit bank stock representing bank property to be taxed upon some fair and equitable basis.

Argument is deemed unnecessary on the proposition that the property of national banks, producing on the whole large income and much profit, owned as it is by the individual citizens of the State, protected by the laws of the State, should not escape, or virtually escape, taxation. The right of the sovereign State in which such property is situate to so tax such bank property is challenged by the opposition of certain bankers of the Nation to any and every amendment proposed, so as to permit the State to exercise its sovereign right of taxation in a fair and equitable way. As we see it, the States should not permit such opposition to permanently deprive them of such sovereign right. We recommend that the State of Minnesota continue the fight for a fair and reasonable amendment to section 5219, whatever present loss of revenue such course may entail. The mere loss of revenue, now or in the near future, should not deter the State in its effort to establish its right reasonably to tax such property. It should be said that many bankers of this State fully agree with this commission, but the State bankers association of this State and the American Bankers Association of the United States oppose any and every amendment to section 5219. They urge the States to adopt the excise tax upon the net income of national banks as the sole and exclusive method of taxing banks. Why do the bankers urge the adoption of the excise tax? One reason which suggests itself may be that, wherever used, the excise tax method has reduced taxes upon banks, as in the case of Massachusetts, Wisconsin, and New York, as follows:

In Massachusetts under the ad valorem system in 1922, the total bank tax paid in that State was $4,370,845; in 1927, under the excise tax, $833,017; on national banks alone in Massachusetts in 1922, $2,784,204; in 1927, under the excise tax, $515,578. The rate varies each year. In Wisconsin the income-tax method has reduced bank taxes to less than half of what they had been under the ad valorem system, the rate in Wisconsin running from 2 to 6 per cent on the net income. In New York banks are taxed at 4½ per cent upon their net income. This produced about 30 per cent of the taxes produced under the former system. The State of California has adopted a law taxing the net income of national banks at 4 per cent. In startling contrast to these low rates it may be noted that national and other banks in the District of Columbia where the rate is fixed by the Congress of the United States are taxed at a rate of 6 per cent upon gross income. Let the farmer, the business man, and the business corporation figure out what per cent of net income is devoted to taxes outside of real estate taxes, and invariably the rate will be found as high as 10 per cent and perhaps 20 per cent of such net income.

We think the adoption of an excise tax on net income plan would be introducing a very unfair principle of taxation in Minnesota—that is, that taxes should be levied upon property only when a net income is derived therefrom and then only upon such net income. Minnesota in common with all other States of the Union derives the funds to defray the expense of its local and State government almost wholly by a tax based on the value of the property as distinguished from a tax on the income thereof. The farmer, the home owner, and the business man has to pay a tax upon all property owned by him whether it produces a dollar of net income or not.

The only exception to this rule in Minnesota is in the case of railroads and express companies, etc., which pay taxes on their gross earnings, but such property in the very nature of things always produces a gross income, although not necessarily a net income, and such gross earnings tax is another form of taxing the property itself. It has been found a fair tax in actual practice. If the proposal were to tax banks upon gross income, it would be worthy of the most serious consideration. No form of property in this State is exempted from taxation because of its failure to produce a net income, and so far as we know, no property in any State of the Union is exempted from taxation for a similar reason, except it be the property of banks, in such States as have adopted the net income or excise tax on the net income of national banks, provided in section 5219, Revised Statutes, United States. It would be a rather startling departure from the whole theory of taxation in this and other ad valorem States to admit any such principle of taxation in a system where all other forms of property pay taxes on value irrespective of income, net or otherwise. To permit the property of any of the banks in this State to escape taxation entirely because of its failure to produce net income would be grossly unfair to every other taxpayer in the State.

The United States Government is supported very largely by a net-income tax and it is estimated that such income tax produces $50,000,000 annually in the State of Minnesota, whereas about one hundred and fifty millions is raised in this State for the support of local and State government. If the State of Minnesota were to adopt the net-income tax as the sole method of raising its revenue, it will readily be seen that it would be necessary to multiply the rates included in the Federal tax by three. What is said about Minnesota applies very largely to most of the States of the Union. Do the bankers of the State of Minnesota, or other States, wish to be taxed upon a system which would triple existing Federal income-tax rates to other taxpayers, or do they wish to be set aside as a privileged class and let all other forms of property pay a large share of their taxes?

A net-income tax upon banks or any other form of property is wholly impracticable and unworkable and inconsistent with any general system of taxation upon the ad valorem basis. In every township, city, and county the tax rate is based on the assessed value of the property in such taxing district and fixed at a rate which will produce the necessary amount of revenue to defray public expense therein for the coming year. How can the budget of any tax district be based upon the fluctuating profits or losses of those who own property, whether engaged in the banking business, or any mercantile, financial, or manufacturing business, or in the more general business of farming. Manifestly it is unfair and impossible. Where all other property is taxed regardless of profit or loss, why should there be an exception made in favor of the property used in the banking business?

The provisions of section 5219 limit the tax which a State may levy upon the excise tax on net income of national banks, so that "the rate shall not be higher than the rate assessed upon other financial corporations nor higher than the highest of the rates assessed by the taxing State upon mercantile, manufacturing, and business corporations doing business within its limits." Under this limitation the only practicable way the excise tax can be legally levied on national banks is to place an excise tax upon the net income of such other corporations. How else can it be determined whether the rate on national banks is legal or illegal? Such an excise tax on the net income of such corporations must either be a tax in addition to a personal property tax or in lieu of such personal property tax. In other words, if the excise tax be applied upon the net income of corporations, then the personal property of such corporations must be wholly exempted from taxation. This is the case in New York and Massachusetts. If the personal property of such corporations be not exempted, then the excise tax is a supertax in addition to all other taxes paid by such corporations, if the excise tax be made in lieu of personal-property taxes, and such personal property exempted from taxation, then in the case of corporations not making a profit there would be no excise tax and such personal property would be wholly untaxed. We do not think property owned by corporations or individuals may be so exempted under our Constitution, and if our Constitution permitted such exemption we could not recommend such exemption or any such method of taxation as would produce such a result.

Would it be fair to other taxpayers who are obliged to pay taxes whether they make a profit or not, to exempt the property of corporations taxed on an excise basis which did not make a profit? Is it fair to tax all other property on its value regardless of income, and to tax corporate property only in proportion to net profit? And, if the excise tax is made a supertax and is a new and additional burden upon such corporations above and beyond the tax burden of all other property owners, would this be fair to such corporations?

But, if the excise tax be made a supertax on all other corporations and they be required to pay a personal-property tax in addition thereto, national banks can not be required to pay anything but the excise tax.

This is carefully guarded by the limitations in section 5219, so that when a bank is taxed by the excise method, or any other method provided therein, such tax must be in lieu of all other tax. Any such system is absolutely unfair to every other taxpayer.

In actual practice how could any taxing district in this or any other State make a budget based upon the net income of property owners therein and forecast expectation of profit or loss upon the property of banks and corporations to which any such excise tax on net income might be applied? That such a system is utterly impracticable and inapplicable in any State taxing corporations and all other property upon the ad valorem basis will be seen when we consider the situation in another aspect. Assume that the property of any such business corporation is situate in two or more taxing districts, how would the tax produced by an excise tax upon the net income of the whole corporation be divided among the taxing districts? A bank is situate in one taxing district as a rule, and property of corporations of the kind included in section 5219 may be and usually are, if of any size, situated in from two to a dozen taxing districts of the State widely separated; quite frequently their property is situated in many different States.

However, it is suggested by the proponents of the excise tax plan that Minnesota and other ad valorem States may continue to tax all other corporations mentioned in section 5219, Revised Statutes of the United States, and all individuals in the State upon the value of their property, and apply the excise plan only to banks. This raises the question of how the rate applicable to banks shall be ascertained. Under section 5219 the rate is measured by the "highest rate assessed by the taxing State upon mercantile, manufacturing, and business corporations doing business within its limits." We think the rate mentioned in the statute means an excise rate, but the proponents of the plan claim it should be construed as burden of taxation. They contend that the rate applicable to banks may be determined by calculating the per cent of net income of such corporations represented by the taxes paid by such corporations upon its property in the State of Minnesota, exclusive of real estate. If this be true, there would be but one rate applied to every bank in the State regardless of the tax rate in the taxing district where the bank is located. Without conceding that section 5219 will permit any construction which would allow all other corporations mentioned in section 5219 to be assessed upon an ad valorem basis, and the rate on banks be ascertained in the manner above suggested, we observe that the rate of taxes upon national banks would bear no relation whatever to the taxes upon other property situate in the same taxing district and would as to all other property owners in the district be unequal, for that reason, unfair.

But in the conference held between the commission and the bankers in November one of the leading counsel appearing for the bankers suggested that the excise tax on net income could be applied to the national banks and other banks in the State of Minnesota without placing a similar tax upon financial, mercantile, or business corporations in the State; also that the legislature could fix the rate of such tax. That is, that the legislature might pass an act taxing banks alone on the excise plan on net income and fix a flat rate of tax thereon. But the question immediately arises if the excise tax applies only to banks, whether any rate so fixed would be legal in view of the limitations of section 5219, Revised Statutes of the United States, which provides that the rate shall not be higher than the rate assessed upon such other corporations. There is no method suggested in section 5219 for determining whether the rate upon national banks is higher than the rate upon such other corporations. Section 5219 presupposes an excise tax upon banks and also upon other corporations enumerated therein, so that comparison of rate will determine the legality of the rate on national banks. Both the language of section 5219 and its history clearly indicate that it was written and intended only to apply to States taxing all corporations therein enumerated on the excise-tax plan and is only practical in such States where the excise tax is statewide; that is, the same rate all over the State and where the proceeds of the tax go to the State itself as distinguished from the taxing district in which the bank or corporation is located. It would be wholly inapplicable in a State like Minnesota, where all property is taxable in the district where situate and where the tax rate differs in each district.

How can comparisons be made of the tax paid in one taxing district by a bank on the net-income plan with the tax paid by a corporation having property in that district and also having property in many other taxing districts in the State, all taxed on value at different rates? There can be no proper basis of comparison of the tax burden borne by a bank taxed on the net income plan and the tax paid by corporations of the classes enumerated in section 5219, where their taxes are paid upon the value of the property differing in rate and amount, even though of the same value, because taxed in different districts of the State. Let us attempt, for instance, to compare the tax burden of the First National Bank of St. Paul with the tax burden of the Northern States Power Co., having its property distributed over hundreds of taxing districts in the State.

There is no appropriate nor equitable comparison in the tax burden upon property situate in one taxing district with property, even of the same character and value, situate in another taxing district. The tax rate in each district is governed by two factors, one the total assessed value of the taxable property therein, the other the total public expense authorized therein. These factors vary in every taxing district. It is assumed that the public in each taxing district desires and receives benefits from the taxes levied therein corresponding in some degree at least with the amount expended.

But the counsel for the bankers suggested that if the legislature would enact an excise tax law upon the net income of national banks, even at a flat rate bearing no relation to the tax rate on corporations, that the banks would not question the legality of the rate. Such suggestion was made after it developed in the conference between the commission and the bankers that the excise tax would be unconstitutional and impracticable in Minnesota. To this suggestion it may be replied that if the ad valorem tax on bank stock be illegal because it conflicts with section 5219, and, if such an excise tax rate be illegal for the same reason, why do the bankers suggest their willingness to be taxed upon an illegal excise tax rate, but object to a tax on the ad valorem basis? In other words, why do they prefer to suggest the illegal excise tax on net income as distinguished from the illegal tax on the value of bank stock? The answer seems to be that the American Bankers' Association has definitely determined upon a course which will force the States to adopt the excise tax on net income, as the exclusive method of taxation thereof and that the ad valorem system must go. The question is, What will this State and the other States of the Union say to this attitude of the banks? Shall we consent to the adoption of a system which admittedly places the property of banks in a privileged class where such property goes untaxed entirely if no net income is produced and by which the State is practically forbidden to tax such property any more than 30 per cent to 50 per cent as much as other property of equal value?

There are other matters to be considered in connection with the proposition that Minnesota and the other States adopt the excise-tax system on the net income of banks. To adopt the excise plan suggested by the banks is equivalent to an abandonment of the effort to secure unimpaired the right to tax by the method deemed fair by the State and applied to all other property therein, viz, to tax such bank stock upon its value at the ordinary tax rate. There are many banks in the United States resisting the payment of taxes; one such bank in Minnesota has set aside a reserve amounting to more than one and three-quarters millions of dollars on account of unpaid taxes for the past seven years. If the State of Minnesota should now adopt an excise-tax system, we could not hope to have Congress authorize the collection of the unpaid taxes for the years from 1921 to the present time on any other basis than the low-rate basis of such excise-tax plan. Congress has full power to authorize the State of Minnesota and every other State wherein any bank has failed to pay its tax for any year or years in the past to reassess such taxes upon the basis authorized by any amendment which may be made to section 5219. To change our system to an unfair excise tax upon net income, illegal in Minnesota, would be to practically abandon hope of recovering taxes for such past years.

From what has been said it seems to be quite clear that section 5219 should be amended so as to permit bank stock to be taxed upon its value, as has been done for more than 50 years.

The greatest obstacle to success in the campaign which has been made to amend section 5219 is that the only persons in the various States who are at present interested in having it amended are the tax officials therein, whereas in every village, hamlet, and city in the Nation where there is a bank, with some few exceptions, we find bankers interested in preventing such an amendment. The American Bankers Association, and its committees and counsel, are constantly in attendance upon Congress, opposing any amendment to or modification of section 5219. Something must be done to arouse the States to action.

We recommend that the legislature adopt a resolution reciting the pertinent facts bearing upon the situation and calling upon each State in the Nation to cooperate with the State of Minnesota for the purpose of securing an appropriate amendment to section 5219, permitting the States to tax national banks upon a fair and equitable basis, and requesting the several States to provide for the appointment of one or more delegates representing the same, to meet in a conference of all the States of the United States, to be held in the city of Washington, D. C., at an early date, the time to be fixed by the governor of this State, and requesting each State to appropriate a sufficient sum of money for the purpose of defraying the expense of such delegates to such conference, and for the purpose of defraying the necessary expenses of carrying on an active and energetic campaign of promotion and publicity at Washington and elsewhere throughout the United States as may be found expedient, for the purpose of giving the widest publicity possible to the situation and to the necessity of so amending section 5219, so as to preserve to the States the right to tax the property of national banks situate therein upon the same basis as other property, and to the end, that such conference of States interested formulate and adopt a plan for making effective the efforts and expenditures of the several States in relation to the matter;

That the governor of this State be requested to transmit a duly authenticated copy of such resolution to the governor of each of the States, with the request that such governor communicate the same and his recommendation thereon to the legislatures of the several States.

We further recommend that the activities of this commission as heretofore conducted by the commission be continued during the present session of the legislature and of the Congress of the United States and until the further pleasure of the legislature in the matter. Letters are being constantly received from the tax officials of the other States requesting information as to the necessary steps to be taken to meet the situation. We believe it essential at the present time, for Minnesota and the other States to be represented in Washington for the purpose of promoting the adoption of the legislation pending providing for the amendment of section 5219.

Your commission further recommends that a suitable special commission be provided for by this legislature to carry on the work hereinbefore mentioned after adjournment of the session, and that the members of the Minnesota Tax Commission and the attorney general be ex officio members of such commission; that such commission be provided with ample funds for the purpose of carrying on all necessary work, and that a competent person be employed to devote all his time thereto with all necessary assistance, until such amendment be adopted to section 5219;

Your commission recommends that the sum of $25,000 be appropriated, available immediately for the purpose of carrying out the above recommendations.

Your commission desires to commend the members of the Minnesota Tax Commission and the attorney general for their whole-hearted cooperation with, and invaluable assistance to this commission.

Respectfully submitted.

CONSTRUCTION OF CERTAIN NAVAL WORKS

Mr. HALE and Mr. COPELAND addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from New Hampshire yield; and if so, to whom?

Mr. KEYES. I will yield to the Senator from Maine, if the matter does not lead to any extended debate.

Mr. HALE. I ask unanimous consent that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Order of Business No. 1358, Senate bill 4572, to authorize the Secretary of the Navy to proceed with the construction of certain public works, and for other purposes.

Mr. KING. Mr. President——

Mr. HALE. Every year an authorization bill for public works of the Navy is introduced providing authorization for the appropriations that will come the following year. For the last two years we have not been able to get the annual authorization bill through, and we have reached a point now where three years' work has piled up.

Mr. McKELLAR. Has the House passed this bill?

Mr. HALE. The House has passed a similar bill, which is on the calendar.

Mr. WATSON. It is a Senate bill the Senator is talking about now?

Mr. HALE. This is Senate bill 1358, and there is a House bill, Calendar No. 1814, which I would like to have substituted for the Senate bill.

Mr. WATSON. Is this unanimously reported by the Committee on Naval Affairs?

Mr. HALE. It is unanimously reported by the Committee on Naval Affairs. It is simply an authorization. Every item in it has been looked over by the Budget and approved, with the exception of an amendment put in on the floor of the House, and that amendment I shall ask to have stricken out of the bill.

Mr. JONES. I express the hope that this bill may pass.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. President——

Mr. HALE. This is the House bill, as reported by the Naval Affairs Committee——

Mr. BLACK. Mr. President——

Mr. HALE. At the end of the bill there is an amendment added by the Naval Affairs Committee of the Senate which I ask to have stricken out, because legislation has already gone through taking care of the matter. It is not necessary on this bill.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. President, if that is the bill that appropriates $30,000 for a bridge and other construction work——

Mr. HALE. This is not an appropriating bill; it is simply an authorizing bill.

Mr. BLACK. Is it the bill that authorizes the payment of $30,000 for construction?

Mr. HALE. To what place does the Senator refer?

Mr. BLACK. To Portsmouth.

Mr. KING. That is a $35,000 item. I objected to that last evening.

Mr. HALE. That has nothing to do with this bill.

Mr. KING. This is the bill which will lead to the authorizations for the expenditure of millions and millions of dollars. This is merely the entering wedge to the construction of a large number of naval bases and docks and stations in all parts of the United States, one of the omnibus bills, the result of which no man can yet foretell.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the consideration of the bill?

Mr. BLAINE. I object. This is a bill that calls for tremendous expenditures, and should not be approved of.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection is made.

Mr. KING. Regular order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from New Hampshire has the floor.

ALLOCATION OF FUNDS FOR AGRICULTURAL RESEARCH

Mr. COPELAND. I ask that a short resolution which I submit be considered and passed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution will be reported for the information of the Senate.

The resolution (S. Res. 348) was considered and agreed to, as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of Agriculture be requested to make a full report to the Senate as to the allocation of funds appropriated by the United States for agricultural research, and especially in so far as the same relates to the amount expended in connection with eggs and poultry and the proportion the latter bears to the whole amount expended for food research; also a statement as to the benefits derived by the consumer by such food-research work as is now being done.

CHARLES W. MATHISON

Mr. ODDIE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from New Hampshire yield to the Senator from Nevada?

Mr. KEYES. I yield.

Mr. ODDIE. The other night when the calendar was being considered the junior Senator from Utah [Mr. KING] objected to Order of Business 1744, House bill 12502, for the relief of John H. and Avie D. Mathison, parents of Charles W. Mathison, deceased. I was not in the Chamber at the time to explain the bill to the Senator, but I have just spoken to him, and he has withdrawn his objection. I ask for the immediate consideration of the bill.

Mr. McKELLAR. Let the bill be reported.

The bill was read by title.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I object. I would like to know what is going on.

Mr. ODDIE. Mr. President, this is the case of a young man who enlisted in the Marine Corps in 1919——

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Just a moment. Is it a House or a Senate bill?

Mr. ODDIE. It is a House bill. It has passed the House.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Has a similar or identical bill been reported by a Senate committee?

Mr. ODDIE. Yes; it has been reported favorably by the Senate committee.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. This bill has been reported favorably.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. The Senator said it was a House bill.

Mr. ODDIE. It is a House bill.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. And the bill has been reported by a Senate committee?

Mr. ODDIE. Yes.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Unanimously reported?

Mr. ODDIE. It is reported by the Senate committee favorably.

Mr. SMOOT. By what committee was it reported?

Mr. ODDIE. The Committee on Naval Affairs of the Senate.

Mr. SMOOT. All such legislation has been considered by the Committee on Finance.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I have no objection to the consideration of the bill.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. BARKLEY in the chair) laid before the Senate the amendment of the House of Representatives to the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 223) to amend the act entitled "An act to provide for the submission to the Congress of preliminary plans and estimates of costs for the construction of a building for the Supreme Court of the United States," approved December 21, 1928, which was, on page 2, line 5, to strike out "death or resignation" and insert "the completion of the building."

Mr. MOSES. I move that the Senate agree to the amendment of the House.

The motion was agreed to.

CONSTRUCTION OF INCINERATORS IN THE DISTRICT

The PRESIDING OFFICER laid before the Senate the amendments of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 5598) authorizing the acquisition of land in the District of Columbia and the construction thereon of two modern, high-temperature incinerators for the destruction of combustible refuse, and for other purposes, which were, on page 2, line 5, after the word "area," to insert a colon and the following: "Provided, That the location of said sites shall be approved by the National Capital Park and Planning Commission before purchase or the institution of proceedings for condemnation thereof"; on page 3, lines 1 and 2, to strike out "loading hoppers, separating plants, ramps, platforms, and"; on page 3, line 15, after the word "commissioners," to insert a colon and the following: "Provided, however, That nothing in this act shall prohibit or prevent the sale of salvageable material by the owners thereof or by the Commissioners of the District of Columbia"; and on page 4, line 19, to strike out all after the word "engineering" down to and including the word "and" in line 21.

Mr. CAPPER. I move that the Senate agree to the amendments made by the House.

The motion was agreed to.

REIMBURSEMENT OF NEVADA

The PRESIDING OFFICER laid before the Senate the amendment of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 5717) for the relief of the State of Nevada, which was on page 1, line 7, after the word "session," to insert: ", the same to be accepted in full settlement of all advances and expenditures and interest thereon made by said State."

Mr. ODDIE. I move that the Senate concur in the amendment of the House.

The motion was agreed to.

BANK TAXATION LAWS

Mr. NORBECK. Mr. President, the inequalities of the bank taxation laws are so well known as to arouse the taxpayer. I present and ask to have printed in the RECORD and referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency, House Concurrent Resolution No. 5, passed by the South Dakota Legislature.

There being no objection, the concurrent resolution was referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

House Concurrent Resolution 5 (introduced by Mr. Bode)

A joint resolution memoralizing Congress to amend section 5219, Revised Statutes of the United States, so as to permit the taxation of shares of national banks upon a fair and equitable basis

Be it resolved by the House of Representatives of the State of South Dakota (the Senate concurring):

Whereas the several States of the Union may tax shares of national banks only as permitted by Congress under the provisions of section 5219 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, which in effect permits the taxation of such shares only at a rate not higher than the tax imposed upon money owned by individuals and by them invested in mortgages, bonds, and other securities (commonly known as money and credits) in which national banks may invest their funds; and

Whereas it is unfair to tax an individual so using his own funds at as high a rate as bank shares, which desire the benefit of the investment returns from seven to ten times their own amount in the form of deposits; and

Whereas it is impractical to tax money and credits at more than a relatively nominal rate; and

Whereas the courts have held invalid taxes levied on bank shares in States that undertake to tax money and credits at a low rate and shares of bank stock at any higher rate; and

Whereas the schemes contained in section 5219 of taxing bank shares by income or excise rather than by value are neither practicable nor adaptable to States raising their revenue by the ad valorem method of taxation, which method has always been and now is in use by substantially all of the States of the Union; and

Whereas the American Bankers' Association and their representatives in the different States have united in exerting every effort in opposition to relief of the States by the necessary amendment of that section, and have demanded that the States abandon their present well-tried and satisfactory methods of taxation and substitute an income or excise tax, the result of which has been to reduce the tax on bank shares by more than one-half in every one of the three States in which it has been adopted, with the consequent increase of the burden to be borne by other taxpayers; and

Whereas there is no organization corresponding to the American Bankers' Association to protect the interests of the general taxpaying public in the 40 States whose present methods of taxing bank shares are now found to be unworkable and invalid under section 5219; and

The deplorable situation in which these States find themselves, faced as they are with the choice of radically altering their present taxation systems in compliance with the wishes of the American Bankers' Association or of virtually exempting banks from taxation, demands immediate action in the amendment of section 5219 so as to permit the taxation of national banks on a basis that is fair and equitable to themselves and to the general taxpaying public: Therefore be it

Resolved by the House of Representatives of the State of South Dakota (the Senate concurring), That the Congress of the United States be, and the same is hereby, urgently petitioned and requested to amend section 5219, Revised Statutes of the United States, so as to permit the taxation of shares of national banks upon a fair and equitable basis, as contemplated by bills now pending before the Senate and House of Representatives of the Congress and amendments proposed thereto.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. Farrell, its enrolling clerk, announced that the House had passed the following bill and joint resolution, each with an amendment, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate:

S. 5717. An act for the relief of the State of Nevada; and

S. J. Res. 223. Joint resolution to amend the act entitled "An act to provide for the submission to the Congress of preliminary plans and estimates of costs for the construction of a building for the Supreme Court of the United States," approved December 21, 1928.

The message also announced that the House had passed the bill (S. 5598) authorizing the acquisition of land in the District of Columbia and the construction thereon of two modern, high-temperature incinerators for the destruction of combustible refuse, and for other purposes, with amendments, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

The message further announced that the House had passed the following bills and joint resolution, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate:

DEATH OF REPRESENTATIVE ROYAL H. WELLER

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the following resolutions of the House of Representatives, which were read:

House Resolution 346

Resolved, That the House has heard with profound sorrow of the death of the Hon. ROYAL H. WELLER, a Representative from the State of New York.

Resolved, That a committee of 18 Members of the House, with such Members of the Senate as may be joined, be appointed to attend the funeral.

Resolved, That the Sergeant at Arms of the House be authorized and directed to take such steps as may be necessary for carrying out the provisions of these resolutions and that the necessary expenses in connection therewith be paid out of the contingent fund of the House.

Resolved, That the Clerk communicate these resolutions to the Senate and transmit a copy thereof to the family of the deceased.

Resolved, That as a further mark of respect, this House do now adjourn.

Mr. WAGNER. Mr. President, I offer the following resolution, and move its adoption.

The resolution (S. Res. 347) was read, considered by unanimous consent, and unanimously agreed to, as follows:

Resolved, That the Senate has heard with profound sorrow the announcement of the death of Hon. ROYAL H. WELLER, late a Representative from the State of New York.

Resolved, That a committee of 10 Senators be appointed by the Presiding Officer to join the committee appointed on the part of the House of Representatives to attend the funeral of the deceased Representative.

Resolved, That the Secretary communicate these resolutions to the House of Representatives and transmit a copy thereof to the family of the deceased.

ENLARGEMENT OF CAPITOL GROUNDS

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 13929) to provide for the enlarging of the Capitol Grounds.

Mr. KEYES. Mr. President, the bill before the Senate is a measure to provide for enlargement of the Capitol Grounds. I do not propose to make any extended remarks, realizing as I do that the hour is very late. I shall be very glad, indeed, to answer any question I can in relation to the bill. It has been under consideration for several years. The first legislation was enacted in 1910, providing for the acquisition of lands between the Capitol and the Union Station, and also providing for a new avenue from the Union Station to Pennsylvania Avenue at the foot of Capitol Hill.

The matter has been thoroughly discussed and has had a great deal of consideration. The bill embodies a report from a commission which was authorized to make a report about a year ago. It provides for landscaping the space between the Capitol and the Union Station and for the laying out of a new avenue.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The clerk will proceed with the reading of the bill.

The Chief Clerk proceeded to read the bill.

The first amendment of the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds was, on page 1, line 10, after the word "session," to insert the words "with certain modifications," so as to make the paragraph read:

That the commission created by the act entitled "An act to create a commission to be known as the Commission for the Enlarging of the Capitol Grounds, and for other purposes," approved April 11, 1928, is authorized and directed to carry out the plan for the enlarging of the Capitol Grounds recommended by the commission in Scheme B of its report to the Congress contained in House Document No. 252, Seventieth Congress, first session, with certain modifications, as follows:

The amendment was agreed to.

ELECTRIC RATES IN CANADA AND THE UNITED STATES

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I desire to submit a few remarks. Several days ago I made a statement in the Senate in further comparison of some electric-light rates. I have been criticized by some editorials which have been sent to me and by some letters for the reason that my comparison consisted mainly in a comparison of domestic rates. I was asked why I did not take up other rates such as power rates. I had made some comparison between the rates in cities in Ontario and cities in New York State and other States bordering on the Canadian line, but mostly on domestic and commercial lighting.

It seemed to me that some of the criticism might have come about from the very best of motives. We all know that in the main, with but very few exceptions, in all countries and in all municipalities, whether the electricity is supplied by private utility companies or publicly owned municipal companies, there are as a rule three classifications and different rates are prescribed for each one of the classes. Domestic rates are those which apply where electricity is supplied to the homes. Incidentally there is always a little power included with that such as power for operating washing machines, electric irons, electric fans, electric sweepers, and so forth; but the main thing is for light supplied to the homes. Then there is commercial lighting that is another class, and a third class is for power. Sometimes a fourth classification is made for street lighting.

The claim has been several times made by representatives of private power companies in the United States that in Ontario, where they have such cheap electricity, low rates are made for domestic purposes, that electricity is supplied for domestic purposes even at a loss, and that the loss is made up by higher rates for power. The law regarding the Ontario system specifically provides that the rates shall be at cost and that each one of the different classes shall be self-supporting; that is, that domestic rates must be high enough to pay the cost of domestic lighting, that commercial rates must be high enough to pay the cost of commercial lighting, and that power rates must be high enough to support the cost of furnishing the power.

The charge has been made by some eminent engineer that in the United States there has never yet been put into active practice a scientific cost scheme in the supplying of electricity. In Ontario the law provides that these classes must be differentiated, that each one must be self-supporting, and that each one must be furnished at cost. The charge made by representatives of the Power Trust that domestic electricity is supplied to the domestic consumers in Ontario at less than cost is absolutely groundless. Nevertheless, I am willing to make comparisons as to power rates.

Several years ago when we were considering the Muscle Shoals proposition before the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry, there was evidence being produced in regard to rates in Ontario as compared with rates in this country. The charge was made before the committee, getting the information from a book which had just been published by a representative sent over into Ontario by the Power Trust, and on the basis of his statement—that charge being made by an eminent engineer of this country—that electricity in Ontario for domestic purposes was much cheaper than on this side of the line, but that for power purposes it was much higher.

About that time the bells rang and the committee which was holding the hearings adjourned to come to the Senate where the tariff bill was being considered. It was found that there was no quorum present in the Senate Chamber so the members of the committee came over here. When I got here a quorum had appeared, and either the chairman of the Committee on Finance or some other member of the committee was then arguing a tariff proposition involving some chemicals; carbide, I think, was one of them. There was quite a stiff tariff proposed in the tariff bill on that product.

I sat down in the Senate and listened. I think it was the chairman of the Finance Committee who was then speaking. He was explaining to the Senate why they had proposed a tariff on carbide and several other articles that were then under consideration. His main argument was that the American manufacturers of that article came into competition with the manufacturers of the same article across the line in Ontario, Canada, and that there was no other substantial competition for the American manufacturers, and that on account of the cheap power which they had over in Ontario those on this side of the line making the article were unable to compete. So that before the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry the charge was made that power was furnished cheaper in this country than it was in Ontario, but on the same day the Senate itself was being told by the chairman of the Finance Committee—and they acted on his advice and adopted that tariff revision—that American manufacturers would be driven out of business by the Canadian manufacturers on account of the cheap power over there unless we put the tariff on the articles as proposed by the Senate Finance Committee. I took the floor when the chairman of the Finance Committee got through and called attention to what had happened before the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry, but apparently I had no effect because the tariff was put on and is there now.

These criticisms came the other day and my attention was called about that time to an open letter written by Mr. Judson King, executive director of the National Popular Government League, to Mr. Samuel Ferguson, who is president of the Hartford Electric Light Co. They had been having a series of articles published and Mr. King has just issued a bulletin from his department. I read it and saw that there were some definite comparisons made between the cost of power in Ontario and the cost of power over here in the United States. I want to read from this correspondence and from some of the quotations that were made. In it is a letter which the writer quotes from the chairman of the local commission at St. Catherines, Ontario, where they are supplied electricity, both for lighting, for street lighting, for commercial purposes, and for power, by the publicly owned hydroelectric commission facilities. In this letter this commissioner at St. Catherines used this language:

As you know, the rates in use by the municipal systems are subject to the approval of the provincial commission. Each year an analysis is made of the rates in use in each municipality, the costs of each of the four departments being placed against the revenue derived from that business, and if a loss should be made in one department and the factors which produce the existing deficit are likely to remain the same for a considerable period of time, the rates are increased, or if an undue surplus is made the rates are, of course, decreased. This distribution of cost is made from our load curve and from our monthly reports, and invariably we have found that the greatest percentage of the surplus in normal years has been made from domestic lighting business.

It will be noted that he says on a purely cost basis it has been found that the greatest percentage of profit comes from the domestic business. I read a book not long ago written by Morris L. Cook, an eminent engineer of Philadelphia, in which he reviews the subject and he deduces from his technical examinations the conclusion that in the United States the domestic consumers are being vastly overcharged.

They are paying what the users of power in commercial lighting ought to pay. This letter goes on:

Naturally the details of such an analysis could not be placed in letter form and I can only tell you that we do conscientiously try to determine our costs in each one of the four departments and that we have consistently made money on the domestic business.

He speaks of four departments; I have been speaking of three. The fourth one, under the practice in St. Catharines, is street lighting. They have domestic consumers, commercial consumers, power consumers, and street lighting. Each of the four must be self-sustaining. This letter says:

Revenue from domestic consumers in St. Catharines—

St. Catharines, by the way, is a city of between 20,000 and 25,000 people in Ontario, Canada—

Revenue from domestic consumers from 1916 to 1920, $153,716; cost of serving domestic consumers, $128,894—

Leaving a net surplus from the domestic consumers of $24,822.

Next—

Says this report from St. Catharines—

The figures for the whole system, including domestic, commercial, power users, and street lighting, are as follows:

Total revenue from all customers, 1916 to 1920	$581,215
Total cost of serving all customers	499,218
Net surplus, all services	81,997

Let me say to the Senate that in the figured cost is an item—not only in St. Catharines but in every other municipality of Ontario—providing for an amortization fund that in from 30 to 50 years will pay off all the capital.

In addition, of course, there are all the costs of maintenance, and so forth. This report further says:

Of the total revenue, then, the domestic customers furnished 26 per cent; of the total net surplus the domestic customers furnished 30 per cent.

At the end of 1927—

I am still reading from Mr. Yates's report—

At the end of 1927, after 14 years' operation, the city owns a plant at a cost of $502,098.74; has a bonded indebtedness of $186,700.88, against which we have a sinking fund of $44,887.11; has paid off $45,322.03 in bonds; and has an operating surplus of $153,933.26, $23,900 of which is in bonds. Nineteen hundred and twenty-two was the only year in which the system has not paid all costs, including interest.

He states further:

As the operating surplus during 1927 was more than the hydro policy of "power at cost" could sanction, we have returned this year to our customers of 1927 a refund of 5 per cent of the accounts paid by them for service during the year.

That is what the Canadian law provides. If at the end of the year they have accumulated a greater surplus than necessary; in other words, if they have made more money than under the law they ought to make in supplying electricity at cost, they are required to rebate the excess to their customers, and that happens often.

He incloses some statistics in regard to St. Catharines's domestic service from 1914 to 1927. At the beginning, before this publicly owned operation was commenced, electricity was being supplied by privately owned companies, and the people were paying 7 cents per kilowatt-hour.

The first year, 1914, when the public operation began, the net average cost per kilowatt-hour was reduced to 3.7 cents per kilowatt-hour. It has been reduced every year from that time on with the exception of two or three years, when the cost was increased.

In 1922 their average rate for domestic service was 1.3 cents per kilowatt-hour, and that year, as Mr. Yates says, they operated at a loss. So they were required under the law to increase their rates; and how have they increased them? They increased them from 1.3 cents per kilowatt-hour to the enormous sum of 1.7 cents per kilowatt-hour. They increased the rates four-tenths of 1 cent per kilowatt-hour, and that gave them a profit instead of a loss. Then they continued to reduce their rates until in 1927 the average cost per kilowatt-hour for domestic service was 1.2 cents per kilowatt-hour.

Mr. Yates, the man who has charge of the electric service in St. Catherines, makes some very interesting comparisons. I want to call the attention of the country to them. He says:

There are other ways of testing this charge of domestic losses. Suppose that in 1917, the first year for which we have complete official figures, the manufacturers and other industrial power users in St. Catherines had paid the cost of the whole service.

That is, had furnished free service to the householders and commercial users and lighted the city streets. Just consider this comparison, and see how it comes out.

Suppose for that year, 1917, each one of these departments had consumed the same amount of electricity they actually did consume; that they had charged the entire cost to the manufacturers and industrial users of electricity; and that they had furnished all householders, all domestic consumers, their electricity absolutely free, what would have been the result?

The total revenue from all services in that year was $117,190. If the power consumers had had to pay it all, how much would it have cost them? It would have cost them $26.50 per horsepower per year. That is not as cheap electricity for power as we have in some places even in this country, but it is very cheap electricity, much cheaper than the average. It is a lower average cost than that paid by power users in the United States.

That comparison was where the power users paid it all and let the other consumers have their electricity for nothing.

Let us consider another comparison that Mr. Yates makes. Suppose in that same year, instead of having the power users pay it all, they had charged it all up to domestic users. Let us see what they would have to pay.

Suppose—

that the women of St. Catherines had paid everything and furnished free service to the manufacturers, the stores, and lighted the city streets for this same year at a time when the domestic service was just getting its stride and there were only 2,800 customers or domestic consumers with a small monthly consumption.

It is interesting to see if all this cost were charged to the domestic consumers and everybody else were given free service, how much they would have to pay. Here is the result:

The total revenue from the service during that year, as I have said, was $117,190. The computation is made by Mr. Yates, and shows that the domestic consumers would have had to pay 11.3 cents per kilowatt-hour. There are thousands of cities in the United States and towns where the consumers are paying much higher rates than that, and yet that rate would have enabled the domestic consumers to supply all of the power used, all the current used to light the streets and to light all the stores and business places in the city of St. Catherines without the charge of a single cent for electricity.

Now I come to the comparison as to power rates I said I was going to make. I am quoting from this article by Mr. King, in which he gives a verbatim copy of an actual power receipt in St. Catharines; not an imaginary receipt, but an actual receipt. The bill is for power, and the concern purchasing the power was a big one. It consumed 1,531 horsepower. That is a vast amount of power. It would operate a very extensive manufacturing plant, as it did, as a matter of fact. Here is the bill rendered according to their schedule. The industrial company consumed during that month 432,500 kilowatts. Under the rates charged in St. Catharines 57,100 kilowatt-hours were charged at the rate of 1.25 cents per kilowatt-hour; 57,100 kilowatt-hours were charged for at the rate of 0.85 cent per kilowatt-hour; 318,300 kilowatt-hours were charged for at the rate of 0.12 of a cent per kilowatt-hour. Adding it all up and allowing the discount which the law provides, they had a net bill for that month to pay for the power thus consumed of $2,110.74.

Now let us transfer our activities to the home of the man who is having this correspondence with Mr. King, to Hartford, Conn. Suppose some power company in Hartford, Conn., had consumed during the same month the same amount of electricity, how much would it have had to pay? Here is the net bill, itemized, amounting to $5,292.56. Over $5,000 in Hartford, Conn.; a little over $2,000 in St. Catharines! That is power. It is all power—nothing but power.

I have some more power bills here.

Here is a company in St. Catharines that paid, for the power it consumed—it is a small power-user—$15.36. If the same concern had been in Hartford, Conn., it would have had to pay, for the same power, in the same month, $105.90. That is power comparison for you between publicly owned and privately owned generating and supply plants!

It will be said in one case that the private company pays taxes, and it will be said in the other case that it does not, although that is not strictly true. As I have said before, the parent corporation, the wholesale corporation in Canada, does pay taxes. The municipality pays none. On the other hand, in Hartford, Conn., the private company sets aside nothing to pay off its capital. Instead of that, every year its capital gets greater; and there is a constant contest from all these privately operated utility companies to increase their capital, increase it, put a little more water in it, increase it from time to time, and, like Tennyson's "Brook," it goes on forever; whereas in the other figure that I have given you from St. Catharines there is an amortization fee that in less than 50 years will pay off the entire capital and leave them no investment whatever, with all their property free of any charge.

Here is another bill. This is commercial lighting. In this case a department store up in St. Catharines—and I have been in the store myself—consumed, during the month for which this bill was rendered, 6,260 kilowatt-hours. Its net bill was $54.37. If that department store had been operating in Hartford, Conn., during the same month, and had consumed the same amount of electricity, it would have had to pay $233.94 for it.

Mr. President, at this point in my remarks I ask permission to insert, without further reading, the entire bulletin from which I have been quoting.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. BARKLEY in the chair). Without objection, the request is granted.

NATIONAL POPULAR GOVERNMENT LEAGUE,
Washington, D. C.

AN OPEN LETTER TO MR. SAMUEL FERGUSON, PRESIDENT HARTFORD ELECTRIC LIGHT CO., IN ANSWER TO "A PIECE OF MUSCLE SHOALS PROPAGANDA"

A CHALLENGE

In your Piece of Muscle Shoals Propaganda sent Congress and in your recent speech to the League of Women Voters at Worcester, Mass., you attempt to explain why American women are paying from two to five times as much for domestic electrical service as the women of Ontario (p. 8).

Your chief explanation and that of the National Electric Light Association and the Joint Committee of Utility Associations is:

1. There are "losses" on the domestic service in Ontario.
2. Made up by overcharging merchants and manufacturers (pp. 8–14).
3. Who pay higher rates than charged in the United States (pp. 9, 15, 16, 17).
4. Where the home, the store, the factory, and street light each pays its own way by proportional rate adjustment (p. 9).

These charges are false. The crux of the whole matter lies in the fact that American companies do not even know what it costs them to serve these respective classes of customers because they do not keep scientific cost accounting—they charge what the traffic will bear.

Ontario hydro managers have practiced cost accounting for 20 years, as provided by law; every municipality adjusts its rate schedule for each class of customers on the basis of the cost of service to that class (pp. 10 and 11).

For the electrical industry of the United States to spread the above misleading propaganda is unprofessional conduct, an insult to Ontario, a fraud on our public officials, business men, manufacturers, and the people.

If you, Mr. Ferguson, or Judge Stephen B. Davis, director of the joint committee, or Mr. P. S. Arkwright, president of the National Electric Light Association, or any of the officers of your varied organizations will furnish me information and proof as to more than 5 out of the 4,352 operating companies in the United States which have maintained continuous records of costs in terms of class of service comparable in accuracy with those recognized as good practice in industry, I will present to the Worcester League of Women Voters, the Hartford Community Chest, or any institution you may name $100, which is more for me than $10,000 to the National Electric Light Association or the joint committee. (P. 19.)

INTRODUCTORY NOTE

This bulletin is a rejoinder to a pamphlet issued by Mr. Samuel Ferguson, president of the Hartford Electric Light Co., containing certain correspondence between us, and entitled "A Piece of Muscle Shoals Propaganda."

Attention is called to Mr. Ferguson's preface in which he offers Senator NORRIS copies of his pamphlet for league members. The Senator paid no attention to this, and I then wrote Mr. Ferguson that I would distribute 1,000 copies to a selected list of league members and others especially interested in the power question. He accepted.

It should be added that former Senator Robert L. Owen last summer indicated his desire to retire from active work in the league and submitted his resignation as president. The resignation was not acted upon until the close of the year. This explains the presence of his name on the league letterhead, although he is in no way involved in this controversy.

For brevity and clearness, short titles will be used as follows:

N. E. L. A.: The National Electric Light Association, New York, chief technical and propaganda organization of the power companies. It furnishes statistical data, news releases, pamphlets, etc., aids its various regional divisions, and the 28 State bureaus of public-utility information. It is "the voice" of the industry. Its regular annual income approximates $2,000,000.

N. E. L. A. Rate Book: Issued annually, around 800 pages; gives in detail official rate schedules of private power companies in the major municipalities of the United States. It is confidential, numbered, and can not be obtained by the public.

Ontario Reports and Bulletins: Annual reports and monthly bulletin of the Hydroelectric Power Commission of Ontario. The reports are volumes of some 500 pages and contain a vast amount of detail matter not ordinarily included in utility reports. Not confidential; annually subjected to four different official audits.

Joint Committee: Joint Committee on National Utility Associations, formed in 1927 by the National Electric Light Association, the American Electric Railway Association, and the American Gas Association, George B. Cortelyou, chairman, to defeat the Walsh resolution for investigation of the Power Trust and the bills for public operation of Muscle Shoals and Boulder Dam. Its first year's budget was $400,000.

Brief of the joint committee: Joint committee, above, issued a printed document of 264 pages, presented to United States Senators by ex-Senator Lenroot, as counsel, in opposition to the Power Trust investigation. Contains much data furnished by the National Electric Light Association. Signed by 182 utility lawyers and law firms whose power and political connections are analyzed in Bulletin 115 of this league, entitled "Political Lawyers."

Harvard reports: Studies, Domestic Electric Service, St. Catharines, Ontario, and Hartford, Conn., Graduate School of Business Administration, Harvard University.

THE LETTER

DEAR MR. FERGUSON: Your pamphlet containing our correspondence is of interest to me because in your letter of November 23 you add your voice to that of the combined utility interests of the Nation in promoting one of the most objectionable propaganda tales now beclouding public opinion in this struggle with the power interests for lower electric rates.

I refer to your "hint"—which amounts to a charge—that there are "losses" on the domestic service of the Ontario hydroelectric system and which are made up in other ways. And for this reason:

The American people—active, thinking women in particular—know the importance of electricity in the home. They know that they are denied the full measure of its benefits because of high costs. They are becoming aware that they are compelled to pay from three to five times as much money for similar service as are the people of Ontario. If they ask why, they are told by prominent power officials and financiers, gentlemen in whom they are entitled to have confidence, that it is "all politics"; that Ontario domestic users are served far below cost; that these "losses" are made good by overcharging the manufacturers and commercial users and by taxes. In essence, that the Ontario hydro is conducted on principles financially unsound and the hope that we might have similar low rates in the United States is but the fairy story of Communists and other radical propagandists seeking to destroy this Republic.

This is one of the most important assertions made in a general "educational" drive to control the American mind on which the electrical industry, spends around $30,000,000 annually in advertising and propaganda. It is also solemnly asserted as established fact by utility lawyers and experts before committees of Congress, State legislatures, city councils, and State public utility commissions when franchises, power sites, and rate reductions are at stake. It is believed—and honestly believed—by a majority of Federal and State judges, Army engineers, lawmakers, editors, economists, college professors, statisticians, industrial leaders, civic leaders, and the public at large. Hence it becomes of enormous practical consequence.

But it is untrue. As a matter of demonstrable fact, the vast majority of power and commercial users are also paying from two to five times as much for their service as are commercial and industrial users in Ontario. But they do not know this. Hence manufacturers' organizations, national and State; commercial organizations, national, State, and municipal, solemnly pass resolutions against the Swing-Johnson Boulder Dam bill, the Norris Muscle Shoals bill, the Walsh resolution, etc. They will doubtless repeat this performance in the immediate struggle over the new Muscle Shoals bill offered by private interests. From this viewpoint the claim becomes an important matter. I propose here to refute it by reliable evidence, fully documented, which must commend itself to candid minds.

The issue here, let me emphasize, is not primarily as between the merits of public versus private ownership and operation. It raises the question of what electric service is worth when furnished by private companies on an honest valuation with efficient management.

Incidentally, if there is no power trust, it is curious that you, a New Englander, are so concerned over Muscle Shoals, 1,000 miles distant, and that your company contributed money to defeat not only the Norris bill for Muscle Shoals, but the Swing-Johnson bill for Boulder Canyon, desired by the people of California, 3,000 miles from Hartford. Can it be that you fear that the example of cheap power rates through public operation at Muscle Shoals and Boulder Dam would start an agitation for cheaper power rates in New England? But cheaper power rates is one of New England's needs. New England leaders are alarmed over the exodus of manufacturers, one item being cheaper power elsewhere. Your New England conference is considering the causes of New England's present condition. I commend to them a study of power costs from data furnished by sources other than the National Electric Light Association.

Since early November, when you began this correspondence, my time has been absorbed by other work. I could not give it extended attention, and, to be frank, I was not impressed either by your method of reasoning or by your undocumented assertions. Time spent on them seemed futile. I was unaware you were writing for publication purposes. But when suddenly, without warning, you published an uncompleted interchange of letters in facsimile and sent it to United States Senators and Congressmen just prior to the introduction of a new bill giving Muscle Shoals to private interests, also to officials of this league, officers of other organizations—and how much further I do not know—with manifest intent to discredit me on the grounds that I am a disseminator of "false information," it became another matter.

I do not object to your publishing the correspondence, but it would have been a not unusual courtesy for you to appraise me of the fact that you intended to do so. I regret that space forbids my publishing in full the letters which have passed between us since you issued your publication, but I shall quote from them, and quote fairly.

At first I intended to mail your pamphlet and my answer in separate envelopes. You sent 5-cent stamps and envelopes. I discovered, however, that you made a mistake and your pamphlet will require only 3 cents. Exchange of stamps at the post office would require considerable time and red tape. Hence I have purchased stronger envelopes, added my share of the postage and am inclosing the two together. I will, of course, make the proper adjustment on the mailing expense, which, as a matter of fact, is slightly more expensive for me than the original plan.

I shall first deal with your Muscle Shoals contentions and next take up "why the 5 cents," which I claim is the approximate figure by which American consumers are being overcharged on their average domestic service per kilowatt-hour by private companies in the United States, and which you told Congressmen is foolish.

MUSCLE SHOALS—BULLETIN 123

The letters from November 6 to November 21, inclusive, will take care of themselves. In them you attempted to force me to give a "yes" or "no" answer to a question based on a wrong premise—one of those "have-you-stopped-beating-your-wife" questions. Your letter of November 22 is more to the point.

Now, in Bulletin No. 123 I set up at page 3 certain hypothetical conditions and showed that if the power purchased by the Alabama Power Co. from the United States Government at 2 mills per kilowatt-hour were sold at the published rate schedules, under these assumptions the profits would have been $46,000,000. I did not say that the Alabama Power Co. had sold this current as suggested. I distinctly said "let us assume this" (these conditions).

I freely confess that I presumed too much upon fairness of interpretation and did not repeat the word "assume" or "if" or "under these conditions," etc., in each paragraph. And so, by treating these hypothetical figures on possible profits as assertions of fact which might presumably have been taken from an annual report, you are easily able to reach the conclusion that I am dishonest and am spreading false information.

THE REAL POINT IN BULLETIN NO. 123

My starting point: The real purpose of Bulletin No. 123 was to indicate the relative profits per kilowatt-hour being made by private electric companies on the various classes of consumers from the viewpoint of an honest valuation and economical management—with watered stocks, inside deals, enormous salaries, multiple ownership, and large sums for politics and propaganda eliminated. My fundamental starting point is an honest estimate of real generating and transmitting costs, plus real distribution costs to different classes of customers, as nearly as we can judge in the absence of proper cost accounting by American private companies, since this is the only method by which we can get at real net earnings.

Your starting point: You start from the other end of the line—that is, from net earnings as reported, or gross sales. This relieves you of the necessity of disproving that the block of Muscle Shoals power sold under the conditions I laid down would have produced that profit—for somebody, somewhere. For the Alabama Power Co., or the Southeastern Power & Light Co. of New York which controls it, or the Electric Bond & Share Co. of New York which controls it, or the Electric Bond & Share Securities Corporation which controls it, or the General Electric Co. which controls it, or contracting concerns controlled by officers of these companies, or transmitting or distributing companies to which the Alabama Power Co. sells current wholesale, or all of them. It makes little difference to the people paying the bills how you conceal the profits in the subterranean passages of the pyramids—they are there and all that the State utility commissions know is what you tell them.

Of course, if the Alabama Power Co. did not sell half of this current for lighting purposes as do the Ontario municipalities, averaged, then it—or somebody along the line—would not have made the profits assumed. I was frankly astounded to have Mr. Martin, president of the company, vehemently inform me that less than 10 per cent of the company's current was sold for lighting purposes.

The real question still unanswered: So, Mr. Ferguson, it is still up to you to prove that there is not a 5-cent profit on domestic current, a 2½-cent profit on small power users, and a 1-cent profit on large power, per kilowatt-hour, unless Mr. Martin is selling certain blocks of industrial power at less than his schedules published in the N. E. L. A. rate book.

I refuse to accept conclusions based upon the "reports" of a single company—such as the Alabama Power Co.—in the pyramided line of holding companies which constitute the maze of the existing system of ownership and control. This is what, in the rush of rapid dictation, I referred to as "bookkeeping" methods. I demand that you get down to brass tacks, namely, cost allocation on an honest valuation to the various classes of ultimate consumers. That you will be reluctant to do. From this viewpoint your impressive looking set-up of November 22, paragraph 5, demolishing my Muscle Shoals assumptions does not apply, because a considerable part of your gross sales figure of $16,800,000 came not from retail consumers but from other electric companies buying current from the Alabama Power Co. at wholesale rates. This you forgot to mention.

WHY THE 5 CENTS DIFFERENCE? BULLETIN NO. 119

I am glad you took up the challenge as to "why the 5 cents" difference in your letter of November 23, because in Bulletin No. 119 I do not deal with assumptions but with documented facts.

For the benefit of readers who have not seen this bulletin, its chief feature consists of a 2-color chart which shows the comparative cost of domestic electricity in a selected group of 32 American cities with a combined population of 25,000,000 and 21 Ontario cities with a combined population of 1,179,000. It was printed in black in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of March 9, 1928, at page 4569.

The selection of American cities listed and figures thereon were determined by the Electrical World and used by the N. E. L. A., also by the joint committee at page 162 of the brief filed by former Senator Lenroot as attorney in opposition to the Walsh resolution for an investigation of the Power Trust.

There are only 21 cities in Ontario of 10,000 population or more and figures for these cities were taken from the official Bulletin of the Hydro-Electric Power Commission of Ontario for November, 1927, page 411, and from their annual reports. Note that the figures are not "rates"—they give the net average "cost" per kilowatt-hour purchased.

The Ontario Hydro system began operation October 11, 1910, with 5 cities and 9 towns to serve. By 1918 there were 21 cities and also 108 towns and villages connected. There are now over 350. It is significant to note that the figure of 9.3 cents in parentheses at the top of the Ontario column on the following table is the net average cost charged by private companies prior to Hydro and is approximately the same as under private companies in the United States.

Cost of residence electricity per kilowatt-hour

Year	United States (cost kilowatt-hour)	Ontario (cost kilowatt-hour)
	Cents	Cents
1912	8.9	6.00
1913	8.7	5.06
1914	8.5	4.86
1915	8.0	3.83
1916	8.05	3.08
1918	7.9	2.72
1919	7.8	2.55
1920	8.0	2.29
1921	7.9	2.20
1922	7.8	1.98
1923	7.7	1.83
1924	7.6	1.73
1925	7.5	1.71
1926	7.4	1.66

The bulletin also contained the following condensed tables. Being a small 4-page leaflet, there was no room for extended explanation:

Industrial power, total, 1926

	Kilowatt-hours sold	Revenue	Kilowatt-hours
			Cents
Entire United States	35,154,000,000	$461,000,000	1.31137
Entire Ontario	546,452,626	6,720,796	1.22990

Hence at Ontario power rates, the American power bill would have been less by $28,819,000.

Domestic, commercial, and street light, 1926

	Kilowatt-hours sold	Revenue	Kilowatt-hours
			Cents
Entire United States	15,000,000,000	$1,018,200,000	6.788
Entire Ontario	638,486,973	12,987,676	2.034

At Ontario light rates, the total American light bill would have been less by $713,000,000.

The Ontario figures for industrial power included only that sold by the municipalities and not the quantity sold by the commission direct, which would bring the average per kilowatt-hour much lower.

The sources from which the above figures were taken are: Electrical World, January 7, 1928; for Ontario data, the bulletins and reports above mentioned.

WHY THIS DIFFERENCE?

Under the double-page chart, or "graph," with the above heading, there was added the following:

	Cents per kilowatt-hour
Average price in these American cities to domestic consumers in 1926	7.4
Average price "service at cost" in Ontario cities in 1926	1.6
Since Hydro does not pay taxes in proportion to United States add 10 per cent	.16
Since Hydro does not pay dividends, add a fair profit of 10 per cent	.16
Since Hydro generates by water power, and 23 of the above United States cities generate chiefly by coal, add per kilowatt-hour	.48
Adding these American extra would raise the Ontario price to	2.4
Leaving unexplained why American consumers are forced to pay an added	5

This, then, was the "5 cents" which I asked you to explain. Characteristically, in your letter of November 23, you attack the 5 cents and "reduce the whole bulletin to an absurdity" by attacking another table, which in logic is a nonsequiter, and which we will let rest until you demonstrate in extensio and with documentation how you arrive at your offhand figure of $540,000,000 possible reduction of revenue by American companies. I observe you are a trifle careless about giving your references and people will ask, "Who said so?"

You tell me that you have made an analysis and arrived at the "complete answer" as to "why the 5 cents" difference. On January 8 I asked you to send this analysis to me. You refused. I also requested you "to send me the figures of your cost findings of serving your various classes of customers." This also you refused.

However, in the last half of your letter of November 23 you gave a "hint" as to what this answer is, the concluding paragraph being:

"THE HINT"

"The large use in St. Catharines is, of course, due to the low price charged for the past 12 years with the attendant losses; which losses are, however, steadily being reduced from the large figure which must have existed in 1916 when the average revenue was only $8 per customer."

Here again is the familiar claim that Ontario householders have cheap electricity because they are served below cost. It is, as I have said, the chief charge made by the N. E. L. A.—the "voice" of the electrical industry, to which your company as a member paid $3,371.58 as annual dues in 1927 (Exhibit 4125, Federal Trade Commission Hearings)—also by the joint committee to which your company contributed $1,800 (Exhibit 756) toward the $400,000 budget sought to kill the Boulder Canyon and Muscle Shoals bills and the Walsh resolution to investigate the Power Trust.

To be specific, one of the leading pamphlets published by the joint committee is Government Fails in Industry—300,000 circulated. In the chapter Ontario Hydro-Power Myth, at page 24, we find the following in a discussion of this very matter:

"That is quite true (that in Ontario the domestic consumer pays much less for current than his American neighbor across the border) but the Ontario factories and other power users pay much higher rates than do American power users."

The claim was given further dignity in the memorandum of the joint committee above noted, signed by 182 utility lawyers and law firms over the Nation, 14 of them coming from New England. Through four pages the thesis is maintained that in Ontario the domestic user "is in economic effect subsidized by the State, the business man, and the manufacturer" (p. 180 seq.).

Its latest appearance, to my knowledge, is in a newspaper release dated January 31, 1929, sent out by the Department of Public Information, National Electric Light Association, 420 Lexington Avenue, New York City. It is an extended review with quotations from an article in The Annalist entitled "Ontario's Hydro—Drastic and Elusive Venture in Government Economics," by William M. Carpenter. The Annalist stands in the front rank of financial journals, being published by the New York Times Co.

Through two pages Mr. Carpenter rings the familiar charges which show that "the system in vogue in the United States seems to result in lower charges to industry and trade," etc. The publicity man, knowing his job, plays up Mr. Carpenter as an independent authority and concludes his story with this:

"In other words, Mr. Carpenter voices the old, old question: 'Shall the small domestic consumer be subsidized at the expense of industry and business and the taxpayer generally?'"

Now, it happens that I met the writer of this article recently in Chicago. I asked for his card and on it was written: "National Electric Light Association, Wm. Morgan Carpenter, Research Statistician, 420 Lexington Avenue, New York."

That is to say, with the kind permission of The Annalist, the N. E. L. A. quotes the N. E. L. A. to prove what the N. E. L. A. desires the public to believe. I charge that this is the exact reverse of the truth.

ONTARIO MANAGERS PRACTICE COST ACCOUNTING—AMERICAN MANAGERS DO NOT

We arrive here at the most vital and important issue now needed to be discussed in the whole power problem—namely, cost accounting for different classes of service.

There is no possible way of knowing whether an electrical utility is making or losing money on any one of its loads—domestic, commercial, power, or street lighting—unless there is a regular, scientific system of accounting established and kept so that the exact cost of serving each class can be allocated.

In view of this charge against Ontario, made by the most responsible men of the electrical industry in the United States, including yourself, it has been an amazing thing for me to discover that the American managers do not keep such cost accounting but that the Ontario managers do and have for 20 years. I have seen the books and talked with the chiefs both at the head offices in Toronto and with managers of various municipal systems. I know that it is true. Ontario managers know what they are about in their rate making—American managers do not. They are guessing.

That is why, Mr. Ferguson, I asked you and also Mr. Martin of the Alabama Power Co. for your cost allocations. You refused as usual, saying, in your letter of January 14:

"Relative to your request for this company's cost analyses, would say that having already seen your ability to distort figures I, naturally, decline to furnish new material for similar use.

"I feel especially justified in making this answer as your question is incomplete in not asking for such essential information as 'K. W. demand' of each class; as 'number of customers' of each class; and 'miles of distribution lines' for each class, etc., without which any conclusion you might draw from the figures would be quite as foolish as your '5-cent overcharge' conclusion.

"We keep the 'set-up' including, however, the other essential items of information."

Prof. Philip Cabot, of the Graduate School of Business Administration of Harvard University, in an article in the Annalist, republished in An Analysis of the Domestic Business of the Hartford Electric Light Co., 1914–1926, says, at page 41:

"All the services of the Hartford company are produced at a joint cost and it is impossible to allocate the costs between the various services."

It is for you two gentlemen to decide which statement is correct.

I deny the claim that American companies have a scientific system of establishing rate schedules by a system of cost allocation as implied and make the challenge printed on the first page of this bulletin.

ONTARIO AND ST. CATHARINES

Return now to your charge that in St. Catharines, Ontario, as an example, there are "losses" on the domestic service, particularly heavy in the earlier years—1916 and following. Now, if cost accounting is kept in Ontario and your statement is true, then the official records will show it. Ontario hydro accounts are audited by four different sets of official auditors, and no one—except American propagandists—has had the temerity to deny their accuracy.

So I wrote Mr. P. B. Yates, manager of the Public Utilities Commission of the City of St. Catharines, and an electrical engineer of 30 years' experience, and asked him for an official financial statement as to his domestic business from 1916 to 1920. He wrote as follows:

"As you know, the rates in use by the municipal systems are subject to the approval of the provincial commission. Each year an analysis is made of the rates in use in each municipality. The costs of each of the four departments being placed against the revenue derived from that business, and if a loss should be made in one department and the factors which produced the existing deficit are likely to remain the same for a considerable period the rates are increased, or if an undue surplus is made the rates are, of course, decreased. This distribution of costs is made from our load curves and from our monthly reports, and invariably we have found that the greatest percentage of the surplus in normal years has been made from the domestic lighting business. Naturally the details of such an analysis could not be placed in letter form, and I can only tell you that we do conscientiously try to determine our costs in each one of the four departments, and that we have consistently made money on the domestic business."

Mr. Yates also furnished me the figures for his domestic business from 1916 to 1920, inclusive, which are sufficient to cover the period in which you claim the losses were especially heavy. They may be put in tabular form as follows:

Revenue from domestic customers (1916–1920)	$153,716
Cost of serving domestic customers	128,894
Net surplus on domestic load	24,822

Next, the figures for the whole system, including domestic, commercial, power users, and street lighting, are as follows:

Total revenue from all customers (1916–1920)	$581,215
Total cost of serving all customers	499,218
Net surplus, all services	81,997

Of the total revenue, then, the domestic customers furnished 26 per cent.

Of the total net surplus, domestic customers furnished 30 per cent.

Unfortunately, Mr. Ferguson, your confident assumption of "losses" on the St. Catharines domestic business as an explanation of low rates falls to the ground in the face of the official figures, and with it goes this explanation for low rates in Ontario, since you are using St. Catharines as an illustration and since the experience of St. Catharines, by and large, is typical of the other municipalities.

Mr. Yates summarizes the whole operation from 1914 to 1927, inclusive, as follows:

"At the end of 1927, after 14 years' operation, the city owns a plant at a cost of $502,098.74, has a bonded indebtedness of $186,700.88 against which we have a sinking fund of $44,887.11, has paid off $45,322.03 in bonds, and has an operating surplus of $153,933.26, $23,900 of which is in bonds. Nineteen hundred and twenty-two was the only year in which the system has not paid all costs, including interest, sinking fund, and depreciation. With a population of 22,043, we had 6,038 consumers at the end of 1927.

"As the operating surplus during 1927 was more than the hydro policy of 'power at cost' could sanction, we have returned this year to our consumers of 1927 a refund of 5 per cent of the accounts paid by them for service during that year."

Considering that widespread publicity has been given your recent refund of 60 per cent of one month's bill to your consumers, it is highly interesting to note that, although Mr. Yates is selling current in all branches of the service at rates startlingly below your own, he made to his customers of 1927 a refund of 5 per cent for the entire year, which just equals your refund of 60 per cent for one month.

Hence the following statement from the Ontario reports of the financial history of the St. Catharines domestic service is highly instructive. The average cost of domestic current by the private company prior to hydro was 7 cents per kilowatt-hour, water-power generation.

St. Catharines domestic service, 1914–1927

Year	Total revenue	Total consumption, kilowatt-hours	Number of customers	Average monthly use per customer, kilowatt-hours	Average monthly bill	Net average cost per kilowatt-hour
						Cents
1914	$2,013	53,572	833			3.7
1915	9,540	273,389	1,612	19	$0.65	3.5
1916	16,419	591,765	2,410	24	.68	2.8
1917	24,275	1,038,894	2,833	31	.77	2.3
1918	30,187	1,448,273	3,022	40	.84	2.0
1919	36,710	1,815,947	3,428	44	.89	2.0
1920	46,123	2,899,265	3,703	65	1.04	1.6
1921	55,560	3,932,393	4,040	81	1.15	1.4
1922	59,603	4,565,984	4,341	88	1.15	1.3
1923	77,332	4,394,072	4,598	79	1.40	1.7
1924	89,008	5,380,069	4,851	95	1.57	1.6
1925	95,398	5,832,281	5,042	98	1.61	1.6

Note that the use by the average home grew from 19 kilowatt-hours per month in 1915 to 147 kilowatt-hours in 1927, but the average monthly bill increased only from 65 cents to $1.83—more than seven and one-half times the current at less than three times the cost. The increased use continued even during the difficult years of the World War and the reconstruction period following. The St. Catharines public system began just when the war started and all Canada was hit harder than the United States. Yet it has been highly successful and the cost of electricity to the people has decreased much faster than in the United States.

IF THE MANUFACTURERS HAD PAID ALL BILLS

There are other ways of testing this charge of domestic losses. Suppose that in 1917, the first year for which we have complete official figures, the manufacturers and other industrial power users in St. Catharines had paid the cost of the whole service—that is, their own bills and furnished free service to the householders and commercial users and lighted the city streets:

Total revenue for all services	$117,190
Average cost per horsepower per year	$16.10
Average power billed monthly to power customers, horsepower	4,418

Dividing the total revenue by the average horsepower used shows us that had the power consumers paid all the bills the average cost of power to them would have been only $26.50 per horsepower.

This is a lower average cost than that paid by power users in the United States then or now.

IF THE WOMEN HAD PAID ALL BILLS

Again, suppose the women of St. Catharines had paid everything and furnished free service to the manufacturers, the stores, and lighted the city streets for this same year at a time when the domestic service was just getting its stride and there were only 2,800 customers with a small monthly consumption. The official reports show the following:

Total revenue from all services	$117,190
Total domestic consumption—kilowatt-hours	1,038,894
Average cost per kilowatt-hour, domestic—cents	2.3

Dividing the total revenue for all services by the domestic consumption shows that if the women had paid for all services the average cost would have been 11.3 cents per kilowatt-hour.

This is only 3 cents more than the average cost to the women in 32 of the largest cities in the United States. (See p. 7.) But in 1927, with the domestic consumption nine times as much and with twice as many customers, the average cost would have been raised only from 1.2 cents, which was paid, to 2.6 cents per kilowatt-hour.

DOMESTIC "LOSSES" DISPROVED BY ANOTHER METHOD

Test the claim by still another method. The annual report for 1927, at pages 292 and 331, shows the following:

Domestic revenue	$116,155.00
Power revenue	74,473.00
Average cost per year per horsepower	15.88
Net surplus, all services	12,207.00
Assume a 20 per cent loss on the domestic service	23,231.00
Add the net surplus	12,207.00

If this loss and surplus came from the power users it would be equivalent to making a "profit" on the sale of industrial power at $15 per horsepower per year of 47 per cent, which, of course, is ridiculous either in Ontario or in the United States.

Demonstration by this method is shown most clearly by taking a municipality in which the power load is small and the domestic load is large. The little residential city of Sandwich, population 8,077, opposite Detroit, 245 miles from Niagara Falls, whence its power comes, is such a city. I give here a detailed set-up of its operating accounts for three years. The figures are from the Official Reports of the Hydroelectric Power Commission of Ontario for 1925, 1926, and 1927, pages 311, 315, and 293, respectively:

Sandwich, Ontario, hydroelectric utility—operating reports

Total revenue	$91,732.00	$114,554.00	$137,177.00
Domestic service revenue	65,714.00	84,417.00	101,530.00
Commercial light revenue	12,432.00	14,997.00	b 18,508.00
Commercial power revenue	6,859.00	7,853.00	c 9,042.00
Street lighting revenue	6,726.00	7,286.00	d 7,991.00
Total expenses excluding sinking fund	78,919.00	95,642.00	109,580.00
Sinking fund or principal payments on debentures	3,412.00	3,612.00	4,598.00
Gross surplus	9,401.00	15,299.00	22,999.00
Depreciation	2,617.00	3,345.00	3,879.00
Net surplus	6,784.00	11,954.00	a 19,120.00
Net cost per kilowatt-hour, domestic service—cents	1.9	2	1.8
Net cost per kilowatt-hour, commercial light service—cents	3.1	2.5	2.6
Net cost per horsepower per year, power service	25.69	24.31	22.77

These figures speak for themselves. The net surplus was nearly equal to the revenue from commercial power service in 1925, was 50 per cent greater in 1926, and was more than double in 1927.

In 1927 the net surplus (a) was greater than the revenue from commercial light service (b) and greater than the combined revenue from commercial power service (c) and street lighting (d). Where did the surplus come from? Street lighting is by law supplied at cost. Power service could not have given a surplus twice as great as its total revenue. Commercial light service could not produce a surplus greater than its revenue. The two together could not produce a surplus equal to 70 per cent of their combined revenue. The surplus must, therefore, have come chiefly from domestic service, and this at the low rate of 33 cents service charge per month, 55 kilowatt-hours per month at 3 cents per kilowatt-hour, and all additional at 1½ cents per kilowatt-hour, less 10 per cent on the whole bill for prompt payment, a rate which with the high average monthly consumption of 184 kilowatt-hours per consumer results in a net cost per kilowatt-hour of 1.8 cents for domestic service supplied to a town of population less than 9,000 situated 245 miles from the source of supply.

Such demonstrations could be endlessly repeated with like general results.

DOES POWER COST MORE IN ONTARIO THAN IN THE UNITED STATES?

There remains the question, Does industrial and commercial power cost more in Ontario than in the United States? Let us compare costs on actual bills. First take large power.

MANUFACTURER—ST. CATHARINES, $2,210; HARTFORD, $5,292

Here are the essential figures of an actual bill as nearly as can be reproduced on a mimeograph of a large industrial power user for December, 1928, in St. Catharines.

(The Public Utilities Commission of the City of St. Catharines, 202 St. Paul Street, St. Catharines)

To the Blank Co.—Consumption, 432,500:
57,100 consumption at $1.25 per kilowatt-hour	$713.75
57,100 consumption at $0.85 per kilowatt-hour	485.35
318,300 consumption at $0.12 per kilowatt-hour	381.96
Service charge, 1,531 horsepower at $0.75 per month (demand)	1,148.25
Gross bill	2,729.31
Class discount—10 per cent, 12,000-volt supply	272.93
Total bill	2,456.38
Less discount, 10 per cent	245.64
Net bill	2,210.74

In the absence of Hartford rate schedules, which you failed to send me, I have had an electrical engineer who is a rate expert, estimate the cost of this bill in Hartford, Conn., as shown by the large power (optional) rate schedule of your company published in the N. E. L. A. rate book for 1927, page 46. It works out as follows:

(Same consumption—432,500 kilowatt-hours)

Energy charge:
205,560 kilowatt-hours at 1 cent	$2,055.60
226,940 kilowatt-hours at eight-tenths cent	1,815.52
5 per cent discount, 12,000-volt supply	193.56
	3,677.56
Demand charge:
(1,531 horsepower equal 1,142 kilowatt demand.)
50 kilowatts at $3.50	175.00
100 kilowatts at $2	200.00
992 kilowatts at $1.25	1,240.00
	1,615.00
Total bill	5,292.56

NOTE: Coal clause.—Cost of coal not known. Probably somewhere between $5.83 and $6.50 per ton. Mr. Ferguson can make proper reduction if any required. If coal were $5.50, the reduction would be $410.87 and the net bill would be reduced to $4,881.69.

SMALL POWER—ST. CATHARINES, $15.36—HARTFORD, $105.90

Note that this small power user in St. Catharines is on the same rate schedule as the large power user just considered. The Hartford cost is figured on the general power schedule, National Electric Light Association Rate Book, page 46.

(The Public Utilities Commission of the City of St. Catharines)

To the Blank Tool Co., 2,200 kilowatt-hour consumption:
373, at 1.25 cents per kilowatt-hour	$4.66
373, at 85 cents per kilowatt-hour	3.17
1,454 at 12 cents per kilowatt-hour	1.74
Service charge, 10 horsepower (connected load), at 75 cents per month	7.50
Gross bill	17.07
Less discount, 10 per cent	1.71
Net bill	15.36

2,200 kilowatt-hour consumption:
500 kilowatt-hours, at 7 cents	$35.00
1,000 kilowatt-hours, at 4.5 cents	45.00
700 kilowatt-hours, at 3.7 cents	25.90
Total bill (no discount)	105.90

If allowed on the commercial lighting and power schedule, this bill would have been net, $94.06; with coal adjustment, if any, $91.86.

DEPARTMENT STORE—ST. CATHARINES, $54.37; HARTFORD, $240.20

Surely, after all the talk, we shall find Ontario commercial users in a sad plight when compared with their fellow merchants in the United States—e. g., Hartford, especially famed for low rates. Sad to state, the figures do not tend to support this view, although held by those who have a horror of "wild distortion of truth." Here is the December, 1928, bill of a large store in the little city of St. Catharines, compared with the costs under the commercial lighting schedule of Hartford (National Electric Light Association rate book, p. 46):

(The Public Utilities Commission of the City of St. Catharines)

To the Blank Store, 6,260 kilowatt-hour consumption:
600 at 3.5 cents per kilowatt-hour	$21.00
1,400 at 1.75 cents per kilowatt-hour	24.50
4,260 at 0.35 cent per kilowatt-hour	14.91
Gross bill	60.41
Less discount, 10 per cent	6.04
Net bill	54.37

6,260 consumption demand charge, 20 kilowatts:
5 kilowatts, at $3.50	$17.50
15 kilowatts, at $3	45.00
	62.50
Energy charge:
500 kilowatt-hours, at 5 cents	25.00
500 kilowatt-hours, at 4 cents	20.00
1,500 kilowatt-hours, at 3 cents	45.00
2,500 kilowatt-hours, at 2.5 cents	62.50
1,260 kilowatt-hours, at 2 cents	25.20
	177.70
Total bill (no discount)	240.20
Coal adjustment, if any	6.26
Total	233.94

LARGE DOMESTIC USERS?

During your Worcester speech before the League of Women Voters, you circulated copies of a monthly bill of one of your largest domestic customers, Mr. Adolph Mettler, the essential items of which are here reproduced.

To the Hartford Electric Light Co., debtor, for electrical service, residential

	Rate	Amount meter		Flat rate	Net bill
		First block	Excess at 1½ cents
Energy consumed all meters, kilowatt hours, 1,149 from Nov. 9 to Dec. 12	Cents 3	$6.00	$14.23	$2.10	$22.33

In St. Catharines Mr. Mettler would have paid: Service charge, 66 cents; 60 kilowatt-hours at 2 cents; 1,089 kilowatt-hours at 1 cent; 10 per cent discount; net bill, $11.48.

Even Mr. Willis J. Spaulding, commissioner of the Springfield (Ill.) city plant, population 70,000, coal generation, in fierce competition with a private plant, total sales $480,000 as against your $5,000,000 in 1926, would have charged Mr. Mettler $19.64.

I assume you told your audience your average domestic customer used only around 43 kilowatt-hours per month and at an average cost of $2.96, as, for example, in December, 1926, as shown by the Harvard report, page 22. You advocate keeping rates high for the small user and propose to get down to 2.5 cents per kilowatt-hour for "a fully electrified home."

LITTLE FOR AVERAGE FOLKS

But the high prices of ranges, refrigerators, water heaters, and other major electric household appliances requires an investment prohibitive to full use by a family of less than $5,000 income. This, plus your high initial charges, prevents the mass of women from ever reaching your low rates, and the high continuing cost to them under your plan is an arbitrary overcharge not based on cost of service. If Ontario and American cities can serve common people at low rates and make money you should.

I have a bill of one of your average customers. For 51 kilowatt-hours he paid $3.60. In St. Catharines his bill would have been $1.03. For $3.60 your customer could have purchased 290 kilowatt-hours in St. Catharines.

COST OF DISTRIBUTION

In an address to the convention of the National League of Women Voters at Chicago, April 23, 1928, you repeated the stock claim of the National Electric Light Association that the high cost of distribution is the main reason for the high rates charged domestic customers as compared with industrial power users.

You complained that a certain newspaper article "entirely neglected the fact that the cost at the switchboard is only a very small fraction of the cost of current delivered to the home in small amounts." (Italics mine.)

I deny that switchboard cost is "only a very small fraction" of the delivered cost under a just system. But the delivery charges from the switchboard to the home, the store, the office, and the ordinary factory is a very large fraction of the reason why power securities are flooded with water—and why even some conservative securities sell at 400.

But how can the public be certain, when you refuse to divulge your detailed costs of delivery? If you will not show them to me, show them to the members of the League of Women Voters in New England, who are studying the power question. They will be interested.

More of "costs" in later bulletins—but this, for the present: If a man with a lead-pencil monopoly tries to charge me 25 cents for a pencil I could buy in another locality for 5 cents, I am not likely to be impressed with his explanations about the high cost of delivering lead pencils unless I am buying them near the North Pole.

When the industry starts scientific cost accounting we will listen with great respect—to reports on all kinds of costs—if they will show us the books.

ONE-HALF CENT FOR FUEL COST ONLY?

By the way, you also told the League of Women Voters at Chicago that you could "sell large quantities of power, at such times and in such amounts as suited my convenience, for one-half cent per kilowatt hour (cost of fuel only) without loss provided it were practicable for the customer to come and get it." (Your pamphlet, p. 12.)

Incidentally, the people of Tacoma, Wash., heat their homes with electricity at a one-half cent per kilowatt hour rate, and since the city owns the lines the people do not have to go and get it. But what interests me is that phrase in parenthesis. I can not figure out why your switchboard cost for "fuel only" should be 5 mills when the chief accountant of the Public Utilities Commission of the District of Columbia informs me that the total cost—capital charges and all—at which our manager, Mr. Ham, who also burns coal as do you, delivers his power at the switchboard, was in 1927 a little over half a cent per kilowatt hour—to be exact, 5.475 mills; also that Mr. Ham's operating cost is 3.75 mills, and this includes coal, oil, water, labor, maintenance, and other items.

Mr. Ham buys coal at just under $5 per ton. Your cost is probably not over $6.83, but even if it were $7.50 it would not explain this difference. Is our Mr. Ham a better manager than you?

OPEN DIPLOMACY

My hope that you will give us all abundant inside data in the near future is heightened by your assurance to me in the letter of January 9, in which you say:

"Relative to your suggestion that our correspondence was personal, would say that in the public-utility business I have acquired the habit of thinking that all my doings pertaining thereto are and should be public property."

That being the case, I personally would be especially interested to see an unexpurgated copy of an address I am informed you made not long since to the Association of Edison Societies, which I am told is the very Sanhedrin of the N. E. L. A. and the electrical industry.

And let me add here that if you choose to respond to this open letter I trust you will observe the admonition you gave the delegates to the convention of the National League of Women Voters at Chicago: "In any study you may make on this subject [electric rates] be sure your conclusions are drawn from facts rather than statistics." It will increase confidence in your writings if you are careful to include your authorities for both statistics and facts. It may occur to you upon reflection that the chairman of the propa—pardon—the committee on public-utility information, which put 75,000 copies of the Connecticut Catechism into the public school of his State can not be offended if asked to document his statements.

Lest there be misunderstanding as to what is meant by "cost accounting" in this open letter and challenge to you, let me say emphatically there must be no attempt to confuse that term with "cost estimates" or "cost analyses," which latter term you doubtless inadvertently used in your letter of January 14, quoted at page 10. I said in my letter of January 11: "Especially would I request you to send me the figures on your cost findings on serving your various classes of customers as domestic, commercial, power, and street lighting." To make my meaning clear, I gave you the following suggested set-up to indicate what I meant:

Cost of serving various classes of consumers, cost per kilowatt-hour, year 1927

	Number of kilowatt-hours	Capital	Operation	Total
Large power
Small power
Commercial Domestic
Total operating expenses
Total capital charges
Combined total

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, after I had made the comparison of rates a week or so ago, I received a letter from R. G. Doxey. He lives at Vails Gate, N. Y. His letter was written February 19, 1929. He incloses a bill. It is not a copy; it is the original. It is marked "Paid," and stamped by the private utility company that supplied him the electricity. This bill shows that during the month for which it was rendered—the bill was rendered November 20, 1928—he consumed 13 kilowatt-hours of electricity. If he had been over in Canada, he probably would have consumed 113 kilowatt-hours, because the rate would have been so much cheaper that he could have afforded it; but the rate in New York was so high that he could not use it for anything but lighting. The total amount consumed during that month was 13 kilowatt-hours, and he had to pay a net bill of $1.82; and here is the bill itself.

Mr. Doxey also incloses an editorial from a paper published in that town, criticizing me in a very respectful and courteous way, I will say, for the comparisons I have been making. I will read an extract from this editorial. It says:

As residents of the mid-Hudson region know, the rates of the Central Hudson Gas & Electric Corporation have been reduced time and again, the result of savings by the corporation from the development of new water power and economies attendant on more centralized control and operation.

The top rate of that company now is 14 cents a kilowatt-hour, reduced as the consumption increases. If, as this editorial says, the company's rates have been continually decreasing, and have now gotten down to 14 cents a kilowatt-hour, for God's sake where were they when they started?

Mr. Doxey says in regard to this editorial:

The corporation is a large advertiser in the paper. Possibly that accounts for it.

And possibly it does, Mr. President.

I desire to insert, without reading, at this point in my remarks, a very able editorial from the Nashville Banner of February 5, 1929.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the editorial will be printed in the RECORD.

The matter referred to is as follows:

TURN ON THE LIGHT

The bribery and corruption uncovered in connection with the lease of the power and light plant owned by the municipality of Paris to the Kentucky-Tennessee Power & Light Co. should put many other communities in this State on guard.

For years there has been a systematic drive to capture municipal plants. This, indeed, has been one of the two distinct features of the strategy of the directing agencies in Wall Street and Chicago of what Mr. Roosevelt termed the "power barons." One objective was the acquirement of the undeveloped power resources of the State, through wholesale granting of licenses. The other has been, and is, the elimination of competition and destruction of public ownership through the purchase, or long lease, of establishments owned by municipalities.

The public is familiar with the ceaseless, desperate campaigns to seize the Tennessee and Cumberland River power treasures. They have seen, too, scores of municipal plants being corraled by the great holding concerns which stood in the background and prosecuted their designs through local operating companies. Some of the most desirable of such properties in the State have held out, however, against every species of intrigue and every proposition, however specious and alluring.

A Federal judge sitting at Memphis in a decision rendered Saturday tells how Paris, the capital of Henry County, was overreached. According to the evidence, which he pronounced conclusive, a trusted city official was bribed, and citizens were deluded into belief that they were getting a fancy price for their property, when, in reality, they were being defrauded into selling far below its value. Here is the record of shame as shown in the courts.

The Kentucky-Tennessee Power & Light Co. in 1926 secured a 30-year lease of the Paris plant upon the consideration of $30,000 annual rental, assumption of $355,000 bond issue of the city to be paid off over a period of 30 years, and the option of purchase upon payment of $45,000. Judge Harry B. Anderson, of the Federal court, after reviewing elaborate testimony taken at the hearing in Jackson, held that the contract was obtained by the bribery of former City Attorney George H. Freyer, of Paris, to whom, it was shown, $2,000 had been paid by agents of the power company. In the course of his ruling the judge said:

"I set aside the sale on two grounds: First, because I am convinced that the contract was obtained by fraud, and, second, because the price paid for the Paris company was decidedly inadequate. Instead of assuming obligations approaching $1,200,000 as reported, the power company merely agreed to pay an annual rental of $30,000 and to take over $355,000 bond issue. Investigation of the deal brought out that Paris was to pay the city and county taxes upon the property during the 30-year period. Thus the power company was getting the Paris plant for virtually $400,000—considerably less than its real value."

It appears that Paris citizens had become suspicious of the transaction, and, when a new council was elected, Y. U. Caldwell, jr., the present city attorney, was instructed to institute annulment proceedings. He prosecuted the inquiry with diligence, courage, and success, uncovering the whole unsavory transaction.

Now, as to the parties of it. The thread of ownership or control leads directly from Paris to New York. The Kentucky-Tennessee Light & Power Co. is but another of those euphonious sounding concerns with southern names and Chicago or New York ownership. It is a subsidiary of the Associated Gas & Electric Co., one of the big holding companies of the country, the operating management of which is in the J. G. White Managing Corporation of New York.

The company which captured the Paris plant has been making a successful campaign with the same purpose in both of the States, the names of which it bears. In 1924 it obtained the municipals of Dresden, Obion, Trimble, Rutherford, Dyer, Martin, Kenton, Greenfield, Bradford, Gleason, Sharon, Mason Hall, and Newburn, in west Tennessee; McKenzie and Paris in 1926. In 1925 it acquired those at Louisport, Cloverport, Mayfield, Hardinsburg, and Howesville, in Kentucky; in 1926 got that at Murray, Ky., and besides controls the Ohio River Power Co. and the municipals at two points in Indiana. Indeed, procurement of municipal plants appears to be the special if not sole activity of this bi-State subsidiary.

In view of the above survey of the activities of the company in this field in west Tennessee, the local comment in Memphis newspapers upon the decision rendered by Judge Anderson is highly significant. It was stated that, should the power company appeal, and the decision of Judge Anderson be sustained by the circuit court of appeals, his ruling "is regarded in legal circles as a far-reaching one and may result in other cities bringing suits to recover plants leased or sold to power companies."

The field of speculation which the disclosures as to this little Tennessee city necessarily opens up is wide. Many towns in this State in the last three or four years have parted with their public utilities to power companies that were and are subsidiary to great eastern holding concerns. The citizens of these multiplied communities will naturally ask themselves, What of the methods employed in obtaining these contracts of sale or lease? Have there been other recreant official advisers, with power money in their pockets or power favors held out in return for secret assistance?

The taxpayers of Paris were led to believe that they were getting a big price for their property; and it required a hard fight in the courts to uncover the fact, as Judge Anderson asserts, that they were grossly deceived and would have been defrauded of a heavy sum. What of other communities which have been under the impression that they were receiving bonuses and were the recipients of the most generous and even lavish terms? Have many of these been similarly victimized?

This Paris revelation contains an unerring suggestion to other localities to closely scan the methods and terms of contract or lease; and to every town where efforts are being made or are contemplated to capture its plant, to be doubly on guard against corrupt approach. Elections of mayors, aldermen, and other officials who would have to negotiate with the power companies should be closely scrutinized, and no man under suspicion of alliance with the power interests or whose loyalty to the public welfare is open to question should be elected or appointed to any position of trust.

To intrigue, propaganda, political expenditures, lobbying, jugglery of newspapers, battalion of lawyers, big and little, and busy orators electing allies to office and to the general assembly the power situation in Tennessee has received in this Paris incident a most sinister supplement.

Whether it is isolated or not remains to be determined.

Have suspicious circumstances indicating corruption or involving fraud and deception developed since the transactions of sale or lease were concluded in any community? If so, they should be probed promptly and without fear or favor. A sale or lease that was fair and proper has nothing to fear from close scrutiny; one that subsequent events have brought under suspicion manifestly should not be exempt from the searchlight.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, most Members of the Senate are acquainted with the owner of that paper. He has been here several times to testify in the Muscle Shoals hearings. The Nashville Banner is one of the ablest papers of the South, and its editor goes into the trouble they are having in Tennessee with the power company.

Here is another editorial criticizing the comparison I made. This is from Niagara Falls, N. Y., where I showed how cheap the electricity was on the Canadian side and how expensive it was on this side. I will read a part of it:

The relative costs of electric current on this and the Canadian side of the river are frequently referred to by those who like to draw comparisons between publicly owned and privately owned utilities. Senator NORRIS, of Nebraska, has recently introduced the subject in the upper branch of the Congress at Washington, drawing invidious comparisons in a speech before that body in which he attempted to show that the users of electricity on the American side were being grossly discriminated against in the matter of service charges.

The editor goes on to say, in the article—and from his standpoint it is a very able editorial, I think—that they pay taxes on this side, and they do not pay any taxes on the other side. As I said before, the statement about the municipally owned electric systems in Canada not being taxed is not accurate, although it is partially true. The municipality owning the distributing system pays no taxes. The wholesale company, the hydroelectric concern that generates and distributes the electricity to the municipalities, does pay taxes. But on the Canadian side at Niagara Falls, although those rates are much lower, as is admitted by this editorial, they have an amortization fee. Up to this time, as I remember, they have almost completely wiped out the entire investment that they have on that side.

Although the capital has been practically paid off by the consumers in Canada, and has been going down continually, year after year, on the American side it has been going up and up and up, and is higher now than it ever was. In other words, it will be but a short time until the investment on the Canadian side will be entirely wiped out, while the investment on the American side will be increased more than ever. That amounts to much more than the difference in taxes. If you should add 1 cent a kilowatt-hour—and there is no private concern in the United States that pays that much tax—it would still leave the discrepancy, in many cases, more than twice as much on the American side as it is on the other side.

Mr. President, at this point I desire to insert in my remarks, without reading, an editorial entitled "Power Trust Propaganda Again Meets a Waterloo." It is taken from the Washington Herald of February 21, 1929.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the article will be inserted in the RECORD.

The matter referred to is as follows:

POWER TRUST PROPAGANDA AGAIN MEETS A WATERLOO

One of the means of bamboozling the American public with regard to the success of the Ontario hydroelectric system, which furnishes its patrons electric power at rates much lower than those charged by privately owned plants in this country, is the assertion that there are losses on the domestic service furnished by the hydro, and that these are made up by higher rates charged big business enterprises or, if necessary, by incorporating a deficit in the tax rate.

Such stories are absolutely untrue, according to a statement just issued by the National Popular Government League issued in the form of an open letter by Judson King, director, to the president of an American privately owned utility. "As a matter of demonstrable fact," Mr. King asserts, "the vast majority of power and commercial users are also paying from two to five times as much for their service as are commercial and industrial users in Ontario. But they do not know this."

Mr. King cites statements which he traces back to sources originating in the power industries of this country, to the effect that in Ontario the domestic user is "in economic effect subsidized by the State, the business man, and the manufacturer," and an intimation that small domestic consumers are subsidized "at the expense of industry and business and the taxpayer generally." These assertions and intimations, Mr. King believes, are "the exact reverse of the truth."

As a matter of fact, he says, the Ontario hydro has in effect cost-accounting systems which show the exact cost of different kinds of service. Every municipality adjusts its rate schedule for each class of customers on the basis of the cost of service to that class.

Privately owned utilities in this country, however, do not even know, he says, what it costs them to serve these respective classes of customers, because, instead of keeping scientific cost accounting, they charge what the traffic will bear.

The Washington Herald and the other Hearst newspapers have done everything in their power to make known the workings of the utilities' propaganda in this country as revealed in the hearings before the Federal Trade Commission. The revelations have been nothing short of amazing. They have shown how the Power Trust has bamboozled the American public with its own money; how vast expenditures have been made for propaganda in the interest of the utilities and charged up to operating expenses; how the Power Trust has sought to influence newspapers, to buy college professors, and to spread false statements about public ownership throughout the country.

Commenting on this point, Mr. King says:

"The American people—active, thinking women in particular—know the importance of electricity in the home. They know they are denied the full measure of its benefits because of high costs. They are becoming aware that they are compelled to pay from three to five times as much money for similar service as are the people of Ontario. If they ask why, they are told by prominent power officials and financiers, gentlemen in whom they are entitled to have confidence, that it is 'all politics'; that Ontario domestic users are served far below cost; that these 'losses' are made good by overcharging the manufacturers and commercial users and by taxes. In essence, the Ontario hydro is conducted on principles financially unsound, and the hope that we might have similar low rates in the United States is but the fairy story of communists and other radical propagandists seeking to destroy this Republic."

The Herald congratulates Mr. King on the exposition of facts he has adduced to refute the charges that special concessions have been made in behalf of the domestic consumers in Ontario. These charges are simply of a piece with other Power Trust propaganda, which is designed to discredit public ownership and which seldom is scrupulous about facts.

The Herald trusts that the American people, after so many instances of Power Trust propaganda against their interests, will look with considerable suspicion on the antipublic-ownership propaganda. The facts in general are in favor of public ownership, and the Herald hopes to do its part to make them known to the people of Washington.

Mr. NORRIS. I have here a magazine, Forbes' Magazine for Busy Business Men. This is a business man's idea, not making an argument for municipal ownership, not making an argument at all, but stating a business proposition, something that is going on. We have all read about it; but here is this business magazine that calls attention to it:

J. P. Morgan & Co., the most influential international banking house in the world, has openly entered the public utility lists by forming a holding corporation which is expected to accumulate stock and a voice in leading power and light companies stretching all the way from the Canadian border to Washington or farther South. Other interests of the largest caliber likewise are aggressively corraling utility properties. The prospect is that by the end of this year the bulk of the utility business will have been gathered into relatively few hands.

That is not from a magazine or an editorial criticizing the Power Trust, or finding fault with them; but it is from an article stating a fact that is apparent to all students of the subject. They are stating as a matter of news that the present indications are that at the end of this year practically all of the private utility corporations supplying electricity to the people of the United States will be in control of a very few hands. In other words, we are approaching a monopoly of a public necessity. When, year after year, the monopoly increases and the ownership extends, we will reach a place where there will be no such thing as competition, where the monopoly will dictate to every municipality, every power user, every manufacturing institution in the United States what they shall pay for power if they use electricity.

Mr. President, I have here a letter—it is called a memorandum of the City Club of New York—with a letter in it to Gov. Franklin D. Roosevelt, of New York. It is a mighty interesting letter. It would be interesting, indeed, if the Senators would read the entire letter. I am only going to include in my remarks, without reading, the tables which this committee set out in their letter, calling the attention of the governor to the wonderful condition of the water power and electric light business that is going on in the greatest State of the Union, in New York, just across the line from Ontario.

It calls attention to what the people of New York are paying for electricity, and asks him to see that the proper investigation is made. They wind up their letter by putting in an appendix, in which they give the rates charged by about 200 municipalities in the great State of New York. The first table gives the rates charged for electricity in cities having more than 100,000 population.

We all know that the electric-light rates are often hard to compare, because one city will have a rate, we will say, of 10 cents for the first 50 kilowatts, the next one may have a rate of 10 cents for the first 200 kilowatts, and another one 8 cents for the first 35 kilowatts. So a fair way to do is to assume an arbitrary amount of consumption, get the average if you can, and this committee has taken the average of 36 kilowatt-hours per month in the ordinary home.

As I remember it, it is above the average consumption in the homes of the United States. It is only about one-third of the average consumption of the homes in Ontario, Canada. In Ontario, Canada, under the system of publicly owned and supplied electricity, the average consumption in the home there, as I remember it, is somewhat between 95 and 100 kilowatt-hours per month, and the average consumption in the United States is a little less than 33 kilowatt-hours per month.

We all know that when the price of electricity goes down, the consumption goes up. In other words, the woman who does her own housework, if the electricity is cheap enough, has an electric fan, she has an electric iron, she has an electric washing machine, she has an electric sweeper, she has an electric range. The people perhaps heat some of the water for bathing purposes by electricity, whereas if the electricity must be paid for at the rate of 8, 10, 12, 13, or 14 cents a kilowatt-hour, nobody but a rich man can use enough electricity to supply his home with all those facilities which, in the modern home, are becoming more of a necessity every day.

The next table shows the price in cities of between 50,000 and 100,000 population, and the third table shows the rates paid in cities of between 25,000 and 50,000. Then come the electric rates in cities with a population under 25,000. That is the last table. This shows the list of the cities, the list of the municipalities, the population in each case, and figures out how much the people would pay for the consumption of 36 kilowatt-hours. They figure that out at the rates charged. They say here that these rates are from the tariffs in effect December, 1928, and here is the grand total of these cities in New York, the grand total of table "V"; that is, villages and towns, with a population of 383,620. This represents the total population in all the tables of 2,678,800. The average rate in all these cities that is paid for 36 kilowatt-hours a month is 10.14 cents per kilowatt-hour.

I wonder how the people of that great State, just across the line from where the domestic consumers paid last year an average of less than 2 cents a kilowatt-hour, must enjoy turning on the electric light, knowing that they are paying more than five times as much as the people just over the line in Canada pay.

I wonder what the people of New York must think when they read the results supplied by the City Club of New York as to electric rates in their great State. What do the manufacturers think, those who have to buy electricity to operate machines, of paying five or six times as much as the same manufacturer would pay for the same electricity across the line? What do the business men think, the owners of stores, when they are paying these enormous rates? Is it any satisfaction to them to think that the company that supplies them does pay taxes and that if they were relieved from taxes the entire reduction applied to a reduction in their rates it would reduce their rates less than 1 cent a kilowatt-hour? What do they think when they realize that it will be only a few years before their competitors across the line will have no capital invested, all will be paid off, and will have nothing to do but to pay enough to keep up the system, to keep it in repair, and to provide for depreciation, operation, and maintenance?

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to include without reading the tables I have been discussing and to which I have made reference.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection?

There being no objection, the matter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

HARRIMAN GEOGRAPHIC CODE SYSTEM

Mr. MOSES. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Senate bill 5722, to provide for the purchase of the Harriman Geographic Code System.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, which was read, as follows:

Whereas under and by virtue of authority contained in Public Resolution No. 70, Sixty-ninth Congress, a select joint committee, consisting of three Members of the Senate and three Members of the House, has found that the Harriman Geographic Code System would promote efficiency and economy of operation and administration in certain of the executive departments and administrative branches of the Government, and has recommended the purchase from George W. R. Harriman, of Washington, D. C., of the right to an unrestricted use of the said system for all governmental, administrative, or publication purposes for which the same may be desirable: Therefore

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury is authorized and directed to pay to George W. R. Harriman, of Washington, D. C., his heirs, executors, or assigns, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $300,000, and, in addition thereto, to enter into a contract with the said George W. R. Harriman, his heirs, executors, or assigns, for the payment to him of royalties based on the use of the Harriman Geographic Code System, upon such terms and conditions as may be agreed upon between the said George W. R. Harriman and the Secretary of the Treasury: Provided, however, That the said royalties shall not in any one year be less than the sum of $10,000 nor exceed the sum of $50,000, and that no royalties shall be based upon or paid for the use of patents covering said system which have expired by limitation of law: And provided further, That at any time after five years from the date of said contract, the Secretary of the Treasury shall have the right, upon 12 months' notice in writing to the said George W. R. Harriman, his heirs, executors, or assigns, to cancel said contract, said payments to be in full consideration and compensation for the past, present, and future unrestricted use of the Harriman Geographic Code System, under patents No. 1192829, issued July 25, 1916; 1362939, issued December 21, 1920; 1408455, issued March 7, 1922; 1429285, issued September 19, 1922; 1448960, issued March 20, 1923; 1448961, issued March 20, 1923; 1512598, issued October 21, 1924, heretofore issued, or other patents that may be issued to the said George W. R. Harriman in connection with the products or publications of the Harriman Geographic Code System, and including also the unrestricted use of all copyrights issued or that may be issued in connection with the products or publications of the Harriman Geographic Code System, including the right, license, and privilege to manufacture, use, and dispose of geographs, maps, diagrams, and charts embodying said patented inventions or improvements thereof, or copyright issued in connection therewith, incident to the functions of all bureaus or departments of the United States Government, for all governmental, administrative, or publication purposes for which the same may be desirable: Provided, however, That said unrestricted use to be acquired hereunder shall not include the right to generally or commercially distribute to the public any products or publications using the Harriman Geographic Code System, patents, or copyrights: And provided further, That a full and unrestricted license to use the said Harriman Geographic Code System, as hereinbefore provided, is executed by the said George W. R. Harriman and approved by and deposited with the Secretary of the Treasury.

SEC. 2. That it shall be the duty of the Chief Coordinator, created by Executive order promulgated in Circular No. 15, Bureau of the Budget, July 27, 1921, to study the application of the said Harriman Geographic Code System to the executive departments and the administrative branches of the Government, and from time to time recommend to said executive departments and administrative branches such use or uses as would tend to promote efficiency and economy of operation and administration of said departments and administrative branches.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The preamble was agreed to.

OIL LANDS IN THE SALT CREEK FIELDS, WYO.

Mr. NYE, from the Committee on Public Lands and Surveys, reported the following resolution (S. Res. 349):

Mr. NYE. I ask for the immediate consideration of the resolution. It is unanimously reported.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

Mr. BRATTON. Mr. President, as the chairman of the committee has stated, the resolution was unanimously agreed to by all the members of the committee present. It expresses the unanimity of sentiment among the members of the committee, and I express the hope that it will be adopted.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

NEWSPRINT PAPER FROM FARM PRODUCTS

Mr. SCHALL. Mr. President, about two months ago the President invited my police dog, Lux, to come over and visit him. That incident was heralded to the country and to the world.

A few weeks before that I introduced a plan in the Senate which, if enacted into law, would turn farm waste into farm profits, put billions of dollars into the pockets of the farmer, create a new industry in this country, furnish employment to thousands of people, put millions of dollars into the very hands of the newspapers, make not only newsprint paper but synthetic lumber, insulating board, wallboard, substitute for cork, an excellent substitute for paneling wood now used in airplanes, also many by-products which are revolutionizing chemistry, such as substitute for casein, glue, dyes, oils and sorghum, varnish, perfumes, face powder, and hard plastics which can be used instead of hard rubber. There is also an excellent food for cattle produced as a by-product.

Whether that was news or not I do not know, but I do know that it was not considered interesting enough to allow the public to understand it. The smaller papers of the country did give the news as best they could, but the larger papers did not. That is not true of my State, as an unusual number gave it ample notice up there.

Following the introduction of this farm waste bill, S. 4834, phones rang, inquiries were made by letter, visitors made appointments, as I afterwards learned, not to bring information but to get it. Some of the callers had a Canadian or English accent. I thought it peculiar, in view of such evident interest, that the larger newspapers did not think it worthy of mention. I could not figure out why a plan that meant billions to the farmer and millions to the newspapers would not be news. I thought I was helping the big metropolitan press as well as the little dailies and weeklies, for surely they would want to get their print paper at a reasonable figure and uncontrolled by foreign interest.

An assured market for newsprint paper from farm waste would help, so I introduced Resolution 183, to print the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD on farm-waste newsprint. If all Government printing were done on this paper it would give a market of millions of dollars. Again great interest was shown by those who seemed to know all about it, but no attention was given it so far as the big press is concerned. Where the smaller press did find out about it, it seemed to be of great and vital interest to them.

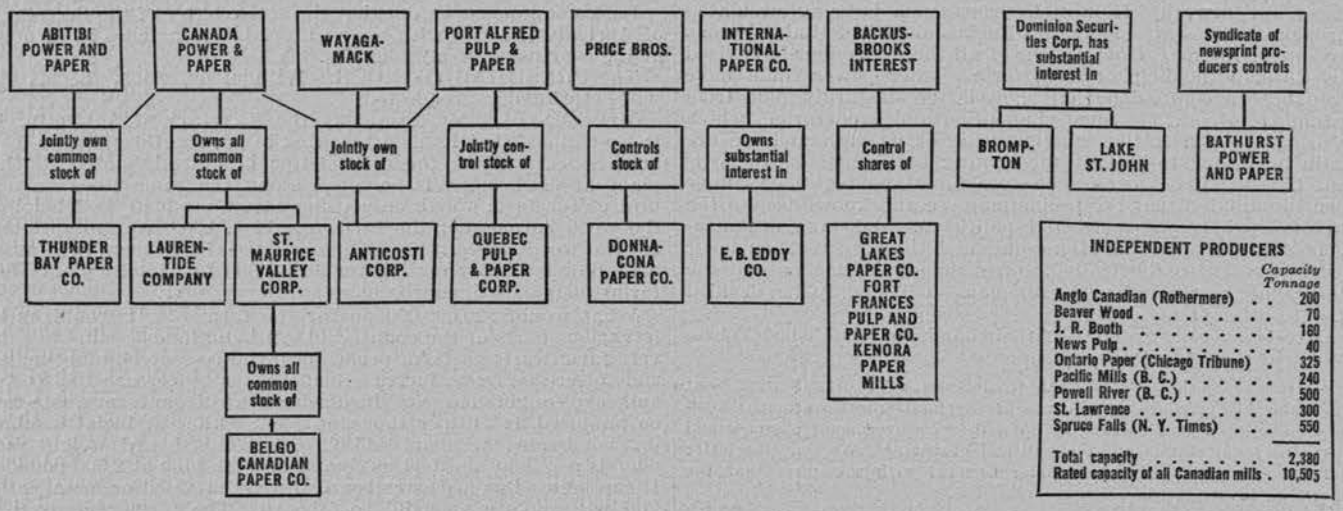
There was considerable talk in the press, with quotations from Canadian newspapers, about officials of newsprint manufactures getting together for the purpose of fixing a price on newsprint.

The American Press, a newspaper trade journal, official organ of about 8,000 smaller dailies and weeklies, was very much exercised over the newsprint situation. It loyally continues to fight the battles of the small daily and weekly press for the right of their subscribers to live and is striving to break the strangling hold of the foreign newsprint monopoly from the throat of its subscribers. For these smaller papers the indisputable testimony shows, have been paying $95 to $180 per ton for their paper and can see clearly the situation of a few years ago returning, when they were forced to pay as high as $260 per ton for their paper. They rightfully demanded that Congress do something to head off this price-fixing monopoly menace. I ask unanimous consent that the Committee on Printing be authorized to approve the printing of a chart published by this press showing how leading foreign and American newsprint producers interlock.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. SCHALL. Mr. President, the chart on the following page shows graphically the extent to which the Canadian newsprint industry is controlled by a few companies.

Last Saturday in Canada the newspaper manufacturers, foreign and domestic, came to an agreement and signed upon the dotted line forming the biggest newsprint paper trust the world has ever seen. I hope my Resolution 337, which we passed last Wednesday, referring to the Federal Trade Commission the investigation of this huge newsprint price-fixing combine, will have the desired effect in thwarting the ruthlessness of their methods of a few years ago, when they ran paper up to $260 a ton and would have kept on raising it higher if it had not been for the order issued by the Federal Trade Commission. I therefore am in hopes that my Resolution 337 will save the little dailies and weeklies from being forced to quit or sell their American independence.



Editor and Publisher, official organ for the larger press, was also extremely excited. It published articles telling how the Premiers of Quebec and Ontario were the offical agents of the Canadian manufacturers of newsprint and were in New York representing them. It struck me peculiar at the time that the Canadian Government officials should be taking such a leading hand.

Editor and Publisher asserted that foreign newsprint manufacturers were in the market for the purchasing of the stock of United States newspapers, financing publishers who need capital in return for 15-year paper contracts. And they said a publisher of a group of newspapers who has been approached by two of the manufacturers this week told Editor and Publisher about the offers being made, and they declared they knew of instances where foreign "newsprint money" had been accepted.

It was explained that these foreign paper manufacturers were prepared to offer much cheaper money than our own bankers, as their purchase of stock involved none of the brokerage expenses and the deal would afford the foreign manufacturers the advantage of an assured market for their product for a definite number of years.

And they asserted that a $16,000,000 corporation had been backed by foreign newsprint manufacturers to assure itself an outlet for its print, and the corporation so backed had already acquired 3 American dailies and wanted 40 or 50 more. They asserted that papers were not being bought outright but that 51 per cent of the stock was being acquired. Other newspapers carried articles concerning this $16,000,000 and declared that $100,000,000 was in the offing for a like purchase of the majority of the stock of well-established American newspapers.

CHART SHOWS HOW MANY OF LEADING NEWSPRINT PRODUCERS INTERLOCK

In a later article in Editor and Publisher, February 2, they quoted a Canadian manufacturer as saying, "After all it is the newspapers that seat and unseat governments." This thought expressed by this unnamed Canadian is very much in my mind. It seems to me to demand the attention of the men intrusted with our Nation's destiny.

At the close of the war the British Government-owned Dutch Shell Oil and their subsidiary interests succeeded in getting a Secretary of the Interior that sought to turn over to them the very reserve oil supply of our Navy. No wonder foreign propagandists teach that we need no Navy, deluge us with duplicate telegrams and letters urging us to vote for no cruisers, among the signatures of one of which I was astonished to find the name of the governor of my own State. The sure way to the control of that navy or our merchant marine and the protection of our great foreign commerce, which is the lifeblood of our Nation, is the control of the raw products that furnish its motive power.

I introduced Resolution 292, to investigate the foreign and American newsprint price-fixing monopoly to find out just why foreign manufacturers were so vitally interested in preventing the use of our own farm waste with which to make our own newsprint paper.

On the 7th of January I addressed the Senate on my bills to turn farm waste to farm profit. On the 8th of January I addressed the Senate in reference to my Resolution 292. On both of these occasions I introduced into the RECORD various editorials, magazine articles, newspaper clippings along the lines of my argument. In my innocence I had thought that the entire American press would certainly be with me, but I found I had a great many things to learn and I am still going to school.

One of the many visitors interested in this movement claimed he was a representative of the Cornstalk Products Co., of Danville, Ill. I expected to be commended for my work and was not a little surprised to hear him assuring me I had greatly erred; that I had been misled in my information. If I would only stop right here, all might yet be well, but if I should continue the idea dire consequences would happen. I was taken to the heights and assured that if I would but imitate the silence about me all would be well, then a glimpse of the depths.

I could not get it through my head how furnishing a market to the farmers for their waste product could be construed under any light as the wrong procedure. He assured me that this would be all right later but at the present time it was premature. In view of the distressed condition of agriculture, I could not understand this either.

He opined that of all men in Congress I should have a goodly understanding of incurring the displeasure of large business interests. His purring assurance and keen cold-edged presumption as he related what was going to happen to me and my bills if I did not quit, reminded me very much of that same assumption of authority expressed by Mr. Backus when he was called as a witness by me in Minnesota's State Senate hearings, wherein he testified that he thought I was extremely unfair and unwise in my attitude on the floor of the House in reference to him and his back taxes, that before making the statements I did I should have sent for him and said, "I want to talk to you about this." Wherever you turn, whatever you try to accomplish in the interests of the ordinary folk you get up against the same group of men, few in number but whose power is world embracing. I recalled the big Minnesota political boss, timber and newsprint baron, whom I had been instrumental while in the House in getting to pay up his back income taxes to the tune of $3,218,000 and whose power projects on the northern Minnesota boundary waters I had blocked.

I thought of the past four years of castigation, defamation, and tribulation. How this power had brought an action before a Hennepin County court to nullify my Republican nomination for the Senate.

How, when it had been dismissed, and despite newspapers, organizations, clubs, and money galore, the people had elected me in opposition to the machinery of not only the Democratic and Farmer Labor Parties but against the dominating faction of the Republican Party of my State, immediately this same power, from campaign lies and deliberate falsehood started an action in the Senate of the United States to unseat me.

How, after the Senate had unanimously dismissed this proceeding, with the aid of his governor and lieutenant governor and his partner, the Republican national committeeman and a member of the Minnesota State Senate, a resolution was put through that senate to try me by a carefully selected and well-packed committee, on charges that had already twice by proper authorities been declared without the slightest foundation.

How Providence had intervened in that despicable plot to destroy a man whose only crime was that he had kept the oath of the great office the people had elected him to and refused to keep quiet when he heard the soft footpads of the great timber wolf stealthily approaching our country's treasury.

How the principal, bought witness in that trial had, by the hand of Providence, been brought to the vision of death, called in the priest, took the last sacrament, and made his deathbed confession that he and his coconspirator, A. N. Jacobs, were to have received $30,000 for their perjured testimony against me.

How this evidence was indisputable and cut away the ground completely beneath the feet of the official tools.

How truth had again, this time by the State senate, forced another unanimous verdict.

How four years of gruelling grind where the fire of watchfulness could not be allowed to die, four years of detectives and snoopers and rifling thieves, where my home in Minneapolis had been sacked from garret to cellar, my office rifled, my mail intercepted and copies taken, in the hope of framing me, every moment under some hireling's eye brought on nervous strain and resultant ill health and me unable to protect myself even as a seeing person could have done.

How these four nightmare years turned gray the hair of my wife, my pal, my eyes, my inspiration, who has the last 15 years fought side by side with me and shared my victories and my tribulations.

How now after all this, the Backus-paid newspapers, headed by Rudy Lee, of the Long Prairie Leader, and Mabe Moreaux, of the Luverne Herald, and the rest of the subservient scribes are cunningly declaring that they want a full-time Senator and that I am through. How their propaganda is being circulated throughout the State to-day that Backus and other timber barons are supporting me. How yet out of all these ingeniously devised lies through the help of God, for no other power could have wrought the confession that showed the dastardly plot from beginning to end, has come vindication and exoneration, which is bringing with it the reinvigoration of us both and we are again beginning to feel fit for another battle and our hope is that it will not be so hard because facts and personages have been illuminated that the people may see and know, despite the craft of paid newspapers and politicians and fake organizations, "who's who" in Minnesota, and that my real opponent for my return to the United States Senate is Backus and the powers he represents whatever name will finally be decided upon to attempt my defeat.

Here is a recent example of their handiwork published February 21 in the Long Prairie Leader:

> We received a letter this week from Senator THOMAS SCHALL sent out under his privilege of free use of the mails for Government business. The letter had nothing to do with the Government business and was a personal statement of a political character. We sent the letter and the envelope to the Postmaster General with a request that the matter be investigated.

It was not a letter but a statement, and on its face would have shown that it was the essence of public business. To have printed it in connection with his editorial statement would have branded his statement as a falsehood.

The statement is as follows, and is a matter of the highest privilege. Not only that, but the "public business" is the very fight that I have been making in behalf of the very class of papers such as the Long Prairie Leader which nevertheless makes this jaundiced attack on me. What kind of a perverted mind it is that even though I am its author in order to insult me would injure the legislation which if they are honest they should want, and which is of benefit to their brother editors? Why stamp my motives with their little narrow prejudices and lack of understanding, if it be ignorance and not deliberate intent?

STATEMENT BY SENATOR THOMAS D. SCHALL, OF MINNESOTA

> The effort to intimidate me made by those persons owning a cornstalk pulp plant at Danville, Ill., culminated to-day in the statements made on the floor of the House by Congressman HOLADAY, of that city.
> Insinuations of benefit that would come to me if I would desert the cause of farm aid and join with the newsprint combination, which is now milching the small publishers of the country and preventing the farmer from selling his waste crop for paper making, were made to me several weeks ago, and the threat was then made that if I did not succumb this matter would be taken to the floor of the House. I saw at that time that they were desperate, and undoubtedly this comes as a result of the plight they find themselves in in their effort to stop the farmer from the prosperity which belongs to him and which is now just around the corner.
> I do not intend to be bluffed or browbeaten by this combination, and as the Senate Agricultural Committee voted its confidence in me to-day by reporting out my resolution to investigate the newsprint-paper combination, I think it will be very appropriate to place this Member of Congress on the stand who knows so much about it, as well as the members of the corporation located at Danville, Ill., and thus give the country an opportunity to see what they will have to say under oath upon these questions instead of merely flinging on the floor of the House the propaganda of the Newsprint Trust.

Rudy Lee, of the Long Prairie Leader, has, like every other newspaper, the franking privilege. His paper is sent entirely free through the United States mails throughout the county in which it is published. Yet, he would deny to honest public officials seeking to get the truth to the people the privilege which he does not hesitate to use to broadcast lies and slander. This pusillanimous hypocrite is ambitious to be governor of our State. As if a dishonest heart, lack of character, ideals, and justice, without principles, a toadyism and an obedient compliance to the big political bosses' wishes are the qualifications needed. And if he is looking to our present governor for an inspiring example of these qualifications he must not forget that Teddy has that specious craft which gives a kind of plausibility which Rudy can never hope to attain.

My visitor insisted that I would find that neither the Department of Agriculture nor the Bureau of Standards was back of my proposition. That if I would take the phone even now and call up I would find that his surmise was true. I should think the matter over thoroughly, and that he would see me again. Upon his leaving the office, Doctor Woods came in with a letter from the Secretary of Agriculture. This seemed immediate corroboration.

I ask unanimous consent that the entire letter of the Secretary of Agriculture along with some editorials and articles be printed at the conclusion of my remarks.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the matter will be printed, as requested.

Mr. SCHALL. Mr. President, the Secretary of Agriculture's letter claimed that I was attempting to put the Government into business, though in the same letter he warmly defended the plant at Madison, Wis., created along the same lines as my project for farm waste only using forest products and helping the wood barons, not the farmers. If $20,000,000 appropriated for the wood interests is not putting the Government into business, how is it that my bill for $6,500,000 for similar plants for farm waste experiment becomes so?

What would $20,000,000 do for the farmer? It would build in various parts of the country 40 synthetic lumber mills to convert farm waste to farm profit, drop the cost of building materials, decrease rents, increase home owners, decrease fuel costs, and save freight charges. Insulating board from farm waste can be produced at $10 per thousand feet. Other artificial insulating wholesales at about $45 f. o. b. This board weighs 500 pounds per thousand feet as compared with pine at 2,500 pounds. It can be used as a plaster board instead of wood or metal lath, and will make a splendid roof board. The farmer needs this insulating board for his new and his old buildings, warmer in winter, cooler in summer. The using of a building material to replace natural wood would conserve our remaining forest supply, whose loss is now a national calamity. It is poor economy to destroy and then tax the people millions of dollars to control the floods. Clear the forests off the land and the great rivers will climb their banks, for the trees withdraw the water and send it into the air, the spongy material at the roots soak up the water and holds it back, thus allowing nature to gently and naturally regulate and keep constant the supply of needed rainfall.

I introduced Resolution 200 because the Secretary of Agriculture, running true to the prediction of the cornstalks products gentleman, writes me reference my statements urging enactment of S. 4834 and Joint Resolution 183 that "We have not found it necessary so far for the Department of Agriculture to actually go into the business of manufacturing in order to demonstrate the practicability of our findings." Joint Resolution 200 finds a very successful precedent in freeing ourselves from foreign monopoly in a similar enactment of Congress giving a bonus to sugar-cane growing in this country. My Resolution 200 would have the Government pay a bonus of 1 cent per pound for newsprint paper manufactured from farm wastes such as corn and cotton stalks, sugar cane, straw of all kinds for the next five years after enactment.

I want, if possible, to get the Secretary of Agriculture interested in the farmer, and I am therefore in this bill clearing the way that the farmer may have the support of the Department of Agriculture. I am vitally interested in making solvent the bankruptcy of the farmer and am praying and hoping that the Department of Agriculture will see its way clear to divide its zealous attention of finding a wood substitute for spruce and hemlock pulp with farm waste in the manufacture of newsprint paper.

The Secretary of Agriculture's letter says:

> It is the department's duty to show every possible means of utilizing the waste products of woodland and to properly utilize forest products.

Our laboratories have done everything possible to develop this field of work.

This statement is more than true. I find no fault with it. The department has done and will do everything within their power to find that substitute. The zeal and efficiency of the Department of Agriculture in its efforts to find a solution of the white-paper problem is commendable. For what it has done for wood this department deserves the highest approbation. But the farm problem is at our door and must be solved, and the Department of Agriculture, I should think, is somewhat charged with that solution.

At a cost of some three millions of dollars the Department of Agriculture has erected a paper-manufacturing plant at Madison, Wis. This plant has just been endowed by this Congress, at the Agricultural Department's request, with $1,600,000 yearly for 10 years, or a total of $16,000,000, making the wood-pulp manufacturing project cost the Government just a trifle under $20,000,000, and I call your attention in comparison with this $20,000,000 manufacturing investment to the modest request of the Agricultural Department for $8,000 for investigation in the economic utilization of corncobs and stalks, quoted in the 1929 hearings on the Agricultural appropriation bill, page 918. This $20,000,000 manufacturing organization is confined to experiments in making paper from woods only.

For 10 years past and for 10 years more this $20,000,000 manufacturing organization was and will be burning midnight oil in a single effort to find some method of using woods other than spruce or hemlock in the manufacture of white paper. Twenty million dollars and 20 years to find something that is not lost, while the raw material they are seeking to find at such an immense cost is standing ready at hand in sugar cane, corn and cotton stalks, and straw of all kinds, and is going to waste, while forests are depleted and need a respite.

The Secretary of Agriculture in his letter calls my attention to the fact that 19 years ago the Department of Agriculture discovered the substitute for wood pulp in cornstalks and straw among other wastes. He further states:

One of the large paper-manufacturing plants made rather extended tests, but at the time it was proved that cornstalks could not successfully compete commercially with wood pulp, for instance.

But that was 19 years ago, and vast quantities of spruce and hemlock wood pulp have gone over the dam since then, leaving us denuded of the raw material with which to make white print paper. Why not use the raw material of corn and cotton stalks, sugar cane, straw of all kinds, of which we have an abundance that is now going to waste, and turn it into profit for the beleaguered farmer instead of baiting him and calling him a whiner and trying to blame his misery on lack of diversification and bull-headed employment of antiquated methods? I want a Department of Agriculture that is for the farmer. Why should the bureau of markets continue its policy of issuing glowing crop reports far in advance of the ripening of the crop, when anyone knows that the only result of such practice is an immediate drop in price, regardless of what finally matures of his harvest? As it is, he is compelled to fight the hazards of wind, storm, hail, frost, unseasonable weather conditions, drought, insect pests. Why add the Department of Agriculture to his staggering handicap? Labor and capital are organized and equipped to fight, and they both get results, for their potential strength is well known, and legislation in their behalf has been comparatively easily secured. Why neglect a third of our population because they are unorganized and then expect prosperity? The raw material the farmer has to sell would help to stem his bankruptcy. Use this wealth of now wasted raw material instead of annually turning its value over to foreign newsprint monopoly.

There are numerous crop materials now going to waste that deserve utilization for the making of paper. Hitherto the price of wood has been so low that they could not enter into competition with it. This condition appears to be changing, and a point may soon be reached where crop by-products can be made into pulp and paper at a profit to both the farmer and the manufacturer. * * *

It seems very probably that raw products now scarcely considered may in a few years play an important part in the paper and pulp industry.

Those few years have passed. The question of doing something to help the farmer is so absorbing, so vital that our President elect is calling an extra session of Congress to deal with that problem. If the farm waste can be utilized it will go far to solve that burning question, and it seems to me and numbers of Senators with whom I have talked that it is worth trying, and it would be inspiring if we could have a Secretary of Agriculture to hoist his standard in behalf of the farmer and lead the procession instead of standing doubtfully by and wondering if, where the farmer is concerned, it would be advisable to put the Government in the manufacturing business, although he approves of the wood barons' $16,000,000 manufacturing project of the Government in developing forest products which has been appropriated by this Congress.

Therefore I am in hopes that my Joint Resolution 200 will remove this impediment for him and leave them and others protesting they do not want to put the Government into business free to get back of the idea of utilizing our own farm raw material, judging from his letter to me, wherein he says:

We have never permitted the development of one phase of the work in a manner antagonistic to any other phase. It is our duty to promote the wise utilization of forest lands and forest products as well as agricultural lands and agricultural products, and we have done both to the fullest extent of our ability under the authority and funds granted by Congress.

We have no criticism of the work done in behalf of forest products, but we do wish to point out the unfavorable proportions of a $20,000,000 request for appropriation in behalf of forest products in comparison to the paltry little appropriation of $8,000 requested in behalf of developing our farm raw material and thereby equalizing the help to the farmer that has been given the wood baron.

Is the Department of Agriculture warden of the forests only? Is it not concerned with all horticulture? Is its function that of developing the industry of the forest primeval and only writing books or talking in committees about what could be done with our waste field crops? Is not Maeterlinck's bluebird of promise in our own raw material to be had from corn and cotton stalks, sugar cane, straw of all kinds, right here on our own doorstep?

The Secretary of Agriculture in this same letter writes me that he did not oppose the $50,000 appropriation for the Bureau of Standards to make these tests of the economic practicability of utilizing cornstalks and other waste products of the land for the manufacture of paper, building boards, insulating material, and so forth. Yet from the same paragraph I quote him:

When the work was first brought up it was our belief that any work of that kind should be done by existing agencies established by Congress for that purpose rather than starting work in some other bureau, which might lead to duplication.

That was the very thought I expressed, and that was the thought promulgated by the Department of Agriculture that prompted the Director of the Budget to delete it. President Coolidge, at the request of Secretary Hoover, put it back, and as a result of this little $50,000 appropriation we have definite proof of the commercial practicality of the billion dollars' worth of raw material annually raised by the farmers that can and should be invested in the protection and prosperity of our farmers and our country.

If the propaganda being spread at this time by the Agricultural Department and the newsprint Paper Trust and the English Danville Cornstalk Products Co. to the effect that waste field-crop pulp can not be made to profitably compete with wood pulp is true, there can be no harm in passing Joint Resolution 200, because this resolution gives a bonus of 1 cent a pound for paper made from waste products, such as corn and cotton stalks, sugar cane, straw of all kinds, when it is sold at a price not to exceed $50 per ton and contains at least 65 per cent farm waste. If the agricultural and foreign newsprint Paper Trust propaganda is true, then no collection can be made from the Government under my bill. If it is not true, private industry will demonstrate that paper can be made from waste field crops as cheap as wood pulp and an industry which shall be second to none in this country will have been established and we shall have been freed from the domination of foreign countries, who now control our paper supply.

The farmer will be benefited by about a billion dollar annual income and employment furnished thousands and thousands and a new American industry set upon its feet. Surely the Department of Agriculture can now have no objection to supporting my Joint Resolution 200, and we shall confidently look for its powerful influence in the forefront of this fight for turning farm waste into farm profit.

My suave Cornstalks Products Co. representative visitor returned and wanted to know what I had decided. I informed him that I inteded to do all I could to help the farmer through utilization of his farm waste. He again assured me that I would get nowhere with it and that as for the Editor and Publisher articles in reference to my Resolution 292 for investigation of the Newsprint Trust, the editors would not substantiate upon oath what they had said in their magazine. Later when the hearing on 292 came up I found that he had predicted with entire truth. My prophet further told me that any speeches I might make on the subject would get scant press notice, which I had by this time begun to realize was also the truth. He went on to tell me that such contrary information would be given through the press as would be necessary to counteract anything I might do. Page articles in Sunday supplements have since appeared to verify his predictions.

He asked me if I did not know that the greater press of the country was intertwined with the newsprint-manufacturing business. This I also later discovered to be perfectly true when I found Elisha Hanson, a lawyer, appearing before the Agricultural Committee on the 30th of January in behalf of the American Publishers Association and later appearing before the Committee on Audit and Control as attorney for the Canadian International Paper & Power Co., on the same subject. The International Paper & Power Co., through its bankers, state that—

The International Paper & Power Co., with its subsidiaries, has expanded in such a manner that it is now dominant in the pulp and paper industry with a daily capacity of more than double that of its nearest competitor.

My prophet further said that if I did not desist in trying to get out my Resolution 292 that there would be an attack made on the floor of the House. I continued to urge the members of the Agricultural Committee that they report out my resolution, and on the 21st of January made a speech in the Senate to that end and included in that speech several editorials and articles showing that the smaller dailies and weeklies of the country were insistent upon having the Senate do something to help them in their dilemma and that they feared utter extinction if this foreign combination trust were allowed to work out its contemplated plans. On the 30th of January I appeared before the Agricultural Committee, urged the reporting out of my resolution, and left with them much documentary evidence showing that the smaller dailies and weeklies unprotected by long-time contracts, would have to supply the reparations and furnish the prosperity that the bankers of the International Paper & Power Co. promise in their prospectus, to wit:

It may again be pointed out that the International Paper & Power Co. has not yet begun to reap the benefits of its widespread expansion and diversification. In the meantime the period of overproduction through which the paper industry is at present passing has delayed a realization of the returns which had been hoped for. As described before, however, this situation is temporary in nature and ultimately the tremendous values of the company's paper, pulp, and power properties will produce constantly increasing revenue. The position now held by the company is unique in corporate history. Not only is it the greatest paper company in the world, but it is now also one of the largest public-utility enterprises on this continent.

The above quotation from the International Paper & Power Co. shows conclusively what the Paper Trust intend to do to the smaller dailies and weeklies, and it was no doubt with this understanding the Agricultural Committee reported favorably my Resolution 292.

On the same day as the above resolution was favorably reported, an article was read into the House RECORD by the Congressman from Danville, Ill. Editor and Publisher, which is the official organ of the American Newspaper Publishers' Association, had this article in print at least two days before it was read on the floor of the House. Their headlines declared SCHALL Misleads Public—Would Hamstring Private Industry.

I want to be as courteous to the Danville Representative as he was to me, and, therefore, in his own words I shall say: "I am convinced the Danville Representative accepted this article in good faith," and read it into the RECORD without knowing whom he was representing and without knowing the ramifications of this interlocking and interwoven creature that seeks to use him and the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD to aid their monopolistic control and as an advertising medium for their stock-selling racket. It was natural that Danville's Representative should come to the aid of the Danville Cornstalk Products Co.

The article speaks of an American company and American capital. The Cornstalk Products Co. is the subsidiary of a European holding company, a close corporation, known as the Euroamerican Cellulose Products Co., with their American offices at 42 Broadway, New York City. This company holds the Bela Dorner Hungarian patents for England, Mexico, all Central America and all South America, the United States, and all the rest of Great Britain's colonies and possessions. J. C. VanEck, president of the Shell Union, the Royal Dutch holding company for America, a company owned by the British Government, is a director of the Cornstalk Products Co., of Danville, Ill. Lewis L. Clarke, chairman of the executive committee of the American Exchange of the Irving Trust Co., another English concern, is another director of the Danville Cornstalk Products Co., and this bank is the depository for the Dutch Shell Oil Co. funds in the United States. W. Jule Day, New York lawyer, is president of the Cornstalk Products Co., is also president of the Euroamerican Cellulose Products Co., and a man named W. Jule Day—I have not been able to yet verify, but I think he is undoubtedly the same man—is attorney for the Dutch Shell Oil Co., in which the British Government itself is interested, and which company has the oil of the world cornered, and the Shell Oil Co., in connection with other companies whose management is in harmony with the Shell Oil Co., has 85 to 90 per cent of our own oil in their control. This is the British Oil Co., with which Doheny is connected and for which he undoubtedly acted in his connection with Secretary Fall.

The nation that controls the oil of the world will control the seas, and I am again reminded of the Canadian newsprint manufacturer who said, "After all, it is the newspapers that seat and unseat governments."

If the raw material of corn and cotton stalks, straw of all kinds, sugar-cane, and so forth, of which we have an abundance in this country, is to take the place of our depleted wood pulp, can be cornered for the Canadian or English Governments through patents in the uses of farm waste with which to make newsprint paper, our newspaper industry will continue to be in the hands and under the control, as it is in a great part to-day, of foreigners. So, Senators, the question at issue is of far greater importance than the price of cornstalks, which the article read by the Danville Representative would lead you into thinking was under discussion, and is of far greater importance than whether the newspaper man who was honestly trying to get the facts over to the people as best he could and whom this article sorely berated, is a member of the press gallery or, as the Danville Representative slurringly called him, a detective. I can not see what Mr. Coan or any other newspaper correspondent can have to do with the principle involved in this case, and anyone with a pinch of reasoning power, knowing the situation, knows that he has been dragged in here merely as a red herring across the trail. Is it possible that there are no honest, able newspaper men in the country and in Washington outside the National Press Club and the House and Senate press galleries?

These cornstalk-products people, through the very article the Representative read into the RECORD prove their foreign flavor by their little twisted suspicions that it is impossible for anyone to do anything unless he gets something in return. Is there no patriotism, no ideals, no altruism, and no conception that a man might do something for the distressed farmer, something for his country without there being something in it for him? It would be just as logical and just as fair to state that there are no honest men outside of the United States Senate and that anybody that was not a Member of Congress was undeserving of trust. So far as getting the news of this farm-waste project over to the people is concerned, this so-called detective seems to me to have been the better newspaper correspondent. Mr. Coan is criticized in this article for saying that the farmer will get $12 an acre for his cornstalks and sugar-cane pulp and $15 an acre for his straw. Doctor Sweeney, in charge of the Bureau of Standards laboratory at Ames Agricultural College, when he was here the 30th of January, testifying before the Agricultural Committee on my Resolution 292, told me that his cornstalks had cost him $10 to $14 a ton delivered, but that he was now getting some deliveries for $8 per ton.

The conservative average yield of cornstalks per acre, says Lionel K. Arnold, assistant chemical engineer, Iowa State College, is a ton and a half. This would corroborate that Mr. Coan did not overstate when he said that the farmer would receive $12 per acre for his cornstalks.

As to the so-called detective correspondent's value per acre on straw set at $15. I refer you to a work on rice written by Edwin Bingham Copeland, dean of the Agricultural College of the Philippines, page 329, in which he says that a certain Louisiana factory making corrugated fiber boxes from rice straw is paying the farmers $6.25 a ton for their straw. This would mean $18.75 an acre, or $3.75 more than Mr. Coan reported to his newspaper that the farmer should receive per acre for his straw.

My attention has been called to the English-Canadian Newsprint Trust propaganda that cornstalks make good fertilizer. This is not true. Experts in touch with advanced understanding of soil chemistry state that unless cornstalks are finely shredded and then allowed to decompose in the open air, they take more nitrogen out of the soil in the process than the fertility they furnish is worth. They estimate a ton of cornstalks is worth not more than 75 cents as fertilizer.

Patches of corn have been grown side by side as an experiment, the one fertilized by cornstalks plowed in without shredding or decomposing, the other where they have been removed and no fertilizer added. The corn on the patch without the cornstalks has been heavier and taller and healthier than the corn grown on the patch where cornstalks were turned under. This propaganda, of course, is being advanced to thwart the utilization of farm waste, but the fact remains that cornstalks are of great value for paper pulp as well as insulating board, and that a reasonable estimate of their value to the farmer is $12 an acre and up.

This Cornstalk Products Co. is not worried about the price of cornstalks, but the powers they represent are worried at the thought of losing the raw material supply with which to make newsprint paper, for through its loss they might lose what control they now have of our press.

Doctor Sweeney is in charge of the Bureau of Standards' practical demonstration of making newsprint paper from cornstalks and straw, and so forth, at Ames, Iowa, and undoubtedly knows more about its commercial problems than anyone else in this country, yet this article read by the Danville representative would have you believe that Doctor Sweeney does not know anything about it.

Doctor Sweeney testified that he had made, and exhibited the paper to the committee, paper of an excellent quality from 72 per cent cornstalks and the balance outside of the clay, wood pulp. That he could produce even with his miniature paper-making machine, as he called it by rule of thumb, a ton of paper with 72 per cent cornstalks for $49. Doctor Sweeney also testified that straw could be used to blend with the cornstalk pulp so that wood pulp would not be needed. The Cornstalk Products Co. now making newsprint paper are charging $160 per ton. The newsprint paper they originally got out for the Danville Commercial News, which was they claimed 65 per cent cornstalks and which I held in my hand before you when I spoke on the 7th of January, was an excellent newsprint paper. Since that speech, and in order to baffle public understanding, they have been furnishing a quality of paper that is not opaque to the different newspapers who wanted to publish on this new medium and at the same time sending along articles to publish therein that it is not feasible to do this thing they are doing, and that competition with wood pulp is not practical. I asked Doctor Sweeney about this lack of opaqueness and he said they were simply failing to put in enough clay. These people are attempting to keep from the public the knowledge that newsprint paper can be made as cheaply with proper machinery from farm waste as it can from wood pulp until they can manipulate patent rights cleverly intertwined with their Hungarian patents and build up a semblance of legal right to prohibit anyone except themselves from entering upon this field of production. The Hungarian patent which they now hold, I am informed, is far from perfect and inferior to the process developed by the Agricultural Department, along the lines of the Shirdell patent, which was taken out 75 years ago and whose rights are now lapsed, and therefore open to the use of anyone together with the improvements the Agricultural Department's investigations have added.

Doctor Sweeney further testified in the hearings before the Agricultural Committee that Richard K. Meade & Co., of Dayton, Ohio, are developing a process of making high-grade paper from straw, and he told me after the hearing that he expected the Meade Co. would turn their factory entirely over to making paper from straw and cornstalks.

Tom Campbell, the greatest wheat farmer in the world, has just returned from Germany and has brought with him a German machine with which to make binder twine from flax straw and is installing this machinery on his farm in Montana, thus pointing the way to remove from our farmers another foreign leech, the Sisal Trust, which robs our farmers annually of millions of dollars.

Up to 30 years ago the United States produced all the bagging used in this country, mostly from flax straw, as well as exporting some to other countries. Through the influence of foreign agents the duty was taken off jute bagging, which is manufactured by the British interests in India with coolie labor at 10 cents a day salary. It was impossible for the American manufacturers of this commodity to compete with this coolie labor after the duty was removed and the result is that to-day we import $150,000,000 worth of jute bagging and flax seed, the production of which rightfully belongs to the farmers of this country.

The Government developed a process for making furfural from oat hulls. The Quaker Oats Co., at Cedar Rapids, Iowa, took the process and are making furfural which adds millions to the profits of the Quaker Oats people, but the farmer does not get a cent more for his oats.

A man named Jackson, in the Bureau of Standards, worked out a process to make sugar out of corn. He left the Government before the process was perfected and went with the Corn Products Co. Jackson and the Volstead law, together with the fine grade of corn sugar they are making, add millions to their profits but have not benefited the corn producer.

These processes must be developed and perfected by the Government, otherwise some monopoly will control it, and the farmer will get no benefit.

Doctor Sweeney's method of making insulation has been adopted by a manufacturer of ice boxes and they are already building a factory for that purpose.

The Cornstalk Products Co. have been constantly absorbing and freely given anything that Doctor Sweeney knows about the process. In fact they have been doing their level best to hire Doctor Sweeney.

Doctor Arnold says that the annual yield of cornstalks in this country is 150,000,000 tons. The Cornstalk Products Co. claim they are using this year the yield of 20,000 acres of cornstalks. That would be 30,000 tons at a ton and a half per acre. It does not seem to me that with an annual yield in the United States of 150,000,000 tons the Danville people will be pushed to the wall if some outlet for the remaining millions of tons is considered. As to the price paid the farmer it seems to me at this time to be immaterial, one price is paid to-day, another to-morrow, just as in any other raw material. If it is not $12, I am sure the farmer would be glad to get $11.25 per acre, which would be the price on their own figuring of $7.50 per ton for cornstalks.

The hamstringing of private industry referred to means a kink in their plans for the Euro-American holding company to retain the majority of the stock of its subsidiary companies and sell the minority to gullible Americans, thus using American capital to load foreign control onto American backs. They are perfectly willing to have us use cornstalks and sugar-cane and straw of all kinds to make synthetic lumber and cork, and so forth, all of which would give benefit to the farmer. But when you come to newsprint paper then you get on the English toe. And immediately the whole interweaving communication of underground wires is set jangling—the bells of alarm begin to sound, here, there, and at far distances.

The suppression of Coan's articles is a hint of what they will do when they control newsprint. Philip Schuyler, who wrote the articles for Editor and Publisher referred to in my Resolution 292, I am told, has been separated from his job.

It is no little struggling concern that can make men in or out of the Government talk or keep still as the indicator is adjusted. No struggling infant industry that after full steam ahead with fine product ready to sell can reverse, slow up, back down. In their own propaganda they put forth more enthusiastic rapturous and glowing statements than those they attack, yet in the statement of the Representative from Danville they try to give the impression that development of rice straw is new to the Department of Agriculture, that potato alcohol is a dream; paper from corn waste a highly impractical and unprofitable venture. Blow hot, blow cold. On the one hand, the process is a failure; on the other hand, they do not need or want any suggestion for improvement that trained scientists can give to make it other than the imperfect thing they claim.

In truth, all they want is to be let alone while they secure a monopoly. Of course, private enterprise would enter, if they do not manage to conceal the facts. They intend to gobble up all the improvements the Government chemists make, hire anyone who knows anything about it, keep a keen outlook on this farm waste, for through it we might be able to make newsprint and thus escape their Canadian-English control. They already look with jealous eyes on the whole field as if in reality they had a corner on it. All I wanted was to establish Government plants in various localities to demonstrate commercial practicality. Then when demonstrated, these plants to be taken over by private industry in open competition where the public could get the benefit of these scientific processes. Who better fitted to take them over than these people? If they were honest they would welcome just such aid, but they want a close corporation, the whole thing tied up in a bag and a string around it.

The English Government already control the rubber supply of the world. Through Dutch Shell Oil Co. they control the oil supply of the world, and through this poor little innocent struggling pioneer, the Cornstalk Products Co., they hope to hang to their control of newsprint paper in this country.

My bill contemplates no Government manufacturing competition. It is simply that I have asked for six commercial demonstrating plants. The Danville Representative seems to think that the one asked for by Congressman DICKINSON is all right because that is not for the purpose of demonstrating the commercial practicality but is only a further feeder of developing processes which may be gobbled up and intertangled with the so-called Hungarian patents as a legal wall to bar competition so that anyone setting up to make newsprint paper from cornstalks would find an interminable lawsuit at his door. He refers to this English company as a pioneering enterprise. It is a long way from a pioneering enterprise. There is no chance with its tremendous financial backing of throttling it as the Danville gentleman seems to suggest, and if all signs are to be understood the English Government is back of this little baby industry. Maybe that is the reason why the Premiers of Canada—Taschereau, of Quebec, and Ferguson, of Ontario—are so interested in keeping such a close watch upon the consumption of newsprint paper in the United States.

Why all this pressure about the farmer being given something for his farm waste? Why not give the little newspaper a chance to live, for they and the farmer are very closely connected. The little dailies and weeklies are to-day the ones that are keeping alive the old-time ideas of equality and patriotism, and have not yet succumbed to the idea that nationalism is a crime, and if they are removed—which they will be unless something is done to see that they are protected—God help us.

This same foreign power is always found meddling in the nominations of our Presidents, but in the last analysis the real control of our Government is the control of raw supplies of our basic industries. We boast of $14,000,000,000 worth of annual foreign commerce, and are able now to get only half the navy that our President recommends to protect that commerce. What sort of naval protection shall we have when the absolute and permanent control is assumed of our newsprint paper.

Next to the control of the newspapers the most vulnerable spot through which to disintegrate our Government is our convention system. The convention system by which we nominate our Presidents furnishes an excellent opportunity for designing foreign influence to wield a tremendous power in the shaping of our Government's policy, both domestic and foreign. These conventions meet on a strip of no-man's land, over which neither State nor Federal Government have any control. Delegates can do with their vote what they please, and there is no law to reach them. Delegates have been known to openly stand on the floor of the convention and state just how much they have received for their vote. Political bosses from many States practicing their profession as any other profession manipulate the delegates to these conventions for their clients. When such a convention produces a Secretary of the Interior who attempts to turn over to a foreign nation the very oil reserves of our Navy, it is legitimate for us lawmakers to begin to wonder if the safety of our country would not be better guarded through the nomination of our Presidents by the direct votes of our people. If a Secretary of the Interior can be secured, why not a Secretary of State, why not an Attorney General, why not a Secretary of Commerce, yea, why not a President himself? Absolute control of newsprint paper will mean the ultimate control of newspapers. Control of newspapers means the control of the thought of the country, and the control of the thought of the country brings us back to the thought expressed by the large Canadian manufacturer of newsprint when he said, "After all, it is the newspapers that seat and unseat governments."

DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE,
Washington, D. C., January 9, 1929.

Senator THOMAS D. SCHALL,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR SCHALL: I have read with a great deal of interest your statements in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD regarding the utilization of farm wastes. I regret to see that you have been misinformed in regard to some of the facts of the situation.

This department has been engaged, by authority of Congress, in working out methods of utilization of all kinds of farm wastes, including cornstalks, straw, waste fruits, vegetables, etc., for many years.

If you will look over the hearings before the Committee on Agriculture, you will find that every year this subject has received wide attention. Since the appropriation features have been taken over by the Committees on Appropriation, you will find in the hearings before the subcommittees constant reference to many aspects of this question.

What the department has already accomplished in the utilization of these wastes is saving the farmers and fruit growers millions of dollars annually, and still further work is in progress in various laboratories devoted to this purpose. We have not found it necessary so far for the Department of Agriculture to actually go into the business of manufacturing in order to demonstrate the practicability of our findings. We have usually found industry ready to take up these questions as soon as the facts indicate commercial practicability.

In the Yearbook for 1910, page 329, you will find an article by Charles J. Brand on the utilization of crop plants in paper making, in which cornstalks and straw, among other wastes, are discussed. This same material was presented and widely distributed in the form of bulletins. It was shown at that time that various useful products, including those mentioned in your statements, could be made out of cornstalks, and also quite a number which you did not mention. Efforts were made at that time to get some of the larger paper manufacturers to utilize stalks for paper production, and certain pages of Circular 82 of the Bureau of Plant Industry were published on paper made from cornstalks. It was shown that nearly all grades of paper could be made from cornstalks. One of the large paper-manufacturing plants made quite extended tests, but at the time it was proved that cornstalks could not successfully compete commercially with wood pulp, for instance.

It is also the department's duty to show every possible means of utilizing the waste products of woodland and to properly utilize forest products. Our laboratories have done everything possible to develop this field of work, as we have been required to do by congressional acts. However, we have never permitted the development of one phase of the work in a manner antagonistic to any other phase. It is our duty to promote the wise utilization of forest lands and forest products, as well as agricultural lands and agricultural products, and we have done both to the fullest extent of our ability under the authority and funds granted by Congress. We have been successful in both fields, as abundantly attested by those familiar with the facts.

This department did not oppose the special item of $50,000 appropriated to the Bureau of Standards for making commercial tests of the economic practicability of utilizing cornstalks and other waste products of the land for the manufacture of paper, building board, insulating material, etc., for it was evident from the work already referred to that these products could be manufactured. When the matter was first brought up it was our belief that any work of that kind should be done by already existing agencies established by Congress for that purpose, rather than starting work in some other bureau, which might lead to duplication. We discussed this aspect of the case with those interested in promoting the legislation, including the Bureau of Standards, several Members of Congress, and others. It was finally decided that the efforts of the Bureau of Standards should be devoted to a "survey of the possibilities of the industrial utilization of waste products from the land."

In accordance with my instructions, Doctor Woods, in charge of the scientific work of this department, has conferred frequently with the Bureau of Standards and with Professor Sweeney with a view to seeing that every possible help in the promotion of this work was furnished.

It seems unfortunate, therefore, that you should be misled into making statements based on incorrect information, which entirely misrepresents what has been done by this department and its attitude toward the work in general.

I hope you may take occasion to acquaint yourself with the facts and to see that this matter is corrected through the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

Yours very truly,

W. M. JARDINE, Secretary.

TURNING STALKS OF CORN INTO STACKS OF COIN—SOME OF THE ACTIVITIES OF SENATOR SCHALL, OF MINNESOTA, IN THE INTEREST OF AMERICAN MANUFACTURES

United States Senator THOMAS D. SCHALL, of Minnesota, is the author of several bills in Congress intended to encourage and to protect the manufacture of newsprint paper made from American raw materials.

Two hundred and seventy-five million dollars' worth of newspaper is imported annually from Canada and elsewhere that might as well be made here in the United States from our own raw materials now going recklessly to waste.

Senator SCHALL knows that just as good newsprint paper made from the waste products of American farms, such as corn and rice stalks, certain straws, hog palmettos, and the pulp of sugar cane after the sucrose has been extracted, as well as many other vegetable products with a large content of carbohydrate cellulose, from which paper can be manufactured.

Senator SCHALL, with the force of a thunderclap, spread consternation abroad when he recently exposed in the Senate the existence of a $16,000,000 fund by shameless and impudent foreign interests to establish a campaign of propaganda against this American economical enterprise of American manufacture of newsprint paper from the waste products of our farms—North, South, East, and West.

The Senator from Minnesota is entitled to the sincere gratitude of every American for his many activities in behalf of the farmers of the country and for his efforts to transmute into gold those products of their fields that have been heretofore a loss and a source of expense for their removal. By this process of conservation the sum total of our national wealth will be increased hundreds of millions of dollars each year.

We take great pleasure in presenting to our readers Senator SCHALL'S own modest summary of his legislative activities along those lines of conservation, which he has so kindly furnished to the editor of the Pennsylvania Manufacturers' Journal.

SENATOR'S SCHALL'S MEASURES IN CONGRESS

"Why should the United States import $275,000,000 worth of paper annually from foreign countries while waste field crops on American farms capable of producing this paper are allowed to rot? This question agitated me until I determined to introduce legislation which would remedy this evil.

"My first bill is to establish demonstrating plants, which plants are to be sold by the Government to private interests just as soon as their commercial practicability is shown.

"My second bill is to print the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD on paper manufactured from waste field crops. The Government purchases $2,500,000 worth of white paper annually; encourage manufacturers to make this paper by offering them this market.

"My third measure is a Senate resolution to investigate price fixing by foreign newsprint manufacturers who are offering low-term loans to newspapers who will make 15-year paper contracts, thus destroying a possible market for field-crop paper for that period of time.

"My fourth resolution is a joint measure asking that a bounty of 1 cent a pound be paid to any paper manufacturer using at least 60 per cent of field crops in his mixture and selling it to newspapers for $40 a ton.

"This is a 100 per cent American program and should appeal to every loyal citizen of this country."

SENATE COMMITTEE REPORT BACKS NEWSPRINT TRUST INVESTIGATION—SENATOR SCHALL TELLS WHY HE LEADS FIGHT FOR PUBLISHERS

Senator THOMAS D. SCHALL, of Minnesota, whose resolution to investigate the Newsprint Trust has been favorably reported on by the Senate Committee on Agriculture and Forestry and now goes to the Senate Audit Committee, told the American Press in an exclusive interview that he intends to stick to his guns until he gets action.

The resolution calls for the appointment of a committee of five Senators to "investigate the activities of groups of foreign and American citizens controlling the supply of white paper in the United States with a view to determining whether such activities would have the result of creating a monopoly in the supplying of paper" to newspaper publishers. The committee is to report to the Senate its findings, with recommendations.

Should the Senate committee uncover enough evidence to warrant, there is a possibility of action by the Department of Justice, similar, perhaps, to that resulting in the dissolution of the Newsprint Manufacturers' Association in 1917.

Many of the firms that were members of the Newsprint Manufacturers' Association have been taking leading parts in the attempts of the past few months to fix prices.

In the final decree in the case against the Newsprint Manufacturers' Association, United States District Judge Julius M. Mayer held that "The Newsprint Manufacturers' Association is an unlawful combination of the defendants in restraint of the trade and commerce in newsprint paper among the several States and with foreign nations, in violation of said act of July 2, 1890; and said Newsprint Manufacturers' Association shall be, and it hereby is, dissolved.

"Each corporate defendant is hereby perpetually enjoined from carrying into further effect the combination hereby dissolved and from entering into or engaging in any like combination having for purpose or effect (a) the elimination or restriction by concert of action of competition in newsprint paper, or (b) the concerted working for materially higher prices for newsprint paper, or (c) the establishment by concert of action of uniform prices, terms, or conditions for the sale of newsprint paper, or (d) the concerted working to discourage others from manufacturing newsprint paper."

Senator SCHALL, who is leading the fight in the Senate for the investigation, told the American Press he wants to see justice done to the smaller publishers as well as the larger, and explained his active interest in the newsprint situation.

"There is no doubt that a Newsprint Trust exists," said Senator SCHALL. "The manufacturers of newsprint from wood pulp have made no attempt to conceal the fact that they have been holding conferences for the past two months in the attempt to fix prices and limit production.

"The newsprint manufacturers doubtless believe they are protected by the Canadian frontier, but they became overbold when they stepped out of this protection to hold their conferences in New York.

"We are now entering upon the second month of 1929, but to-day newspaper publishers do not know what price they will have to pay for their newsprint this year. The Newsprint Trust has not yet announced the price. Isn't it plain enough that price fixing is going on?

"As to statements made by representatives of the larger daily newspapers that if the price arrived at is $55 a ton for 1929 they will raise no objection, all I have to say is that fixing a price of $55 a ton is just as illegal, to my way of looking at it, as fixing a price of $65 a ton. And the publishers of the larger dailies would kick strenuously if a price of $65 a ton were announced.

"Canadian newsprint manufacturers have not tried to conceal their intention to raise the price of newsprint in 1930 and again in 1931. If they can fix a price of $55, they can fix a price of $65 just as easily. Maintaining this fixed price is another matter. But if they can maintain $55 a ton for 1929, the chances for maintaining a price of $65 a ton in 1930 or 1931 will be much better.

"I am particularly interested in this fight because of my interest in farm aid and because I want to see justice done to the smaller newspapers of the country as well as the larger. I want to see that the weekly publishers, who are now paying around $95 a ton for newsprint made from wood pulp get cheaper newsprint and the farmer gets a chance to turn some of his waste products into cash.

"Scientists who have been experimenting for a considerable time in the endeavor to make newsprint from cornstalks, wheat, rice, and flax straw, cotton stems, sugar-cane pulp, and other farm waste products assure me that the project is entirely feasible. Dr. O. R. Sweeney, of the Iowa State College Experimental Station, has made newsprint said to be of excellent quality from cornstalks, and a number of newspapers have been printed on cornstalk paper. Doctor Sweeney says newsprint can be made just as well from other farm waste products.

"He testified before the Agricultural Committee, January 30, that he could make and was making an excellent newsprint paper from cornstalks for $49 a ton, and he exhibited to the committee an excellent quality of paper which had been made from cornstalks by his little, as he called it, thumb-to-hand equipment.

"The paper that he exhibited to the committee was 72 per cent cornstalks and 28 per cent wood pulp. He explained that he thought a blend could be made with straw and cornstalks so that you could get along without any wood pulp, but the paper he exhibited was 72 per cent cornstalks and 28 per cent wood pulp. If we could reduce the drain of our forest 72 per cent, it would be a mighty factor in giving us independence of the foreign Newsprint Trust.

"To-day I find that most of our newsprint supply comes from Canada."

"Now, what I want to do is to bring back to the United States the production of paper on which the newspapers of the United States are printed and at the same time to give the farmers of this country at least part of the money that has been going into the pockets of Canadian and other foreign manufacturers of newsprint from wood pulp.

"With that aim in mind, I introduced in the Senate my resolution. That is also why I have proposed that a bounty of a cent a pound be paid to manufacturers of newsprint from farm waste products. The bounty would be paid for a period of five years, and during this time the newsprint made from farm waste products would be sold to newspapers at a price not to exceed $50 a ton. At the end of five years the industry of manufacturing newsprint from farm waste products, I am assured by authorities, would be able to continue selling newsprint at $50 a ton or less.

"And I am going to keep in the fight until something is done about it. I have already been subjected to pressure to call off the fight, but I have served notice that it will not be called off until I get action that will help the newspapers and the farmers of this country."

INVESTIGATION OF NEWSPRINT INDUSTRY AUTHORIZED BY UNITED STATES SENATE—FEDERAL TRADE COMMISSION WILL PROCEED AT EARLIEST OPPORTUNITY—SCHALL EMPHASIZES HANSON'S APPEARANCES FOR AMERICAN NEWSPAPER PUBLISHERS' ASSOCIATION AND INTERNATIONAL PAPER

By George H. Manning, Washington correspondent, Editor and Publisher

WASHINGTON, D. C., February 28.—The Federal Trade Commission, at the direction of the Senate, will undertake at the earliest opportunity an investigation into practices of manufacturers and distributors of newsprint paper which are alleged to tend toward monopoly and to discriminate against publishers of small daily and weekly newspapers.

With but brief discussion and one minor amendment the Senate assured the investigation with the passage Wednesday of the resolution of Senator THOMAS D. SCHALL, of Minnesota, directing the commission to investigate the supposed combination which is said to have fixed prices and virtually controlled white-paper supply in this country.

The sole change in the Schall resolution as reported by the Senate Committee on Agriculture was that which requires the commission to make occasional reports as to the progress of the investigation, largely at its own convenience. This replaces the clause which requested reports every 30 days.

The bill was called up the day before its final passage, but was passed over at the request of Senator DAVID REED, of Pennsylvania, when Senator WESLEY JONES, of Washington, objected to the provision requiring monthly reports. The prospective debate on this proposal caused REED to ask that the bill be brought up the next day. This was done, and there was no objection from the floor to its passage.

The sole objections to Senator SCHALL'S resolution in its present form were voiced by Senator WESLEY L. JONES, of Washington, who thought that the provision as to a report by the Federal Trade Commission every 30 days was useless. The amended resolution does not refer to the "citizens of foreign countries" alleged to control the white-paper business of the world and to have purchased a controlling interest in a chain of American newspapers.

Instead, it merely directs the Federal Trade Commission to hold hearings and report whether practices of manufacturers and distributors of newsprint paper tend to create a monopoly in supplying publishers of small daily and weekly papers. The measure in its present form was reported February 7 from the Committee on Agriculture, to which it had been referred when introduced, January 7.

"At the time I introduced the resolution," said Senator SCHALL, "I believed that it would be a relatively simple matter to have the Senate authorize this inquiry, because it has always shown its sympathy to the small consumers and others who are not in a position to defend themselves against the harmful practices of monopolies.

"It is particularly true that the Senate of the United States has kept in mind the viewpoint of the smaller daily and weekly newspapers of the country. The Senate has in recent years authorized two sweeping investigations into the activities of the newsprint combines—one in 1917 and another in 1920. The first inquiry authorized by the Senate was conducted by the Federal Trade Commission and resulted in indictments and a decree in the Federal courts against certain newsprint manufacturers for violation of the antitrust law. It is these same manufacturers, more closely knit than in other years, that are the moving figures in the present newsprint monopolistic trend. The Senate itself conducted an investigation in 1920, at which time they made it clear that the smaller publishers were harmed by newsprint combines."

Senator SCHALL then turned to the testimony of Elisha Hanson, pointing out that he had appeared before one committee as attorney for the American Newspaper Publishers' Association and at another as attorney for the International Paper Co., but declared that when Mr. Hanson was appearing for the American Newspaper Publishers' Association he had asserted that he or Senator Lenroot, his law partner, represented the newsprint industry.

In this connection Senator SCHALL said:

"The National Editorial Association, representing the small daily and weekly newspapers, whose representative testified at the Agriculture Committee hearings, was not notified.

[The National Editorial Association has supported this investigation and the American Newspaper Publishers' Association and International Paper Co. has opposed it.]

"The authorized spokesman for the newsprint manufacturers was present and ready to oppose the measure. The record of the hearing of Saturday, February 9, contains the statement of Elisha Hanson, who appeared as the attorney for the International Paper Co. in opposition to reporting the resolution. Mr. Hanson had previously appeared before the Committee on Agriculture as attorney for the American Newspaper Publishers' Association. At that time he declared: 'We think this particular investigation is unnecessary.' At this hearing, in response to my questions, Mr. Hanson denied that either former Senator Lenroot or himself represented the newsprint organization."

Senator SCHALL dwelt at length on Mr. Hanson's appearances before the two Senate committees, calling attention to the latter's declarations that there was no monopoly in newsprint, and his statement "my client in this particular instance, the International Paper Co., has nothing to fear from the proposed investigation."

"Senators, the International Paper Co., and other large producers of newsprint have every reason to fear a repetition of investigations of other years by the Senate," continued Senator SCHALL.

The blind legislator next discussed in detail newspaper stories appearing in Toronto and Montreal newspapers concerning conferences of A. R. Graustein, president of the International Paper Co., and J. H. Grundy, head of "a huge United States-Canadian alliance of power and paper groups." He declared that the matter thus extended beyond the newsprint field solely, and was linked with monopoly in public utilities generally.

He foresaw a price-cutting battle between these two large hydroelectric and paper manufacturing interests, with resultant price increases later to the small publishers who have not signed long-time contracts. He quoted a recent news dispatch which said that Canadian newsprint manufacturers expect soon to announce a settlement stabilizing the price of newsprint at about $55.20 a ton.

"The fixed price of $55.20 will be given only to the larger newspapers who will protect themselves by contracts," he went on, "and it applies only to the year 1929. What the fixed price will be in 1930 and 1931 can only be conjectured by remembering what happened a few years back when newsprint paper to the small consumer ran up to $260 a ton. The testimony admitted by all concerned in the hearing before the Agricultural Committee on January 30 was that the smaller newspapers are now paying $95 per ton and only a short time ago were paying $180.

"I heard this morning on good authority that last Saturday the combination forming a tremendous Newsprint Trust of American and Canadian interests was formed, and the names thereto put on the dotted line. Another fact is that A. R. Graustein, president of the International Paper Co., resigned as president of the Bathurst Pulp & Paper Co., a subsidiary of the International, and another was elected in his place to do the signing."

Senator JONES then suggested that the resolution should require only a final report from the commission as soon as possible. This apparently does not greatly concern backers of the bill, for Senator NORRIS, of Nebraska, agreed that a final report would do as well.

[From the Grand Rapids (Minn.) Review, Saturday, March 2, 1929]

Senator TOM SCHALL'S platform may not be worth the cornstalk paper it is written on, but why not give him credit for an honest effort to serve his constituents? The attempt on the part of the band-wagon Republican newspapers to ridicule his cornstalk-paper proposition smacks of small politics and lacks the fairness which he has a right to expect from the press of Minnesota. The very newspapers that are heaping ridicule upon him now supported his candidacy four years ago when he ran against Magnus Johnson, the farmers' candidate, and J. J. Farrell, the Democratic nominee. (Olivia Times.)

PAPER FROM FARM WASTE

Two-thirds of the newsprint used in the United States is manufactured in Canada, and to Canada goes $200,000,000 every year to pay for it. To the United States this is an advantage, so long as newsprint is best made from wood pulp. It saves our forests. It helps to develop economically our northern neighbor. Unless wood pulp from Alaska becomes more of a factor in the paper industry than at present the United States has few more wood-pulp paper resources. The Alaskan project, still in the planning, may be important in the future. To-day the wood-pulp supply lies in Canada.

Paper of fair quality is now produced from cornstalks and from straw, and this, with time, no doubt, will be improved in quality and made cheaper in its price. To the corn grower and the sugar-cane grower this will give an income of $12 an acre. To the grower of peanuts and cotton $7 an acre may be derived from like by-products.

Farm waste may be used by manufacturers of paper and other products to the great advantage of the farmers and to American industry, and investigations conducted under a Government appropriation of $50,000 show that the gain may be much greater. A resolution introduced by Senator SCHALL, of Minnesota, to investigate the print-paper supply of America probably will have worth-while results. A supply of paper pulp from the United States without destroying our forests is possible.

[From the Hanley Falls (Minn.) Press, Friday, February 8, 1929]

SCHALL'S PLAN A PRACTICAL FORM OF FARM RELIEF

THOMAS D. SCHALL, the blind Senator from Minnesota, should have unstinted praise and encouragement from the farmers of the whole country in his efforts to have his bill passed to encourage the manufacture of paper from the waste products of the farm.

Mr. SCHALL'S bill (S. 4834) calls for an appropriation to build manufactories in different parts of the country where this raw material can be secured easily, and demonstrate the commercial practicability of making a high-grade writing paper, newsprint paper, compoboard, insulating board, and wall board from straw, cornstalks, and cugar-cane pulp, thus utilizing and turning into profit what is now waste and burnable nuisance.

On January 17 Mr. SCHALL introduced a joint resolution which is to provide a bounty for the encouragement of the manufacture of newsprint paper from the waste products of field crops produced on American farms. It reads as follows:

"Whereas it is necessary to encourage the manufacture of newsprint paper from the waste products of field crops produced on American farms (such as cornstalks, flax, wheat, rice, or oat straw, cotton stems, and sugar-cane pulp) for the purpose of further developing the paper-making industry in the United States, which is now dependent principally upon foreign countries for an adequate supply of the pulp and paper used in such industry; and

"Whereas it is estimated that the utilization of the waste products of such field crops would increase the annual income of the American farmers by more than a billion dollars and thereby tend to relieve the present agricultural situation and the distress of the farmers; and

"Whereas it has been demonstrated that paper manufactured from such waste products is of a finer quality than that now manufactured from wood pulp and that the manufacture of paper from such products is commercially profitable; and

"Whereas the Congress, in order to encourage the growing of sugar cane within the United States, has enacted legislation to provide for the payment of a bounty to sugar-cane growers with the result that a large and profitable industry has been developed; and

"Whereas similar encouragement to the American manufacturers of newsprint paper would tend to develop the paper-making industry and enable such manufacturers to compete with those in foreign countries: Therefore be it

"Resolved, etc., That any American manufacturer of paper who manufactures newsprint paper containing at least 60 per cent or more of waste products of field crops produced on American farms (such as cornstalks, flax, wheat, rice, or oat straw, cotton stems, or sugar-cane pulp) and who sells the paper so manufactured to any newspaper or other publisher in the United States at a price not exceeding $50 per ton, shall be paid from the Treasury of the United States a bounty of 1 cent for each pound of paper so produced and sold.

"SEC. 2. This resolution shall take effect immediately and shall remain in force for a period of five years from the date of its approval."

[From the Duluth (Minn.) Labor World, Saturday, February 16, 1929]

SENATE TO FAVOR SCHALL PROBE OF NEWSPRINT TRUST

Senator TOM SCHALL is still riding E. W. Backus. He charged in the Senate that a newsprint monopoly exists. Backus manufactures newsprint. SCHALL presumes if there is a trust, Backus is in on it.

SCHALL'S resolution to probe his alleged trust was this week reported out of the Senate Committee on Agriculture and Forestry, calling for a special senatorial investigation.

The resolution must be approved by the Senate before the probe can be held. SCHALL proposes to find out if it is true that a group of foreign and American capitalists control the white-paper supply in the United States.

The committee wants to know whether the activities of this group will have the result of creating a monopoly in the supplying of white paper to the publishers of small daily and weekly newspapers.

Before agreeing to report the resolution the committee amended it by striking out the preamble, in which it was asserted that a group of newsprint producers have invested $16,000,000 in a chain of American newspapers and is planning to make further investments for the purpose of assuring for themselves control of the sale of newsprint to American papers.

The committee further amended the resolution to make the proposed investigation apply to the activities of American citizens as well as to foreigners, and to include the effect of the alleged activities upon weekly as well as upon daily papers.

[From the Albert Lea (Minn.) Tribune, Monday, January 28, 1929]

The editor of the Le Sueur Herald doesn't mince matters when he says:

"Senator SCHALL has a proposition to make print paper from cornstalks, and as a result the price of paper has been reduced. There has been and is now more pure, unadulterated graft in newsprint than in any other one article. During the war paper got up to $260 a ton. The head of one paper mill was 'fined' $250,000 for grafting—that is, he was compelled to buy $250,000 worth of war bonds, which he sold a few days later at a premium. We hope the Senator will be successful in putting a crimp in the newsprint grafters."

[From the Park Rapids (Minn.) Journal, Thursday, January 24, 1929]

While the Journal has never had much to say about United States Senator THOMAS D. SCHALL, from our State, we must admit that his bill, Senate file 4834, which calls for an appropriation to build manufacturing plants in different parts of the country where raw material can be easily secured and demonstrate the commercial practicability of making a high-grade writing paper, newsprint paper, compoboard, insulating board, and wall board from straw, cornstalks, and sugar-cane pulp, thus utilizing and turning into profit what is now waste and burnable nuisance on the farm, as being worthy of every consideration by our Government. Reports are out that a certain combine of foreign capitalists has been formed, buying a controlling interest in all of the big dailies of the country, forcing these papers to sign a contract to buy their print paper from them for 15 years. This would ultimately force the small newspaper man to come to them, with the result that foreign countries would have absolute control. The Journal thinks Congress should look into this matter very seriously.

UTILIZING FARM WASTE

Senator THOMAS SCHALL is sponsoring a bill that will, if it becomes a law, be worth millions of dollars to the publishers of country newspapers. It does not affect the big city papers so much, as they buy in such large quantities that they now get the lower rates.

The bill is known as the Schall farm waste bill. It is proposed to make print paper from cornstalks, sugar-cane pulp, cottonseed, bran, peanut shells, rice and wheat straw, all of which in many sections are a waste. Converting this waste into print paper means more than a billion dollars annually to the farmers of the United States.

Many Senators and Congressmen are of the opinion that the adoption of this bill will go a long way toward helping the farmer solve his problems. Newspaper publishers should get behind Senator SCHALL'S bill and give him every support possible in getting it through the Congress.

Briefly, cornstalks make better and cheaper newsprint paper than is now produced by spruce pulp. Sugar-cane pulp, another waste product, makes the highest grades of writing paper at much less than its present cost.

Cottonseed, bran, and peanut shells, of which 2,000,000 tons are now produced and burned yearly, have been found to contain 45 per cent of xylose, a sugar of no food value, which will take the place of glucose in the spinning of rayon, will produce high-power explosives, and a number of other necessary commodities. Xylose now sells for $100 a pound.

Straw makes the best wall board or synthetic lumber; all we have is now produced from sugar-cane pulp and supplies only 1 per cent of the potential demand. Straw also makes high-grade paper pulp.

Potatoes will produce the higher as well as the lower grades of alcohol, which at present to manufacture we import annually from foreign countries $10,000,000 worth of blackstrap molasses. (Le Sueur News-Herald.)

[From the Milan (Minn.) Standard, Friday, January 25, 1929]

Senator THOMAS D. SCHALL is trying to secure legislation which will make it possible to convert cornstalk and other waste from field crops into paper. We are importing a great deal of paper from other countries. If the Senator succeeds, he will have made the United States independent of foreign paper manufacturers and thereby removed a more or less subtle influence from American journalism. It will also provide for an additional source of income for the American farmer.

THEY DON'T KNOW OR CARE ABOUT IT

The Milaca Times thinks that few of the organizations which are indorsing the "Minnesota plan" know anything about it; their indorsement of it is just perfunctory; much the same as the indorsement years ago by the same organizations of the plan to bond northern counties for drainage. They didn't study the effects of drainage, but just blindly indorsed the thing.

We would go further and say that very few of the 60 editors who sponsored the "plan" know anything or care anything about it. It is just something to talk about and put the McNary-Haugen type of farm relief out of people's minds.

We can prove it.

One of the chief items of the "Minnesota plan" is the advocacy of utilization of farm waste. Well, before the plan was even drawn up Senator SCHALL began work on a scheme to encourage the manufacture of cornstalk paper. He has proposed two plans: One the building of paper mills in several States by the Government to be run until the process is a success and then sold to private industry; the other, that the Government pay a bounty of 1 cent a pound to any American paper mill that makes paper of at least 60 per cent cornstalk or other farm waste and sells it for not more than $40 a ton. (The present price of Canadian newsprint is $55 a ton.)

Here is a practical effort to utilize farm waste and at the same time help out the country publisher by assuring him an unfailing and cheap supply of newsprint, and to take the monopoly in that product away from Canada. Every single one of the 60 editors should be shouting for SCHALL'S bills if they cared anything about their own plan of farm relief.

Are they?

Not so you could notice it! Very few of them have even mentioned the Schall resolutions. Most of them have advertised the fact that they have received samples of cornstalk paper, but with no mention of the fact that an effort is being made to have the Government encourage its manufacture. A few of the sponsors, like the Detroit Record and the Alexandria Citizen-News have, on the other hand, sneered at Senator SCHALL'S efforts.

They don't care or know anything about what their "plan" proposes to do for agriculture. In fact, they don't care anything about farm relief; never did and never will. All they care about is to keep their gang in office, and "kidding the farmer," is a necessary part of that process.

[From the Milan (Minn.) Standard, Friday, February 8, 1929]

A mill at Danville, Ill., is now manufacturing newsprint from cornstalks and the paper is reported to be of good quality. To help this infant industry to grow the country newspapers should begin to make a demand for such paper and buy it in preference to paper made from wood pulp whenever a supply is available. It would also be good policy to give Senator SCHALL the encouragement he deserves for demanding an appropriation by Congress for establishing experimental plants to determine the practicability of making paper from wheat straw and other waste products of the farm.

[From the Kasson Call, Wednesday, January 23, 1929]

PAPER PRINTED ON CORNSTALK PAPER

The editor of the Kasson Call received a copy of the Evening Huronite, printed at Huron, S. Dak., from H. E. Young, State bank examiner in charge, that was of particular interest to us. The paper was printed on the new cornstalk paper. In appearance it is very nearly the same as wood-pulp paper, except that it is not quite so opaque and the blacker type shows through the sheet. The fault will likely be remedied without difficulty. The paper has a crispness and crackle when it is handled and has a much smoother finish than wood-pulp print, which is likely due to the process of manufacture.

This new means of obtaining cellulose, which is the substance composing print-paper pulp, is the most encouraging development in a great many years of work and study to find a substitute for wood. The United States is the largest user of paper in the world. Its natural supply of wood for paper making is practically exhausted and this country is a great market for the foreign wood-pulp industry. The American industries are using their available pulp supply much faster than it is being replaced by reforestation. This situation has been the cause of much serious study and experiment to prevent the country from becoming dependent upon foreign supplies to make paper.

The new process is of great importance to paper users, but the variety of uses to which cellulose can be put, the locality of the supply of raw material, and the opening of new markets for waste products means a great deal to the Corn Belt and the Northwest.

Cellulose occupies a peculiar place in the chemical world. In their study of the substance, chemists have not been able to isolate its composing elements and are somewhat in the same position as scientists are in finding just what electricity is. Like electricity, however, they have in no way been hindered in developing it and using it. The production of rayon, or artificial silk, a short time ago has brought this substance to general public attention. In the same process of using cellulose in making silk many other articles have been imitated. At Iowa State laboratories no less than 187 useful products, ranging from synthetic lumber and axle grease to face powders and delicate perfumes have been developed from the lowly corn plant. Some of the articles made from cellulose are rayon, paper, lacquer, artificial leather, wall liquid and ice-cream spoons, toilet articles.

The future in the cellulose world is of such magnitude as to defy the imagination of the most visionary. Next to cornstalks, cottonseed hulls promise to be the cheapest source of cellulose. Other vegetables from which it is obtained are flax, jute, hemp, nettle fiber, pineapple fiber, thistle fiber, sea grasses, raphia, Spanish moss, coconut fiber, hops, broomcorn, hibiscus, linden, willow, shells, tobacco stems, and many others.

The only plant that has made paper from cornstalks is the experimental plant of the Cornstalks Products Co. (Inc.), at Tilton, Ill. Plans are under way for many other plants. The importance of the successful operation of such plants is the market which they offer to the corn States for waste material. No prices and figures have been quoted, but the cornstalk paper, at present in its experiment stage, is quite a little higher than wood-pulp paper. As a basis of figuring a price of $5 per ton has been placed on cornstalks. Methods of handling the stalks have not been worked out definitely, although the national farm-machinery companies are working with the plants to perfect a system.

That this new paper is of some importance may be attested by the fact that Senator THOMAS D. SCHALL has presented a bill in Congress to have the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD printed on cornstalk paper, and included in the bill are provisions for pulp mills all through the Northwest.

[From the Olivia (Minn.) Times, Thursday, January 24, 1929]

Senator SCHALL will be entitled to the unanimous support of the farmers of Minnesota if he succeeds in having paper mills established which will utilize the waste products from the land. His bill calls for an appropriation of $7,000,000 for the erection of eight demonstrating plants in the United States, two of which are to be erected in Minnesota. These mills would manufacture paper from the farmers' waste products, which would prove a valuable commodity. Senator SCHALL has made an extensive study of the processes of converting these waste products into paper and there may be much merit in his proposal. We would respectfully suggest to the Senator that Olivia might be considered a strategic point for the location of one of these plants.

[From the White Bear Press]

SCHALL AFTER CANADIAN PAPER TRUST

Senator SCHALL has introduced a bill for an appropriation with which to build experimental factories for the making of print paper from wheat straw, rice straw, cornstalks, canestalks, and cotton stalks. He has met a solid wall of opposition from a Canadian organization which has spent $16,000,000 on American newspapers with a view of controlling them and tying them up with 15-year contracts to use print paper made from wood. They say they have $100,000,000 more to spend if necessary.

The United States Government has spent millions trying to make paper from pine, but it contains too much rosin and it is so sticky it can not be made a success. Only $50,000 could be squeezed out of Congress for experiments on cornstalks, etc.

Now comes the invention or discovery of a process which makes a good grade of newsprint paper from these products, and it is now acknowledged by the Department of Agriculture that it has been known for 20 years that paper could be made from cornstalks, canestalks, cotton stalks and wheat straw, but it has been kept under cover all these years, to the advantage of the Paper Trust.

It is estimated that the utilization of waste farm products for the manufacture of paper would bring a billion and a half dollars into the pockets of the American farmer. It would seem that those who claim to be desirous of helping the farmer would seize this opportunity to assist him, but no undertaking affecting such a gigantic industry as paper making and involving such enormous amounts of capital can ever get by without violent opposition. Senator SCHALL has a fierce battle before him and has started something which will undoubtedly be prolonged in the accomplishment.

The Senator has also "stirred up the animals" by introducing a resolution in the Senate authorizing the appointment of a committee from the Senate "to investigate the activities of groups of foreign citizens controlling the supply of white paper in the United States."

In closing his address before the Senate recently Senator SCHALL said:

"Millions of dollars have been appropriated. This last year, as I said a moment ago, $1,625,000 was appropriated to make studies into the best wood from which to make paper, but no effort is made to do anything along the line of utilizing the farm waste.

"Let us break this foreign monopoly of our newspapers by turning this billion and a half dollar farm waste to its proper use. Let us make the United States the controlling factor of the world's paper market and free ourselves from foreign dominations, and at the same time do what we are about to hold an extra session for—help the farmer. Allow the farmer to cash in on what is now waste, and it will come mighty near settling the farm situation."

Senator SCHALL is making quite a fight in the Senate of the United States in the interests of making paper from cornstalks, cotton stalks, and various plant straws. Paper of such making has been used by several publications and is reported as satisfactory.

The move seems to have a good foundation in that it will, if put on a commercial basis, afford farmers on the average of $15 an acre for cornstalks, tend to preserve our natural forests—what there are left of them—and to liberate the newspapers of the United States from a possible conflict with Canadian paper interests, which are supplying a great amount of the paper used by some American dailies in the East.

And it also seems to have good possibilities for reality considering the fact that Canada paper interests have demanded 25-year contracts from several of their buyers right away before the move gets any further.

"WOLF HOWLS"

By Fred B. Wolf

TO FIGHT PAPER TRUST WITH CORNSTALKS

There is a possibility of the newspapers of the United States taking more interest in "farm relief" now that they are facing a strong gouge by the newly formed Canadian Paper Trust, which seeks to control the output and price of newsprint, the paper used for printing all newspapers.

We are in receipt of a letter from Senator DAN STECK, Iowa's Democratic United States Senator, in which he incloses a copy of a bill introduced by Senator SCHALL, of Minnesota, and prepared by that Senator and Mr. STECK, which proposes to vote several millions of dollars for the construction of experimental plants to manufacture print paper out of various farm by-products, including cornstalks, wheat and flax straw pulp, rice-straw pulp, sugar-cane pulp, etc.

Such a law would have a double object, the utilizing of waste products on the farms of the United States worth billions annually and now unused, and making a cheap print paper that would compete with that made from wood pulp now and very largely controlled by the big paper mills in Canada.

Very little wood-pulp paper is now manufactured in the United States, for we have used up most of our raw material. The paper this is printed on comes from a Canadian mill and costs more than twice as much at it did 15 years ago, and the prospects are it will cost still more.

We certainly wish the Minnesota and Iowa Senators success in their undertaking, but realize that they will meet the same opposition that the attempt to bring corn sugar into general use met—the big trusts back of cane sugar have throttled that movement, and the big Paper Trust will make the sledding anything but easy for the Schall bill.

Anyhow, thanks, Dan, for trying to help we poor devils out of a tight hole.

PAPER FROM FARM WASTE

Newsprint and other papers are now being successfully manufactured from rice straw, cornstalks, and other heretofore waste matter on the farms and plantations, precisely as high-grade insulating materials are being made of bagasse, or the fiber of sugar cane, after the extraction of the juice.

Senator SCHALL, of Minnesota, with the active support and collaboration of Senator SACKETT, of Kentucky, has introduced two important resolutions which, it is hoped, will be acted on at the special session to be called by Mr. Hoover, or at least not later than the December regular session of Congress.

The first of these resolutions provides for a special committee of five Senators, who are to be authorized and directed to investigate certain activities of a group of foreign citizens controlling the supply of white paper, in order to determine whether there is a movement on foot having for its object the creation of a monopoly.

It was announced in a trade magazine in December that this group of men, holding foreign citizenship, have purchased control of a chain of American newspapers at a total cost of $16,000,000, and that it is planned to secure control of some of the leading metropolitan dailies of the country.

The purpose seems to be not only to deluge the country with propaganda as a means of protecting the present wood-pulp paper industry and to influence Congress, but to make 15-year contracts with important newspapers for the supply of white paper.

Senators SCHALL and SACKETT and other influential men believe that if the scheme is carried out it might have a tendency to prevent the development of an American paper industry using cornstalks and other farm wastes. Such an industry, it is felt, will add greatly, when once established and flourishing, to the farm income and will aid in solving the agricultural problem.

In view of these facts the second resolution, on whose behalf Senators SACKETT and SCHALL have been active, provides a Government bounty for the encouragement of the manufacture of newsprint paper from the waste of farm crops, including cornstalks, flax, wheat, rice, or oat straw, cotton stems and sugar-cane pulp in order that an American industry may be developed and one free from foreign control.

The use of these waste materials, it is estimated, would increase the income of the farmers of the country in the sum of $1,000,000,000 or more, and at the same time lower the price of paper and guarantee a product of superior quality.

The proposed bounty would stand on the same basis as that which Congress provides by legislation for the purpose of promoting the cultivation of sugar cane and which has had the effect of developing a very important and profitable industry.

It is further provided that any American manufacturer of paper using 60 per cent of waste or more, such as cornstalks, wheat, rice, or oat straw, etc., and who sells his product at a price not exceeding $40 a ton shall be the recipient of this bounty, which amounts to 1 cent for each pound of paper produced and sold at or below the maximum price indicated.

The resolution, when passed, will take effect immediately and remain in force for a period of five years, thus giving ample time in which to make the experiment involved, at which time Congress can act in the light of developments.

This is a most important piece of legislation and deserves support. The situation demands its passage. There is reason to believe that it will have favorable consideration when it has been thoroughly studied.

SENATOR SCHALL STARTS BIG FIGHT

Senator THOMAS SCHALL, well known to many of our readers, is putting up a real fight at this session for the passage of a bill to foster the manufacture of waste products of the farm, such as cornstalks, straw, etc., into paper, and to convert the excess potatoes into alcohol, the latter item for which we now import $10,000,000 annually on blackstrap molasses.

Actual facts seem to show that by allowing these plants to operate Congress will give the corn grower about $12 per acre for his stalks, the wheat grower should realize about $15 an acre from his assurance of a really dependable market for his product regardless of quality.

None of the statements made by the sponsors of this big movement are guesses, suppositions, or a desire to please the agricultural sections. They are facts, and chemistry has solved this problem beyond the slightest doubt, and as the industry is developed the process will no doubt be improved until the waste from our farms and orchards would be a source of profit far above the annual total value of some of our staple products.

While the present bill now before Congress carries with it a 1 cent per pound subsidy on paper that is made from these waste products, it may develop that capital will be ready to undertake the building of the pulp mills without assistance from the Federal Treasury. At any rate, this is a wonderfully large undertaking and means almost unlimited gain for the American people, and should have the united support of every citizen who is in the least interested in the welfare of the country.

SCHALL MOVES TO ENCOURAGE MAKING PAPER FROM CORNSTALKS

A joint resolution introduced in the United States Senate recently by Senator THOMAS D. SCHALL, of Minnesota, would provide a bounty for the encouragement of the manufacture of newsprint paper from waste products of field crops produced on American farms.

The resolution provides that an American manufacturer of paper who made newsprint containing at least 60 per cent of waste products from the farm, such as cornstalk, flax, wheat, rice, or oat straw, cotton stems, or sugar-cane pulp, and who sold the paper to publishers at a price not exceeding $50 a ton, should receive a bounty of 1 cent a pound of paper from the Government.

The resolution declares that it is estimated that the utilization of the waste products of field crops would increase the annual income of American farmers by more than a billion dollars and thereby tend to relieve the present agricultural situation and distress of the farmers. The resolution has been read and referred to the Committee on Finance.

Newsprint has been successfully made from cornstalks and has been used recently in printing by both newspapers and magazines.

MAGNUS SUED AS SEQUEL TO FIGHT AGAINST SCHALL

A suit which is an echo of the attempt to unseat United States Senator THOMAS D. SCHALL three years ago for alleged violation of the corrupt practices act was filed in Hennepin County district court. Sam H. Holt, investigator employed to obtain evidence against Senator SCHALL, is suing Magnus Johnson, former United States Senator, and Henry G. Teigen, Johnson's secretary, for $875 as part of $1,475 which Holt alleges was to be paid him for his work. The suit was filed by H. T. Van Lear, Holt's attorney.

Mr. COUZENS. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will call the roll.

The legislative clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Fess	King	Sackett
Barkley	Frazier	McMaster	Schall
Bayard	Glass	McNary	Sheppard
Bingham	Glenn	Mayfield	Smith
Black	Goff	Metcalf	Steck
Blaine	Hale	Moses	Steiwer
Bratton	Harris	Norbeck	Thomas, Idaho
Broussard	Harrison	Norris	Thomas, Okla.
Bruce	Hayden	Nye	Trammell

Copeland	Johnson	Pine	Walsh, Mass.
Couzens	Jones	Reed, Pa.	Warren
Deneen	Kendrick	Robinson, Ark.	Waterman
Dill	Keyes	Robinson, Ind.	Watson

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Fifty-six Senators having answered to their names, a quorum is present.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, I desire to say a word in support of the resolution of the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. SCHALL]. He has a resolution pending here for making print paper out of cornstalks. I suggested to him the other day that we had succeeded in making print paper out of cotton stalks.

This resolution, if passed, will put into operation machinery that will take care of a great deal of the waste products of our farms, and in this way will help to solve the farm problem. I have seen trees cut to pieces with the great machines with which print paper is made. They take the body of a great tree and feed it into a vast machine and cut it into chips not much larger than your three fingers. It involves an immense amount of cost and a vast amount of machinery. You can take the cornstalks and the cotton stalks on the farm and provide machinery at much less cost and much smaller machinery to pound these cotton stalks and cornstalks into pulp, and, in my judgment, in a little while make this print paper much cheaper than it can be made out of wood. In doing that a vast amount of waste material upon the farm can be taken care of, and the great forests of the United States can be preserved.

I just wanted to say that much in support of the Senator's resolution.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Mr. President, the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. SCHALL] has called our attention in several addresses to the importance of investigating the newsprint-paper industry.

I desire to call attention to the fact that in the second session of the Sixty-sixth Congress an exhaustive investigation was made by a subcommittee of the Committee on Manufactures, and that a report—Report No. 662—was filed in the Senate on June 2, 1920. That report made several recommendations seeking to give relief to the small consumers of newsprint paper. No action was taken upon those recommendations.

Without making any suggestion as to what the Senate ought to do now in the way of a further investigation, I think the subject ought to be fully presented in the RECORD of the debates. Therefore, I ask that the report made at that time be printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The report is as follows:

[S. Rept. No. 662, 66th Cong., 2d sess.]

NEWSPRINT PAPER INDUSTRY INVESTIGATION

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts, from the Committee on Manufactures, submitted the following report pursuant to Senate Resolution 164:

In pursuance of Senate resolution 164, providing for the investigation of the newsprint industry with a view of discovering whether discriminatory, unjust, or illegal practices are responsible for the present conditions in the newsprint-paper industry, and have affected the prices for the products thereof, the Committee on Manufactures presents the following report:

HISTORICAL BACKGROUND OF THE NEWSPRINT SITUATION

Although the average cost of manufacturing print paper decreased between the years 1913–1916, according to the Federal Trade Commission report, the open-market price charged the consumer rose from 1½ cents per pound in 1913 to 2.35 cents per pound in 1915 f. o. b. destination, and by the end of 1916 to 5 cents per pound f. o. b. mill.

This advance in price was accompanied by a "new policy of delivery on the part of most manufacturers and a strict rule against allowing leeway in tonnage to the buyer, who was compelled to take his allotment monthly whether he needed it or not; and if he was unable to store the surplus shipments, the paper went by forfeit to the maker."

Under the then prevailing system the terms on large contracts were more favorable than those on small ones, and after the increase in price of the second quarter, 1916, but very few short-time contracts were concluded. The smaller newspapers, because of their inability to sign long-time contracts, suffered severely from constantly increasing prices during this period.

Conditions in the industry became so glaringly bad in 1916 that the Trade Commission was requested by the Senate to investigate evidences of unfair practice. This investigation resulted in the prosecution of several offending newsprint manufacturers and, in addition, to fines imposed for admitted violation of the Sherman antitrust law by pleas of "nolo contendere." An agreement was entered into by the then Attorney General and the manufacturers as to a fair price for paper, which was put at $0.03275 per pound, but it was furthermore stipulated that in case a buyer offered more than the price set by the agreement it was lawful for the manufacturer to accept it on the ground that it was a voluntary offer mutually satisfactory to buyer and seller. The utter inadequacy of this agreement to protect the public interest will be later discussed.

RECENT DEVELOPMENTS AS SHOWN IN THE INVESTIGATION

In regard to the situation since that time, the testimony has brought to light two predominating factors which have influenced the conditions of the newsprint market and placed publishers of small country daily and weekly newspapers in a very serious plight. Firstly, that there has existed a shortage of newsprint paper, threatening many small publishers with extinction; and secondly, that certain newsprint manufacturers have taken advantage of this shortage to exploit the purchasers of such paper and hold them up for excessive, unreasonable, and wholly unfair prices. If this shortage could actually be traced to the operation of natural economic laws, the offense of charging high and exorbitant prices would not be so grave, although the committee is not willing to concede the right of the manufacturer, distributor, or any other person to make unfair use of such a condition. But all the evidence of the various witnesses and the substantial and absolutely authentic information we have obtained from official reports seem to indicate that many of the newsprint paper makers here and in Canada were acting in collusion, with the apparent intent to bring about restraint of the normal flow of trade and engage in unfair competition by methods in some cases of creating an artificial supply and in others of resorting indirectly through their bureaus of statistics to an actual fixing of price. Indeed, there is sufficient evidence to warrant the finding that there has been a deliberate curtailment of newsprint paper upon the part of some newsprint paper manufacturers to "get even" with the Government for its prosecution and also to hold up prices.

QUESTIONABLE BUSINESS METHODS OF THE MANUFACTURERS

In regard to contracts made by manufacturers, the committee found that many of them were practically identical so far as terms were concerned. Except in the case of some small independent companies, the contracts nearly all have the same terms of delivery and reserve the right to readjust terms quarterly. Even the large publishers can not to-day, in most cases, contract for a year's supply at a fixed annual price. The mills, with few exceptions, reserve the right to fix prices quarterly, and there is invariably a rise in price each quarter. Moreover, it has been the custom of the large manufacturers during the past three years to notify their customers in advance that it would be necessary to reduce their previous allotments. This, of course, would enable the manufacturers to compute accurately their annual production. It develops in the testimony also that the companies gathered general statistics on the amount of paper consumed by their different customers so as to estimate what quantity of paper would produce the most favorable market conditions.

Newsprint paper known as standard news constitutes 90 per cent of the total production in the newsprint paper industry. Although the demand for standard news has increased very materially, yet the mills have produced more paper of the other grades, which formerly made up 10 per cent of their output, and have limited the production of the standard news below an amount proportional to the increased demand. In the case of one large mill they increased the production of the grades other than standard news more than 170 per cent for 1919 over 1917; and in the case of another, producing more than 25 per cent of the newsprint paper of this country, the production of standard news has decreased over 20 per cent in the last two years, while the other grades of print paper not so widely used by publishers have been increased by more than 65 per cent, despite new large demands for print paper. This total production has decreased from 1,238,787 tons in 1917 to 1,227,180 tons in 1919.

Since the excess-profits tax was put into effect there has been a noticeable increase in the amount of advertising carried by all newspapers, particularly the large urban publications. This is due to the fact that large concerns, having realized greatly excessive returns, have chosen to expend a portion in some form of advertising which can be counted in their tax returns as going expenses of business, rather than turn large amounts over to the Government in taxes. While this is obviously a bad development growing directly out of our income tax laws, and it is also true that the tremendous quantities of paper consumed would naturally cause a rise in the price of newsprint, nevertheless the facts brought out concerning the Manufacturers' Statistical Bureau and its influence in diminishing instead of increasing production of newsprint in the face of new demands would seem to indicate that it was the deliberate intent of some manufacturers to reduce their output in order to find justification in scarcity for a large increase in price.

And the figures of production for the first quarter of 1920 show even a greater falling off in output. During the first part of 1920 all of the paper produced by 76 mills was 12,320 net tons as compared with an output of 15,656 net tons by 51 mills in a similar period of time in 1919. A favorable indication was given in the production figures for April, 1920, which show an increase of newsprint of 10 per cent over April, 1919, and we trust that this production will increase until the supply of paper is sufficient to meet the full requirements of the publishers.

TREND OF NEWSPRINT PRICES

There are two methods of selling and buying newsprint paper, by contract between the manufacturer and the publisher or consumer—this method is confined to the large users—and by purchasing in the open market through brokers and jobbers—this is the method in vogue by the small publishers.

Now, as to the methods of price fixing and its effect on the market. In 1918, subsequent to a prosecution by the Government of certain newsprint manufacturers under the Clayton Act, hereinbefore described, a sort of a sliding-scale agreement based on changing costs was entered into between the Attorney General and the companies, and which is still in force, permitting a charge of $0.03275 per pound for print paper, since this was deemed an equitable and fair rate. We have discovered that the indicted manufacturers have violated the spirit of the agreement and that they have increased their prices considerably beyond that figure without first effecting a legal readjustment of the rates as was provided in the court decision; that they were able to do so by virtue of the provision in their agreement with the then Attorney General which permitted them to receive higher rates for their paper provided that the buying price was satisfactory to both parties. This amounted to a virtual nullification of the law, for if a customer was willing to pay more than $0.037525, it was within the privileges of the company to accept any price offered over that amount, so that obviously the firm attempting to sell on the basis of the rate agreed upon was operating at a relative disadvantage. Hence the natural tendency of the price of print paper was toward a high level.

Why the Department of Justice should have drafted such an ineffective decree the committee is unable to explain. To all intents and purposes the insertion of the clause which permitted the manufacturers and buyers to negotiate privately and fix the purchasing price constituted an annulment of all the other clauses in the agreement which attempted to control this business, prevent combinations in restraint of trade, and punish profiteering. The result has been that though the agreement is still legally in effect, no manufacturer anywhere is making the slightest pretense to live up to it and the Federal Trade Commission and the present Attorney General's office practically admit that it not only can not be enforced, but worse still that it is a hindrance, if not a bar, to prosecution. How deplorable the present situation is can be summed up as follows:

The prevailing pre-war price for newsprint paper was discovered to have been 1½ cents per pound. Many honestly managed mills made contracts for the half year 1920 at 3 to 5 cents, on which—we have it by their own admission—they are realizing fair and reasonable profits. We found that the contracts for the most part were confined to publishers controlling the big metropolitan dailies. The country newspapers, very small users, have been unable to make contracts with the mills and they have been obliged to buy through brokers and jobbers and pay as high as 22 cents per pound for individual lots. It was not uncommon to find very many country newspapers who have been paying between 12 and 16 cents per pound for shipments since the beginning of the year. To-day it is practically impossible for them to buy at a price less than 15 or 16 cents per pound. The result, of course, is pernicious. A crisis has been reached.

Small publishers are in the hands of unscrupulous profiteers and exploiters. All newsprint paper not bought under large contracts with the mills is for sale to-day to only the highest bidder. Normal business conditions in the newsprint paper are removed and disregarded. Figuratively speaking, the supply of newsprint paper not manufactured under large contracts with the publishers is to-day for sale only by auctioneers, and the auction block is located in the offices of a few brokers and jobbers. Mr. Courtland Smith, testifying before the committee as the representative of 5,300 country papers, said:

"In my opinion not half of the country press, numbering 12,000 weekly papers and 800 daily papers, will survive the next six months unless there is a drastic change in the situation."

PROFITEERING

While this committee has not been able, because of the limited time at its disposal, to consider to what extent profiteering exists in the newsprint paper-manufacturing business, we are satisfied that there has been excessive profit making in this business during the last few years.

One witness before this committee testified that the net earnings of his company for the year 1919 were $400,000, and when closely questioned he admitted that net earnings for the four months of the present year, namely, from January 1 to May 1, 1920, were approximately $500,000. The same witness testified that the actual money invested in this plant was about $4,000,000. It is thus apparent that if the net earnings for the first part of this year continue this company will make in the year 1920 net earnings of $1,500,000 on an actual investment of $4,000,000, or 66⅔ per cent on the total plant value. This witness further testified that his company's selling price during this quarter ranged from 4 to 8 cents, but that most of its output was sold at 6¼ cents per pound. With these figures before us who dares to estimate the extent of profiteering when paper is sold for 15 cents per pound? We use the word "profiteering," but in view of the evidence "usury" would be a better word.

As to the profits of jobbers and brokers, we cite the following case as an extreme example of profiteering among newsprint distributors. One firm dealing in newsprint and other paper paid 7 per cent on its preferred stock last year and 120 per cent on its common stock, besides increasing its surplus substantially. This enormous record of dividends has been paid by this company for the last three or four years. The committee has found several instances of where middlemen had increased their commissions from 2 per cent, the standard less than a year ago, to 10 per cent during the recent paper shortage.

Even the large newsprint publishers are at the mercy of the manufacturers. It is a special favor to-day for any manufacturer to contract at any price to furnish newsprint paper to any publisher. One newspaper publisher, when he was asked what suggestions he could make to assist in remedying the present condition, raised both hands, implying that he could do nothing but get paper where he could and pay what was demanded. It was not and still is not safe for a publisher in any way to criticize or protest to a manufacturer. On the other hand, the small consumer of newsprint paper finds himself in the spot newsprint paper market with the prices prohibitive. In a word, the big publishers, not having mills of their own, are in a "hold-up market," while the small publishers are being driven from the business by threatened bankruptcy.

THE EXPERIENCE OF THE GOVERNMENT PRINTING PLANT

The experience of the Government with the question of newsprint paper would seem to bear out the findings of the committee in regard to the shortage of newsprint paper and the extent of profiteering. At the Government printing plant, where all Federal documents, including the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, are published, there has been an increase of over 300 per cent in the price of paper since 1917 and a threatened increase to-day of 600 per cent. At that time (1917) an adequate supply was available at 2½ cents per pound, whereas the last price the Government was forced to pay a few weeks ago was 7¼ cents per pound. At present the printing plant is unable to obtain paper because the authorities are unwilling to pay the exorbitant demands of the manufacturers, who are demanding 14½ cents per pound from the Government in the last quotations submitted. Under the obtaining conditions the Government, like the small publishers, is forced into the spot market for paper.

This committee is not convinced that over one-third the price now asked in the spot market is warranted, and, in fact, there are some well-regulated firms who, as the evidence has shown, consider 4 to 5 cents per pound a thoroughly fair and reasonable price for their products.

While the testimony revealed certain paper mills that were reaping extra legal rewards from their dealings, the committee was deeply impressed by other concerns who continued to do business on a fair basis of return. These latter firms serve as a source of gratification and encouragement, since they prove that we still have left in American business, men imbued with a desire to live up to the traditionally high character of American business and to conserve some of the ideals of square dealing, as distinguished from those who pursue the new selfish policy of "get what you can." These firms, in the midst of an era of gross profit taking, managed to resist the many strong temptations embodied in the success of their more unscrupulous paper makers. And the committee wants the honest concerns to know that it is our purpose to repudiate the practices of their fellow manufacturers and to restore the paper industry to a plane of respectability compatible with the trust and confidence of the American public.

CONCLUSIONS

There is no doubt that it is the manufacturers who have spot paper to sell that have and are reaping the large profits and placed such severe penalties upon the country press. There has been evidence presented which would show that jobbers and brokers and commission men are receiving very large financial returns as a result of existing high prices, though many of them frankly admit their disgust with the existing unhealthy and immoral conditions of trade, and candidly admit that they are ashamed to sell newsprint paper for the prices current to-day.

Although the committee has considered the various disturbing elements that the newsprint industry has been subjected to during war time, and the subsequent period of quickly rising material and labor costs, and has also taken into account increased consumption of print paper, the apparent scarcity of wood pulp, and the numerous other unstabilizing forces common to all businesses of to-day, we feel that the scarcity of the product was more the result of artificial obstructions than of the natural laws, and that the market prices and the uniform contract stipulations were arrived at through the shortage of production, the efficient work of the manufacturers' bureau of statistics, and the use of a virtual gentleman's agreement.

We believe that the profits taken by several of these concerns were totally out of keeping with the best business practices, that some manufacturers were and are guilty of breaking the spirit, if not the letter, of their own previous agreement with the Government, and that they took advantage of a condition—attributable for the most part to their own manipulation—in order to make gains far out of proportion to those of fair, legitimate business profits. That the practices were unjust, illegal, and discriminatory is established beyond any doubt, and also that the prices charged for newsprint paper are both excessive and unwarranted. Therefore, in order to remove the causes of this discrimination and excessive price charging and to protect the country press—one of the chief means of enlightening and educating our rural population—the committee makes the following recommendations as a possible solution.

The measures suggested in some instances may be considered drastic. This committee, however, believes and deplores the fact that the existent emergency has made strong, determined action necessary. It is not the function of any government to stand by and watch the enforced decadence of an institution so vital to the soundness and integrity of our Nation as the country press and the press managed and conducted by religious bodies, farm agencies, wage earners, and fraternal associations; nor did the committee feel as though it could witness the wholesale exploitation and imminent bankruptcy of our newspapers, large as well as small, without advising radical procedure against the offenders aimed to prevent in the future the continuance or repetition of any such processes.

REMEDIES

I. Immediate action by the Attorney General for the prosecution and punishment of the newsprint manufacturers guilty of offenses either against the Sherman antitrust law, the Clayton Act, or the provisions of the court decree of 1917 in regard to the newsprint industry, and that in this procedure the Attorney General be furnished with all the information which the Federal Trade Commission may at present have in its possession or which it may hereafter procure.

II. In order to discourage wasteful use of newsprint paper, we recommend that a tax of 10 cents be levied on all Sunday papers weighing over 1.28 pounds, until such time as the supply of print paper shall be adequate for the fullest needs of all publishers. The committee believes that this law would result in limiting the pages of Sunday papers to 80, thus resulting in large savings in the consumption of newsprint paper in Sunday editions that have reached as high as 140 pages in some instances.

III. That the Congress shall amend the sundry civil bill by the appropriation of a sum of $100,000 for research, study, and experimentation into different methods of making paper, with a view of finding a substitute for wood pulp; that this work be conducted by the Department of Agriculture, whose experts shall first report their plans to a special committee of Congress appointed to supervise the work and to receive from time to time reports as to its progress.

IV. We recommend also legislation to establish a parcel-post rate of 1 cent a pound without regard for zones, for 10 or less packages of sheet print paper shipped weekly from any mill direct to a newspaper, without increasing the present limit of weight of 70 pounds. This would enable the small publishers to combine in the establishment of a mill to supply their needs. At present there is discrimination in postal rates in favor of the finished newspaper, and it is apparent that in order to sustain thousands of smaller papers a similar favorable discrimination is necessary for newsprint paper.

V. And if the Government's efforts to fix and maintain a reasonable price appears to be futile because of a virtual monopoly in the print-paper industry or because of continued protests from the manufacturers that the supply is running dangerously low, we recommend that the Government by law establish a newspaper print board to supervise the manufacture and distribution of newsprint paper; and to enter into a cooperative organization with the country newspapers which would eliminate the jobber or middleman and enable the country press to buy newsprint at the lowest mill rate.

VI. That the Government consider seriously the possible purchase or establishment of a newsprint paper mill for the purpose of manufacturing the newsprint used at the Government printing plant and that the overproduction of such mill be sold to the small consumers of newsprint paper.

VII. Finally, that Congress amend the Lever Act to include the commodity—newsprint paper—under its provisions.

In conclusion the members of this committee wish to express their regret that since the drafting of this report the Senate has voted to adjourn, which action postpones and prevents action on this report. The undersigned members of the committee believe the Senate has not acted wisely or in the interest of the public welfare, in view of the many pressing problems left unsolved, and we have therefore by our voice and vote recorded ourselves against the proposition to adjourn and assume no responsibility for future results growing out of neglect to act on this and other public questions.

ASLE J. GRONNA.
DAVID I. WALSH.

On account of the fact that my time since the conclusion of the taking of evidence in the above matter has been completely absorbed in important committee work, which required immediate attention, I have been unable to give to the foregoing report the careful examination which the importance of the question demands. I am, therefore, reserving the right to express my views at a later date.

JAS. A. REED.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, the resolution of the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. SCHALL], to which I referred a moment ago, has passed the Senate. It orders an investigation into the operations of the print-paper trust.

The testimony before the committee, of which I am a member, disclosed the fact that the big dailies were paying about $55 a ton for this print paper, and the small papers were having to pay about $85 to $100 a ton. The Senator from Minnesota, among other things, is seeking to relieve them and to have justice done to the smaller papers of the United States, as well as to provide ways and means for making print paper out of cornstalks, and I suggested in the hearing cotton stalks.

This experiment has been made; and the Senator exhibited before the committee a daily paper printed on paper made out of cornstalks alone, and I have seen paper made out of cotton stalks. I repeat that by making this paper out of the vast amount of cornstalks and cotton stalks that we have in the country every year we can save a great deal of the forests of the United States.

PRINTING OF HEARINGS BEFORE INDIAN AFFAIRS COMMITTEE

Mr. FRAZIER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to submit a resolution and ask for its immediate consideration. It simply authorizes the printing of more copies of the hearings before the Indian Affairs Committee.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The resolution will be read.

The Chief Clerk read the resolution (S. Res. 350), and it was considered by the Senate and agreed to, as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on Indian Affairs of the Senate is hereby authorized to have printed, for its use, extra copies of the hearings held before the committee pursuant to Resolutions 79, 303, and 308, Seventieth Congress, up to the limitations of cost provided by existing law.

FORMULATION OF SCHEDULE OF RADIO FEES

Mr. DILL. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to present a resolution and have it read for the purpose of immediate consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The resolution will be read.

The legislative clerk read the resolution (S. Res. 351), and it was considered by the Senate and agreed to, as follows:

Resolved, That the Federal Radio Commission is hereby requested to formulate a schedule of fees to be recommended to Congress as the charges which should be made for the different kinds of radio licenses issued by the commission and report the same to the Senate for its consideration in connection with radio legislation at as early a date as convenient to do so.

AMENDMENT OF NAVAL RETIREMENT ACT

Mr. STEIWER. Mr. President, from the Committee on Naval Affairs I report back favorably a bill for which I ask immediate considertion.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will read the bill.

The legislative clerk read the bill (H. R. 17322) to amend the act approved June 22, 1926, entitled "An act to amend that part of the act approved August 29, 1916, relative to the retirement of captains, commanders, and lieutenant commanders in the line of the Navy."

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, what is the bill?

Mr. STEIWER. I think I can explain it in just a word, without debate.

The Navy is now retiring officers under the authority of the so-called temporary law, passed in June, 1926, which, by its terms, automatically will expire next Tuesday. Unless the law is continued, some 15 or 16 officers will be retired in a very short time, some of them never having had an opportunity to go before a retiring board.

In recognition of that situation, the House, in response to the request of the Navy Department, has passed this bill, and the Naval Affairs Committee is very much in favor of it and hopes it will be passed.

Mr. BLACK. That is not the so-called Britten bill, is it?

Mr. STEIWER. No; it is not the Britten bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the consideration of the bill?

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Has the bill been considered by the committee?

Mr. STEIWER. Yes; it has. The committee was polled, and all the members who were reached are in favor of it.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

T. L. YOUNG AND C. T. COLE

Mr. CAPPER submitted the folowing report:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the House to the bill (S. 4848) entitled "An act for the relief of T. L. Young and C. T. Cole" having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the Senate recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the House, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the matter inserted by said amendment, strike out all the language in said bill after the numerals "1924," in line 1, page 2, except the period at the end thereof; and the House agree to the same.

ARTHUR CAPPER,
GERALD P. NYE,
Managers on the part of the Senate.
ED. M. IRWIN,
U. S. GUYER,
Managers on the part of the House.

Mr. CAPPER. Mr. President, this is the conference report on a bill introduced by the senior Senator from Kansas [Mr. CURTIS]. It involves only $2,500, and relieves two citizens of Kansas from the payment of a small judgment of the United States court. They were bondsmen, and the United States attorney recommends the legislation.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the conference report.

The report was agreed to.

MISSOURI RIVER BRIDGE, NEBRASKA

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, last night the Senate passed Senate bill 5875, to extend the time for the beginning of the building of a bridge across the Missouri River near Niobrara. The House has passed an identical bill, and it has just come over to the Senate, so the bills crossed each other. I ask unanimous consent for the consideration of the House bill, which has just been sent to the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair lays before the Senate a bill from the House of Representatives.

The bill (H. R. 17208) to extend the times for commencing and completing the construction of a bridge across the Missouri River at or near Niobrara, Nebr., was read twice by title.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

ESTABLISHMENT OF AND BOUNDARY REVISIONS OF CERTAIN NATIONAL PARKS

Mr. NYE, from the Committee on Public Lands and Surveys, submitted a report (No. 2073) pursuant to Senate Resolution 237, relative to the advisability of establishing certain national parks and proposed changes in, and boundary revisions of other national parks, as follows:

Proposed Roosevelt National Park, N. Dak.;
Proposed Kildeer National Park, N. Dak.;
Yellowstone National Park, Wyo., Mont., and Idaho;
Proposed Grand Teton National Park, Wyo.;
Wind Cave National Park, S. Dak.;
Proposed Teton (Bad Lands) National Park, S. Dak.; and Rocky Mountain National Park, Colo.;

which was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[S. Rept. No. 2073, 70th Cong., 2d sess.]

Mr. NYE, from the Committee on Public Lands and Surveys, submitted the following report (pursuant to S. Res. 237):

The Committee on Public Lands and Surveys, pursuant to, and in accordance with, Senate Resolution 237, reports that a subcommittee consisting of Senators NYE, NORBECK, DALE, KENDRICK, and ASHURST, in July and August of 1928 visited the sites of certain proposed national parks and certain other national parks, and that the said subcommittee has submitted the following report, which is approved by the committee:

In accordance with Senate Resolution 237, the subcommittee of the Committee on Public Lands and Surveys, authorized and directed to investigate the advisability of establishing certain national parks and the proposed changes in, and boundary revisions of, certain other national parks, visited, in the order named, the following areas:

Proposed Roosevelt National Park, N. Dak.
Proposed Kildeer National Park, N. Dak.
Yellowstone National Park, Wyo., Mont., and Idaho.
Proposed Grand Teton National Park, Wyo.
Wind Cave National Park, S. Dak.
Proposed Teton (Bad Lands) National Park, S. Dak.
Rocky Mountain National Park, Colo.

PROPOSED ROOSEVELT AND KILDEER NATIONAL PARKS, N. DAK.

The committee spent several days in the so-called Bad Lands of North Dakota and visited the Kildeer Mountains.

With relation to the proposed Roosevelt National Park in the Bad Lands, the committee is of the mind that the site is of national-park status, though the area embraced in the proposed site ought to be materially reduced.

There is offered here something quite different from the usual national-park scenery, which is coupled with the historic interest created by the fact that Theodore Roosevelt ranched for several years in these parts. The old Roosevelt log house is still in existence, and at its original site within the proposed park would prove of great interest to the great number of people who travel through this proposed park on their way to and from the national parks farther west. The park boundary should be made to include the old Roosevelt ranch, the Petrified Forest, the so-called Painted Canyon (which has been likened to a small edition of the Grand Canyon in Arizona), and perhaps one or two other exceptionally attractive spots within the Bad Lands. These are linked by good highways, which would make a large part of the Bad Lands scenery available to visitors.

The establishment of the Roosevelt National Park in the Bad Lands is understood to be dependent upon the availability of all land involved without cost to the Federal Government.

YELLOWSTONE NATIONAL PARK, WYO., MONT., AND IDAHO

The committee held hearings at Cody, Wyo., on July 19, 1928, on the proposed additions to and adjustment in the boundaries of Yellowstone National Park. As a result of the committee's study, S. 3001 was amended January 17, 1929, to cover the proposed revision of the boundary of Yellowstone National Park, except the addition of the upper Yellowstone region, which was left for further study. This bill passed the Senate on February 7, 1929, and is now pending before the House of Representatives.

A further study of the adjustments of the southeast, south, and southwest boundaries of Yellowstone National Park is provided for in Senate Joint Resolution 206, which authorizes the appointment of a Yellowstone National Park boundary commission. This joint resolution was passed by the Senate on February 9, 1929, and is also pending before the House.

PROPOSED GRAND TETON NATIONAL PARK, WYO.

Hearings were held in the territory, and the committee is unanimously in favor of the establishment of the Tetons as a national park. S. 5543, creating these great peaks as a national park, to be known as the Grand Teton National Park, passed the Senate on February 7, 1929, and was passed by the House of Representatives on February 18, 1929. This territory comprises outstanding scenery and is easily deserving of national-park designation.

WIND CAVE NATIONAL PARK, S. DAK.

The committee only briefly visited this area en route to the proposed Teton National Park, S. Dak., passing through the park and the interesting Custer State (Black Hills) Park to the north.

PROPOSED TETON (BAD LANDS) NATIONAL PARK, S. DAK.

The committee made an inspection of an extensive area of the South Dakota Bad Lands and was greatly impressed with their value for scientific and scenic interest. The principal scenic features are the Great Wall, Cedar Pass, Big Foot Pass, and an unsurveyable area of great fascination known as The Pinnacles.

The topography of the South Dakota Bad Lands is so unique, varied, and interesting, and the fame of the region as a large field for scientific exploration of the geologic past is so extensive, the committee is of the opinion that this area is worthy of a national-park status. The whole area is an open book on the evolution of animal life from the earliest geologic period. The fossil remains of prehistoric animals embedded in the formations of this region are found in great profusion. For over 80 years it has been the scene of operation for scientific expeditions from all parts of the world. Specimens of these fossils repose in the world's principal museums.

Erosion has facilitated the exposure of these fossil remains and has caused the rugged contour of this section to assume the most fantastic and unique shapes. There is a wealth of scenic features with a wide range of exquisite coloring which can not be found elsewhere.

ROCKY MOUNTAIN NATIONAL PARK, COLO.

The committee visited this park and looked over the present development and proposed road and trail construction plans, passing over the Fall River Highway, which ascends an elevation of 11,797 feet, the highest altitude reached by an automobile road in the national park system. The members of the committee discussed briefly with local interests the question of cession of jurisdiction over the Rocky Mountain National Park by the State of Colorado to the United States in order that the development of this park could be actively planned and continued.

NATIONAL PARK SERVICE

The committee would not fulfill an obligation owing if it did not at least briefly recite its enthusiastic approval of the manner in which the National Park Service is being conducted.

The Government and the people are fortunate in having and having had the services of such men as Stephen T. Mather, Horace M. Albright, Roger W. Toll, and others working with them in the management of the national parks. Wherever the committee went it found the maximum of return being effected through the national parks of means made available by the Government and a service being accorded the people that was of the highest standard.

The retirement of Mr. Mather from the directorship of the National Park Service is greatly regretted, as is the extremely unfortunate condition of his health which caused it. He has during his years at the head of the Park Service laid a foundation upon which a finer service will be builded from year to year. He must at all times be numbered among the most unselfish and able of public servants.

Succeeding Mr. Mather as Director of the National Park Service is Mr. Horace M. Albright, formerly superintendent of Yellowstone National Park, who has been intimately associated with Mr. Mather since the inception of the Park Service back in 1916. Mr. Albright brings to the Park Service a continued great interest in the park cause, and his administration of the service can be expected to win that same great measure of confidence which has been accorded the administration of Mr. Mather.

CONCLUSION

That the committee has discharged its duty in accordance with Senate Resolution 237, is made manifest by the subsequent results of its field investigation and hearings, especially in the case of the proposed Grand Teton National Park and the boundary revisions of Yellowstone National Park.

It has since become evident that the only way in which these results could have been brought about was through the committee's visit to the areas involved and in hearing and meeting all the people interested and in feeling out and obtaining first-hand knowledge of local sentiment and wishes.

The establishment of the Grand Teton National Park, Wyo., has become a reality after 21 years of effort with the passage by the House of Representatives of S. 5543 (by Senator KENDRICK, of Wyoming) on February 18, 1929. The committee's hearings in the shadow of the Tetons, at which representative people from the surrounding country attended, tended to iron out the misunderstandings and difficulties which have prevented enactment of this legislation for years.

The passage by the Senate of S. 3001, by Senator NORBECK (now pending in the House), which provides for the readjustment of the northwest, northeast, and east boundaries of Yellowstone National Park, is partly due at least to the committee's investigation into this matter. It fulfills in part the recommendations of the coordinating commission on national parks and forests made to the President back in 1925. The recommendations of the commission covering the revision of the boundaries of Yellowstone Park on the southeast and south, together with a proposal by the State of Idaho to eliminate the southwest corner of the park (Bechler Meadows) for irrigation reservoir purposes are to be further studied by a Yellowstone National Park boundary commission to be appointed by the President pursuant to Senate Joint Resolution 206 (now pending before the House of Representatives). It was through testimony before your committee that this Yellowstone Park boundary situation has been finally straightened out and the way paved for final disposition of the matter, a matter which has actually been before Congress in one way or another since the establishment of the Yellowstone as a national park in 1872.

The visit of the committee into North Dakota for the purpose of studying the proposal to establish the Roosevelt and Kildeer National Parks, and the holding of hearings at Medora, N. Dak., in regard thereto, has furnished the committee with first-hand knowledge of the situation, which will prove invaluable when the matter comes up for consideration. The historical background of the area proposed to be set aside as the Roosevelt National Park is a fitting atmosphere for these bad lands, with their crimson buttes rising out of this picturesque country. Besides the historical importance connected with Theodore Roosevelt's stay in the Bad Lands, there is also a bit of romance associated with the name Marquis de Mores. He was a French nobleman who came early into this Bad Lands country and built a chateau overlooking the little town of Medora, which stands to-day preserved in its original state and contains the furnishings of its builder. It is of great interest to the tourist who visits this unusual country. A monument stands to his memory in Medora, where he established the first of a chain of packing plants which were to have stretched westward from Chicago, if his dream had been realized.

The Bad Lands of South Dakota furnished the committee with an entirely different character of this picturesque and unique scenery than is to be found in the Bad Lands of North Dakota (proposed Roosevelt National Park). The formations of the proposed Teton (Bad Lands) National Park are of a jagged spire type, an extremely unusual formation, as compared with the crimson buttes of North Dakota, and convinced the committee that this area should be given national-park status, in order that it can be properly preserved and administered for the benefit of the thousands of people who pass through this section yearly.

The chief obstacle in the way of properly developing and promoting Rocky Mountain National Park has been the failure of the Colorado Legislature to enact legislation providing for the cession by the State of Colorado of jurisdiction over the park to the United States, as is the case of the other parks in the national system. The Colorado Legislature has now passed such a bill, and it has been signed by the governor. Thus, with its enactment into law by Colorado, it will be necessary for this committee to consider the matter when it is presented to Congress for action. The cession of jurisdiction will open the way for needed development of this park in the bosom of the Rockies, especially in the building and maintenance of highways, and in the development of the area in accordance with high national-park standards. The information and knowledge obtained by the committee's visit to Rocky Mountain National Park will be necessary in the consideration of legislation looking to the proper development of this area.

It is becoming more and more apparent that additional national parks are necessary and needed, in order that the natural wonders and scenic beauties of this great country of ours may be preserved and administered for the benefit and enjoyment of the people of these United States and future generations to come.

The visit to the national parks and proposed park sites herein referred to has given your committee a wealth of valuable information and a far better understanding of park administration, standards, interests, and needs. This information and understanding is necessary to a proper consideration of park problems and development, and will prove exceedingly valuable in the consideration of park legislation by this committee.

ENLARGEMENT OF CAPITOL GROUNDS

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 13929) to provide for the enlarging of the Capitol Grounds.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will state the next amendment of the committee.

The next amendment was, on page 2, line 4, after the word "Northwest," to strike out the period and insert a semicolon.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 2, line 8, to strike out the words "First Street NE.," and insert "Delaware Avenue"; and in line 10, to strike out "subway passing under Delaware Avenue" and insert "depression and subway between New Jersey Avenue and Delaware Avenue, and extending the street-car tracks on C Street from Delaware Avenue to First Street NE.," so as to read:

Closing of C Street to vehicular traffic between New Jersey Avenue and Delaware Avenue, and removal of street-car tracks from C Street and re-laying them in a depression and subway between New Jersey Avenue and Delaware Avenue, and extending the street-car tracks on C Street from Delaware Avenue to First Street NE.

The amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will state the next amendment.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. On page 2, line 17, to strike out after the word "northeast," as follows: "and establishing a convenient subway connection with the basement of the Senate Office Building," and to insert a colon.

The amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill is still in Committee of the Whole and open to amendment. If there be no further amendment to be offered, the bill will be reported to the Senate.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended.

Mr. BLAINE. Mr. President, I desire to offer an amendment to the pending bill, and also to discuss the bill and the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will report the amendment proposed by the Senator from Wisconsin.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. Add to the bill the following additional sections:

That the Secretary of Labor is hereby authorized and directed to provide for the construction, equipment, maintenance, repair, and operation of Government dormitories for women employees of the United States in the District of Columbia, and of such refectories, laundries, power houses, infirmaries, and other structures as, in the opinion of the Secretary of Labor, are suitable and necessary for use in connection with such dormitories. Such dormitories and other buildings may, in the discretion of the Secretary of Labor, be erected either upon the present sites of the Government hotels or dormitories, known as the Capitol group and the Plaza group, between Delaware Avenue and New Jersey Avenue, or upon lands which may be acquired for this purpose in the District of Columbia within a radius of not more than one mile from the Capitol Building. The dormitories shall be capable of accommodating not less than one thousand five hundred nor more than two thousand five hundred persons, and they may be constructed in separate units to accommodate five hundred persons or any multiple of such number.

SEC. 2. That in order to carry out the purposes of this act the Secretary of Labor is hereby authorized and empowered—

(a) To sell for the purpose of removal the existing Government hotels or dormitories referred to in section 1 of this act, or to remove the same and sell or otherwise dispose of the materials used in their construction;

(b) To exercise exclusive direction and control over all matters pertaining to the dormitories and other buildings herein authorized to be constructed and over the Government dormitories fund hereinafter established, through such agency or agencies as he may create or designate;

(c) To make such agreements, contracts, and regulations as he may deem necessary and appropriate;

(d) To appoint, in accordance with the civil service laws, such officers and employees as are necessary for executing the functions vested in him by this act, and, in accordance with the classification act of 1923, to fix the salaries of such officers and employees; and

(e) To acquire by purchase, condemnation, or otherwise such lands as may be necessary.

SEC. 3. (a) There is hereby established a special fund, to be known as the Government dormitories fund (hereinafter referred to as the fund). All amounts received in carrying out the provisions of this act shall be covered into the fund, and are reserved, set aside, and appropriated to be available for use by the Secretary of Labor in accordance with the provisions of subdivision (b) of this section.

(b) The amounts derived from the sale of the bonds hereinafter authorized shall be available only for the payment of the costs of construction and equipment of the dormitories and other buildings herein authorized and for the payment of interest on such bonds during the period of construction. The receipts derived from rentals shall be available for the payment of the principal and interest on such bonds and for defraying the expenses of maintenance, repair, and operation of such dormitories and other buildings. After the payments of the principal and interest on such bonds have been completed, so much of the receipts derived from rentals as are not necessary for defraying such expenses of maintenance, repair, and operation shall be annually covered into the Treasury to the credit of miscellaneous receipts.

SEC. 4. That in order to provide funds for the payment of the costs of construction and equipment of such dormitories and other buildings, the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized, upon request of the Secretary of Labor, to issue bonds of the United States Government of such denominations as the Secretary of the Treasury shall determine and of an aggregate amount not to exceed the sum of $5,000,000. Each such bond (1) shall contain a provision for the payment of the principal of the bond and the interest thereon upon an amortization plan, by means of a fixed number of quarterly installments sufficient to cover the interest upon the unpaid principal and such amounts, to be applied on the principal, as will extinguish the indebtedness within a period of 50 years from the date of issue of the bonds; (2) shall bear interest at a rate not to exceed 5 per cent per annum; and (3) shall be subject to such other terms and conditions as the Secretary of the Treasury may prescribe.

SEC. 5. That the right to occupy such dormitories shall be restricted to women employees of the United States in the District of Columbia. Each such occupant shall be required to pay a weekly charge or rental in an amount determined by the Secretary of Labor to be just and reasonable as between such occupant and the Government. In making such determination the Secretary of Labor shall take into consideration among other factors (1) the total amount necessary for each quarterly period for the payment of the principal and interest on the bonds herein authorized and for defraying the estimated expenses of maintenance, repair, and operation of such dormitories and other buildings, (2) the total number of persons that such dormitories are capable of accommodating, and (3) the relative rental values of the rooms in such dormitories. Upon the completion of the payments of the principal and interest on such bonds the Secretary of Labor may readjust such weekly charges or rentals.

Mr. BLAINE. Mr. President, I think it is unnecessary to call attention to the fact that we had a presidential election campaign in 1928. However, I think it is essential to call attention to the fact that in that campaign the very question embodied in the amendment which I have proposed to the pending bill is one of the issues upon which the Republican nominee appealed for support and upon which he obtained support.

It will be recalled that Mr. Hoover, in his speech of acceptance, declared, "Our problems of the future are problems of construction." That acceptance speech was divided into paragraph headings. One of those headings is "A Nation of Homes," and I am going to quote, in support of the amendment I have proposed, no less authority than the successful candidate for President. I am appealing to the membership on this side of the Chamber that in good faith their votes should be cast for this amendment. Of course, the proposal to furnish living quarters which approach the ideal of a home was initiated before the last presidential campaign. I do not suppose Mr. Hoover had in mind the bill which I introduced at the first session of this Congress, and which bill I now propose as an amendment to the pending measure.

I have no doubt, however, that those who supported Mr. Hoover believe in him, and in the pronouncements he made during the campaign. I have no doubt but that it is quite immaterial to the President elect whether this proposed amendment is adopted before he takes office next Monday or subsequent to his assuming the Presidency of our country.

This proposed amendment embodies in legislative form what tens of thousands of people of America believe to be the most important issue in the presidential campaign. Mr. Hoover, in his acceptance speech, under the paragraph headed "A Nation of Homes," said:

> Our party platform deals mainly with economic problems, but our Nation is not an agglomeration of railroads, of ships, of factories, of dynamos, or statistics.

He said further:

> It is a nation of homes, a nation of men, of women, of children. Every man has a right to ask of us whether the United States is a better place for him, his wife, his children, to live in because the Republican Party has conducted the Government for nearly eight years.

Mr. President, these words which he spoke and this language which he used must have referred to homes for everyone, whether in private life or as employees of this great Government of ours.

Continuing he said:

> Every woman has a right to ask whether her life, her home, her hopes, her happiness will be better assured by the continuance of the Republican Party in power.

In that paragraph he concluded:

> I propose to discuss the questions before me in that light.

That is the language of the President elect. Paraphrasing his concluding sentence I say I propose to discuss these questions, in so far as they relate to homes for women employed by the Government of the United States within the District of Columbia, here this night. I shall endeavor to show the pressing necessity, the urgent demand for decent living quarters at reasonable prices for the women who so faithfully serve this Government.

The women employees of our Government in the main are not residents of the District of Columbia. They come from everywhere, from the North, from the South, from the East, and from the West. They come from every State in the Union. Those women are your constituents. They are serving your Government. I am quite certain that no one will disagree with me when I suggest that efficiency of the highest character comes from satisfied employees. There is something more in the life that we lead than the simple necessities of life. Life under drudgery, life surrounded by environments that depress the mind and the soul, life that has no other course than the mere routine labor, is a life that is scarcely worth living. It was designed in the creation of life that there should be some opportunity for mental development and cultural development. Those opportunities are not afforded unless there is a reasonable provision for the physical comfort.

Mr. President, I want to look into some of these homes in the city of Washington. This is a great metropolitan center. It is a location sought almost by the tens of thousands who enjoy ignoble ease and whose vast fortunes can be counted only by the tens of millions. Here the very citadel of wealth, the great Government of the United States, is about to abandon the only housing proposition for Government employees and the committee proposes to abandon the only housing conditions that the Government sustains without any substitution therefor.

What are the homes of many of the faithful women who are doing their daily toil, the arduous tasks, in the departments of our Government? One of these employees, who has given six years of her life in the service of her Government in Washington, has been paid the fabulous, unprecedented salary of $1,440 a year. It is true that that is not the average salary. I will direct my attention to that question a little later. But what kind of a home is afforded for some of these women employed at the salary of $1,440 a year?

Mr. Hoover, when he was a candidate for President, said that—> every woman has the right to ask whether her life, her home, her hopes, her happiness, will be better assured by the continuance of the Republican Party in power.

Yes; she has a right to ask that question, and it is our duty to grant to those Government employees an opportunity that they may have a decent home in Washington at reasonable cost. Let us look into some of these homes. This is but one among many. I am about to quote from a statement of one of the women in the employ of our Government. She is one of those who receive this fabulous salary of $1,440 a year. She said:

> Many of us can only afford $20 a month for a room.

That is $240 out of her meager salary every year. What kind of living quarters does this mean? I am speaking now of some of the private lodging and boarding houses in the city of Washington where some of these women make their domiciles.

In these rooms there is no closet space; nothing but a little corner curtained off in which to hang clothes on which the dust of the carpets may rest. There are no towels, linens sometimes unfit for covering the body; filthy rooms with little heat. Some of these rooms are located in so-called apartments where the women must climb 2, 3, and 4 flights of stairways before reaching their rooms. They are even without a bathroom upon the floor where their rooms are located.

By the abandonment of the so-called Government hotels the Republican Party proposes solemnly to decree that some 600 or 800 women now occupying those hotels must go out and search for rooms which they must rent at a very low cost because of the meager salaries paid to those employees.

The city of Washington is quite distinct from any other city in the United States. The great plan that has been worked out for the beautification of the Capital of the United States through added parks and open spaces, has had a tendency and a very rapid tendency toward a tremendous unearned increase in land values, with the result that these employees must pay not only what would be the normal cost of respectable living quarters but as well must pay their proportionate share to make up earnings for the landlord upon an inflated value which has come to him not through any effort of his own, but rather because of these great improvements, the cost of which comes out of the people of America and out of the pockets of our employees not only in taxes but as well in the stingy treatment of the workers for our Government, in the failure of the Government to pay them a decent wage to meet the ever-increasing cost of living.

Mr. President, there are other elements entering into the situation which in my opinion demand that the Government of the United States make a special effort to provide for the proper housing of our Government employees. The problem of housing is becoming an acute problem in all the large cities of our country. It has been seriously considered and deeply studied by the State of New York. Governor Smith during his term as Governor of the Empire State turned his attention to this problem. The great centers, some commercial, some industrial, others of a special character such as is Washington, are developing one of the most serious problems confronting the solution of those responsible for our several governments. The congested areas of these great cities are bringing far greater problems than the mere problem of furnishing places in which people may live.

I am sure that the distinguished Senator from New York [Mr. COPELAND], skilled I know in the line of medical science, appreciates the necessity of well-lighted, well-heated, well-ventilated homes, with open spaces for the breathing of fresh air given to us by the Creator, and I want to congratulate the State of New York, so ably represented as it is by the distinguished medical authority, in having taken advanced steps in relation to this problem of housing. I am sorry, indeed, that I have not the voice, the experience, the ability, the knowledge, and the scientific understanding of the distinguished Senator from New York. I am making an especial appeal to one of the Members of this body, whom I know to be deeply interested in the problems of health, in the hope that I may have the force of his experience and his understanding behind this measure which I propose as an amendment to the so-called plaza bill.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President——

Mr. BLAINE. I yield to the Senator from New York.

Mr. COPELAND. I am very much obliged to the distinguished Senator from Wisconsin for his kind reference to me. There can be no doubt that there is no more important question than the proper housing of the people. I was a member of the District of Columbia Committee immediately after the World War, when we had to consider the serious housing problem in Washington and the question of the price to be paid for rent. At that time we made an extensive survey of the city to see how well housed the people were or how well housed they might be.

There can be no doubt that the Senator from Wisconsin is on sound ground when he pleads for proper housing for the employees of our Government. We must make every effort to see to it that there is such housing. I shall be very glad, Mr. President, to join with the Senator in any movement looking to the improvement of the housing conditions in this city. He may count upon my very hearty and cordial support.

Mr. BLAINE. Mr. President, I assure the Senator from New York that I deeply appreciate the interest and the efforts of the distinguished Senator from New York, and I have given my reasons why I am sure he can bring great force to bear on this movement, so that it may become a success in the very near future if we can not adopt my amendment to-night.

Mr. COUZENS. Mr. President, will the Senator from Wisconsin yield to me?

Mr. BLAINE. For what purpose?

Mr. COUZENS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. ODDIE in the chair). Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from Michigan?

Mr. BLAINE. I yield.

Mr. COUZENS. I move that the Senate take a recess until to-morrow morning at 11 o'clock.

Mr. NYE. Mr. President, the Senator from Wisconsin having yielded for that purpose, does he lose the floor?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will lose the floor if he yields for that motion.

Mr. COUZENS. I move that the Senate take a recess until 11 o'clock to-morrow morning.

Mr. TRAMMELL. Mr. President——

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Couzens	Heflin	Norbeck

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Sixty-one Senators having answered to their names, a quorum is present. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from Michigan [Mr. COUZENS].

Mr. WATSON obtained the floor.

Mr. COUZENS. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry: Is this motion debatable?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is not.

SEVERAL SENATORS. Let us have the yeas and nays.

Mr. BROUSSARD. What is the motion?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Michigan [Mr. COUZENS] has moved that the Senate take a recess until 11 o'clock to-morrow.

Mr. WATSON. And I move to amend that motion by making it 10 o'clock Monday morning.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Indiana to the motion of the Senator from Michigan.

Mr. NYE. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry: Is a motion such as that offered by the Senator from Michigan amendable?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Under the precedents of the Senate, yes. It is not debatable.

Mr. HEFLIN. I call for the yeas and nays.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Indiana to the motion of the Senator from Michigan.

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. President, I move, as an amendment to the amendment of the Senator from Indiana, that the Senate take a recess until 11.10 to-morrow.

Mr. HEFLIN. That motion is out of order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. BINGHAM] to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Indiana [Mr. WATSON].

Mr. COUZENS. On that I call for the yeas and nays.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. President, I move, as a substitute, that the Senate recess——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That amendment would be in the third degree, and can not be entertained.

Mr. BLACK. I offer a substitute, Mr. President.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Pennsylvania will state it.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. Can not the Senator from Alabama move a substitute for the original motion of the Senator from Michigan; and, if he does so move, does not his motion take priority?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The attempt to amend or to deal with the original motion has gone as far as it can.

The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. BINGHAM] to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Indiana [Mr. WATSON] to the motion of the Senator from Michigan [Mr. COUZENS].

Mr. BLACK. Mr. President, I move that the Senate adjourn until Monday morning at 10 o'clock.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. That motion is in order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That motion takes precedence of everything.

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. President, I move to amend that motion——

Mr. KING. Is that motion debatable?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is not at any stage.

Mr. FESS. Mr. President, I rise to a point of order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Ohio will state it.

Mr. FESS. Is a motion to adjourn in a qualified form in order at this stage? The motion was to adjourn until a certain time.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. A motion to adjourn to a time certain is a privileged motion.

Mr. FESS. That is when we vote to fix the time to adjourn, but not on a motion to adjourn.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will hold that this is one of the privileged motions. The question is upon the motion of the Senator from Alabama that the Senate adjourn until 10 o'clock Monday morning.

Mr. FESS. That is not in order.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Kentucky will state it.

Mr. BARKLEY. Is the motion of the Senator from Alabama subject to amendment?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It being to adjourn to a day certain?

Mr. BARKLEY. Yes, sir.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Certainly.

Mr. BARKLEY. I move to amend the motion by making it 11.10 to-morrow.

Mr. SACKETT. Mr. President, how about the special order which says that we shall meet at 11 o'clock for the remainder of the session?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. This would supersede any arrangement of that sort.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. President, I desire to withdraw the motion I made, and move that the Senate adjourn.

Mr. FESS. That is in order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That motion is in order. It would carry the Senate until 12 o'clock Monday.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. Mr. President, a point of order. The standing order of the Senate is that the hour of daily meeting of the Senate be 11 o'clock a. m. for the remainder of the present session of Congress.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That will carry it until Monday at 11 o'clock.

Mr. SACKETT. That is the point I was making.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Alabama [Mr. BLACK].

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator will state it.

Mr. BINGHAM. Is it true that a motion to adjourn is not amendable in any form?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. A straight motion to adjourn? No.

Mr. HEFLIN and Mr. BLACK called for the yeas and nays, and they were ordered.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Chief Clerk called the roll.

Mr. JONES. I desire to announce the following general pairs:

The Senator from Connecticut [Mr. MCLEAN] with the Senator from Virginia [Mr. GLASS];

The Senator from Delaware [Mr. HASTINGS] with the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. MCKELLAR];

The Senator from Colorado [Mr. PHIPPS] with the Senator from Georgia [Mr. GEORGE];

The Senator from New Jersey [Mr. EDGE] with the Senator from Virginia [Mr. SWANSON]; and

The Senator from California [Mr. SHORTRIDGE] with the Senator from Maryland [Mr. TYDINGS].

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania (after having voted in the affirmative). I transfer my general pair with the Senator from Delaware [Mr. BAYARD] to the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. GILLETT] and allow my vote to stand.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas (after having voted in the affirmative). I have a pair with the Senator from Kansas [Mr. CURTIS]. I transfer that pair to the junior Senator from Arkansas [Mr. CARAWAY] and let my vote stand.

Mr. WARREN. I transfer my general pair with the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. OVERMAN] to the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. LARRAZOLO], and vote "yea."

Mr. BURTON. I transfer my pair with the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS] to the Senator from Vermont [Mr. GREENE], and vote "yea."

The result was announced—yeas 16, nays 42, as follows:

YEAS—16

Black	Harrison	Neely	Steck
Burton	Hayden	Reed, Pa.	Trammell
Hale	Heflin	Robinson, Ark.	Warren
Harris	Mayfield	Sheppard	Watson

Ransdell	Smoot	Tydings
Shipstead	Stephens	Tyson
Shortridge	Swanson	Wagner

So the Senate refused to adjourn.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator will state his inquiry.

Mr. NORRIS. If the Senate should adjourn without any condition, just taking a straight adjournment, would it not follow that it could not reconvene until the expiration of this Congress, and that it would be the end of the Senate, as far as this session is concerned?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will answer that in the negative, because under the standing order the Senate would come in at 11 o'clock on Monday, which would be an hour prior to noon of March 4. But on the point whether it would be the end of the Senate, the Chair will answer that in the affirmative.

Mr. NYE. Mr. President, I move now that the Senate take a recess until 11 o'clock to-morrow morning.

Mr. MOSES. That is in the third degree. There is already the motion of the Senator from Michigan [Mr. COUZENS] with the amendment proposed by the Senator from Indiana [Mr. WATSON], and the amendment to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. BINGHAM], and upon this last stated question the Senate will now vote.

Mr. WATSON. May they all be stated?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Michigan moves that the Senate take a recess until 11 o'clock to-morrow.

The Senator from Indiana moves to amend so that the Senate would recess until 10 o'clock on Monday.

The Senator from Connecticut moves to amend the amendment by asking that the Senate take a recess until 11.10 to-morrow, and on that question the Senate will now vote.

Mr. COUZENS. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Chief Clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas (when his name was called). I have a pair with the Senator from Kansas [Mr. CURTIS], which I transfer to the junior Senator from Arkansas [Mr. CARAWAY], and vote "nay."

Mr. WARREN (when his name was called). Making the same announcement as to my pair and its transfer as on the previous vote, I vote "nay."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania (after having voted in the negative). I have a general pair with the Senator from Delaware [Mr. BAYARD], which I transfer to the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. GILLETT], and allow my vote to stand.

Mr. JONES. I desire to announce the following general pairs:

The Senator from Connecticut [Mr. MCLEAN] with the Senator from Virginia [Mr. GLASS];

The Senator from Delaware [Mr. HASTINGS] with the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. MCKELLAR];

The Senator from Colorado [Mr. PHIPPS] with the Senator from Georgia [Mr. GEORGE];

The Senator from New Jersey [Mr. EDGE] with the Senator from Virginia [Mr. SWANSON]; and

The Senator from California [Mr. SHORTRIDGE] with the Senator from Maryland [Mr. TYDINGS].

Mr. BURTON. Making the same announcement as on the previous vote, I vote "yea."

Mr. ASHURST (after having voted in the negative). I desire to withdraw my vote.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. I challenge the count of the vote, and ask that it may be read again.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The vote will be recapitulated.

The vote was recapitulated.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Before announcing the vote, the Chair wishes to read to the Senate Rule XII, and call the special attention of the Senator from Arizona [Mr. ASHURST] to it. It is as follows:

> When the yeas and nays are ordered, the names of Senators shall be called alphabetically; and each Senator shall, without debate, declare his assent or dissent to the questions, unless excused by the Senate; and no Senator shall be permitted to vote after the decision shall have been announced by the Presiding Officer, but may for sufficient reasons, with unanimous consent, change or withdraw his vote. No motion to suspend this rule shall be in order, nor shall the Presiding Officer entertain any request to suspend it by unanimous consent.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, it was obvious that I was under a misapprehension owing to some failure on the part of the Chair properly to state the question. I wish to vote to preserve the immigration law as it now is.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Then, if the Senator wishes the Chair to give him an answer to that as a parliamentary inquiry, the Chair should permit his negative vote to stand.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I submit the Chair is not competent to decide that question.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair is still a Senator, and has some rights as such.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, the question before the Senate is on the motion to take a recess until 11.10 o'clock to-morrow. No parliamentary question arises on the effect of that motion.

Mr. JOHNSON. I ask that the vote be announced.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. Mr. President, I change my vote from "nay" to "yea" for the purpose of enabling me to move for a reconsideration.

Mr. DILL. I object. That can only be done by unanimous consent.

The result was announced—yeas 31, nays 27, as follows:

YEAS—31

Bingham	Couzens	Jones	Oddie
Blaine	Deneen	Keyes	Reed, Pa.
Brookhart	Dill	King	Schall
Broussard	Fess	McMaster	Thomas, Idaho
Bruce	Frazier	Metcalf	Vandenberg

So Mr. BINGHAM's amendment to Mr. WATSON's amendment was agreed to.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. Mr. President, I move a reconsideration of the vote by which the amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. President, the Senate having recessed until 11.10 a. m. to-morrow, that motion is not in order until 11.10 a. m. to-morrow.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senate has not recessed until 11.10 a. m. to-morrow yet. The Senate has merely amended the amendment of the Senator from Indiana to the motion of the Senator from Michigan. The question now recurs to the amendment of the Senator from Indiana as amended.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, I move to lay the amendment as amended on the table.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The vote just taken developed the presence of a quorum, so the suggestion is not in order.

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. President, a point of order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator will state the point of order.

Mr. BINGHAM. Does the Chair hold that a motion to lay on the table takes precedence over a motion to recess?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Having been amended in as many degrees as it has, the Chair so holds.

Mr. BINGHAM. Oh, no, Mr. President.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator desire to appeal from the decision of the Chair? If so, the question is——

Mr. BINGHAM. I hesitate to appeal from the decision of so distinguished a parliamentarian as the present occupant of the Chair, but I am sure that if the Senator who is now occupying the Chair will look at the rule he will see that he is in error.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair prefers to have the appeal taken and the question submitted to the Senate.

Mr. BINGHAM. If the Chair prefers to have the appeal taken, I appeal from the decision of the Chair.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is, Shall the decision of the Chair stand as the judgment of the Senate?

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. On that question I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Chief Clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. BRUCE (when his name was called). "Not that I love Caesar less, but that I love Rome more," I vote "nay."

Mr. BURTON (when his name was called). I have a pair with the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS]. I transfer that pair to the Senator from Vermont [Mr. GREENE] and vote "nay."

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania (when his name was called). Making the same announcement as on the previous vote, I vote "yea."

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas (when his name was called). As heretofore stated, I have a pair with the senior Senator from Kansas [Mr. CURTIS] which I transfer to the junior Senator from Arkansas [Mr. CARAWAY], and vote "nay."

Mr. WARREN (when his name was called). Making the same transfer as before, I vote "yea."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. JONES. I desire to announce the following general pairs:

The Senator from Delaware [Mr. HASTINGS] with the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. MCKELLAR];

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The decision of the Chair is not sustained. The question now recurs upon the amendment of the Senator from Indiana [Mr. WATSON] as amended.

Mr. HEFLIN. On that I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question recurs upon the motion of the Senator from Michigan [Mr. COUZENS] as amended.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, what is the question now?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion of the Senator from Michigan to take a recess until to-morrow morning at 11 o'clock having been amended by the adoption of the amendment of the Senator from Indiana [Mr. WATSON] as amended, the question now is, Shall the Senate recess until 11.10 to-morrow morning?

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

SATURDAY, March 2, 1929

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. James Shera Montgomery, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Because of the Father's mercy we are here. We thank Thee, for Thy stars have been watching overhead. A prevailing Providence has laid its hand upon us, and called us to manifold service. Thou hast charged us with great responsibilities and put us in trust of great things, from which there is no escape. Oh, the pain and the bliss of living! Merciful Lord God, when we were impatient, it was because we were weak; when we were harsh, it was because our wisdom was imperfect. Forgive us and let us rest quietly and hope confidently that we have the approval of Thy benediction. The scenes of this Congress are closing; we are helped because of its memories and associations. The union of hearts and minds will soon be severed. We would not close the door with a restless or impatient hand. O God, bless our Speaker, all Members, officers, and pages. Keep bright and radiant every sky and cleanse the last cloud from every horizon. Lead us on; carry us when weary, and always provide strength according to our need. Ever clothe us with peace and happiness; always hold us in the sweet and beautiful trust that some time, some way, some where we shall meet in the perfect day. In this tranquil moment we think of that Member who was associated with the intimate work of this Congress. The Grim Reaper has called; he who stood high in the scale of service answered. We cast at his bier loving tokens of esteem and appreciation. Remember the family in the deep night of its sorrow. Through Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. TILSON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that all Members of the House may have until the last issue of the RECORD is printed to extend their own remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Connecticut asks unanimous consent that all Members of the House may have permission to extend their own remarks in the RECORD until the last day on which the RECORD is printed. Is there objection?

Mr. O'CONNELL. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, and I am not going to object, of course, could the gentleman fix any definite date?

Mr. TILSON. The announcement is printed on the front page of the RECORD of yesterday that the last issue will be printed on March 15, and advises that matters for publication in the RECORD of the Seventieth Congress be submitted before that time. Mr. Speaker, it is understood that if a Member wishes to extend his remarks on different subjects he may do so, and he is not limited except as to his own remarks.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TILSON. Yes.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. If a Member desires to insert anything in connection with his remarks he must secure special permission from the House?

Mr. TILSON. It is so understood. I suppose that a mere extract or excerpt which a Member uses as a text might be included in his own remarks, but any substantial extension of matter other than his own remarks may only be inserted in the RECORD by special permission.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I would like to inquire whether the gentleman means that there may be several extensions upon different subjects?

Mr. TILSON. It is understood that a Member may extend on as many different subjects as he desires.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Mr. Speaker, one more question with reference to the remarks that may be extended upon the lives of deceased Members. The House has entered a rule permitting extensions of that character, and I would like to know whether under that permission we may quote from papers, articles, or information with reference to a deceased Member personally?

Mr. TILSON. I suppose the same rule would apply—that any reasonable quotation used to illustrate or amplify a gentleman's own remarks might be included.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. And that must all be done before the final print of the RECORD?

Mr. TILSON. I think that is included in my request.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

INAUGURATION CEREMONIES

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, I desire to make an announcement about the ceremonies on Monday. Every Member of the House must have his own ticket of identification to go on the Senate floor. There will be policemen there who do not know the Members; and in order to go upon the Senate floor, a Member must have his own ticket, and no one will be exempt from that rule. It has been reported to the Sergeant at Arms of the Senate that some Members have already given their tickets to other people, and that those people will present them at the Senate doors. I hope such is not the case, for they may be refused at the door. I wish to say further that the House must leave this Chamber promptly at 11.40 on Monday.

IMPEACHMENT OF JUDGE FRANCIS A. WINSLOW

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Speaker, I rise to a question of the highest constitutional privilege.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. I rise to formally impeach Francis A. Winslow, a Federal judge of the southern district of New York.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will present a resolution.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. On my responsibility as a Member of this House, by virtue of the duties vested in a Member of Congress by the Constitution, I now formally impeach Francis A. Winslow, a judge of the United States District Court for the Southern District of New York, and here charge him with the commission of high crimes and misdemeanors as herein set forth:

1. That the said Francis A. Winslow, having been nominated by the President of the United States, confirmed by the Senate of the United States, duly qualified and commissioned, and while acting as a district judge for the southern district of New York, did on divers and various occasions so abuse the powers of his high office and so misconducted himself as he is charged with corruption, collusion, favoritism, oppression, and judicial misconduct whereby he has brought the administration of justice in said district in the court of which he is judge into disrepute by his aforesaid misconduct and acts and is guilty of misbehavior and misconduct, falling under the constitutional provision as ground for impeachment and removal from office.

2. That the said Francis A. Winslow did suffer one Marcus Helfand to represent himself as an intimate friend of the said Judge Winslow, able to obtain favorable judicial decisions, orders, and ruling and the said Marcus Helfand, with the knowledge, collusion, or connivance of the said Judge Winslow, did so represent himself to many members of the bar of the city of New York who had cases and litigation pending in the said southern district of New York, and did, as a result of said representation, and with the knowledge, collusion, or connivance of the said Judge Winslow, appear repeatedly before the said judge as counsel of record and as special counsel, and did repeatedly receive favorable decisions, orders, and rulings, and all of such decisions, orders, and rulings are matters of record in the said court for the southern district of New York, all of which records are made part of these charges and impeachment as if herein fully set forth.

3. That the said Marcus Helfand, with the knowledge, collusion, or connivance of the said Francis A. Winslow did actually obtain an unbroken line of favorable decisions, orders, and rulings, whereby the said Judge Winslow has brought the administration of justice in said district in the court of which he is a judge into disrepute.

4. That the said Judge Winslow has made repeated appointments of a small group of men to receiverships and special masters, which group in turn appoint to other positions persons closely associated with said Judge Winslow either by ties of marriage, previous business relationship, or personal favor, constituting said group into a ring which, through its commonly known connections and influence with said Judge Winslow, has harassed and damaged legitimate business and has depleted with excessive expenses and fees, all approved by said Judge Winslow, bankrupt estates, thereby preventing legitimate creditors from obtaining their just distributive share of the assets out of the various bankrupt estates.

5. In the aforedescribed ring of favored lawyers there is one David Steinhadt indicted for shortage in his accounts as receiver and for larceny, and who is now a fugitive from justice and who was repeatedly appointed by the said Francis A. Winslow as receiver notwithstanding that he had not properly accounted in no less than 16 estates previously intrusted to him, all of which was known to the said Judge Winslow at the time of such appointments.

6. That the said Judge Francis A. Winslow, prompted by improper motives and considerations, among which was the sudden appearance as special counsel of the aforesaid Marcus Helfand after the completion of the trial and solely for the purpose of obtaining special consideration and favor, the said Judge Winslow imposed an unusually light sentence of 30 days in the city jail on one Walter Gutterson, convicted of having used the mails in a scheme to defraud; the said mild sentence having ostensibly been justified in open court on a promise of restitution to the extent of $100,000 to the several persons, victims of the fraud, while the said Judge Winslow then and there denied the motion of the assistant district attorney to make such light sentence conditioned on the actual restitution of the money to the victims of the fraud; that the said Walter Gutterson and his special attorney, Marcus Helfand, did not intend, and as a matter of fact did not make any such restitution, all with the knowledge, connivance, or consent of the said Judge Winslow.

7. That the said Judge Francis A. Winslow on divers occasions, improperly and for improper consideration, so conducted the trial of criminal cases as to prejudice the jury against the Government of the United States prosecuting said cases, so interjected himself in the examination of witnesses as to intimidate the witnesses or to confuse the issues, so abused and harassed the assistant district attorney charged with the trial of the case as to discredit him entirely to the jury, all with the improper purpose and intent of obtaining a verdict of acquittal for the said defendants on divers occasions on trial before him.

8. That the said Marcus Helfand, with the knowledge, consent, or connivance of the said Judge Francis A. Winslow, did make an arrangement with one Meyer Kaplan whereby he, said Marcus Helfand, would obtain from the said Judge Winslow a suspension of sentence on the payment by the said Kaplan of a large sum of money; and conditioned further that another payment should be made before the expiration of the period of probation; and that when the said Meyer Kaplan was unable to make the said last payment to the said Helfand, the said Francis A. Winslow did commit the said Kaplan to the penitentiary at Atlanta for a term of 18 months.

9. That subsequent to the introduction of House Resolution 320 on February 12, 1929, and subsequent to the issuance of a subpœna served upon one Harry J. Halperin to appear and testify before a Federal grand jury sitting in and for the southern district of New York, the said Marcus Helfand and others, with the knowledge, consent, or connivance of the said Judge Francis A. Winslow, did threaten, coerce, and otherwise improperly sought to induce the said Harry J. Halperin to testify falsely concerning the Kaplan case and particularly concerning his personal knowledge of the negotiations and details in the aforesaid matter of Meyer Kaplan as set forth in paragraph 8 herein.

10. That one Stewart Eaton, related by marriage to the said Judge Winslow, together with one E. Bright Wilson, Bernard A. Grossman, jr., and Stephen Goble, acting as trustees in bankruptcy for the Goody Shop, did with the knowledge, consent, or connivance of the said Judge Winslow, take from assets of the said bankrupt estate one Packard car and that the said Packard car has since been used by the said Stewart Eaton and the said Judge Winslow, its unlawful origin and unlawful possession being known by the said Judge Winslow.

11. That the said Judge Francis A. Winslow, in collusion and connivance with the aforesaid Marcus Helfand and others, did misuse and abuse his high office in an equity cause known as the Manhatten Mortgage Corporation, complainant, v. Archer Builders (Inc.) (Equity Cause 41/252) pending in the said southern court of the southern district of New York; and as a result of such improper judicial conduct by the said Francis A. Winslow, the said Marcus Helfand and others, acting with the knowledge, consent, or connivance of the said Judge Winslow, did so misadminister said estate, improperly divert its assets, and commit other improper and unlawful acts as to cause large losses to the stockholders of the said Archer Builders (Inc.). Reference is particularly made to the papers, orders, decisions, and rulings in said case and other records now on file in said court for the southern district of New York as if fully set forth herein.

12. That on divers occasions, the said Francis A. Winslow, in consideration for privileges and favors granted by him in his judicial capacity to said Marcus Helfand, Stewart Eaton, E. Bright Wilson, and others, constituting a so-called bankruptcy ring, did improperly receive gratuities, presents, gifts, and things of value.

All to the scandal and disrepute of said court and the administration of justice therein.

Mr. Speaker, I ask immediate reference of this resolution to the Committee on the Judiciary of the House.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. LAGUARDIA submits the following resolution:

House Resolution 347

"Resolved, That Francis A. Winslow, United States district judge for the southern district of New York be impeached of high crimes and misdemeanors in office as hereinbelow in part specifically set forth."

The SPEAKER. Without objection, in view of the fact that the resolution has been read, further reading of the resolution will be dispensed with and the resolution referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

SUBCOMMITTEE OF THE COMMITTEE ON THE JUDICIARY

Mr. GRAHAM. Mr. Speaker, I rise to present a resolution (H. J. Res. 434) to appoint HOMER W. HALL, a member of the subcommittee of the Committee on the Judiciary established under House Joint Resolution 431, to inquire into the official conduct of Grover M. Moscowitz, United States district judge for the eastern district of New York.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the resolution.

House Joint Resolution 434

Resolved, etc., That HOMER W. HALL, a member of the Committee on the Judiciary of the House of Representatives, be, and he is hereby, appointed a member of the subcommittee of the Committee on the Judiciary of the House of Representatives established by House Joint Resolution 431, to inquire into the official conduct of Grover M. Moscowitz, United States district judge for the eastern district of New York, vice Royal H. Weller, deceased.

Mr. GRAHAM. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question.

Mr. CELLER. Will the gentleman reserve that for a minute?

Mr. GRAHAM. I will. But let me say that I have consulted with the Democratic members of the Judiciary Committee—the gentleman from Texas [Mr. SUMNERS] and the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. MONTAGUE] and others, and they concur in the presentation of this resolution.

Mr. CELLER. Did the gentleman consult with the members of the New York delegation, which, as the result of the death of Mr. Weller, will not have any representation on the Judiciary Committee?

Mr. GRAHAM. I did not; this is an emergency resolution. I only learned last night of the announcement of Mr. Weller's death, and after consulting with members of the Judiciary Committee this resolution was prepared to fill the vacancy. There is no one on the committee that I know of that can be put in to fill the vacancy except those who are going out of Congress.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

On motion of Mr. GRAHAM, a motion to reconsider the vote whereby the resolution was agreed to was laid on the table.

THE DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR APPROPRIATION BILL

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Speaker, I offer the conference report on the Department of the Interior appropriation bill and ask for its immediate consideration. I ask unanimous consent that the statement be read in lieu of the report.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Michigan?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the statement accompanying the conference report on H. R. 15089, making appropriations for the Department of the Interior for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1930, and for other purposes.

The conference report and statement are as follows:

CONFERENCE REPORT

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on Senate amendment numbered 39, as amended, to the bill (H. R. 15089) making appropriations for the Department of the Interior for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1930, and for other purposes, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

Amendment numbered 39: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 39 as amended, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the matter stricken out and the matter inserted, insert the following: "or by condemnation under the provisions of the act of August 1, 1888 (U. S. C., p. 1302, sec. 257), whenever in the opinion of the Secretary of the Interior acquisition by condemnation proceedings is necessary or advantageous to the Government, such condemnation proceedings not to be resorted to for acquisition of lands in Acadia, Glacier, Grand Canyon, Great Smoky, Hot Springs, Platt, or Yellowstone National Parks not leased to others but occupied by the owner and used exclusively for residence or religious purposes by such owner"; and the Senate agree to the same.

STATEMENT

The managers on the part of the House at the conference on the disagreeing vote of the two Houses on the amendment of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 15089) making appropriations for the Department of the Interior for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1930, and for other purposes, submit the following statement in explanation of the effect of the action agreed upon by the conference committee and embodied in the accompanying conference report, as to the amendment, as follows:

On No. 39: The Senate had striken from the bill the House provision for the condemnation of privately owned lands within the national parks and national monuments and subsequently amended this provision by allowing the condemnation to stand but excepting from its operation the privately owned lands in all of the parks and monuments now used exclusively for residence, hotel, or religious purposes. The conference agreement restores the House provision for the condemnation of the privately owned lands but modifies it in such a way as to exempt privately owned lands in the Acadia, Glacier, Grand Canyon, Great Smoky, Platt, Hot Springs, or Yellowstone National Parks, if such lands in these specified parks are used by the owner exclusively for residence or religious purposes.

Mr. SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the conference report.

The conference report was agreed to.

THE DEMOCRATIC CAUCUS

Mr. KINCHELOE. Mr. Speaker, by direction of the Democratic caucus, I ask unanimous consent to insert a speech made by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. SUMNERS] placing the gentleman from Texas [Mr. GARNER] in nomination, and the speech of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. Box] in presenting a watch to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GARRETT].

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kentucky asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD by printing some speeches in the Democratic caucus on yesterday. Is there objection?

Mr. TILSON. Reserving the right to object, and I shall not object, would the gentleman insert also the speech that the gentleman from Tennesse [Mr. GARRETT] made in reply? I have understood from Democratic sources, of course, that it was a very able and interesting speech.

Mr. KINCHELOE. I would gladly do so, but the gentleman from Tennessee was taken so completely by surprise that he did not have a prepared speech.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

NOMINATION OF HON. JOHN N. GARNER

Mr. KINCHELOE. Mr. Speaker, under leave heretofore granted me to extend my remarks in the RECORD I do so by inserting a speech made by Hon. HATTON W. SUMNERS, Member of Congress from Texas, in the Democratic caucus held in the House Chamber March 1, 1929, placing in nomination the Hon. JOHN N. GARNER, Member of Congress from Texas, as the nominee of the caucus for the office of Speaker of the House of Representatives.

The speech is as follows:

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Ladies and gentlemen of the Democratic caucus, we are assembled to transact the serious business of a great party, at a time when thoughtful members of the party know that there is involved in our situation and circumstances the question whether we shall remain one of the two major parties or shall go into dissolution while another party comes into the field in our stead. That determination is going to depend in no small degree upon the vigor and efficiency of our leadership during the next two years, and the solidarity of the Democratic minority in the House.

Governments are not accidents. They are provided for in the big economy. They operate under natural laws. Viewed in the larger aspects, they select the human agencies through which they function. Selection or rejection of political parties depends in substantial degree, at least, upon the efficiency with which they serve the public interest.

Whether the Democratic party shall live, and come again to power depends upon whether in this time of as great need as this Nation ever had, it can, and will, respond with a vigilant, aggressive, courageous party organization, following in solidarity a wise and effective leadership, in the protection of the rights and opportunities of the average man, and the protection of private interests themselves, against the inevitable consequences of the abusive exercise of the power, financial and political, of great groups which now dominate in this country.

With a rapidity unequaled in the economic and governmental history of the world, we are moving toward those conditions and positions from which heretofore those who have so moved, without exception, have been driven back in diastrous retreat.

Only the foolish person, untaught by the lesson of the past, is not asking himself now, if we can preserve a democracy in government, if we destroy democracy in opportunity, who is not asking himself if a feudalism in business and in industry will not bring to us results comparable to those which in the history of our ancestors were incident to the establishment of feudalism in land tenures. The rapidity with which the free yeomen of industry and of business are being driven out and subjugated by the invasion of great organizations, as alien to our institutions as would be an invading host from a foreign land, can not fail to arrest the apprehensive attention of all thoughtful people. The average man must have a champion, will have a champion. It will be either the Democratic Party, conservatively progressive, which, while protecting the legitimate right of property, will hold pride, greed, and thirst for power within bounds safe for the opportunity and the economic liberty of the people, or the people goaded to desperation will rise in economic revolution and under mob political leadership will seize upon the powers of government and with these powers will smash the vaults of special interest and sweep on far beyond, leaving chaos in their wake. The new school of economic philosophy, under the teachings of which it is urged that political support be denied to the Democratic Party, which stands in the middle position, will not be able to protect those whom it is guiding to their own destruction, when the inevitable reaction comes. The Democratic Party is not an enemy of the legitimate aspiration of private interest. It would protect them against their own folly. At such a time, in such a situation, where the Nation's interest and the economic peace and security of the people challenge the Democratic Party to the greatest possible solidarity, and to produce its wisest leadership, we, the Democratic Members of this House come to the selection of our own leader, upon whose leadership, and upon the wisdom of the counsel and cooperation and loyalty together of those whom he is to lead, will depend in great degree not only the fate of the party, but in my judgment the happiness and the economic independence of the people and the political peace of the country.

This situation requires a leader of aggression, trained to his duties, of clear judgment, one who can inspire the respect and, in action, hold the confidence and support of those whom he leads; a man who is the master of political strategy and whose love for his country and service to his party links the weal of his country with the fortunes of his party. Such a man the Texas delegation presents to the Democrats of the House in the person of Hon. JOHN N. GARNER, of demonstrated ability, who in full measure, meets the challenge of the situation.

Mr. Chairman, I nominate the Hon. JOHN N. GARNER to be the leader of the Democrats of the House of Representatives of the Seventy-first Congress, and their candidate for the Speakership of the House for that Congress.

HON. FINIS J. GARRETT

Mr. KINCHELOE. Mr. Speaker, under leave heretofore granted me to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I do so by inserting a speech made by Hon. JOHN C. Box, Member of Congress from Texas, in the Democratic caucus held in the House Chamber on March 1, 1929, presenting a watch and chain to Hon. FINIS J. GARRETT, Member of Congress from Tennessee, contributed by the Democratic Members of the Seventieth Congress.

This speech is as follows:

Mr. Box. Mr. Chairman, ladies, and gentlemen, men of strong and dependable character are not usually pretentious or pompous. One of the many admirable qualities of the gentleman who has led the Democrats of this House for several years is his reality and his freedom from "put on."

Courtesy well becomes one in high place. After serving 10 years as a subordinate in the Democratic ranks I can truly say that I never saw the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GARRETT] treat friend or foe with even slight discourtesy. In daily contact with Members, whether raw recruits or veterans, whether weak or powerful, whether obscure or conspicuous, all have had from him the kindliest and most considerate treatment. On the humdrum days and in the performance of the most important functions as leader of a great party in this Chamber the gentleman from Tennessee has shown uniform manly and kindly courtesy to us and to all about him.

Learning and ability are required of one who fills the great place in this Hall to which our party has repeatedly called the gentleman from Tennessee. That high requirement he has filled with such full measure that he has made us constantly proud of him.

A Democratic Representative in Congress should know and love the legislative history and, above all, the Constitution of his country. One who leads the Democratic Party in this the most popular branch of the National Congress needs to be deeply grounded in the political history and Constitution of the United States. But for the Constitution there would be no Democratic Party, and without the Democratic Party I fear that not much of the Constitution would long remain. The gentleman from Tennessee is a profound student and outstanding champion of the Constitution of the United States. I would that more of us might sit at his feet as he teaches these great constitutional lessons.

If these halls continue to be filled with men who understand and cherish the Constitution as written in the hearts and character of Americans of all the earlier generations and stated in the great document itself, the fundamentals of American Government will continue without serious impairment, but if we lose our grasp on its fundamentals the essence of free American government will begin to disappear.

Democracy and the Nation need men with conviction enough to make them willing to take punishment for the sake of principle and paramount public interests. American interests are numerous, complicated, and momentous; yet many arise to oppose the best considered, most wholesome, and most needed measures. Timeservers and cowards fail the Nation in such crises. The gentleman from Tennessee has continuously demonstrated that he is a statesman, willing to meet issues and accept the consequences of courageous action. It would prophesy good for the country and for posterity if we had more men in both legislative chambers of this Capitol guided by courage and conviction as we have seen the gentleman from Tennessee follow them.

After serving long here, first as one of the ranks and later as our leader, the gentleman goes to another exalted position which his personal qualities, great learning, and judicial temperament will adorn and strengthen. We regret his going, but our hearts go with him. When some of us reassemble here he will be often in our thoughts and his name often on our lips. As one by one, or in groups, we leave this Capitol to go to our respective States, we will carry with us abiding recollections of him. When we circulate among the friends at home, sit by the fireside, or wait through the twilight of retirement, thoughts of him will be to us as messages of loved friends come from afar. In order that he and his may have a slight but visible token of our affection, the whole Democratic membership of this body have determined to present to him a gift, valuable chiefly because of the love that goes with it.

Accept, I pray you, sir, this token of our attachment to you, our friend, respected and loved; our retiring leader, trusted, honored, and admired.

N. Jenks, F. J. Stransky, L. H. Miles, John Grandy, and Bruce Machen, their heirs, legal representatives, and assigns, shall make available all of their records in connection with the construction, financing, and promotion thereof. Such contracts shall be advertised for a reasonable time in some newspaper of general circulation published in the States in which the bridge is located and in the vicinity thereof; sealed bids shall be required and the contracts shall be awarded to the lowest responsible bidder. Verified copies or abstracts of all bids received and of the bid or bids accepted shall be promptly furnished to the highway departments of the States in which such bridge is located. A violation of the provisions of this act shall be a misdemeanor; and, upon conviction thereof, the person, firm, company, or corporation so charged shall be fined not more than $100 for each and every offense, or confined in the District of Columbia jail for a period not exceeding 60 days, or both, in the discretion of the court.

SEC. 5. That, in order to dispose of combustible refuse in the manner provided by this act, the commissioners are authorized to purchase motor trucks and trailers and other means of transportation, to install additional equipment, buildings, and machinery, and to employ personal services and labor.

SEC. 6. That a sum not exceeding $725,000 is hereby authorized to be appropriated, in like manner as other appropriations, for the expenses of the District of Columbia, for sites, buildings, equipment, and other construction work authorized by this act, of which amount $25,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, may be expended for the employment of one or more experts for engineering studies, to determine the possible generation or use of available power resulting from incineration of combustible refuse, and for preparation of plans and specifications; and, upon completion of the incinerators herein provided for, the said commissioners shall abandon the use of the leased plant at Montello Avenue and Mount Olivet Road NE.

With committee amendments as follows:

Page 2, line 5, after the word "area," insert the following proviso: "Provided, That the location of said sites shall be approved by the National Capital Park and Planning Commission before purchase or the institution of proceedings for condemnation thereof."

Page 3, line 1, after the word "construct," strike out "loading hoppers, separating plants, ramps, platforms, and."

Page 3, line 15, after the word "commissioners," strike out the period, insert a colon and the following: Provided, however, That nothing in this act shall prohibit or prevent the sale of salvageable material by the owners thereof or by the Commissioners of the District of Columbia."

BUILDING FOR THE SUPREME COURT OF THE UNITED STATES

Mr. ELLIOTT. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of Senate Joint Resolution 223, to amend the act entitled "An act to provide for the submission to the Congress of preliminary plans and estimates of costs for the construction of a building for the Supreme Court of the United States," approved December 21, 1928.

"SEC. 4. Notwithstanding the provisions of section 1, any individual who on March 3, 1929, is a member of the commission by virtue of a committee chairmanship or ranking minority membership as above specified, shall, despite the expiration of his term of office as a Member of the Senate or House of Representatives, continue to serve as a member of the commission until death or resignation. RETIREMENT OF CAPTAINS, COMMANDERS, AND LIEUTENANT COMMANDERS IN THE LINE OF THE NAVY

Mr. BRITTEN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of a bill which is on the Clerk's desk.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of a bill, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read the title of the bill (H. R. 17322) as follows:

A bill to amend the act approved June 22, 1926, entitled "An act to amend that part of the act approved August 29, 1916, relative to the retirement of captains, commanders, and lieutenant commanders in the line of the Navy."

Mr. BRITTEN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the reading of the bill be dispensed with and that I may address the House for one minute in order to explain the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Illinois to address the House for one minute?

There was no objection.

Mr. BRITTEN. Mr. Speaker, this legislation is necessary because of the parliamentary situation in the Senate. It merely changes existing law from March 4, 1929, to March 4, 1931. That is all it does.

Mr. BLACK of Texas. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BRITTEN. Yes.

Mr. BLACK of Texas. What is the purpose of the extension?

Mr. BRITTEN. The purpose of the extension is this: Under existing temporary law officers in the Navy are retired after time in grade; in other words, after 35 years of commissioned service as a captain, 28 years as a commander, and 21 years as a lieutenant commander. That law is merely temporary. It was called the Updike law, passed in 1926, and expires on March 4, 1929, unless the personnel bill now resting in the Senate is passed, which adopts the same principle.

Unless the legislation before us goes through or the personnel bill now in the Senate goes through before March 4, some 20 very capable officers will be retired automatically because of having reached a retirement age. Of the 20 officers affected, 10 or 11 of them are ex-enlisted men who have come up in the service. They, too, will be automatically taken out of the service because of their advanced age. They are very valuable men, and the Navy desires to hold them. Unless this temporary legislation is extended or unless the personnel bill now pending in the Senate is passed these 20 officers will be retired, some of them with no chance for promotion by a selection board.

Mr. BLACK of Texas. I think the bill ought to pass.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, this is the same bill we had before the House some four or five weeks ago and about which I interrogated the gentleman from Illinois, as I recollect.

Mr. BRITTEN. Well, we had several bills.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. If it is the same measure I am very much persuaded that the bill ought not to pass.

Mr. BRITTEN. I am sure if the gentleman understood the situation he would be wholeheartedly for it.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. The effect of the bill is to disturb the regular process of retirement?

Mr. BRITTEN. Oh, no. I now recall the gentleman's objection some four months ago. He was interested in one of the staff corps, the Medical Corps, as I recall. This bill has no effect whatever on that corps.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. But it has effect as to other officers.

Mr. BRITTEN. Only the line of the Navy.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. I objected to the application of the principle to officers in the Medical Staff, and I do not think it ought to be applied to other officers. When the matter was up before I became convinced that it ought not to be applied to any officer.

Mr. BRITTEN. This legislation keeps these officers in the service and does not put them out. It promotes an opportunity for selection up which otherwise can not possibly prevail. The gentleman surely will agree with me that every officer should have equal opportunity for promotion. I will explain the bill to the gentleman.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. I do not think that is desirable legislation, particularly at this stage of the session. It is a matter requiring very careful consideration. Every time we touch the question of retirement we find we have done something wrong. Every time we touch the question of pay, we come back and somebody else wants more pay because we did something wrong.

Mr. BRITTEN. I hope the gentleman will not object.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. I hope the gentleman will not insist on his request.

Mr. BRITTEN. This merely extends existing law.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Existing law is what I object to, and therefore I am compelled to object to an extension of it. I object, Mr. Speaker.

AMATEUR BOXING IN THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA

Mr. UPDIKE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (S. 4085) to prevent professional prize fighting and to authorize amateur boxing in the District of Columbia, and for other purposes.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. BLACK of Texas. Mr. Speaker, may the bill be reported?

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That whoever shall in the District of Columbia voluntarily engage in a pugilistic encounter shall be imprisoned for not more than five years. By the term "pugilistic encounter," as herein used, is meant any voluntary fight by blows by means of fists or otherwise, whether with or without gloves, between two or more men, for money or anything of value, except a suitably inscribed wreath, diploma, banner, badge, medal, or timepiece, not exceeding the value of $35, or upon the result of which any money or anything of value is bet or wagered, or to see which an admission fee of more than $2 is directly or indirectly charged.

SEC. 2. (a) There is hereby created for the District of Columbia a boxing commission to be composed of three members appointed by the Commissioners of the District of Columbia. No person shall be eligible for appointment to membership on the commission unless such person at the time of appointment is and for at least three years prior thereto has been a resident of the District of Columbia. The terms of office of the members of the commission first taking office after the approval of this act shall expire at the end of two years from the date of the approval of this act. A successor to a member of the commission shall be appointed in the same manner as the original members and shall have a term of office expiring two years from the date of the expiration of the term for which his predecessor was appointed; except that any person appointed to fill a vacancy occurring to the expiration of the term for which his predecessor was appointed, shall be appointed for the remainder of such term. The members of the commission shall receive no compensation for their services. The Commissioners of the District of Columbia shall furnish to the boxing commission such office space and clerical and other assistance as may be necessary.

(b) Subject to the approval of the Commissioners of the District of Columbia, the commission shall have power (1) to cooperate with organizations engaged in the promotion and control of amateur boxing (2) to supervise and regulate amateur boxing within the District of Columbia, and (3) to make such orders, rules, and regulations as the commission deems necessary for carrying out the powers herein conferred upon it.

(c) No person shall hold a boxing exhibition in the District of Columbia without a permit from the commission, but the commission shall not issue any such permit except to a club, university, college, school, or other organization or institution which the commission finds is interested in the promotion of amateur athletics. Each such permit shall be limited to a period of one day, except that in case of any interscholastic boxing meet or similar contest a permit may be used for the duration of such meet or contest. No such permit shall be issued to any person unless such person agrees to accord to the commission the right to examine the books of accounts and other records of such person relating to the boxing exhibition for which such permit is issued, and such permit shall so state on its face. A permit may be revoked at any time in the discretion of the commission.

(d) No individual shall engage in any boxing exhibition in the District of Columbia without a license from the commission. Such license shall entitle the licensee to engage in amateur boxing exhibitions in the District of Columbia for the period specified therein, but the commission shall not issue any such license to any individual if the commission finds that such individual has at any time or place engaged in any professional prize fight or in any boxing exhibition for which he received money as compensation or reward, and the commission shall revoke any such license if at any time, after notice and hearing, it makes such finding in respect of the licensee, and may revoke any such license at any time for violation by the licensee of any order, rule, or regulation of the commission, or for other cause.

(e) Any permit or license issued by the board shall not be valid for the purpose of holding or engaging in, respectively, any boxing exhibition which does not conform to the following conditions: (1) Such exhibition may consist of one or more bouts, but no such bout shall continue for more than four rounds; (2) no round shall exceed two minutes; (3) there shall be an interval of one minute between each round and the succeeding round; and (4) each contestant shall use gloves of not less than 8 ounces each in weight.

(f) The commission may charge for permits and for licenses such fees as will, in its opinion, defray the cost of issuance thereof and other necessary expenses of the commission.

(g) Any person who (1) holds any boxing exhibition in the District of Columbia without a permit valid and effective at the time, or (2) engages in any boxing exhibition in the District of Columbia without a license valid and effective at the time, or (3) violates any lawful order, rule, or regulation of the commission shall, upon conviction thereof, be fined not more than $1,000 or imprisoned not more than one year, or both.

(h) The term "person," as used in this act, includes individuals, partnerships, corporations, and associations.

Mr. STEAGALL. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I want to ask the gentleman just what this bill does, not by reading from the bill, but to let the Members who are not on the committee know just what is in the bill.

Mr. UPDIKE. This bill provides a penalty of not more than five years' imprisonment for engaging in professional prize fighting in the District of Columbia, and the term "pugilistic encounter" is defined as any voluntary fight by blows between two or more men.

Mr. STEAGALL. What I want to know is whether this bill prohibits prize fighting in the District of Columbia or permits it.

Mr. UPDIKE. It prohibits professional prize fighting in the District of Columbia and makes the law more stringent with reference to professional prize fighting, but allows amateur boxing.

Mr. STEAGALL. Which is now prohibited.

Mr. UPDIKE. Which is not permitted at this time under existing law.

Mr. STEAGALL. And the gentleman wants it permitted in the District of Columbia. I object, Mr. Speaker.

CARL SCHURZ

Mr. SCHAFER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed out of order for three minutes on the question of the one hundredth anniversary of the birth of Hon. Carl Schurz.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Wisconsin?

There was no objection.

Mr. SCHAFER. Mr. Speaker, to-day is the one hundredth anniversary of the birth of Carl Schurz, the father of civil-service reform, the father of conservation, a distinguished American orator, diplomat, soldier, United States Senator, member of the Cabinet, editor, historian, statesman, and patriot.

I could not, in the brief time allotted to me, pay any greater tribute to the memory of this distinguished American than to quote the brief tribute appearing on the anniversary postal cards circulated by the Muehlenberg Unit, No. 36, Steuben Society of America, Milwaukee, Wis.:

Carl Schurz was born at Liblar, Germany, March 2, 1829. While yet a university student he became prominent in the unsuccessful uprising for the unification of the German States under a constitutional government (realized in 1871).

Coming to the United States in 1852, and to Wisconsin in 1854, he espoused the antislavery cause, speaking effectively for Fremont in 1856. His speeches in 1858 for Abraham Lincoln created a sensation, and were published and circulated throughout the North.

A regent of the university and chairman of the Wisconsin delegation to the convention which nominated Lincoln, Schurz was the outstanding speaker in that memorable campaign.

As adviser to Lincoln, minister to Spain, major general, United States Senator from Missouri, Secretary of the Interior under Hayes, leader in civil service and other reform movements, political factor, orator, editor, historian, scholar, and statesman, Schurz acquitted himself with exceptional honor and ability.

A commanding political figure for nearly 50 years, at his death in New York in 1906 he was recognized as one of America's ablest and noblest public men.

[Applause.]

Joseph Schafer, the superintendent of the Wisconsin State Historical Society, in an article appearing in the magazine of that society, states:

Schurz's coming to America was not in answer to a Macedonian cry from this side the salt sea. On the contrary, we felt an unmeasured competence to manage without the aid of foreigners, who on political grounds were at that time rather feared and hated as alien disturbers than welcomed as cooperating brothers. Yet American statesmanship found in him, from some points of view, its highest exemplification. He possessed breadth of learning, the ability and habit of careful investigation, rare talent for speaking, and equal talent for writing. His personality not only commanded universal respect but appealed dramatically to great masses of men, while his disinterestedness, profound moral conviction, and unshakable democratic faith elevated his politics to a plane approaching that of religion. Without notable gifts as a political manager, he was yet enabled to impress his character upon the public affairs of the Nation. His life gave to American politics in a time of spiritual depression a vigorous impulse toward a new idealism. It justified the tribute of Richard Watson Gilder in his poem on Carl Schurz:

Ah, what a life! From knightly youth
Servant and champion of the truth.
* * * * *
In youth he braved a monarch's ire
To set the people's poet free;
Then gave his life, his fame, his fire,
To the long praise of liberty.

[Applause.]

Mr. CELLER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD on the subject of Carl Schurz.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. CELLER. Mr. Speaker, to-day is the one hundredth anniversary of the birth of Carl Schurz.

It is well to pause in our deliberations; it is well for the American public to quiet for a moment its dynamos of industry and commerce and reflect upon the life and work of this great American and pay him a tribute of respect and reverence. Born in the Rhineland, he early fled from the tyranny then obtaining in Germany and promptly allied himself with liberal leaders here. He soon became a friend and military aide to Lincoln.

In 1861, at the age of 32, he became minister to Spain and served during a trying period. He returned to enter the Union Army and advanced to rank of major general and earned a niche in the American military hall of fame.

As special commissioner to investigate reconstruction conditions he fought for righteous and humane consideration of the Southland. He was among the first to demand granting of general amnesty.

In 1869 he was elected United States Senator from the State of Missouri and became a recognized leader of liberal, progressive principles.

In 1877 he became Secretary of the Interior under Hayes. There he first established, under departmental rules, the "merit system" of appointments to office, leading shortly afterwards to the enactment of the now firmly established Federal civil service law.

Ever a German idealist he inspired by precepts and examples his fellow Americans of German birth to cherish America with heart and soul and to adhere and cling to the ideals that animated the fathers who founded this country.

It is a happy augury that in the demonstrations of to-day, both countries—United States and Germany—take pride in the celebration of his achievements, and alike find encouragement in his example.

RELIEF OF MAJ. H. E. MINER AND OTHERS

Mr. WAINWRIGHT. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of the bill (S. 4308) for the relief of Maj. H. E. Miner, Capt. A. J. Touart, Capt. J. L. Hayden, Capt. H. H. Pohl, First Lieut. C. C. Jadwin, and First Lieut. F. B. Kane, United States Army.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill S. 4308, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay to Maj. H. E. Miner, $2,322.40; Capt. A. J. Touart, $672; Capt. J. L. Hayden, $6,819.90; Capt. H. H. Pohl, $7,524.62; First Lieut. C. C. Jadwin, $3,566.72; and First Lieut. F. B. Kane, $3,601.90, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, as reimbursement for loss by fire of personal property stored at West Point, N. Y., on August 11, 1927.

Mr. BLACK of Texas. Reserving the right to object, may I inquire if this bill was reported by the Military Affairs Committee of the House?

Mr. WAINWRIGHT. It was reported by the Military Affairs Committee of the House.

Mr. BLACK of Texas. May I inquire how the Committee on Military Affairs acquired jurisdiction of a private claim, for that is what this is.

Mr. WAINWRIGHT. It was referred to the Military Affairs Committee.

Mr. BLACK of Texas. May I inquire if the item was recommended by the Secretary of War?

Mr. WAINWRIGHT. The justice of the claim was declared by the Secretary of War, but the objection was raised by him that possibly this should be taken care of by general legislation.

Mr. BLACK of Texas. What was the attitude of the Director of the Budget?

Mr. WAINWRIGHT. I do not believe that it has been to the Director of the Budget.

Mr. BLACK of Texas. I object.

MARGARET I. VARNUM

Mr. MORIN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of the bill (S. 264) for the relief of Margaret I. Varnum.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

An act (S. 264) for the relief of Margaret I. Varnum

Be it enacted, etc., That in the administration of the pension laws and the laws conferring rights and privileges upon honorably discharged soldiers, their widows, and dependent relatives, George Smith, late private of Company K, Twenty-first Regiment Massachusetts Volunteer Infantry, shall be held and considered to have been honorably discharged from the military service of the United States as a member of said organization on the 4th day of March, 1862: Provided, That no pay, bounty, or other emolument shall accrue prior to the passage of this act.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The bill was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

A motion to reconsider the vote was laid on the table.

ANTOINE LAPORTE

Mr. MORIN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (S. 4237) for the relief of Antoine Laporte, alias Frank Lear.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

An act (S. 4237) for the relief of Antoine Laporte, alias Frank Lear

Be it enacted, etc., That in the administration of any laws conferring rights, privileges, or benefits upon honorably discharged soldiers, Antoine Laporte, alias Frank Lear, who was a private in Company L, Eleventh Regiment First Vermont Volunteer Heavy Artillery, shall hereafter be held and considered to have been honorably discharged from the military service of the United States as a member of that organization on November 24, 1863: Provided, That no pay, compensation, or allowance shall be held to have accrued prior to the passage of this act.

The bill was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

A motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

TO AMEND THE FEDERAL FARM LOAN ACT

Mr. McFADDEN. Mr. Speaker, I call up from the Speaker's table the bill (H. R. 13936) to amend the second paragraph of section 4 of the Federal farm loan act as amended, and concur in the Senate amendment.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. STEVENSON and Mr. STEAGALL objected.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks that this is privileged.

Mr. STEAGALL. Mr. Speaker, this is the identical parliamentary situation that the Chair passed on a few days ago. It is a question of the maximum loan that may be made by the Federal loan banks. The House passed a bill fixing the maximum at $15,000, and the Senate passed it fixing it at $25,000.

The SPEAKER. These are the same bills, but the situation is different. In that case we were considering the Senate bill, the House bill having been favorably reported. The Chair ruled that the House bill must be substantially the same bill as the Senate bill. The House bill was not substantially the same, and the Chair sustained the point of order. In this case the question is, Is this an amendment to be considered in Committee of the Whole? The Chair thinks not.

Mr. BLACK of Texas. The gentleman from Pennsylvania would have under the rules of the House one hour on his motion to agree to the Senate amendment, would he not? The Democratic members of the committee are opposed to the change. Will the gentleman yield to him some of his time?

Mr. McFADDEN. I did not want to take up the time of the House so late in the session. I will say in answer to what has been said that the majority of the committee authorized the chairman to take up the Senate bill 5302 from the Speaker's table the other day, but it was objected to, and because of the parliamentary situation at that time the Speaker sustained the point of order. Subsequently the Senate passed the House bill.

Mr. STEAGALL. Will not the gentleman agree that members of the committee who are opposed to this legislation shall have an opportunity to be heard by the House in order that the House may be informed of the action of the committee and the reasons of those who are opposed to it?

Mr. McFADDEN. Mr. Speaker, I do not desire to stop discussion of the measure at all. How much time does the gentleman want?

Mr. STEAGALL. We would like to halve the time allowed under the rule.

Mr. STEVENSON. We would like to have half the time for those who are opposed to the measure.

Mr. STEAGALL. That is what I mean to say.

Mr. STEVENSON. There are Republican members on the committee opposed to it as well as Democratic members, and we want the time divided among them.

Mr. McFADDEN. I should be very glad to yield half the time to those opposed to the bill. Mr. Speaker, I yield 30 minutes to those in opposition to the bill, providing it be divided equally between the Republican and Democratic sides, as the opposition may be shown.

The SPEAKER. When this matter was called up the Chair assumed that there would be no debate. There is before the House now the unfinished business of yesterday. The Chair suggests to the gentleman that he defer calling up this bill until after the unfinished business is completed.

Mr. McFADDEN. Very well.

ENTRYMEN ON DESERT LANDS

Mr. SWING. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the bill, S. 5730, to supplement the last three paragraphs of section 5 of the act of March 4, 1915 (38 Stat. 1161), as amended by the acts of March 21, 1918 (40 Stat. 458), and consider the same at this time.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from California asks unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table and consider the bill which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That where it shall be made to appear to the satisfaction of the Secretary of the Interior with reference to any lawful pending desert-land entry made prior to July 1, 1922, under which the entryman or his duly qualified assignee under an assignment made prior to the date of this act has in good faith expended the sum of $3 per acre in the attempt to effect reclamation of the land, that there is no reasonable prospect that he would be able to secure water sufficient to effect reclamation of the irrigable land in his entry or any legal subdivision thereof, the Secretary of the Interior may, in his discretion, allow such entryman or assignee 90 days from notice within which to pay to the register of the United States Land Office 50 cents an acre for the land embraced in the entry and to file an election to perfect title to the entry under the provisions of this act, and thereafter within one year from the date of the filing of such election to pay to the register the additional amount of $1.50 an acre, which shall entitle him to a patent for the land: Provided, That in case the final payment be not made within the time prescribed the entry shall be canceled and all money theretofore paid shall be forfeited.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. SCHAFER. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, what is the scope of this bill?

Mr. SWING. It is to permit to desert-land entrymen who made their entries before July 1, 1922, and who submit proof that they have made bona fide effort to comply with the desert land law and have been unable to do so because of failure to get water, and who have expended the sum of $3 per acre in an effort to reclaim the land, an extension of time to perfect title under certain conditions.

Mr. SCHAFER. I have no objection.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

The bill was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

A motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

BUILDING FOR THE NATIONAL MEMORIAL ASSOCIATION (INC.) IN THE CITY OF WASHINGTON

The SPEAKER. Just before the House adjourned yesterday the House, by tellers, had ordered a second on Senate Joint Resolution 132, to create a commission to secure plans and designs for and to erect a memorial building for the National Memorial Association (Inc.) in the city of Washington as a tribute to the negroes' contribution to the achievements of America. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. TAYLOR] for 20 minutes and the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. RANKIN] for 20 minutes.

Mr. TAYLOR of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker and Members of the House, I shall bid for your blessings by being brief. I had hoped that it would not be necessary for me to occupy any time in a discussion of this very worthy and thoroughly meritorious measure, because I felt that it deserved and would receive the unanimous and enthusiastic support of the Congress. I confess my very great disappointment, my utter amazement, and my no little chagrin last night when opposition presented itself to my motion to suspend the rules. The melancholy feature about the opposition and the thing that I most deprecate is the fact that the opposition is confined wholly to one side of this Chamber. I had been laboring under the belief that the "incensing relics" of race antagonism and race prejudice had been buried at Appomattox and buried "too deep for resurrection," but, alas, I have been disillusioned. I confess my amazement at seeing the proud Representatives of the great, stalwart, independent, and arrogant Caucasion race gainsaying and denying this small, paltry, insignificant modicum of consideration and encouragement to a people just a little more than a half century removed from penal servitude and a people who have contributed so much in a material and patriotic way to build up this great country and make it as it is to-day the envy and admiration of the nations of the earth.

Mr. Speaker, this measure passed the Senate without a single dissenting vote. Is it possible that the other branch of the Congress is more liberal, more magnanimous, and more charitable and appreciative than are we of an element in our citizenship that has made its full sacrifice of blood and treasure in every crucial period in our Nation's history. God forbid that such be the case. From the Boston Commons to the bloody Argonne Forest the colored American soldier has displayed a quality of heroism equal to that of his white comrade on every battle field and in every war, and he has never been found lacking in patriotism or loyalty to the colors. In reviewing accounts of the uniform heroism of the colored soldier in all our wars, I was particularly impressed by the tribute paid him by Col. Theodore Roosevelt. Referring to the heroic conduct of the Ninth and Tenth Cavalry at San Juan Hill and El Caney the immortal "Teddy" said:

> The Ninth and Tenth Cavalry Regiments fought one on either side of mine, and I wish no better men beside me in battle than these colored troops showed themselves to be.

In my judgment a finer tribute from a higher authority than this can not be found. Wheresoever and whensoever he has fought he has exemplified a magnificent spirit of self-sacrifice and sublime courage. There is not a more loyal element in our entire citizenship than our colored group. In all of our illustrious history, they have never produced a traitor, a Bolshevist, an anarchist, or an atheist, so far as I have ever heard.

Mr. Speaker, no people in the history of the world have shown the progress that the American colored man has exhibited during the last three-score years. Sixty-five years ago in slavery, to-day he constitutes an important and substantial part of our national wealth and our national population. He has produced lawyers, doctors, ministers, and statesmen during this brief period, who have taken high rank in their respective professions and challenged universal interest and admiration performing these things under innumerable and almost insuperable difficulties.

When the immortal Lincoln struck from their limbs the shackles of slavery in 1865, the American negroes owned 2,000 homes and operated 700,000 farms. Then they conducted 2,100 business enterprises, and now they conduct 70,000. Meanwhile their aggregate wealth has increased from $20,000,000 to $2,000,000,000—one hundred times as much in the short period of 50 years. Statistics reveal the very interesting fact that in 1920, there were in America 332,249 negroes engaged in skilled and semiskilled occupations. It is also proper to remark that while the negro was purchasing homes and operating farms, he was also educating his children, building and supporting churches, schools and colleges, and sending missionaries to Africa.

Mr. Speaker, I am led to believe that the opposition to this measure is due largely to prejudice and the further fact that our friends on the other side of the Chamber are not familiar with the provisions and the purposes of this bill. This measure is designed mainly to give a dignity, a prestige, and a responsibility as well as an impetus to this highly commendable movement.

The proposed shrine is in no sense inimical or inconsistent with the spirit of our institutions, but on the contrary is in keeping with that spirit. It is proposed by the colored people to erect a memorial here in the Nation's Capital that will not only be a credit to their race but an honor to the Capital City of the greatest Nation of the world. It is planned to erect a memorial that will cost from one million to two million dollars, the amount to be raised by popular public contributions from the 12,000,000 colored people in this country and their white friends here and elsewhere. It will be a beautiful building and will be designed by the Commission of Fine Arts of the National Capital—a building suitable to depict the Negro's contribution to America and his achievements in the military service, in art, invention, industry, and science—a fitting tribute which will serve as an educational center and will be an inspiration to present and future generations.

Mr. Speaker, we know that the often-repeated slogan of equal opportunity and equality of treatment is a fallacy and an idle fiction so far as the Negro is concerned. We know that negroes are not admitted on equal terms with white people in the public buildings in this city or elsewhere. So why not give him this small meed of assistance and encouragement in this worthy undertaking, when it will only cost the Federal Treasury the puny sum of $50,000; and by express terms of the bill this will not be available until $500,000 has been raised by popular subscription and turned over to the memorial association created by this bill. As a further safeguard, this commission is composed of nine members, to be appointed by the President of the United States, with the Director of Public Buildings and Public Parks of the National Capital, the Supervising Architect of the Treasury, and the Capitol Architect an ex-officio members.

Such a building as is proposed by this measure will benefit this Government far more than $50,000, no matter what race, color, or creed might sponsor it. The Government can well afford to invest $50,000 in this project, irrespective of sentiment and out of cold, naked national pride, if for no other reason.

Let us lay aside sectional prejudice and race antagonism and pass this bill, and thereby in a small way recognize the valuable contribution that the colored people have made to our country and its flag. [Applause.]

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, of course I can not support this bill, which proposes to erect a $500,000 memorial to the Negro race in the District of Columbia and to start it by appropriating $50,000 out of the Federal Treasury to begin with.

This is a political measure, intended to catch negro votes, and it seems to me that it is little short of an outrage to pass such a resolution. There has never been a memorial erected to any race of people in this country.

Not only that, but there is not a monument to Thomas Jefferson in the National Capital, that greatest political philosopher of all times, to whom we are largely indebted for our American institutions and to whom more than to anyone else, with the possible exception of Washington, we are most indebted for our American independence. Yet in the face of that neglect we are asked to erect a $500,000 memorial to the negroes in Washington.

Nor can I agree with the statement made by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. TAYLOR] that the negro has proved himself equal to the white man in every battle in every war that we have had. How absurd!

I would not have to go beyond the confines of the gentleman's own State of Tennessee to refute that statement. There never was a negro regiment on earth, and there never will be, equal to a regiment of Confederate veterans during the Civil War. There never was one, and I dare say there never will be one, to compare with a regiment of white Federal soldiers during the Civil War.

Nor can I agree with the gentleman's intimation that they compared with our white soldiers in the World War. The only division of negro troops, commanded exclusively by negro officers that I know anything about, was the Ninety-second Division. We all remember what happened when they were thrown into action. We are all familiar with the demoralization that followed.

I am willing to give the negro credit for everything that he is and everything that he has done, but I can not agree with any statement to the effect that the negro soldiers ever compared man for man with the great heroes who have fought America's battles in times of war.

Mr. WAINWRIGHT. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RANKIN. Yes.

Mr. WAINWRIGHT. Did I understand the gentleman to say there was only one colored unit in action?

Mr. RANKIN. That was manned by colored officers.

Mr. WAINWRIGHT. I call the gentleman's attention to the Fifteenth Infantry of New York, which had a gallant record.

Mr. RANKIN. But that was commanded by white officers. I never heard anything of its gallantry before.

But there is no reason for this resolution. I have heard men get up on this floor and talk about what the negro is and what he has accomplished, and intimate that he has done so in spite of "oppressions from the people in the Southern States."

Why, Mr. Speaker, the people of the South have done more to take the negro from his natural state of savagery in which they found him hundreds of years ago and lift him up and show him the ways of civilization than have any other people with whom he has come in contact in all the ages past and gone. The white man in the South is the best friend the negro ever had or ever will have again, and I can not agree with the statements made by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. TAYLOR] to the contrary.

This bill provides for a fund of $500,000. I know they will say that it is to be contributed.

But they will come in later and ask for an appropriation; and even now you start in with an appropriation of $50,000.

As I said in the beginning, I am not willing to expend the Government's money to build a memorial here to commemorate the achievements of the negro race; nor am I in favor of spending money in this way on any other race so long as the American Congress refuses to erect a monument in the National Capital to the memory of Thomas Jefferson, the father of the Declaration of Independence.

I know that it is useless to oppose this measure, but I, for one, want to go on record in opposition to it. The bill should not pass.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Mississippi reserves 14 minutes.

Mr. TAYLOR of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, how much time have I remaining?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman has 12 minutes remaining.

Mr. TAYLOR of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I yield four minutes to the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. THATCHER].

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Kentucky is recognized for four minutes.

Mr. THATCHER. Mr. Speaker and Members of the House, I am so frequently in agreement with my distinguished friend from Mississippi [Mr. RANKIN] that I very much regret that I am not in agreement with him now. I disclaim any political motives; and as far as political motives might be considered, as much might be said touching the opposition to this measure as could be said touching the position of those who favor it. I believe that the enactment of this legislation will constitute a simple act of justice; and not only a simple act of justice, but an act which in its far-reaching effect will prove to be of the most splendid character.

If it is said that a building of this kind has not been erected for any white group in this country, it can also be said in response to that suggestion that only the Negro race has given to America two and a half centuries of unrewarded labor; and that is a matter worthy of some consideration by this Congress. To the city of Washington it will be worth $50,000, the total amount authorized by this bill; it will be worth that much to guarantee that the proper sort of building is constructed here; that in its architecture and artistic features, and all those elements which are so necessary to preserve in the National Capital the great plan of preserving this city as the most artistic capital in the world, the proposed structure shall measure up to the highest standards of excellence. It is worth that much alone, this small sum of $50,000, that it should be authorized and appropriated by Congress for the purpose of supervising this work. The building itself, to cost not less than a half million dollars, must be paid for by voluntary subscriptions. The Government will pay no part of it.

It is proposed in this bill that those of the Negro race of this country shall have an opportunity, where otherwise they might never have an opportunity at all, to make their exhibits touching their advance in education, their advance in the arts, their advance in science, and in industry; and, in addition, they will have an appropriate place in which to hold great patriotic and other gatherings in the National Capital. This project will make for a stronger, better colored population in this country. It will contribute toward the improvement of the homes of the colored people. It will make for their general advancement; and, in its essence, it will be of the greatest benefit to all our people, white and black, because it will furnish inspiration and encouragement to the 12,000,000 people making up the colored race in America; and whatever aids one race aids the other, just as whatever hurts one race will hurt the other.

I was very glad to appear before the House Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds to make a statement in behalf of this measure, and I ask, Mr. Speaker, that I shall be allowed to include in my remarks the statement I made before that committee. I think this is a good measure, I earnestly favor its passage, and I believe it ought to pass. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Kentucky asks unanimous consent to include in his remarks the statement he has referred to. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Following is the statement referred to:

STATEMENT OF MAURICE H. THATCHER BEFORE THE HOUSE COMMITTEE ON PUBLIC BUILDINGS AND GROUNDS

Mr. Chairman, I would like to say that I heartily indorse the purposes of this measure. The amount asked is very small, really nominal, and I think the passage of this bill will serve a most beneficent purpose. Whatever theoretically may be true, practically the public buildings of the country are not available for the benefit of the colored race in matters of this sort; and it is true that, bond or free, through all the years of our American history, in peace time as well as war time, the negro has made his contribution to the American cause. If it should be said that no other race has had any consideration of this character, I would say in response to that suggestion that no other race has given 250 years of unrequited toil to America; and that certainly entitles the negro to consideration. Any race or any nation must live in large measure through the greatest and noblest of that race or nation. I suppose if we were to blot out all of the luminaries of the past we would be almost groping in darkness.

We have to renew our faith and our life by what has gone before us. Now, the Negro race has made wonderful progress since its emancipation, and it has made a wonderful contribution to the wealth and progress of America. It has no divided allegiance. It knows but one country and but one flag.

All in the world that is asked here is the nominal sum of $50,000. This bill is in the nature of an enabling act, so that this building may be constructed here in the National Capital, where the colored men and women of the Nation can have an appropriate place for meeting, where they can hold inspirational meetings in the National Capital, and where they can have their exhibits which will illustrate the advancement and progress of their race; and this memorial structure will constitute a kind of common denominator for the benefit of all their people. I think that we, to say the least, ought to give them this little appropriation, so that this building may be constructed. As an architectural matter alone, it is worth the price of $50,000 to have it constructed under the auspices of the Fine Arts Commission and the Director of Public Buildings and Grounds of the city of Washington. The bill provides for such supervision. It is worth that much to insure the construction of this building in proper form and up to the artistic and architectural standards which we are now seeking to establish in Washington. The cost of the structure, estimated at not less than $500,000, will be met by voluntary subscriptions.

It seems to me that, in the light of all history, in the light of all the facts which confront us, this small contribution now asked for would be a most fitting authorization on the part of Congress, and that it would serve a splendid purpose; because, in proportion to the success of our efforts to aid those of the colored race to become better and more efficient citizens, in that proportion do we of the white race aid ourselves, and in that proportion will the general welfare of the Nation be served.

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. THATCHER] is just about as amusing as the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. TAYLOR] when he talks about "250 years of unrequited toil" on the part of the colored race.

We took the negro from a state of savagery and lifted him into a new atmosphere and showed him for the first time the light of a Christian civilization through the unfortunate instrumentality of slavery, which we are all glad has disappeared and for which we were no more responsible than you were.

But it is strange to me that if we are going to erect a monument to any race we do not erect one to some white race or to the Indian race, the people from whom we took this country, a race which has produced some men who have had few superiors among the white men of this country.

Right here in the city of Washington there is buried that famous Chief Pushmataha. During the War of 1812, when New England was threatening to withdraw from the Union, when a great many people were criticizing the administration and refusing to assist, when old Andrew Jackson was leading those intrepid sons of Kentucky, Tennessee, Mississippi, and other States on to New Orleans, it was the eloquence of Pushmataha, that great Choctaw of Chickasaw descent, who raised his voice in opposition to Tecumseh and kept down a rebellion among those Indians, or kept them from joining our enemies, which would have rendered it absolutely impossible for Jackson to have ever reached New Orleans.

We have even been unable to erect a marker upon the famous battle field of Ackia, where the Chickasaws met the French when they were attempting to make the whole western section of our country French territory and won a battle the fruits of which the white people of America enjoy to-day. We can not get a small appropriation to mark the place upon which that sacrifice was made.

By their heroism on the battle field of Ackia the Chickasaws probably saved America for the English-speaking white man, and yet some of the very men who are voting for this measure have denied us even a small pittance for a marker for the place upon which that historic battle was fought.

Mr. GARBER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RANKIN. Yes.

Mr. GARBER. In that event we would have to tear down a great many monuments that are now erected.

Mr. RANKIN. In the event of what?

Mr. GARBER. In the event of erecting monuments only where we made sacrifices.

Mr. RANKIN. I am afraid the gentleman is right. The gentleman from Oklahoma calls my attention to the fact that if we only erected monuments at places where real sacrifices have been made it would be necessary to remove some monuments, and I thoroughly agree with his statement.

Mr. TAYLOR of Tennessee. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RANKIN. Yes.

Mr. TAYLOR of Tennessee. I merely want to state that I thoroughly approve of the gentleman's suggestion that a monument be erected to the American Indian. I think that would be quite fitting and proper, and I would support it.

Mr. RANKIN. The gentleman from Tennessee will also agree with me that before we go off on this kind of a tangent we ought to erect a monument to Thomas Jefferson in the National Capital.

Mr. TAYLOR of Tennessee. I see numerous statues to Jefferson in this Capital.

Mr. RANKIN. The gentleman can not find a monument in the District of Columbia to Thomas Jefferson.

Mr. TAYLOR of Tennessee. Introduce a bill and I will be glad to vote for it.

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, this is a political bill, pure and simple, and ought to be defeated.

Mr. COLE of Iowa. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RANKIN. Certainly.

Mr. COLE of Iowa. In our State we have a statue to the great Chief Keokuk, and there is no statue in that State of which we are more proud than that statue.

Mr. RANKIN. I thank the gentleman for that information and I congratulate the people of Iowa. I am sure the gentleman will join me in supporting a bill to erect a monument in the District of Columbia to Thomas Jefferson.

Mr. THATCHER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RANKIN. Yes.

Mr. THATCHER. I will say to the gentleman that I will be very happy to support it and I believe the majority on this side will support it.

Mr. RANKIN. If the gentleman supports this monument bill he can support any of them.

I know it is useless to oppose this legislation but I want to raise my voice in opposition to it. It should not pass.

Mr. TAYLOR of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I yield two minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MORTON D. HULL].

Mr. MORTON D. HULL. Mr. Speaker, I deplore the disposition to make comparisons between the races. There are no parallel circumstances in the history of the white race which enables us to make any comparisons. The members of the Negro race are here, not of their own choice. They were brought here, and since their emancipation they have made great progress. They can make further progress with our help.

They need our help, and I look at this proposed building not as a monument to them but as an inspiration to them, to help them realize their opportunities, to make the best of their life here, and to achieve the great things which America offers to them and to all mankind. [Applause.]

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. BUSBY].

Mr. BUSBY. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the House, I was on the committee that reported out this bill. I opposed it, as did several other members of the committee, because it appeared to many of us that it would be nothing more than a piece of political legislation if reported and passed.

I know that it has been the purpose of the gentlemen on that side of the aisle often to use the negro during election times. It was suggested by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. TAYLOR] that the opposition came from this side of the aisle altogether. Perhaps this accounts for that.

We have always tried to be entirely open and honest with the negro. We have never tried to lead him to believe that he was our superior in any respect, and we have never used him at election time. It has usually been the case that that side of the aisle has gotten his support, and I do not blame you for getting his support, because you have gotten it for nothing. You have gotten it on empty promises.

At the present time, for the first time in the history of this country, you have succeeded in electing a Member of the House from the North from the colored race to augment your numbers on that side.

I quote this from the Louisville Courier-Journal of February 11, 1929. On that date we find this man making a speech there:

> Oscar De Priest, negro Congressman from the first Illinois district, who addressed the meeting at the R. E. Jones Temple Sunday afternoon, under the auspices of the Louisville branch of the National Association for Advancement of Colored People.

In that speech he said this:

> I represent a wet district in Chicago, and I will vote wet like the people I represent. I consider it far more important to protect human lives and liberties than to deny a man a glass of beer.
> De Priest said also that he was irrevocably opposed to the segregation of the Negro race in any form, especially through Jim Crow cars on the railroads and separate schools.
> Our race—
> He said—
> has been too submissive and we have allowed our liberties to be taken from us without protest. The black people of Kentucky will never succeed until they have learned to stand by each other. I will be glad when Louisville sends a negro representative to the Kentucky legislature.

Now, I am going into this thing without any gloves on, which you do not do on that side of the aisle. When I find you inviting the colored race into your homes, to associate with your wives and your daughters and when you encourage the colored people to call on and keep company with you and your family I will realize that you have reached that sentiment that you have expressed to them about election times.

No; you have not practiced it. It is only in words to get their support, and this gesture here is only to encourage them to believe you are their friend, when they know that you are not and that the southern people are their friends in the only proper way and in the only proper relation that can exist between the white and black races.

Mr. SCHAFER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BUSBY. I have only five minutes and I can not yield.

They have known this every time when they have needed help. You take the negroes about the Capitol here. I know all of them. I have had them come to me about matters that concerned them gravely, and if some of you want to know what some of those matters are that were far-reaching, I will tell you. They knew I was from the South. They knew I was their friend. They knew I understood them. They knew I believed them and would help them in the proper way.

In addition to this I have had Republican Members of Congress say to me, "Why, you fellows down South have got to save us from this situation," referring to the fact that the negroes were getting so strong in Chicago and other parts of the North that they were putting whites out of Congress.

I said, "What situation?" They replied, "From these negro Congressmen we are getting in over here," and I said, "Save yourselves; you have been fishing for them all the while and getting nibbles, now you are beginning to catch them; take care of yourselves."

Mr. DENISON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BUSBY. I yield.

Mr. DENISON. In the last election the Democratic Party did everything it possibly could to get the negro vote, and, in fact, nominated a negro for Congress in St. Louis.

Mr. BUSBY. That was not in Mississippi. I do not think they know any better than that in some sections, but they can not succeed in taking them over and you can not succeed with them either.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. WILLIAMS of Illinois). The time of the gentleman from Mississippi has expired.

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, I yield the gentleman one minute more.

Mr. BUSBY. I just want to say that in the House Office Building I had in mind to file on a certain office. I was led to believe that that office was to be reserved for certain other purposes. I found later that it was proposed to put De Priest in that office, although I have served six years in Congress. I was being mislead in order that this negro might be preferred over me, and I said, "No; you are not going to do that. I am entitled to this office over this negro, and I am going to have it." So in order to isolate him and put him off in one corner, as you contended, you wanted him located there in one of the best offices, and the one that I wanted to file on and was entitled to.

This is the real situation, and I am not varnishing the facts. I am the friend of the negro, and when he comes to me he will find me to be his friend in the proper way.

Mr. TAYLOR of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I yield six minutes to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. WOOD].

Mr. WOOD. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the House, I deplore very much that there should be any opposition to this proposed memorial. Gentlemen on the other side of the House who profess to be the friend of the colored man are the only ones that are opposed to it. If you are the friend of the colored man that you profess to be, if you have been responsible for elevating him during the days he was your slave, as you claim, to a position where he had some little bit of an understanding of civilization, a little smattering, although it be, of education, until by virtue of the will of higher power, aided by the force of a loyal people of this country, slavery was killed and he was given his freedom. Then when you came back into the Union he was good enough to be counted among your forces for representation. I want now to ask you, Is not it still incumbent upon you to help elevate this man to the plane that God meant that all creatures in his image should occupy?

The colored man is with us to stay, not by his own volition but by reason of force. For untold centuries he was a savage; for years and years he was a slave, brought here under chains; liberated only 65 years ago, yet he has made a most remarkable advance as a race. If we are to live with the colored man, if we are to be a part and parcel of the unit in which he is a citizen, acknowledged by the Constitution of the United States, why should it not be the united purpose of all men to encourage him in every way possible to higher attainments, so that he may be a more useful citizen?

We are proposing to do that by this resolution, to give the black man a chance to do for himself what an ungrateful white people ought to have done for him many years ago. All they are asking for is a chance to do something for themselves, a mere foothold on which they can raise this memorial that they may have some place in the Capital of the Nation, which is theirs as well as ours, and where, by reason of conditions and conventionalities, they have no place to meet, no place to give exhibits of the mighty march in progress they are making and will continue to make. Are we going to say to them, "Because you were once a subject people you are forever to be a subject people"? Gentlemen, it sometimes occurs to me that we are standing in the path of our own advancement when we are placing obstacles in the way of others who are trying to help themselves. [Applause.]

A few months ago a colored colonel, with stars won over there, when the world had nothing against him because his skin was black, was given a post on a western frontier. The officers of that post realized that the colored man was coming, and they were put in something of a plight in knowing how to receive him. It had been the custom to give a dinner to any new officer that might come to them. This colored officer, realizing the situation in which the other officers were placed, being more tactful, gave the dinner himself, to which he invited all officers junior to him. When they assembled in the dining room all of the officers were gathered around the white folks' table, and over on the side was a little table prepared for the colonel and his wife, thus showing that he had gracefully relieved them from embarrassment and at the same time administered to them a very just rebuke.

So, gentlemen, I hope that there will not be a dissenting voice against this memorial for these people who are trying so hard to do for themselves and who have shed their blood on every American battle field. The first man killed in the Revolution was a colored man, and they have left their dead and blood on every field, and among them all you will not find a traitor to his country. [Applause.]

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, after listening to the remarks of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. WOOD], I have reached the conclusion that if that is a sample of the speeches of the politicians in his section of Indiana I am not surprised that the white children in the high schools at Gary, Ind., had to go on a strike in order to free themselves from contact with negro students in their schools.

There has never been a monument erected to any race in this country, not even the white race, nor the Indian race, and if you would take the politics out of this bill it would not get enough votes to count.

Mr. WOOD. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RANKIN. No; the gentleman from Indiana would not yield to me. Let us play fair. The gentleman from Indiana had better either revise his remarks or get some time to speak when he goes back to Gary, Ind., because those Anglo-Saxon children there are not going to school with those negroes. They have come to the parting of the ways, they are not going to be humiliated longer in order to gratify the political ambition of some demagogues who attempt to force them to accept the negroes on terms of equality in order to secure a few negro votes. [Applause.]

As I said, this bill should not pass and I trust it will not pass. If we are going to erect monuments and memorials in the city of Washington, let us begin with those people who deserve them most, and erect monuments to such neglected men as the great Jefferson, and others who have contributed so much to the upbuilding of this great civilization. [Applause.]

Mr. TAYLOR of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I yield one minute to the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. HOWARD].

Mr. HOWARD of Oklahoma. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the House, I was born in the State of Kentucky, where we had a large negro population. I live in Oklahoma, where we have a large negro population. The first music that ever broke on my ears was the crooning of my old southern mammy. It is a far step from those days to the accomplishment of the Negro race in the United States. The bill we have before us is not a bill that means social equality in any way and has no bearing on that question. I have always believed that the negro is entitled to the fullest educational facilities. I believe to-day that if the negro wants to erect a monument in this country in dedication to what his race has accomplished he should be encouraged in it, and I shall vote for this bill. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Tennessee to suspend the rules and pass the bill.

The question was taken; and Mr. RANKIN demanded a division.

Mr. LARSEN. Mr. Speaker, let us have the yeas and nays.

Mr. TAYLOR of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I join in that request.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 253, nays 85, not voting 89, as follows:

THE FEDERAL RESERVE BOARD—ITS POWERS AND LIMITATIONS

Mr. BRAND of Georgia. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by quoting a short letter from an ex-member of one of the Federal reserve banks on the policies of the Federal Reserve Board.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Georgia asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD in the manner indicated. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. BRAND of Georgia. Mr. Speaker, under the leave granted for the specific purpose I include excerpts from a letter of date February 5, 1929, addressed to and received by me from a citizen of Georgia who has had years of experience in the banking business and also is familiar with the operation of the Federal reserve banks and member banks of the Federal reserve system; the excerpts being as follows:

Hon. C. H. BRAND, M. C.,

House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. BRAND: Having had the pleasure of your acquaintance for over 22 years and knowing that you were interested in the Federal reserve act, I am taking the liberty of writing you on what I consider a very important subject.

The Federal reserve act, establishing the Federal reserve banks, had for its sole purpose "the mobilizing of the reserves arising from the deposits made in the member banks throughout the entire Union. The object of mobilizing these reserves was to furnish a basis of credit to be used in taking care of the commercial, industrial, and agricultural conditions in each of the Federal reserve districts."

The banks have served that purpose admirably, but a later purpose of these reserves is being used. As I can discern from the discounts in the several Federal reserve banks I am of the opinion that the member banks are availing themselves of the discount of eligible paper with the Federal reserve bank of their district and are having the proceeds of those discounts transmitted by wire to New York, Chicago, and other central reserve cities, to be loaned on call in the stock market. While the Federal Reserve Board has sought to discourage this as much as possible the action has been only to raise the rediscount rate by the Federal reserve banks to their member banks, and this in turn increases the rate of call money in the centers.

The Comptroller of the Currency, calling for reports of the member banks, can no doubt show to what extent the discount system of the Federal reserve banks is being used in the call-money market. It seems to me that if the Federal Reserve Board would call for a statement from the member banks, not for publication but for their own information, on two subjects—one, "How much have you rediscounted with your Federal reserve bank; how much is now under rediscount," the other, "How much have you loaned through your New York or Chicago banks on call in the stock market"—I am quite sure that if this was done, you would find a great portion of their rediscounts with the Federal reserve bank has been transferred to these centers for the purpose herein stated.

I do not know, but think possibly the Federal Reserve Board would have the authority to handle this subject rather than by the raising of a discount rate. For instance, if this confidential report received from the member banks would show that they had on call a large portion of the funds they have discounted with the Federal reserve bank of their district that the Federal Reserve Board could say to such banks, "This action on your part is a dissipation of the reserves that by the intention of the act were mobilized for the purpose of taking care of the commercial, industrial, and agricultural conditions of the district and not to be used for trading in stocks."

While it is true that the paper discounted is eligible to discount, the reading of section 13 of the Federal reserve act does not compel the discount of paper, but says that any Federal reserve bank may discount for its member banks. It further recites that these notes are discountable for the purposes herein stated and not for the purpose of carrying investments in stocks.

If the Federal Reserve Board should take this course, it would not cause a panic on the stock market, but the member banks would, as they needed money for their local conditions, instead of putting up more eligible paper with the Federal reserve bank, withdraw gradually their money from the stock market, and thus the volume would be decreased gradually and not with disastrous effect to the security market of the United States.

RELIEF OF STATE OF NEVADA

Mr. ARENTZ. Mr. Speaker, I move to suspend the rules and pass the bill S. 5717, for the relief of the State of Nevada, as amended, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he hereby is, authorized and directed to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the net balance due the State of Nevada of $595,076.53, as certified by the Comptroller General of the United States January 26, 1929, and printed in Senate Document No. 210, Seventieth Congress, second session, the same to be accepted in full settlement of all advances and expenditures and interest thereon made by said State.

The SPEAKER. Is a second demanded? If not, the question is on suspending the rules and passing the bill.

The question was taken; and, in the opinion of the Chair, two-thirds having voted in favor thereof, the rules were suspended and the bill was passed.

LIGHTHOUSE RESERVATION, SHIP ISLAND, MISS.

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill S. 2594, transferring a portion of the lighthouse reservation, Ship Island, Miss., to the jurisdiction and control of the War Department, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That so much of the lighthouse reservation, Ship Island, Miss., as the Secretary of Commerce deems unnecessary for lighthouse purposes is transferred to and made a part of Ship Island Military Reservation under the jurisdiction and control of the Secretary of War. Such Ship Island Military Reservation, with the portion of the Ship Island lighthouse reservation hereby made a part of it, shall be reappraised and disposed of subject to all the provisions of the act entitled "An act authorizing the use for permanent construction at military posts of the proceeds from the sale of surplus War Department real property, and authorizing the sale of certain military reservations, and for other purposes," approved March 12, 1926.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. SCHAFER. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, was this bill reported out unanimously by the committee?

Mr. RAYBURN. It was.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The bill was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

A motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

PAY AND ALLOWANCES OF COMMISSIONED AND ENLISTED PERSONNEL OF THE ARMY, NAVY, MARINE CORPS, ETC.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, by direction of the Committee on Rules I call up House Joint Resolution 430, for the appointment of a joint committee of the Senate and House of Representatives to investigate the rank, promotion, pay, and allowances of the commissioned and enlisted personnel of the Army, Navy, Marine Corps, Coast Guard, Coast and Geodetic Survey, and Public Health Service, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, etc., That a joint committee to be composed of five Members of the Senate, to be appointed by the Vice President, and five Members of the House of Representatives, to be appointed by the Speaker of the House of Representatives, shall make an investigation and report recommendations by bill or otherwise to their respective Houses, relative to the rank, promotion, pay, and allowances of the commissioned and enlisted personnel of the several services mentioned in the title of this joint resolution.

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask a question of the gentleman from New York [Mr. SNELL]. I would like to ask the gentleman whether the language of this resolution is broad enough so that this committee would have authority to consider the question of retirement or pensions or compensation to members of the Coast Guard for disability incurred in line of duty? If the committee has authority to do that, I would like to be assured of it.

Mr. SNELL. I do not think it would go into the retirement pay or pension pay, nor is it so intended.

Mr. CRAMTON. If there is any question about it, I think it ought to be included.

Mr. SNELL. That is a new proposition that has never been presented to us and was not considered by the Committee on Rules when the matter was before us.

Mr. CRAMTON. At the present time enlisted men in the Coast Guard for disability incurred in line of duty can neither get the benefit of the civilian compensation law nor of the pension laws of the military services.

Mr. SNELL. I am told that under the retirement act retirement pay is considered as pay.

Mr. CRAMTON. The Budget have suggested the commission will consider that matter, and I am satisfied from the gentleman's assurance that the committee will take up the matter.

Mr. SNELL. It was the intention of the committee to consider the whole matter thoroughly. We are being continually bombarded by people asking for a change of pay of the different classes in the services, and whatever we do somebody else comes here and says we have done a rank injustice to other parts of the service. For instance, when we passed a bill giving longevity pay, we supposed we were benefiting many people in the different services in these departments, and yet many people now claim that we did them a rank injustice.

It is desired now that we take the whole matter up and do justice to each one of these several classes. And the only way that I think this can be scientifically done is by complete investigation of the rank, pay, and allowance of these different services.

Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the resolution.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York moves the previous question on the resolution.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the House joint resolution.

The House joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed and read a third, was read the third time, and passed.

A motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

DEPORTATION OF ALIENS CONVICTED OF VIOLATIONS OF THE HARRISON NARCOTIC LAW

Mr. FISH. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of the bill H. R. 15272.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of the bill H. R. 15272. The Clerk will report it.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 15272) to amend section 19 of the immigration act of 1917 by providing for the deportation of aliens convicted in violation of the Harrison narcotic law and amendments thereto.

Mr. BOX. Mr. Speaker, I reserve the right to object.

Mr. LaGUARDIA. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, what is this?

Mr. BOX. This is a little fraction of the deportation bill which has been acted upon. The bill of itself is bad. This is no time to pass new legislation on this subject, to be amended in the Senate and be considered here under the present conditions, and I object.

The SPEAKER. Objection is heard.

BRIDGE ACROSS THE MISSOURI RIVER AT NIOBRARA, NEBR.

Mr. DENISON. Mr. Speaker, I call up Senate 5875, now on the Speaker's table.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report it.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (S. 5875) to extend the times for commencing and completing the construction of a bridge across the Missouri River at or near Niobrara, Nebr.

Be it enacted, etc., That the times for commencing and completing the construction of a bridge across the Missouri River at or near Niobrara, Nebr., authorized to be built by H. A. Rinder, his heirs, legal representatives, and assigns, by act of Congress approved May 22, 1928, are hereby extended one and three years, respectively, from May 22, 1929.

SEC. 2. The right to alter, amend, or repeal this act is hereby expressly reserved.

The Senate bill was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

A motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

COMMITTEE TO INVESTIGATE SALARIES OF SENATE AND HOUSE EMPLOYEES

The SPEAKER. Under the authority of Public Law 844 of the Seventieth Congress the Chair appoints on the committee to investigate salaries of House and Senate employees and employees of the Architect's office Mr. WOOD, Mr. MURPHY, and Mr. BYRNS.

BRIDGE ACROSS THE POTOMAC RIVER AT GREAT FALLS

Mr. DENISON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill S. 4721, to which the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. SCHAFER] advises me he will reserve the right to object.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill S. 4721. The Clerk will report it.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (S. 4721) to extend the times for commencing and completing the construction of a bridge across the Potomac River at or near the Great Falls, and to authorize the use of certain Government land.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. SCHAFER. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, can I have five minutes?

Mr. DENISON. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Wisconsin.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wisconsin is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. SCHAFER. Mr. Speaker, I have fought this Great Falls toll bridge for many months. It is the greatest monstrosity that has ever been placed on the Consent Calendar in so far as toll bridges are concerned.

Let us look at the report for a moment. The report of the committee, on page 2, indicates that the Secretary of Agriculture is absolutely opposed to the bill. A few days ago we passed a bill (H. R. 15524) authorizing the expenditure of sixteen millions of the people's money to develop the George Washington Memorial Parkway, extending from Mount Vernon to and through the District of Columbia. The title of H. R. 15524 which carries that $16,000,000 is as follows:

For the acquisition, establishment, and development of the George Washington Memorial Parkway along the Potomac from Mount Vernon and Fort Washington to the Great Falls—and to provide for the acquisition of lands in the District of Columbia and the States of Maryland and Virginia requisite to the comprehensive park, parkway, and playground system of the National Capital.

Note that, to the Great Falls—

The committee report on H. R. 15524 states:

The bill divides the program into three main divisions:

1. Development of the George Washington Memorial Parkway, to include both shores of the Potomac from Mount Vernon and Fort Washington to a point above the Great Falls, except within Alexandria and the District of Columbia, this to include the Mount Vernon Highway when completed, if constructed on the river route, and also a highway to be constructed from Fort Washington to Great Falls on the Maryland side of the Potomac.

Millions of the people's money were appropriated for the George Washington Memorial Parkway, extending to each side of the Potomac River at Great Falls. The bill which is before us, which I call the biggest monstrosity ever placed upon the calendar, will give to a private toll-bridge company the absolute right for 20 years to construct and maintain a private toll bridge, and charge tolls on the George Washington Memorial Parkway system. The responsibility rests squarely upon the House. I ask you gentlemen to pause before you pass this bill, which will give a private toll-bridge company the right to construct the connecting link in the chain of this great memorial parkway system and charge tolls thereon.

Mr. STEVENSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SCHAFER. Yes.

Mr. STEVENSON. I suggest to the gentleman that if he stays here five years or so longer they will be back asking the Government to buy that same bridge at an enormous profit.

Mr. SCHAFER. That may be expected, and especially so in view of the facts presented by the gentleman from New York [Mr. LAGUARDIA] regarding the excessive tolls charged over these private toll bridges. I think this Congress should hesitate to pass a bill providing for this private toll bridge which is to be a connecting link in the chain of the great George Washington Memorial Parkway, which is costing the people's Treasury millions and millions of dollars.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SCHAFER. Yes.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Will the gentleman point out that the expenditure of this $16,000,000 will create a large amount of traffic over that bridge and that the bridge company will be able to capitalize that traffic as going value and as franchise value, all of which will be charged up at the time this bridge is taken over?

Mr. SCHAFER. The gentleman is absolutely correct. And when you want to recapture that bridge you will be called upon to pay twenty times the actual cost of its construction. I believe this bridge is different from other bridges in various portions of the country. We are providing for the construction of a great memorial highway and parkway in the Nation's Capital and we should not permit a private toll bridge to be the link connecting the Virginia and Maryland sides. In the name of economy, in the name of justice, and in the name of principle I ask you to vote against this monstrosity. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Wisconsin has expired. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the time for commencing and the time for completing the construction of a bridge authorized by the act of Congress approved April 21, 1928, to be built across the Potomac River by the Great Falls Bridge Co., entitled "An act authorizing the Great Falls Bridge Co., its successors and assigns, to construct, maintain, and operate a bridge across the Potomac River at or near the Great Falls," are hereby extended one and three years, respectively, from the date of the approval hereof.

SEC. 2. In constructing the said bridge the said company is authorized, by and with the approval of the Secretary of War, to use and occupy such Government-owned land located at or near Great Falls as is necessary to carry to completion the construction of said bridge, upon such terms and conditions as the Secretary of War May deem equitable and fair to the public.

SEC. 3. That the right to alter, amend, or repeal this act is hereby expressly reserved.

With the following committee amendments:

Page 2, line 3, strike out the words "In constructing the said bridge the said company" and insert "The Great Falls Bridge Co., its successors and assigns."

Page 2, line 5, after the word "is," insert the word "hereby."

Page 2, line 8, strike out the words "carry to completion the construction of" and insert "construct, maintain, and operate."

Page 2, line 9, after the word "bridge," insert the words "and its approaches."

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois to the committee amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. DENISON to the committee amendment: On page 2, line 9, after the word "approaches," insert the words "and as may be approved by the National Capital Park and Planning Commission."

The amendment to the committee amendment was agreed to.

The committee amendments as amended were agreed to.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the bill will be considered as having been read a third time and passed.

Mr. SCHAFER. Mr. Speaker, I object to that. I think the question should be put.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be read a third time.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the passage of the bill.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. SCHAFER and Mr. DICKSTEIN) there were—ayes 91, noes 28.

So the bill was passed.

On motion of Mr. DENISON, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

JOINT COMMISSION ON AIRPORTS

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, I send to the Clerk's desk a resolution (S. J. Res. 216) to establish a joint commission on airports, and ask unanimous consent for its present consideration.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

Whereas it is vital to the resources of the Capital of the United States that its airport facilities should be adequate for present and anticipated aviation needs in order that Washington's equipment in this respect should serve maximum Capital requirements and reflect the Capital's national leadership; and

Whereas this important problem involves not only municipal facilities but also Federal facilities and a proper consideration of the relationships between them; and

Whereas comprehensive inquiry and recommendation require simultaneous study of such ports and fields as may be maintained for the use and benefit of the War Department, the Navy Department, the Post Office Department, the Commerce Department, and the municipality; and

Whereas this multilateral problem involves considerations ordinarily referred to several separate committees in the Senate and the House of Representatives: Therefore be it

Resolved, etc., That there is hereby established a joint congressional commission to be known as the joint commission on airports and to be composed of five Senators, appointed by the President of the Senate, and five Members elect of the House of Representatives for the Seventy-first Congress, appointed by the Speaker of the House of Representatives. The commission is authorized and directed to investigate the needs for airports and aviation fields of the War Department, the Navy Department, the Post Office Department, the Department of Commerce, and the District of Columbia, and to report to the Congress as soon as practicable but in no event later than December 15, 1929, the results of its investigation, together with its recommendations of sites, plans, and suitable allocation of costs.

SEC. 2. For the purposes of this resolution the commission, or any committee thereof, is authorized to hold such hearings, to sit and act at such times and places, to employ such experts and clerical, stenographic, and other assistants, to require by subpœna or otherwise the attendance of such witnesses and the production of such books, papers, and documents, to administer such oaths, to take such testimony, and to make such expenditures, as it deems advisable. The cost of stenographic services in reporting hearings shall not be in excess of 25 cents per hundred words. The expenses of the commission, which shall not exceed $2,000, shall be paid one-half from the contingent fund of the Senate and one-half from the contingent fund of the House of Representatives upon vouchers approved by the chairman of the commission.

SEC. 3. The commission shall cease to exist upon the submission of its report to the Congress in accordance with the provisions of this resolution.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, this is a joint resolution.

Mr. SNELL. Yes; a Senate joint resolution.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. It will require signature by the Executive?

Mr. SNELL. Yes.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. The gentleman has noticed, of course, that there are a lot of "whereases"?

Mr. SNELL. It came over from the Senate in that form and we did not try to amend it, because it would have to go back to the Senate, so we decided to just let it go in this form.

I think the resolution fully explains what we are trying to do. There has been a proposition to spend $1,500,000 on an airport in Washington, without any investigation. It is a controversial matter and it seemed best to all concerned that a careful and thorough investigation should be made to see where the airport should be located.

This is the purpose of the resolution, and I move the previous question on the resolution.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. This is a matter of unanimous consent and consent has not been given, but I will withdraw my reservation of objection.

Mr. GARBER. What is the amount appropriated in the resolution?

Mr. SNELL. Two thousand dollars.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

The joint resolution was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

A similar House joint resolution was laid on the table.

JOSEPH F. THORPE

Mr. UNDERHILL. Mr. Speaker, by direction of the Committee on Claims, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the bill (S. 382) for the relief of Joseph F. Thorpe, and pass the same.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. REID of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, I object.

FORMER OFFICERS OF THE UNITED STATES NAVAL RESERVE FORCE AND THE UNITED STATES MARINE CORPS RESERVE

Mr. WOODRUFF. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of the bill (S. 150) for the relief of former officers of the United States Naval Reserve Force and the United States Marine Corps Reserve who were released from active duty and disenrolled at places other than their homes or places of enrollment.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Michigan asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill S. 150, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the General Accounting Office is hereby authorized to pay mileage at the rate of 8 cents per mile, computed by the shortest usually traveled route, for travel actually performed within one year from date and place of release from active duty or disenrollment to their homes or places of enrollment, to such former officers of the United States Naval Reserve Force or United States Marine Corps Reserve who have been released from active service or disenrolled under honorable conditions and not at his own request at places other than their homes or places of enrollment, upon the presentation by such former officers of satisfactory evidence showing that they actually performed such travel to their homes or places of enrollment: Provided, That the provisions of this act shall be applicable only to former officers of the United States Naval Reserve Force or United States Marine Corps Reserve who were actually released from active duty or disenrolled under honorable conditions prior to July 1, 1922.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, may I ask the gentleman from Michigan if this subject has been considered by his committee?

Mr. WOODRUFF. It has been considered by the Committee on Naval Affairs of the House, and by direction of the committee, both majority and minority members, I am calling up the bill at this time.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The bill was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

RETIREMENT OF OFFICERS OF THE NAVY

Mr. BRITTEN. Mr. Speaker, by direction of the Committee on Naval Affairs, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 17322) to amend the act approved June 22, 1926, entitled "An act to amend that part of the act approved August 29, 1916, relative to the retirement of captains, commanders, and lieutenant commanders in the line of the Navy," which is on the Clerk's desk.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill H. R. 17322, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 17322) to amend the act approved June 22, 1926, entitled "An act to amend that part of the act approved August 29, 1916, relative to the retirement of captains, commanders, and lieutenant commanders in the line of the Navy"

Be it enacted, etc., That the act approved June 22, 1926 (44 Stat. L. 781, chap. 649; U. S. C. Appendix, title 34, sec. 311a), entitled "An act to amend that part of the act approved August 29, 1916, relative to the retirement of captains, commanders, and lieutenant commanders in the line of the Navy," is hereby amended by striking out the figures "1929," appearing in the first sentence of said act, and in lieu thereof inserting the figures "1931," so that as amended said act shall read as follows:

That until March 5, 1931, the provisions contained in the act approved August 29, 1916 (39 Stat. L. 579), which provide for the retirement of captains, commanders, and lieutenant commanders of the line of the Navy who are more than 56, 50, and 45 years of age, respectively, and who have become ineligible for promotion on account of such age, be, and the same are hereby, modified to the extent that captains, commanders, and lieutenant commanders shall not become ineligible for promotion and shall not be retired until they have completed 35, 28, and 21 years, respectively, of commissioned service in the Navy, and upon the completion of such service, if not recommended for promotion, they shall be retired without regard to age under the conditions specified in said act: Provided, That the commissioned service of Naval Academy graduates, for the purpose of this act only, shall be computed from June 30 of the calendar year in which the class with which they graduated completed its academic course, or, if its academic course was more or less than four years, from June 30 of the calendar year in which it would have completed an academic course of four years.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, will the gentleman state the purpose of this bill?

Mr. BRITTEN. Yes; because of the parliamentary situation in the Senate it is necessary to extend existing law two years. The bill now before the House does not change the language of existing law except it extends the time from March 4, 1929, to March 4, 1931.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. This is a House bill.

Mr. BRITTEN. This is a House bill and the presumption is the Senate will pass this bill immediately, whereas it will not pass the legislation now resting in the Senate affecting this same subject.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Let me ask the gentleman a further question. Is there any probability that the Senate in passing this bill, if it goes through, will add a number of amendments of some sort that are going to require a conference and bring us up against a lot of new legislation under a conference report here to-morrow?

Mr. BRITTEN. No; I will say to the gentleman that if they do that, we will "kiss this good-by."

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

ADDRESS OF HON. HAMILTON FISH, JR.

Mr. DEMPSEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by inserting therein a speech delivered by the gentleman from New York [Mr. FISH] on disabled and decorated veterans in my district.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. DEMPSEY. Mr. Speaker, under the leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following speech of Representative HAMILTON FISH, Jr., delivered at the banquet given in honor of the disabled and decorated veterans of the World War at Buffalo, N. Y., on February 22, 1929, under the auspices of the Martha Washington Republican Club:

CONGRESS AND THE DISABLED VETERANS

Mr. FISH. It is a great privilege and honor to come here on this one hundred and ninety-seventh anniversary of the birthday of George Washington and participate in this reception to the disabled and decorated veterans of Erie County. I congratulate the Martha Washington Club for remembering the living heroes of all our wars and doing them honor on this anniversary of the birth of our first President and Father of our Country. I am sure that this remembrance and appreciation of our veterans would appeal to the heart and mind of George Washington, whose hair grew grey and whose eyes grew dim in the service of his country as Commander in Chief of our Revolutionary Army for eight long years.

No other American has ever had the love and devotion of his soldiers to such an unlimited degree, and no commanding officer ever took such a personal interest and affection in his men. In a letter of advice to the governor of the thirteen States from his headquarters at Newburgh, N. Y., dated June, 1783, he wrote as follows: "Where is the man to be found who wishes to remain indebted for the defense of his own person and property to the exertions, the bravery, and the blood of others without making one generous effort to pay the debt of honor and gratitude?"

George Washington went far beyond the American Legion in urging adjusted compensation, for he urged half pay for life for his officers, and land donations, exemption from taxation, back pay, and one full year's pay for his men.

It is fortunately not my function to-day to deliver a eulogy on Washington, but if it were I would be mindful of the little known but nevertheless beautiful and expressive words of Abraham Lincoln, that great master of the English language, when in 1842 he said: "Washington is the mightiest name on earth, long since mightiest in the cause of civil liberty, still mightiest in moral reformation. On that name no eulogy is expected. It can not be. To add brightness to the sun or glory to the name of Washington is alike impossible. Let none attempt it. In solemn awe pronounce the name, and in its naked deathless splendor leave it shining on."

I know of no group more deserving of the affection and gratitude of the American people than those who were wounded or disabled as a result of the war; for many of them there has been no armistice as they have been compelled to wage a continuous war against ill health and disabilities. For them the heart of the American people demands that all the promises and pledges made during the war, that nothing was too good for them, shall be kept. And answering that demand at the instigation of the various veterans' organizations—the American Legion, the Disabled American Veterans, the Veterans of Foreign Wars, and the United Spanish War Veterans—the Congress of the United States has tried to keep faith with our disabled. The veterans themselves do not ask for charity but merely for justice at the hand of a grateful country. The Congress has provided vast sums of money, amounting to in excess of a million dollars a day, to provide hospitalization, rehabilitation, and compensation to our disabled veterans. No nation has ever attempted such a liberal program, and I am glad to say that it is being administered honestly, equitably, and with improving efficiency throughout the country. Of course, there are still individual cases where there are difficulties in proving the necessary war origin in order to secure compensation, but recently the Congress passed a law to take veterans of all wars into Veterans' Bureau hosptials for treatment, regardless of the origin of the disability.

I have proposed a bill providing for $8 a month as hospital allowance for all uncompensated veterans in Veterans' Bureau hospitals during the period of hospitalization. I would appreciate the support and indorsement of the veterans of Erie County, and particularly of the Legion, for the bill which seeks to prevent our sick and disabled comrades from becoming paupers in the hospitals and being obliged to bum postage stamps, cigarettes, telephone calls, bus rides, and small necessities.

This bill has been indorsed by the Disabled American Veterans and the Veterans of Foreign Wars, and I hope, if it fails of passage before Congress adjourns, that the American Legion in this State will get behind it.

As chairman of the President's advisory committee on veterans' preference I want to speak to you of the one glaring instance where our Government has fallen down in providing for our disabled veterans, and that is in securing them positions in the Government service, where they can earn a living for themselves and their families.

The number of disabled veterans in the Government service is criminally small. Go to the various departments in Washington and see how few crippled veterans of the World War are working for the Government. Go to the National Museum or the Smithsonian Institution, where 90 per cent of the guards and watchmen should be disabled World War veterans, and you will only find two or three.

If you happened to visit the Musée du Louvre or any of the French, British, or German public buildings or museums, you would find practically all the guides wounded soldiers, with one arm or one leg, or badly crippled or gassed.

The American people have repeatedly made promises and given pledges to take care of our disabled, and they insist on keeping faith by helping the disabled soldiers to fill every available position for which they are qualified in the Federal Government.

I do not believe I am violating any secret when I predict as chairman of the President's advisory committee on veterans' preference that the President will within a few days issue an Executive order placing the disabled veterans of all our wars at the head of the civil-service list whenever they make a passing mark. At any rate, this was the unanimous recommendation of our committee, and it will go a long way to make it possible for our crippled heroes to secure appointment under the Government in whose service they were disabled.

I am informed that a considerable portion of the population of Buffalo is of German origin. They are among our most industrious and loyal citizens and have done much to build up our country and our free institutions. The greatness and prosperity of many of our western cities—Chicago, St. Louis, Milwaukee, and St. Paul—are due in large measure to the German population, for their thrift and honest industry. Americans of German descent, wherever found, are forces for good citizenship and a bulwark against Bolshevism and communism.

It is now a decade since the signing of the armistice that ended the World War. Is it not time that the passions and prejudices engendered in that conflict should be put definitely behind us? Is it not time that the spirit of hatred and hostility should cease and that all nations should strive together for international peace and good will?

The statute of limitations has long since run against enmity toward the German people. Our Government should welcome the German Republic, which under wise leadership is becoming a potent force for international limitation of armament and world peace.

It is naturally true that many people of German ancestry in this country opposed our entrance into the World War, but once war was declared they were just as loyal as any other element of our population.

It might interest you American veterans who were decorated for valor to know that the two outstanding American aces, Eddie Rickenbacker and Frank Luke, were of German origin, the parents of both having been born in Germany.

I do not want to take the time to discuss our war-debt settlements, except to say that they represent unparalleled generosity in the recorded dealings between nations. We do not claim we won the war, but we must not forget that the American troops helped turn the tide from defeat into victory, yet we asked for nothing and got just what we asked—nothing at all, no conquered land, no territories, no indemnities or reparations, except to pay for our army of occupation. There is no possible excuse for calling us Uncle Shylock.

There has been a tendency in the last few years among successful business men, international bankers, and intellectuals to criticize and belittle our republican form of government and to extoll Fascism or some other form of military dictatorship that has sprung up in Europe since the war. Mussolini may have saved Italy from the horrors of communism. Fascism may be the kind of government needed in Italy, but it is scarcely any different from the dictatorship of Julius Cæsar 2,000 years ago. It is a repudiation of government by the consent of the governed and of the principles of popular government. It is the negation of everything that we were taught at school. It is the rule by force and the bayonet and the denial of all civil liberties—the right to vote, the freedom of speech, of the press, and of assembly. Mussolini says our democratic form of government has failed. Wherein has it failed? Thanks to George Washington and the Constitution of the United States and to Andrew Jackson and Abraham Lincoln we are a united and prosperous country of over 100,000,000 people in the morning of its glorious destiny.

Let us reaffirm our faith in our form of government on this anniversary and give thanks that we are American citizens. Let us rededicate ourselves to the proposition that a government of the people, by the people, and for the people shall not perish from the face of the earth, because it is the fairest, safest, soundest, most honorable, and best government devised by the mind of man.

ATLANTIC REFINING CO.

Mr. WELSH of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the bill (S.

4354) for the relief of the Atlantic Refining Co., a corporation of the State of Pennsylvania, owner of the American steamship H. C. Folger, against U. S. S. Connecticut, and consider the same.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the claim of the Atlantic Refining Co., a corporation of the State of Pennsylvania, having its principal office and place of business in the city of Philadelphia, State of Pennsylvania, owner of the American steamship H. C. Folger, against the United States for damages alleged to have been caused by collision in the Delaware River below the mouth of the Schuylkill River, on April 6, 1921, between said steamship H. C. Folger and the U. S. S. Connecticut, a second-line battleship owned by the United States and operated by the Department of the Navy of the Government of the United States, may be sued for by the said Atlantic Refining Co. in the District Court of the United States for the Eastern District of Pennsylvania, sitting as a court of admiralty and acting under the rules governing such court; and said court shall have jurisdiction to hear and determine such suit and to enter a judgment or decree for the amount of such damage and costs, if any, as shall be found to be due against the United States in favor of the said Atlantic Refining Co., or against the said Atlantic Refining Co. in favor of the United States, upon the same principles and measures of liability as in like cases between private parties with the same rights of appeal: Provided, That such notice of the suit shall be given to the Attorney General of the United States as may be provided by order of said court, and it shall be the duty of the Attorney General to cause the United States attorney in such district to appear and defend for the United States: Provided further, That said suit shall be brought and commenced within four months from the date of the passage of this act.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The bill was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

A motion by Mr. WELSH of Pennsylvania to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

AMENDING THE FEDERAL FARM LOAN ACT

Mr. McFADDEN. Mr. Speaker, under the agreement in relation to the bill H. R. 13936, amending the Federal farm loan act, I am recognized for an hour's time, and I will yield one-half of that time to the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. STEAGALL], who is opposed to the bill. I ask unanimous consent that at the end of the debate the previous question may be considered as ordered.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the title to the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 13936) to amend the second paragraph of section 4 of the Federal farm loan act, as amended.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania asks unanimous consent that the one hour be equally divided, one-half by himself and one-half by the gentleman from Alabama, and that the previous question at the end of the debate may be considered as ordered. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. McFADDEN. Mr. Speaker, at this time I do not care to take up much time of the House except to explain the bill. The bill now before the House amends the Federal farm loan act in one particular. It increases the maximum loan limit of the Federal farm land banks in the island of Porto Rico to $25,000, the same amount that applies to all of the rest of the United States.

I now yield to the gentleman from Alabama one-half of my time, 30 minutes.

Mr. STEAGALL. Mr. Speaker, I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. LUCE].

Mr. LUCE. Mr. Speaker, sympathy for a people stricken by disaster impels me to refrain from labored argument against this proposal, but I think the House ought not to act upon it without full understanding as to what it means. This proposal has been before the Committee on Banking and Currency repeatedly, and as a member of that committee I have always felt that to grant the request would be a dangerous step. The Federal farm-loan system was created for the purpose of helping what is commonly known as "the little fellow." It is in line with the system we have in my neighborhood that we call the cooperative banking system, under which a person struggling to make a start in life is enabled to secure a home or get capital to keep him going until he has made enough money to carry himself. That system of aid as applied by the farm-loan system never contemplated financing large enterprises. A loan of $25,000, being 50 per cent of the equity of the property, is public financing of an enterprise in which $50,000 and upward of capital may be invested.

That idea, if carried further, will ultimately, I am afraid, spell the ruin of the Federal farm-loan system, because sooner or later there will be a revolt against financing large enterprises out of the Public Treasury.

Mr. McFADDEN. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KIESS].

Mr. KIESS. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the House, I strongly favor the passage of this legislation. I think that particularly at this time it will be beneficial to the people of Porto Rico.

Mr. GARBER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KIESS. Yes.

Mr. GARBER. Will it be beneficial to the men of small means—the farmer?

Mr. KIESS. Yes.

Mr. GARBER. Does it increase the amount of the loan to be made?

Mr. KIESS. It increases the limit of loans from $10,000 to $25,000.

Mr. GARBER. How about the per cent of the security, what is required?

Mr. KIESS. It does not change that from the present basis. It does not change the law in any particular except in respect to the total amount that the farm land bank can loan in Porto Rico.

Mr. Speaker, as chairman of the Committee on Insular Affairs, which is charged with general legislation affecting Porto Rico, I have had occasion several times to visit the island, and I feel, therefore, that I am probably in better position to speak with reference to this legislation than some of the Members who have not had the pleasure and privilege of visiting Porto Rico. Two years ago, immediately after the adjournment of Congress, a number of the members of the committee, and also some other Members of the House, visited Porto Rico. At that time this question of increasing the loan limit from $10,000 to $25,000 was discussed. We considered the question at the time when we were traveling over the island. Every one of our party on that trip came home convinced that Porto Rico had been discriminated against when the Farm Loan Board was created, and that there was no good reason why they should not be granted all of the privileges enjoyed by the States. We told our Porto Rican friends at that time that when we came home we would try to have the law amended. This legislation has been carefully considered by the committees of both Houses and has passed the Senate.

Mr. BOYLAN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KIESS. Yes.

Mr. BOYLAN. I notice that on page 2, line 17, there is provided:

> The rate charged borrowers may be 1½ per cent in excess of the rate borne by the last preceding issue of the farm loan bonds of the Federal land bank with which such branch bank is connected.

What will that rate be, all together?

Mr. McFADDEN. That is existing law. The only change that we make is in the amount of the loan.

Mr. BOYLAN. What I am trying to find out is what will be the rate of interest paid by the borrowers. This provides 1½ per cent in excess of the rate borne by the bonds. What was the rate borne by the bonds?

Mr. McFADDEN. If the rate of the bond is 5 per cent, the rate of the loan would 6½ per cent. It is conditioned entirely upon the sale of the bonds. The money market regulates that.

Mr. BOYLAN. Is 6½ per cent the usual rate in Porto Rico?

Mr. KIESS. That is less than the usual rate.

Mr. BOYLAN. I did not want to think that the Government was going into the Shylock business.

Mr. LaGUARDIA. The answer to that is that the Government is trying to take him out of the hands of the Shylocks.

Mr. BOYLAN. I am glad to receive the information, hence the interrogatory that I propounded.

Mr. KIESS. Mr. Speaker, I am surprised to know that there is some opposition to the bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. TEMPLE). The time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania has expired.

Mr. McFADDEN. Mr. Speaker, I yield the gentleman two minutes more.

Mr. KIESS. Mr. Speaker, this legislation has the hearty indorsement of the Governor of Porto Rico, Hon. Henry M. Towner, who was formerly a Member of the House. It has the indorsement of the Baltimore Federal Land Bank, of which Porto Rico is a branch. It has the indorsement of the Federal Farm Loan Bureau and the Porto Rican Legislature. I think we should take action favorably on this bill before we adjourn. You will remember that you all supported the Porto Rican hurricane-relief fund, and we are hoping that the appropriation will pass in the first deficiency appropriation bill. Unfortunately, it has been held up for two months, and there has been a great deal of suffering and inconvenience on account of it. I am satisfied that the passage of this act, in addition to the Porto Rican relief fund, will at this time help our friends in Porto Rico very much. I dislike to see a distinction made between the people of Porto Rico and the people of the United States. I have had occasion to visit the island several times, and I have a very high regard for the people of Porto Rico.

Mr. STEAGALL. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH].

Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the House, since the inauguration of the farm-loan system there has been loaned to the people of Porto Rico $13,314,500 through the farm-loan system, and through the intermediate-credit system there has been loaned $4,074,236.93, a total of nearly $18,000,000, with a population of less than 1,500,000 in the island.

These people are not rich people. They are not people who have property which will justify a loan of $25,000. A citizen of Porto Rico would have to own real estate worth $50,000 before he could get a loan of $25,000; so it is perfectly evident if this loan limit is increased from $10,000 to $25,000 the people of Porto Rico, whom we are trying to help, would not be helped at all. The people of Porto Rico who need this relief would not be relieved, but only great corporations, who would go down there and acquire, through agents, property worth $50,000, could get these $25,000 loans.

Gentlemen, the bond market at this time is low. This is no time to put new securities on the market. Every farm-loan bank in the United States will be called upon to supply any deficiency in the value of this property. The Committee on Banking and Currency of the House, which had extensive hearings earlier in the session, voted with some hesitation that this loan limit should be increased from $10,000 to $15,000. The Senate increased the limit from $15,000 to $25,000.

This bill is back from the Senate for our concurrence. As far as the committee has been able to ascertain, there is no demand from native Porto Ricans for this legislation. The native Porto Rican is not in a position to take advantage of it. He is not in the financial position to offer the security which would justify a loan of $25,000. We have made an effort—I certainly have made an effort—to find out just who is back of this proposed legislation. If it is a legitimate interest, I would be glad to vote for it.

Mr. McFADDEN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield there?

Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH. I regret I can not yield now.

There is not a member of the Banking and Currency Committee, and I am sure there is not a Member of this House, who is not anxious to help the people of Porto Rico. But to ask us to request the farm-loan banks of the United States to supply funds to exploit Porto Rico is not carrying out the purposes of the farm loan act.

If this proposed legislation passes, when the poor fellow who needs a small loan asks for it he will be turned away with the answer that the available funds have already been loaned to the rich and powerful, to those who have real estate justifying loans of $25,000.

The purpose of the Federal farm-loan system was to help those least able to help themselves. [Applause.]

Mr. McFADDEN. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the Commissioner from Porto Rico [Mr. DAVILA].

Mr. BRAND of Georgia. Mr. Speaker, I regard this as one of the most important bills pending before the Congress, and I make the point of order that there is no quorum present. We ought to hear these proceedings.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. TEMPLE). The Chair will count. Evidently there is no quorum present.

Mr. McFADDEN. Mr. Speaker, I move a call of the House.

A call of the House was ordered.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will call the roll.

The Clerk called the roll, and the following Members failed to answer to their names:

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. TEMPLE). Three hundred and forty-seven Members have answered to their names, a quorum.

Mr. McFADDEN. Mr. Speaker, I move to dispense with further proceedings under the call.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Porto Rico is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. DAVILA. Mr. Speaker, I know that my friends on the Democratic side who are opposed to this measure sincerely believe it is not good legislation and that an increase of the amount of farm loans in Porto Rico is not justified. This bill does not change the law. It simply extends to a part of the United States separated by the sea provisions that are in force on the mainland.

I really appreciated the statement of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KIESS] when he said he does not want any discriminations against the people of Porto Rico. He says further that he has some very high regard for the people of my country. I will say to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KIESS] that his regard for the people of my country is not superior to the regard of my people for the gentleman from Pennsylvania and the people of the United States. [Applause.] We are living, in my opinion, under the same protection. For me, it is one family, one nation, one country, one flag. [Applause.] I want my friends from the South to deal with the people of Porto Rico in the same way that the people of Porto Rico deal with the people of the United States.

My good friend from Maryland [Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH] has spoken about the small farmer. He is not more interested than I am in favor of the small farmer. Because I want to protect the small farmer in Porto Rico is that I am defending this measure.

The gentleman from Maryland [Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH] wants to know who is behind this bill. He does not need to leave the floor of the House to find out who is supporting this legislation. I have just been reelected to Congress for a term of four years, and as the accredited representative of the island I am giving to this measure my whole-hearted support. "Who is behind this legislation?" asks the gentleman from Maryland. I am behind it and feel proud of my stand. [Applause.]

I have letters and cablegrams from individual farmers, the chamber of commerce, farmers' association, and other agencies in Porto Rico indorsing this proposal. If the gentleman desires the indorsement of the legislature of the island, I can assure him that he will have no difficulty in obtaining a prompt response.

My good friend from South Carolina [Mr. STEVENSON] has been in Porto Rico, but I do not believe that he knows the exact conditions prevailing in my country. I find him on this occasion in the opposition. He is always honest and fair; and should he be fully acquainted with our conditions, I am sure he would lend his support to this legislation.

Talk about the small farmer! In Porto Rico all are small farmers with the exception of the big fellows of the sugar industry, and these do not need to borrow money in Porto Rico; they can readily obtain it in the United States. This is not the case with the other fellows, who find it difficult to borrow money and are obliged to pay a high rate of interest for short periods. This is the fellow we want to help. He may have 500 acres of land and still be unable to obtain money in the commercial banks of Porto Rico. He has not the facilities of the farmers in this country. It is evident that the necessity of this legislation is more urgent in Porto Rico than in any other part of the Union.

The fear of the inability of these farmers to meet their indebtedness is not justified. The system is not in danger, as has been stated by the opposition. You need not be afraid of any of these contingencies. All loans will be paid, and the people of the United States will not suffer in the least. These loans are sufficiently guaranteed by the value of the property and by the farmer himself, who, as a general rule, is always fair and honest in his dealings.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Porto Rico has expired.

Mr. McFADDEN. Mr. Speaker, I yield the gentleman two additional minutes.

Mr. DAVILA. This bill provides, among other things, that loans made by the branch of the Federal land bank in Porto Rico shall not exceed the sum of $25,000. This provision increases the loans from $10,000 to $25,000. We are in favor of this increase, as we believe it is necessary to furnish some excellent farmers in Porto Rico with all the money they need for the proper cultivation of the soil.

In the beginning the loan limit was $5,000. This was afterwards raised by Congress to $10,000, and this bill increases the loan limit to $25,000, this being the amount permissible under the act to be loaned to the farmers in the United States. The record of the operations of the branch in Porto Rico fully justifies this advance in the loan limit, as there are excellent farmers who are denied service of this system because their operations require a larger loan than $10,000. The record of the branch in Porto Rico has been a very satisfactory one, and the Baltimore bank has been more than pleased with the way the Porto Rican borrowers have met their amortization payments. I am going to read to you the letter that I have from Mr. V. R. McHale, chief examiner of the Federal Farm Loan Bureau:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT,
FEDERAL FARM LOAN BUREAU,
Washington, February 4, 1928.

Hon. FELIX CORDOVA DAVILA,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. DAVILA: In accordance with your request, I am pleased to give you some statistics regarding the loans made by the Porto Rico branch of the Federal Land Bank of Baltimore.

The branch was established in 1922, and up to December 31, 1927, has made 3,972 loans, amounting to $11,693,000. One hundred and ten of these loans, amounting to $293,700, have since been paid off and retired, and borrowers have paid $739,374.21 on principal, leaving 3,862 loans outstanding as of December 31, 1927, aggregating $10,659,925.79. During the year 1927 the net increase in mortgage loans in Porto Rico amounted to 663 loans, aggregating $1,483,240.58. The report of December 31 shows delinquent semiannual installments of $28,311.47.

The borrowers have taken stock in the bank to the extent of $569,965, which is in accordance with the provisions of the farm loan act. On this stock the Federal Land Bank of Baltimore paid a 6 per cent dividend in 1927.

During the five years that the Porto Rico branch has been in operation the Baltimore bank has not had to foreclose or otherwise acquire title to a single farm in Porto Rico.

Yours very truly,

V. R. MCHALE, Chief Examiner.

This legislation is approved and asked for by the manager of the branch of the Federal land bank at San Juan, P. R., has been thoroughly investigated by the Federal land bank at Baltimore, and has also been approved by the Federal Farm Loan Bureau, as shown by the following letter addressed to Chairman McFADDEN, of the Committee on Banking and Currency:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT,
FEDERAL FARM LOAN BUREAU,
Washington, April 5, 1928.

Hon. LOUIS T. MCFADDEN,
House of Representatives.

DEAR MR. MCFADDEN: You wrote to me on March 12, 1928, with reference to the proposal to increase to $25,000 the amount which may be loaned to any one borrower by the branch of the Federal Land Bank of Baltimore in Porto Rico. At that time one of the board's representatives was in Porto Rico, and it seemed desirable to await his return before expressing any opinion concerning the proposal. After canvassing the matter with him and obtaining the views of the Federal Land Bank of Baltimore, the board has reached the conclusion that it would be desirable to increase the loan limit in Porto Rico to $25,000. The Federal land banks in this country, as you know, are authorized to lend not exceeding $25,000 to any one borrower, and the proposed change would place the Porto Rico branch on a parity with the other banks so far as loan limit is concerned.

Very truly yours,

EUGENE MEYER, Farm Loan Commissioner.

This proposal has also been indorsed by the people of Porto Rico through Governor Towner, the Chamber of Commerce of Porto Rico, the Association of Agriculturists, the treasurer, and the commissioner of agriculture and labor.

Our farmers are very badly in need of money. In many cases the sum of $10,000 is not enough to meet their needs; therefore they are unable to cultivate all the available land and to obtain a reasonable balance which will enable them to support their families and live a decent life.

The rate of interest in the absence of an agreement is 6 per cent, but it can be extended by contract to 12 per cent. Within this limit it is lawful to discount bills and notes and other similar obligations.

A farmer in Porto Rico with 5, 10, 20, and even 200 acres of land in the mountains is a poor fellow who has at times to work in the sugar-cane plantations, while the fruit of his poor and badly conditioned plantation ripens.

For the distribution of credit we have commercial banks which lend money at 9 per cent interest for a term varying from 3 to 4 months.

The increase of the loans from $10,000 to $25,000 will not cost a cent to the United States and will be very valuable to the farmers in Porto Rico. As I have said before, the system is working very well in the island, and the officer in charge of the bank in Porto Rico has recommended this increase.

This legislation is very badly needed in my country, and I hope it will have the indorsement of this Congress. I have no quarrel with the people who are opposed to this measure; I respect their position, but I hope the majority here will consider this as good legislation and will give their approval to it. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Porto Rico has expired.

Mr. STEAGALL. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLACK]. [Prolonged applause, the Members rising.]

Mr. BLACK of Texas. Mr. Speaker, this will probably be my last speech in the House of Representatives before retiring March 4, and I want to express my gratitude to every Member of the House for the many evidences of good will which I have received. I yield to no man in fondness for the Delegate from Porto Rico [Mr. DAVILA], but in voting upon this bill we are not voting on the Delegate from Porto Rico. If we were, I dare say we would all vote "aye" [applause]; but we are voting upon a very important measure and not an individual.

When the Federal farm loan act was originally enacted I dare say that everyone will admit that it was the intention of the Congress to extend the provisions of the act only to continental United States, but later on Congress in its wisdom has seen fit to extend the benefits of the act to the island of Porto Rico and the Territory of Alaska within certain limitations.

The present law limits any one individual loan in these Territories to $10,000. The House Committee on Banking and Currency——

Mr. MANSFIELD. I thought the limit was $15,000.

Mr. BLACK of Texas. I am coming to the $15,000 provision now.

The Committee on Banking and Currency of the House at the present session agreed upon a bill to extend the loan limit in Porto Rico and Alaska to $15,000 for any one loan, and that bill went to the Senate. The Senate has amended it, extending the loan limit to $25,000, and the motion now before the House is to agree to the Senate amendment.

I am opposed to the motion. I think the House ought to bear in mind that the success of the Federal farm-loan system depends upon one thing, and that is ability to market its bonds to the investing public at reasonable rates of interest.

On account of the high rates of interest that now prevail in the money market, the marketing of bonds is very considerably depressed. It is more or less difficult now for the farm-loan system to market its bonds at the low rate of intereest that is necessary in order to operate the system for the benefit of the farmer borrowers, and the more we increase the loan limit the greater the amount of bonds that have to be marketed, and therefore the reason I oppose the Senate amendment and insist that we adhere to the House provision is because I think it would be exceedingly unwise at this date to do anything that might affect adversely the marketability of the Federal farm-loan bonds, and I hope the amendment will not be agreed to. [Applause.]

Mr. McFADDEN. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. LAGUARDIA].

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Speaker, ordinarily I would agree with the suggestion just made by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLACK], that perhaps $15,000 would be the prudent limit to place on loans of this character at this time, but we must take the parliamentary situation into consideration. We are confronted now with either accepting the Senate bill and sending it to the President for signature or else having the bill lost in a maze of proposed legislation which will fail of passage in the last hours of the Congress.

I do not think we are taking any undue risks or chances in increasing the loan limit. We are not decreasing the margin required or the proper valuation of the property. The same proportionate amount of margin and security and all the safeguards will be required for a $25,000 loan as is now required for a $10,000 loan. The law in this respect is not changed.

Now, gentlemen, we have an unusual situation in Porto Rico. We have a crisis in Porto Rico, the result of the hurricane of a few months ago. There is universal unemployment throughout the island. I get these facts not from any statistics, I get them from the thousands of Porto Ricans who live in my district and who know of the unemployment and the dire need of the people of the island for work. The good folks in my district know from their own dear ones down on the island the need to rehabilitate all the farms on the island.

We passed a Porto Rican relief bill, and the appropriation for that relief is in the first deficiency bill, which has not yet returned from the Senate. That law provides for loans to individuals. A farm owned by anyone else but an individual can not obtain a loan under the provisions of the Porto Rican relief legislation. I am sure no one in this House will say that I am at all concerned about the big corporations. The big sugar corporations can get all the money they need right in New York City. This bill is not for them. I am in this instance concerned about the question of unemployment in Porto Rico. If these farms that have suffered by reason of this hurricane can not be financed, we can not meet the unemployment situation in Porto Rico, and that is why I am so anxious to see this bill approved by the House at this time.

Everyone knows that when a crisis exists such as we have in Porto Rico at this time, the loan sharks take advantage of the situation by exacting high bonuses and high rates of interest. We must go to the rescue of the owners of these farms to provide loans at a reasonable rate of interest in order that the people of Porto Rico may reassume ordinary employment. This is one reason I am willing to take a chance and adopt the Senate amendment; and if we do not do that at this time, we will have no relief in respect of the loans and there will be great danger that the appropriation under the Porto Rican relief bill will be lost in the first deficiency bill. [Applause.]

Mr. STEAGALL. Mr. Speaker and Members of the House, I want to take this occasion to express my approbation and my thanks to the membership of the House for the splendid tribute to my colleague on the Committee on Banking and Currency, the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLACK]. [Applause.] He has probably made, this afternoon, the last address that he will make during his present service in this House. I know that I speak the sentiment of every Member on both sides of the House, without regard to party affiliations, in saying that he is one of the ablest, one of the most courageous, and one of the most valuable Members who ever sat in the Congress of the United States. [Applause.]

The gentleman from New York [Mr. LAGUARDIA], who just preceded me, says that we should pass this legislation now before us on account of the peculiar parliamentary situation which exists—that on account of the fact that we are approaching adjournment, we must take this measure as passed by the Senate or nothing. The gentleman's contention is hardly justified when it is remembered that weeks and weeks ago the Senate passed a separate bill in which a provision was incorporated raising the maximum limit of loans in the land banks of Porto Rico and Alaska from $10,000 to $25,000. The House, weeks and weeks ago, passed a bill, with the approval of the majority of the Committee on Banking and Currency, raising the maximum limit to $15,000. I would not criticize the chairman of our committee or any member of the committee who does not happen to view the question as I do. But, in reply to the suggestion of the gentleman from New York [Mr. LAGUARDIA], I will say that there is no reason why this House should not have sent the bill to conference long ago; why we should not have made an effort to work out the differences between the Senate and the House, and to have undertaken to secure the approval of the bill passed by the House raising the maximum limit on loans to $15,000.

But instead of attempting to have a conference and adjusting the differences and permitting the matter to take the usual course, the chairman killed time in an effort to substitute the Senate bill without effort to work out an agreement which would meet the views of the members of the Banking and Currency Committee and the Members of the House who were in favor of the bill reported by the Banking and Currency Committee.

Now, my friends, this is an important change in the Federal farm loan law. I hope you Members on this side of the aisle, who represent agricultural districts and who are interested in the Federal farm-loan system, notwithstanding the fact that you are members of the majority party, will give this matter your serious attention before you vote to make this serious change in the provisions of the law, a change that strikes at the basic principles upon which the system was framed and a change which, I firmly believe, will prove harmful and destructive.

Let us see what was contemplated by the framers of the act. The basis of the Federal farm loan act was the provision which permitted borrowers to assemble and market their securities. We were attempting to foster the interest of the small landowner, the small farmer, and the man who wanted to become a landowner and build an independent home and rear a family. With this idea of aiding the farmer of small means we put the maximum limit on loans at $10,000. Later we raised the limit for borrowers in the United States, and the committee reported a bill to raise the maximum limit in Porto Rico and Alaska to $15,000; and we were assured that that amount of increase would be accepted and end the matter. But I want to ask you, considering the question from the standpoint of the principle involved, what right has a farmer worth $100,000, or who has assets in farm and equipment amounting to something like $100,000, to come to the Government and ask for a subsidy from the Government as basis for credit upon which to borrow money? That is what you are doing if you raise the limit to $25,000, because the bonds of the land banks are exempt from taxation; and a farmer would own about $100,000 in order to borrow $25,000. That is about the way it works out in a practical proposition. There is no justification for it in principle, and it is an unjustifiable thing to do.

You who have kept up with the operation of the Federal land banks know the difficulties that have been encountered. The legislation was fought by established farm-loan institutions and by banks in general. It was necessary to throw all possible safeguards around their management and to adopt conservative methods on every hand in order to command the confidence of the investing public and secure a market for the bonds. The value of the system depends on obtaining lowered interest rates for loans to farmers, and interest rates rest upon the rates at which the bonds of the banks can be marketed. The system has accomplished enormous savings in interest to the farmers of the country and will continue to do so if all are only wise enough to hold down the system within conservative limits.

Only last year or the year before complaints on the part of certain officials of the administration led to a complete change in the personnel of the Federal Farm Loan Board. I do not say this action was justified by any defects in the manner of operating or conducting these banks, but is enough to cause caution now in making any far-reaching change in the law.

If we had started out with this system, with provisions allowing loans to the amount of $25,000 to individual borrowers, as it will be if this legislation is passed and it had not been interrupted by the Supreme Court decision which terminated operation for a time during the period of inflation in land values, I do not believe there is a student of the Federal land-bank system of this country who would not say that long ago we would have destroyed the usefulness of these banks. It ought not to be done.

Here is the way the land-bank system works: The borrowers get together and pool their assets. The farmers of this country own the banks. Each borrower pays 5 per cent of his loan as subscription for stock and the banks issue bonds for twenty times the amount of capital. Every Federal land bank is responsible for the bonds of all of the other Federal land banks, and we have already had trouble with some of the banks because of delinquencies on loans—more trouble than I would like to discuss publicly. It is not always prudent to discuss the inside affairs of the delicate business of banking and those things that enter into the consideration of banking—credit and operation depending upon the confidence of investors. The bank at Spokane, Wash., that will have to handle the loans in Alaska if we adopt this amendment has already had its difficulties along with others of the banks that make up the 12 land banks of the country.

That bank had enormous losses there which, under the provisions of the law creating joint liability on the part of the entire membership of the system for all bonds issued, had to be absorbed by the other banks. This is being worked out successfully, and certainly this bank at Spokane should not be allowed to conduct branch operations in Alaska with the latitude or laws which this bill allows. The land-bank system of this country is the method by which all the farmers of the country enter into a sort of partnership, a cooperative system for obtaining credit on lands. I want to ask each Member here, Do the farmers of your State want to enter into a credit partnership with the farmers of Alaska or Porto Rico? I submit that question to your good judgment. My friends, it ought not to be done.

Mr. LINTHICUM. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STEAGALL. Yes.

Mr. LINTHICUM. What is the limit in the United States proper?

Mr. STEAGALL. The limit in the United States has been raised to $25,000, and I will say that it was done over my protest and my humble opposition and I think against the better judgment of those who have been students of the banking system. But that is very different from extending it to the people of Alaska and the people of Porto Rico. Conditions are entirely different. These people can not be brought into the plan of cooperation which rests upon community spirit and community interests. There is nothing in the land-bank system that justifies any contention that this benefit should be extended to anybody on the score of sympathy or for the relief of distressed conditions that obtain. We passed an act for the relief of the storm-stricken people of Porto Rico. We appropriated $8,000,000 to help them over the losses and destruction occasioned by their great disaster. That incident discloses the danger of this measure which would put those unfortunate people into the system set up and owned by our farmers and depress the bonds that regulate the interest that is to be paid by borrowers in this country. Already the market for bonds of the land banks has been depressed, and, no doubt, in part on account of this proposed legislation.

Mr. BRAND of Georgia. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STEAGALL. Yes.

Mr. BRAND of Georgia. What per cent of the poor people of Porto Rico, if the gentleman knows, would get any benefit of this increase?

Mr. STEAGALL. I do not know how to furnish an estimate. I would not say that none of the farmers there who are deserving would benefit by the passage of this act, but I am afraid the greater share of the benefits would go to investors and capitalists, many of them outsiders.

Mr. BRAND of Georgia. As a matter of fact, the natives of Porto Rico will get practically no benefits from these big loans.

Mr. STEAGALL. I am afraid that is substantially true.

Mr. BROWNE. I understand the gentleman to make the statement that the bonds of one bank were guaranteed by the bonds of another.

Mr. STEAGALL. The bonds of each Federal land bank are guaranteed by all the Federal land banks.

Mr. BROWNE. If that is so, why in the market are the bonds of some banks higher than the bonds of other banks?

Mr. STEAGALL. The gentleman is mistaken. The credits of the individual banks are at par, and the bonds of the system are all one, so far as security and market value go. It is a cooperative system and can only be preserved by adhering to the principles of cooperation. I beg you not to take the destructive step which we take if we adopt the Senate amendment. [Applause.]

Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. STEVENSON].

Mr. STEVENSON. Mr. Speaker, this is purely a matter of business, and business for the farmers of the United States. As has just been stated, each bank of the system guarantees the bonds of all the other banks, and when there are losses in one of the banks, those losses have to be absorbed by all of the banks, and the banks are owned by the farmers, who have borrowed, and they have over $60,000,000 of stock in the hands of the farmers to-day. If you were to look behind the scenes, you would find that the losses that have been sustained have been losses in those banks where the loan limit was very large. I remember when we went through the institutions three years ago the banks that had the smallest average loans had the smallest losses in the aggregate, and that was the bank in New Orleans. We raised the limit in the United States, I think imprudently, to $25,000. The result has been, of course, that the average of the loan limits has been increased and the result is that a year and a half ago you had a reorganization down here in the Federal Farm Loan Board, because there was trouble everywhere. The trouble arose from the excess loans that had been made, because of this large limit, and with a prudent and financially strong management they are gradually getting back to the normal that they should always maintain, and now the proposition is that we increase this limit to $25,000 in Porto Rico and Alaska. The Banking and Currency Committee of the House decided against that proposition, but did concede up to $15,000, and we thought that was enough. How much does a man have to have in order to get a $25,000 loan? His property has got to be appraised at $50,000.

That reminds me of a very aristocratic young man, who did not have anything but a wife and four children, who applied to one of the old hard-headed bankers in my town for a loan of $1,000. The banker said to him, "Have you any real-estate security to put up?" The young man answered, "No, sir." The banker asked him, "Have you any bonds or other securities?" The young man answered, "No, sir." The banker asked, "Have you any personal property?" The young man answered, "I have my household and kitchen furniture." The banker asked, "Have you any farming land?" The young man answered, "No, sir." Then the banker said, "I am sorry I can not accommodate you, since you have none of those things." The young man answered, "If I had why should I want a loan?"

Gentlemen, you are preparing here to open the door for a further exploitation of the farm land-bank system, for a further infringement upon the value of the farmers' interest in the new farm land-bank system, by loading them up with loans in Porto Rico and in Alaska which will fritter away the value of the stock which belongs to the farmers, for which they have paid. Our committee did not think it proper, and I ask you to sustain the committee in so thinking. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. McFADDEN] to concur in the Senate amendment.

The question was taken, and the Speaker announced that the ayes appeared to have it.

Mr. STEVENSON. A division, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. A division is called for. As many as favor concurrence in the amendment will rise and stand until they are counted.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 198, noes 52.

So the Senate amendment was concurred in.

On motion of Mr. McFADDEN, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

MUSCLE SHOALS

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD on Muscle Shoals and all legislation in reference thereto during this Congress, and on immigration and all legislation passed in reference thereto.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. Mr. Speaker, the problem of Muscle Shoals has always been considered by Congress as a nitrogen problem and not as a power problem. It was to solve a nitrogen problem which arose in time of national peril that the great investment at Muscle Shoals was inaugurated by Congress, and it was in the effort to solve this nitrogen problem that the development has been so far completed. Muscle Shoals was built to furnish a supply of nitrogen that in time of war could be used in the manufacture of explosives and in time of peace that could be used in the manufacture of fertilizer. On the solution offered in the Madden bill (H. R. 8305), which embodies the acceptance of the offer of the American Cyanamid Co. to lease the Muscle Shoals properties, this problem has been very satisfactorily met.

The problem of an adequate domestic nitrogen supply is a double one. In time of war, for munitions manufacture, nitrogen must be immediately available in large quantities; cost is a matter of secondary consideration. The prime requisites of a solution to this phase of the problem are a production adequate to meet our munitions requirements, and that no time shall be lost before such quantities can be produced. In time of peace, for use in the manufacture of fertilizer, the cost of the nitrogen becomes the essence of the problem. The American farmer does not need additional quantities of nitrogen at present prices. If that were the problem he would simply buy more nitrate of soda from Chile, or he would absorb the entire domestic production of ammonium sulphate. To solve the fertilizer nitrogen problem the farmer must be furnished with a cheaper nitrogen and then this cheaper nitrogen must be combined with other plant foods into a suitable fertilizer material. And, further, to best secure these results it is necessary that those plant foods shall be combined into a fertilizer material containing 40 to 60 per cent of plant food rather than into low-grade materials containing 12 to 14 per cent, such as are now prevalent. One of the great needs of agriculture to-day is a cheaper and higher grade fertilizer.

To secure the production of such fertilizer some one must manufacture them. The present fertilizer industry has not chosen to keep abreast of development in this field, and not only is opposed to Muscle Shoals being used for this purpose but it is also advocating, through a 20 per cent ad valorem duty in the new tariff act, to keep out such high-grade fertilizers as are manufactured abroad. Muscle Shoals should be used to serve the whole people and not lie idle because its operation will hurt this industry or embarrass some other group. Progress invariably means embarrassment and loss to those who will not or do not keep abreast of her advance.

Both phases of this problem have been cared for by the terms of the proposal embodied in the Madden bill, which embodies the acceptance of the offer made by the American Cyanamid Co. for Muscle Shoals. In time of war the leased properties in whole or in part are subject to the needs of the Government. During times of peace the active operation in the production of fertilizer of the nitrogen-fixation plant keeps it instantly ready for use in time of war. Instead of bearing the cost of guarding, maintenance, and depreciation on an idle plant, sure to become obsolete, the Government has at no expense an active, operating plant, kept abreast of development in the art, ready for instant use. In addition the actual plant for the manufacture of high explosives, though not used in the production of fertilizer, is maintained, free of cost to the Government, ready to produce its full capacity of explosives.

In considering the second phase of the problem—cheaper nitrogen for agriculture—there is a report from a special study on Muscle Shoals which has never been successfully refuted. The Muscle Shoals inquiry appointed by President Coolidge in 1925 found that concentrated fertilizer could be manufactured at Muscle Shoals, using the cyanamide process for the fixation of nitrogen, and that these concentrated fertilizers, suitable for use by the farmer, could be shipped to a central point in each of 23 States at a delivered cost that would save an average of 43.4 per cent on what the same materials were costing the farmer at that time. These 23 States use about 90 per cent of the fertilizer now consumed in the United States. To refute the statement that Muscle Shoals fertilizer could not be shipped any great distance it is sufficient to point out that the saving in the State of Maine was 45.5 per cent, which was 1.4 per cent greater than the saving in Alabama. If Muscle Shoals can be leased to a responsible private corporation that will make such fertilizer, with provisions to safeguard the interest of the farmer, the lease should be accepted at once and this great plant be put to work in the interest of agriculture in her time of need.

Such a lease to a responsible company is embodied in H. R. 8305, which was introduced and supported by the late Hon. Martin B. Madden, chairman of the Appropriations Committee of the House, and still bears his name. Reported too late in the session for action by this Congress, it is to be hoped that the American Cyanamid Co. will keep this offer alive by submitting it to the Seventy-first Congress when it convenes. Of course, delay and obstruction have been placed in the way of the acceptance of this offer. Of course, attacks are made on its provisions, doubts are cast upon ironclad guarantees, misleading statements as to power available and interest paid are issued to be broadcast over the country as they have been in the past. Such tactics finally discouraged Henry Ford and he withdrew his offer. It is the hope of the opposition that the Cyanamid Co. will withdraw their offer.

The offer of Mr. Ford was subjected to the same form of attack, largely sponsored by the same authorities, as the attack on this offer which is embodied in the report submitted to the House on February 25 by Mr. MORIN. Though not called or marked as a minority report, it should be so marked. There were 11 votes cast in favor of reporting the bill to the House at a meeting of the committee that all members knew was to be held, and 11 is a majority of 21. There were only two votes cast against the bill.

Five charges against the bill are made by the retiring chairman of the committee. The first is that national defense does not justify additional expenditure at Muscle Shoals. No one has ever contended that national defense did, but sound engineering achievement does require these expenditures. A completed navigation program requires that construction of Dam No. 3. Both primary power at Muscle Shoals and at every other dam below Cove Creek Reservoir is nearly doubled by the construction of that feature of the lease. The Government is presumably as interested in navigation on the Tennessee as it is on the Ohio. Without constructing Dam No. 3 no navigation improvement is secured through the Muscle Shoals stretch of the river. Since the Government can under this offer build these dams and secure 4 per cent on their cost less only nominal amounts in the entirety charged off to navigation and war-time costs and in addition receive payments into a retirement fund that continued will pay back all the cost. Why not build them? Does the Government get 4 per cent on any part of the cost of navigation dams in the Ohio River? Does the Government get 4 per cent on the cost of the great irrigation dams of the West?

Second. Mr. MORIN in his minority report charges that there is no guaranty to make fertilizer and that production could cease in the early period of the lease, leaving the power in the control of the company. This is the same old story. It was held that Mr. Ford did not guarantee to make fertilizer. It is also contended that there are cheaper methods available. This has been argued since 1916, when the first action on Muscle Shoals was taken by Congress, but we are still buying the controlling amount of our nitrogen from Chile, still paying Chile her export duty, and the farmer is still hindered by high-cost nitrogen. But the offer does contain a definite guaranty to make fertilizer and in quantities sufficient to alarm the present fertilizer industry. As fast as the material can be marketed—and the entire distribution is placed in the hands of the farmer board—the company must step up its production of fertilizer until it is containing at least 50,000 tons of nitrogen annually. This amount is contingent upon the Government's carrying out its part in building Cove Creek Dam. This amount of fertilizer is equivalent to 325,000 tons of nitrate of soda and in nitrogen content to 2,500,000 tons of the kind of fertilizer the cotton farmer is offered to-day.

Consider for a moment the plain business figures with regard to the alleged ability of the company to shut down fertilizer manufacture and make money on the power. Even in the first few years of the lease this is impossible. The first guaranty of the company is:

> Before the expiration of the second year the lessee will * * * and will build on the lands of the lessor, the necessary phosphoric acid and ammonium phosphate plants to produce annually a quantity of such concentrated fertilizer containing not less than 10,000 net tons of fixed nitrogen and not less than 40,000 net tons of plant food.

This is an obligation to build a plant. The initial requirement regarding the productive capacity of the first unit, therefore, involves an investment of around $10,000,000, upon which there must be written off not less than 10 per cent per annum. This is an obsolescence and depreciation charge. It is unreasonable to suppose that the investment charge would be less than 6 per cent. To shut down this plant would result in a loss by the lessee of 16 per cent on its investment, or $1,600,000 a year. In these early stages of operation the only power available will be 78,000 primary horsepower as determined by the Army engineers at Dam No. 2, together with such secondary power as may be made primary by the use of the steam plant. This steam plant, the capacity of which must be increased to 120,000 horsepower by a unit to be installed at the cost of the lessee, would make available, with the water power, a total of about 200,000 continuous horsepower.

The cost of this power to the lessee, made up of rents to the Government, operating expenses of the hydroelectric station and intermittent operation of the steam plant, stand-by charges on the steam plant, and other items, is estimated by the Army engineers as about $17 per horsepower per year. To add to this cost $1,600,000 per annum brings the cost to $25 per horsepower-year. How unprofitable such a cost would prove is shown by the fact that large blocks of power in the Niagara district, where a great market for power has been established, can be obtained for $25 per horsepower-year. It will probably be a long time before power from Muscle Shoals can command any such price. These facts explode the fallacy of the arguments as to power subsidy—since the company is paying what the power is worth—and also as to the millions to be made from power by stopping the manufacture of fertilizer.

But what is it that alarms the fertilizer industry if this offer does not mean fertilizer production? Mr. Charles J. Brand, executive secretary of the National Fertilizer Association, appeared before the Committee on Military Affairs and testified as follows:

> Therefore we are now being possessed of a normal amount of self-interest concerned with any proposition, such as that before the committee, which promises to inject an additional production, I believe, as Mr. Bell stated in his testimony Saturday, of something like 2,000,000 tons into an already saturated market.

Again under questioning this representative of the fertilizer industry, and a good representative he is for them, stated:

> I think if nitrate plant No. 2 were operated by private capital, particularly the enterprise that is now being considered, which is an efficient and capable corporation able to carry out its engagements, they could certainly manufacture fertilizer much to the discomfiture of the existing industry. They are not people who talk through their hats; they are people who perform.

Now, we are possessed of the facts. The operation of Muscle Shoals by the American Cyanamid Co. will make a better, cheaper fertilizer, and that is just the use to which Muscle Shoals should be put. The farmer needs that cheaper, better fertilizer to meet present conditions more than any other group needs any service that Muscle Shoals can perform.

The amounts of payment under this lease have also been attacked, but fortunately these payments have been analyzed dispassionately by our former chairman of the Appropriations Committee of the House, Martin B. Madden. He made, just before his death, a final answer to all objections to the terms of payment under the offer of the American Cyanamid Co. He showed conclusively that the interest payments alone during the 50-year lease period would amount to a total of $177,740,480. This is an average annual interest of $3,554,810, which is slightly over 4 per cent on the Government's average investment for water-power development. The Madden statement is set out in the hearings before the Military Affairs Committee and I invite your careful consideration of it.

A WORD ON THE MUCH-DISCUSSED RECAPTURE PROVISION

This provision was put into the offer solely upon the insistence of the committee in seeking to make the fertilizer guaranty more binding. It certainly does not weaken the guaranty to manufacture which was already in the bill, since this recapture provision is in addition to and not in place of the old guaranty.

As a means of taking back the property under the conditions set out it is a fair and equable provision, but the company undertakes certain obligations, as above set out, in regard to the manufacture of fertilizer, and failure to carry out these obligations is a violation of the lease and the Government can recover this property.

In conclusion I wish to invite the careful reading of the hearings had before the Military Affairs Committee covering a period of several weeks just previous to reporting out the bill. The questions which the different members of the committee propounded to Mr. Bell, president of the Cyanamid Co., and his answers thereto are very informing and give, perhaps, the clearest explanation and interpretation of the Cyanamid proposal that can be found, and which the Madden bill seeks congressional authority to accept.

I have attempted here only to call attention to the offer of the Cyanamid Co. because I think it important that the Members of the incoming Congress acquaint themselves with all the terms of this offer, and it is my belief that it presents the best and the only private offer for utilizing the Muscle Shoals plant in the interest of the American farmer. It is encouraging to know that a majority of the members of the Military Affairs Committee made a favorable report on the offer and are interested in having it continued, so that the Seventy-first Congress may have an opportunity of passing on the same.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

RESOLUTIONS REGARDING UNEMPLOYMENT IN ST. LOUIS, MO.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, a resolution adopted by the Central Trades and Labor Union of St. Louis, Mo., in reference to unemployment has just been brought to my attention. I have known that the unemployment situation in my home city has been serious, but I am rather alarmed by the conditions revealed in this resolution. I have been asked to call this matter to the attention of the Congress, and I therefore take the opportunity under leave to print granted me to incorporate the resolution as part of my remarks. I am personally acquainted with Mrs. Mary Ryder, William J. Fitzmaurice, W. G. Gibbons, and J. F. Altheide, who presented the resolution, and can assure you that before placing their names on any document they would be in possession of facts which would prevent anyone disputing their views.

My mail has clearly indicated that tens of thousands of our citizens are really in distress and unable to secure the necessities of life for their families, due to their inability to secure work.

It seems to me the Congress of the United States should meet this situation before it reaches a more advanced stage. We have authorized the construction of and appropriated money for large building programs. If all the work contemplated by the Government was started at once, it would go a long way to alleviate those who the resolution state are not only suffering but are unwillingly idle.

Under this great public-building program hundreds of millions are at the disposal of the building commission. As an example of the delay in prosecuting this work, let me cite the condition in St. Louis. The Congress has authorized and appropriated the money for a new public building in St. Louis. The building commission agrees an emergency exists. This money was placed in their hands in May, 1928, and up to this time no agreement has been reached as to where the new building is to be located. When this new building is constructed, provided it is not placed on the present site, then the old Federal building will be sold and a modern building erected on that block of ground. The two projects will mean an expenditure of from twelve to fifteen million dollars. Surely the commission can advance no sound reason for not selecting a site. It is true there has been a difference of opinion as to where the new Government building should be located, but when Congress passed the present public building law it removed politics from the building program, and this commission should now decide, with the information it has at hand, where to place the building and start construction without further delay.

Then you have the hospital building program of the Veterans' Bureau. The projects have been authorized and millions appropriated to start immediate construction. It was last spring that these projects were assured by the action of Congress. Nevertheless, you find few buildings started, and in many instances the sites have not been chosen. There is no excuse for such delay. The Director of the Veterans' Bureau admits additional beds are needed in the district which includes St. Louis. Money has been set aside and is available to build an addition to the hospital at Excelsior Springs, Mo. Nearly a million is ready for this purpose. Are they spending it? No. They say it will be July, 1931, or after before that project is completed. Why not start it now? It is admitted it is needed, the money is available, and the proper legislation enacted.

The War Department is authorized to spend millions for improvements at Army posts. This work should be started at once.

Rivers and harbors are to be improved. Flood-control work is to go on. Why not speed up the programs if a thorough investigation discloses the unemployment situation is as alarming as this resolution insists it is.

If every Member of Congress will make a survey in his district between now and the time the special session is called, information will be available from the entire country on unemployment. It is a problem that must be solved, and the Congress is in a position to solve it by speeding up projects already authorized and advancing additional funds for other work which has been agreed upon but not started.

The Government has an annual rental bill that is astonishing. Our Government is a permanent institution and there is no sound argument why it should not own the buildings it occupies for its agencies. Statistics will show that people who lease post-office buildings to the Government are permitted a rental paying anywhere from 15 to 22 per cent on their investment. While the contracts are for 10 years, there are specific provisions which enable the Government to secure a release any time it is desired. The Government can borrow money for as low as 4 per cent. Would it not be good business to pass legislation which would enable the Government to borrow a sufficient amount to construct buildings? The amount now being paid in rentals would be almost sufficient to pay the interest.

The resolution adopted by the Central Trades and Labor Union of St. Louis, an organization affiliated with the American Federation of Labor, sent to me by the secretary of the organization, Mr. David Kreyling, is as follows:

Whereas distress caused by unemployment is becoming so alarming that the Government itself realizes that some remedy must be administered to remedy the cause, but the slow winter months drag on without any immediate action being taken to relieve the situation; and

Whereas one or two things could be done to alleviate the suffering of those who are unwillingly idle. First, the Government could be petitioned to start the many projects necessary for the progress of the State and Nation. Roads, Government institutions, and the much-needed flood prevention would all furnish work to millions who are desperately appealing for work. Those who possess great wealth could render this country a great service by seeing to it that every brain and muscle in this country has constant remunerative employment. Whenever the people of a nation are unwillingly idle some plan should be devised so that this enforced idleness would disappear; and

Whereas unless this depression were caused by a flood, famine, or war no wise government should fail to discover and remedy the condition; such a condition is bound to cause distress and the breeding of criminal impulses and revolutionary ideas. Trade unions have created more or less contentment for the workers of the organized crafts, but are not unmindful of the suffering of the millions of unorganized workers: Therefore be it

Resolved, That we, the delegates here assembled, do recommend that this body send a communication to our Representatives in Congress asking them to propose some relief measure to abolish if possible the enforced idleness of millions of men and women who are being displaced from honest employment through various causes and to start some agitation among all right-thinking people to promote enterprises that will give to these American people the right to earn a livelihood; be it further

Resolved, That a copy of this resolution be sent to the executive council of the American federation asking them to aid in a nation-wide agitation along this line.

SENATE JOINT RESOLUTION 9

Mr. HOUSTON of Hawaii. Mr. Speaker, this resolution by its phraseology refers only to the insular possession; it does not refer to the incorporated Territories of the United States, that has always been my understanding. Then it does not refer to the Territories has been stated by the gentleman from New York [Mr. SNELL], who brought the bill up by resolution. But further evidence is to be found in the fact, as stated, that the matter was referred to the House Committee on Insular Affairs and was by them reported; it was not referred to the House Committee on the Territories, which never has passed on the matter.

We in Hawaii are particularly jealous of our status as an incorporated Territory. It is because of that status that we share not only the privileges but also the financial responsibilities of the Government. The Constitution is applicable to the Territories but not to the possessions. Since the establishment of the Interior Department, the Territories of the United States have been under the administration of that department, under such jurisdiction they have been erected into States, and the remaining two should be careful that no change should now come which might affect their prospects of joining the sisterhood of free States. We have no objections to the possessions being placed under this administration.

But because Hawaii happens to be an island community confusion frequently exists as to our relations with the country. Even departments of the Government insist on classifying us for statistical purposes as foreign. By reason of the Federal reserve bank regulations, our bank checks are classed as foreign business. Foreign postage often appears on letters for Hawaii; invoices and custom declarations are prepared by commercial firms on shipments to Honolulu. We have to be everlastingly on the lookout to see that bills of general application do not discriminate against us, even though our organic acts state that they always apply unless locally inapplicable. Only recently we found that in the public buildings program of the Sixty-ninth Congress, section 4, which was a Senate amendment, provided for the mandatory construction of two post offices in each State, and Hawaii was left out probably because of confusion.

Therefore I insist that further confusion be not invited by such action on the part of this House as will join us with the possessions in this investigation. We are always classed with the States when revenue matters are considered, and with them I feel we must stay.

FARM RELIEF

Mr. McFADDEN. Mr. Speaker, the present session of Congress is drawing to a close. A new national administration is about to assume the responsibilities of government. Among the first acts of the new administration will be the convening in special session of the Seventy-first Congress for the purpose of considering a revision of the tariff and farm relief legislation—two problems of major importance to the citizens of this country and particularly so to the farmers of the country.

As one Member of the Congress that will deal with this subject I feel an equal responsibility with every other Member to do my part and be as helpful as possible in a proper solution of these two problems. I am, therefore, taking this opportunity of expressing my view of farm relief, with the hope that it may clear away some of the fog obscuring correct viewpoint of the several basic problems involved. Having been elected as the nominee of both parties, it is probable there would be little effort made to read politics into any remarks I might make on this subject. Having myself long been a farm owner and operator, I have tried the metal of my viewpoints in the fire of actual personal experience. Being a farmer undoubtedly adds to the sincerity of my desire to help in all ways, and at the same time is probably responsible for my deep appreciation of La Rochefoucauld's—

Philosophy triumphs easily over ills past and ills to come, but present ills triumph over philosophy.

As farmers are beset with present ills, seemingly something more effective than plausible philosophy is needed. The public needs correct information and the farmers require workable plans.

There has unfortunately arisen a fog and hence a false viewpoint as to the locus of farm depression. The greater part of our population now resides in cities, and are not investors or interested in farming, and their knowledge of farming and farming conditions is gained largely from newspaper reports of farmer meetings, congressional inquiries, magazine articles, and so forth. These news reports and articles, as well as many of the debates in Congress, too frequently lead one to the conclusion that farming is an enterprise located in the West; that therefore all agitation concerning plans for farm relief should be born in the West where farming is, and that the industrial East is not concerned. As one fairly well-informed city resident of my State puts it:

Of course, Pennsylvania is the keystone State of the manufacturing industry. If the industries of Pennsylvania were undergoing a depression, we would not look to the West for a remedy.

Such remarks by intelligent citizens clearly indicate there must be a wider publicity as to the location and extent of agriculture, and of the importance of agriculture in the East as compared with agriculture in the West, and of the interdependence of industry generally and agriculture.

Farm depression is not a sectional but a national problem. It directly concerns every Eastern State, not only because, as has been frequently pointed out, our farmers are big purchasers of manufactured products, but also and particularly because the East is an important farming section—how important may be definitely illustrated by comparing my so-called "Keystone manufacturing State" with any of the so-called western agricultural States. Let us take Oklahoma, Nebraska, Kansas, Idaho, and Montana. There are more farms in Pennsylvania than in any one of these States. The percentage of renters in Pennsylvania is less than in any of these States, being less than one-third of that of Oklahoma and little more than one-third of that of Nebraska, Kansas, or Iowa. The total farm population of Pennsylvania is over one and one-half times that of Nebraska, over five times that of Idaho or Montana, and within a few thousand of that so-called greatest of all agricultural States, Iowa. In Pennsylvania we have a farm population of over 910,000 people. When the 1925 census was taken, it was found Pennsylvanians paid annually more in money wages for farm help than Nebraska; and for the man who concludes that this may have resulted from a lack of use of machinery, it is interesting to note that the same census found there were more tractors in Pennsylvania than in Nebraska; that there were nearly 20,000 tractors on Pennsylvania farms as compared with approximately 2,000 in Idaho, 6,600 in Montana, and less than 11,000 in Oklahoma. And to the man whose conception is that these western farms are great consumers of farm feed, it is interesting to note that Pennsylvania's expenditure of over $43,500,000 for feed was within less than $6,000,000 of Iowa's expenditure, Iowa being the greatest of the "feed States"; that Pennsylvania's expenditure for feed was over eight times that of Idaho, over twelve times that of Montana, nearly one and one-half times that of Kansas, about $11,000,000 more than that of Nebraska, and nearly three times that of Oklahoma; that the approximately 27,000 silos in Pennsylvania exceeded even Iowa's approximately 21,000; was over five times that of Kansas, nearly thirteen times that of Nebraska, about thirty times that of Idaho, over sixty times that of Oklahoma, and over seventy times that of Montana. The Pennsylvania farm-property value exceeds that of Oklahoma by over one-quarter billion of dollars, and is over three times that of Idaho, and nearly three times that of Montana; that the total value of implements and machinery on the Pennsylvania farms exceeds by approximately $30,000,000 the total value of implements and machinery on the Oklahoma or Idaho farms; is nearly twice the value of implements and machinery on the farms of that so-called greatest machinery farm State, Montana. Another prevalent idea is that the East is depleted of livestock; that the livestock of this country is all in the Western States, and yet the 1925 census values of livestock on farms gives Pennsylvania approximately $150,000,000; Idaho $52,000,000; Montana $89,000,000; and Oklahoma $102,000,000. There are nearly twice as many horses in Pennsylvania as Idaho, over seven times as many mules, over twice as many cattle, over seven times as many dairy cows, three times as many swine, and over eight times as many chickens. In Pennsylvania we have nearly seven times as many sheep as they have in Oklahoma, and we raise twice as many bushels of wheat as Iowa, and twice as many tons of hay as Oklahoma, and very approximately the same number of tons as Idaho and Montana put together. Pennsylvania raises over twice as many bushels of white potatoes as Idaho, so often referred to as a great white potato producer; nearly four times as many bushels as Nebraska, over five times as many bushels as Kansas, and twenty times as many bushels as Oklahoma. Pennsylvania produces over twice as much wool as Kansas, one and one-half times as much as Nebraska, and nearly eight times as much as Oklahoma; produces nearly ten times as many eggs as Idaho, and twice as many as Oklahoma or Nebraska. Our total of land mortgages on Pennsylvania farms is approximately $90,000,000, exceeding that of Oklahoma by approximately $15,000,000. In fact, our mortgage-debt average in Pennsylvania, per farm-land acre, is over twice that of the mortgage-debt average per acre on Oklahoma farm lands; is greater than the Nebraska, Kansas, or Idaho average, and nearly four times the mortgage-debt average per farm acre in Montana; and, as heretofore pointed out, this Pennsylvania debt is on farms where the tenancy is less than in any of these other States.

With these facts confronting him, can anyone say that this typical great eastern so-called industrial State of Pennsylvania is not interested in farming? That it is not concerned in farm products prices, or in farm property, or in farm depression?

Similar comparisons may be made for New York and other northeastern, eastern, and southeastern States.

Thus, no matter what may be the angle of one's view, it is erroneous to look upon farming as western. It is national, and farm depression directly affects the East as well as the West. The farm problem is eastern, western, northern, southern! I repeat, it is national.

On the other hand, there is the substance of fact in the expression, "the industrial East." The territory east of the Mississippi River and north of the Ohio River plus Pennsylvania, New Jersey, and New England States, comprises about 12 per cent of the area of the United States, and nearly half the population, producing 70 per cent of the value of manufactured products. The whole section west of the Mississippi River contains less than a third of the total population and about 69 per cent of the area of our country, although it produces approximately a half only of our principal grain crops. The idea that farming is somewhere in the West may have originated in the days of Horace Greeley's advice to young men. The fixed idea that industry is permanently in the East undoubtedly arose in New England long before that time. True, unless proper reciprocity in exchange of commodities and other economic factors can be impressed and maintained, industry will move. Thus, the gristmills some time ago changed their headquarters to the Northwest, and many of the tanneries have long since moved away from the East, and so we are now told that St. Louis instead of Boston is our greatest boot and shoe producer; and the spindles of Lowell are gradually shutting down and their counterparts are beginning to hum in the South nearer the source of supply, until it has come to pass there are a greater number of spindles operating in the South than in the North and the East combined.

The success of this industrial East was founded upon consumption of its products supported by farming. It can be sustained only through continuance of farmer support. These farmer owners and farm workers have always supplied the base by expending their billions of net income for nonagricultural products. Our soils are so good, and on the average of climatic and other conditions are so favorable to production, and the American farmer is so efficient that notwithstanding his having been given an unequal chance in the economic struggle throughout several decades, he has continued to produce annually billions of dollars of new wealth and to have expended the bulk of his net results for nonagricultural necessities, largely products of manufacturing. The domestic market is as all-important for manufacturing as it is for farming. The value of our whole nonagricultural exports are less than $3,000,000,000, and in the whole list no one manufacturing line exports even as much as 20 per cent of its output except rosin, turpentine, motor cycles, copper, typewriters, kerosene and lubricating oil, locomotives, and sewing machines. The biggest value item is automobiles and parts, the 1927 value being over $825,000,000. Big figure, but such total is only 11.3 per cent of total domestic output. Manufacturing is dependent, even as agriculture, on this known constant home market.

The exchange of commodities in this home market between these two great fields of human activity is supported and facilitated by free trade between our 48 States. On last analysis, where the test becomes the gaining of enough bread to give strength to work to-day to get bread for strength to work to-morrow, agriculture is far less dependent on manufacturing than is manufacturing on agriculture. Under any analysis, however, prosperity can be based only on recognition of the interdependence of the two fields, and continuance of volume in interchange at production costs plus profit must be predicated on an economic balance of the purchasing power of the dollar, whether in possession of a member of the one class or the other.

Whenever in our history there has been a farm depression, there has followed an industrial depression. There is an interim or lag between the farm depression and the consequent industrial depression. Heretofore the depth of a farm depression has shown less deeply in the curve of industrial depression than it will this time, because of the borrowing power of the farmers in the past—namely, borrowing power during period of adjustment. This time it is different. It may be a proper premise upon which this time to prophesy real depth in a following industrial depression when we observe that this farming depression comes at a time when the farmer has exhausted his credit. His total debt at the outbreak of the World War was approximately three and one-half billion dollars. It is now estimated by those most competent to fix upon a total at approximately $10,000,000,000 additional. It was clearly proven at the time of the congressional agricultural investigation in 1921 that under then existing conditions, which, as we shall see, have not been eliminated, farming as a whole was a losing enterprise. It so remains. If, then, the farmer can not receive from the sale of his products a profit on his labor and investment, and if his borrowing power and credit have been exhausted, his purchasing power must rapidly become nil; and as that fast-approaching time arrives, unless prevented by adoption of successful remediel plans, industries must curtail production, which means decreasing pay rolls and unemployment. That man is ignorant or economically mad who conceives national prosperity may be sustained upon sale of manufactured products purchased only by industry owners and dealers and their workmen. Such condition is the equivalent of two Crusoes trading pennies on the desert island, and reflects the picture of the village wherein all the inhabitants made a living and profit, each by taking in the washing of the other. Primarily wealth is in the soil, and the producer of it is the farmer. This wealth production is new annually—a result of cooperation of rain, sun, soil, and man. If the farmers' purchases come out of the base, the foundation of prosperity is so weakened as to crumble and the superstructure of all other activities falls to the ground. Thus it comes about that not less than 90 per cent of the total consumption of our industries' products will be destroyed exactly in proportion to the degree this country permits agriculture to be destroyed. In creating primary wealth, all else than farming (mining of precious metals alone excepted) is superstructure.

I have mentioned the element of time involved, the so-called "lag factor." It is largely because of this that the full power of the present calamity has not yet been driven home to the manufacturer, factory pay-roll worker, merchant, artisan, urban laborer, and city dwellers generally. No installment-payment plan or other scheme of mortgaging the future will avail the manufacturer in an attempt to keep running with "prosperity on paper," once the slack in this lag-factor element is taken up. There is fog as to the seriousness of this situation. This fog should be promptly dispelled. The city wage earner should be advised truthfully as to this existing condition which so concerns his future; and the investor, manufacturer, merchant, and all city dwellers should not defer working diligently now to assist in evolving a solution.

I hope these views will prove convincing that the problem of farm relief is not only not western or southern, eastern or northern, even from the angle of farming alone considered, but also national from the viewpoint of the economic-welfare status of every citizen, no matter where his residence or what his occupation.

The mental attitude of those who are unmindful in the city must change while together all of us carefully consider this national problem. Now is not the time to think lightly of farming in terms of some memory impression of "a hick comedian," a cackling hen, a squealing pig, or a mooing cow. There are social and spiritual values involved having directly to do with the character of our Nation and the perpetuity of our Government. These ultimate considerations are beyond doubt of greater weight than the bald economics of the situation, but a greater city audience can now be reached and urged to action by an "economics appeal."

A large class of city dwellers now enjoying "spotted prosperity" have the popular "economics fever" in a form which some not inappropriately dub "cipher fever." They think in big figures, mainly composed of many ciphers. All right; let them conceive of the six and a quarter million farms as one great unit, comprising nearly a billion acres, with a half under the plough—such investment having a written-down valuation under the last census of something over $67,000,000,000, a shrinkage of $20,000,000,000 in value since 1920. The estimated gross value of its crops and animal products for that last census year was over $16,800,000,000, with net total of over $13,000,000,000 after deducting crops fed to livestock and reservations for seed. Let them think of the farm population as nearly 30,000,000 of our citizenry. Let them consider that in 1911 agriculture, with 24 per cent of the working population, received 17 per cent of the national income, but with its workers (principally on account of farm depression) deserting the farms for the city at the rate of over a million per year, agriculture had remaining by 1921, 22 per cent only of our working population and received 10½ per cent only of our annual income—notwithstanding those that remained in the country produced under favorable climatic conditions a greater tonnage crop. Let them ponder the facts that the range of farm prices for farm products has been for the past seven years from 10 to 30 per cent lower than before the war, compared with general price levels; that the annual return per farmer for labor and management for the years 1920 to 1925 was $613; that while in purchasing power the selling price of his products has been decreased, his wages for farm help, his interest on debts, his building costs, and the costs of his living have been greatly increased, and his taxes are about two and one-half times their pre-war level; that with 1913–14 "farm value" as the base, prices for farm products have been lower than those of nonagricultural products for nearly every year in the past forty; that after this long, unequal, economic pull, this last postwar deflation abruptly and directly affected more acutely his raw products than it did manufactured and processed products; that the capsheaf to his shock of despair was added by action under the Esch-Cummings Act whereby the level of freight rates on 50 representative farm products arose to a point of over 50 per cent above the 1913 level, and this at a time when he was being confronted with decreasing prices, so that the market was a "buyers' market" (as in any event, a farmers' market almost invariably is), causing him to absorb this total freight increase—a position from which he has never been able to extricate himself. Let them know this freight increase resulted in the farmers paying approximately a billion dollar freight bill last year; that although such farm products were approximately 11 per cent only of the total volume of freight, the farmers were called upon to pay and did pay to the railways 19⅞ per cent of the total freight revenues of all the railroads of this country. Add to the foregoing the freight bill arising through the farmers' patronage of the city, being the freight bill of this approximately 30,000,000 farm population on city goods purchased by an annual expenditure of nearly all its net cash income of several billion dollars, and the importance of the farmer to the transportation of this country begins to become apparent. It is charged by intelligent and responsible citizen-farmers that the fixing of these rates on their outgoing products was one step urged by the Federal Reserve Board upon the Interstate Commerce Commission to hasten deflation after the extraordinary inflation consequent upon the Treasury Department's policy in promoting the sale of the low interest-bearing Victory Liberty loan. As there is a soul of truth in this, the thought arises that it is particularly appropriate all bankers join now with other city dwellers to evolve proper and sufficient remedies which may be equitably applied.

All city dwellers should also know the facts about price levels and the purchasing power of the farmer's dollar. Let them, for example, consider the index numbers on farm prices for farm products (not so-called "wholesale prices" but "farm prices") in comparison with index numbers for prices for commodities the farmer must have to survive, and also in comparison with union-labor wages. With 1910–1914 at 100 as a base, the average index for the seven years 1921–1927 for "farm prices" was 132; for "commodities bought by farmer for family maintenance," 162; for "wages paid by farmer to hired labor," 162; for "building materials for other than house," 160; for "farm machinery," 158. Taking May 15, 1913, as a base at 100, the average index for same seven years for union labor was 227. The "cost of living in cities" index average was 174.

This should assist the urban dweller in making comparison. Divide 227 by 174, and we have 130, i. e., the union laborer if paid in city-living necessities has been receiving 130 during the past seven years against the 100 he received in 1913. Divide "farm prices" (132) by "commodities bought by farmer for family maintenance" (162), and we have a little less than 81.5, i. e., in comparison with his 1910–1914 situation, the farmer's dollar during the past seven years has averaged less than 82 cents in purchasing power for his family maintenance. Note there is nearly a 50-point range of difference in these contrasted positions. There has been no end of printer's ink wasted in picking out brief periods here and there, or a commodity here and there, as basis for issuing statements and reports purporting to show return of agricultural prosperity. Here and there a representative farmer charges there was politics in some of this. Not a little of it has been ignorance. Farm prices have been at a long-sustained sublevel. Slight temporary gains have always been offset. Unless effective remedies are applied, general agricultural disaster impends, and no one can foresee the bottom of farm products' prices. On the 15th of last month, after temporary gain, the index of farm prices was again down to 133—practically at the point of the seven years' average of 1921–1927. While this is the farm-price condition, the Department of Labor is announcing a rise in its weighted price index, which covers 550 commodities, and announces advance in its index covering "city prices of food." The city dweller is entitled to such comfort as he can get from consideration of such positions. There is no hope for the farmer in present data. His business is still a losing business. His dollar remains in purchasing power a shrunken 82 cents. The actual price index averages, based on the authorized published index numbers for the seven years mentioned, I have given above. He who runs may read.

Mr. Speaker, these fogs must be dispelled—the fog as to the location of farming and from whence comes the demand for relief and what national spread will there be in relief if obtained, and the fog as to whose duty it is to evolve proper plans which may be inaugurated and result in salvation of this basic wealth-producing activity.

Farm relief of to-day is national relief of to-morrow! The spread of any relief granted will be nation-wide. Manufacturing, transportation, and industry generally could not long survive the decease of farming. They can not long succeed when farming is beset with economic disease. There is interdependence between the city and the country and the transportation link which connects them. To the extent present manufacturing and transportation prosperity has been builded upon the existing unbalanced economic conditions which peonize the farmer and strangle his investment, it will prove false and fleeting. Delay in solution carries penalties to the city dweller—whether banker, investor, manufacturer, employer, employee, or laborer.

Mr. Speaker, the fogs obscuring correct viewpoint of farm relief do not lie over cities only. There are "foggy spots" in the country. For example, there is the so-called "chronic kicker" who complains that legislative bodies enact laws innumerable for manufacturing and other city industry but pay no attention to agriculture. A survey of the Federal and State laws would quickly convince any reviewer that the legislative doctor has always responded to the call of the farmer patient, and has rightly or wrongly always agreed with the patient that he was sick. The pills prescribed were the "quantity laws" enacted. The error was failure to accomplish proper diagnosis before using the prescription pad. Retrospection discloses the patient has been given great quantities of pills, not a few of which were the wrong kind.

Time will not permit substantiation of this position by review of each of these very many laws, but the whole situation may be illustrated by (a) citing, as example of "quantity," a partial list of laws relating to agriculture, and some administrative activities thereunder, and (b) citing, as example of insufficient completeness and lack of quality in law and administration thereunder, acts relating to transportation and credit.

Within my time limit I may mention a few only of the quantity legislative acts which with honest intent and hope we have passed with the idea of assisting the farmer. We have authorized the doing of almost everything any reputedly sane farmer has suggested, even to the making of surveys to determine how many little pigs our sows would farrow next year, and the calves our cows would drop, although without any similar census authorized as to prospective advance in population through births of children to indicate probable increase in bulk consumption of fluid milk by the route of the baby's bottle. As indicating we have been busy, but with no criticism as to results obtained by not a few of these activities, I recall we now have surveys to determine well in advance total production of ensuing harvests; studies innumerable of how best to make the farmers cooperate; the giving of counsel to cooperative boards of directors and managers; the proceeding, as we shall see, to compel the farmers to organize for particular purposes; analyses of up-to-date accounting systems for farmers' use; studies of the extension of markets at home and abroad; prediction of market prices; tariffs against agricultural imports; the market news by telegraph and radio; study of innumerable production problems, and prevention of pests and plant and animal diseases; the selection of seeds; the promotion of good sires in animal breeding; the employment of no end of specialists and technical advisers in the Agricultural Department here in Washington, in experiment stations, extension service, weather bureau, dairy industry, animal industry, plant industry, and Forest Service work, and in the Bureau of Chemistry and Soils; and in the study of by-products, and in the tasks undertaken by the Bureau of Biological Survey, the Bureau of Entomology, the Bureau of Public Roads, the Bureau of Agricultural Economics, the Bureau of Home Economics, and Bureau of Plant Quarantine and Control, the Bureau of Grain Futures Administration, Bureau of Food Administration, and so forth. These technical specialists alone comprise an army of approximately 30,000 people.

In the matter of the tariff, we gave the farmers in 1922 practically what they asked for. The American Farm Bureau Federation Weekly News Letter for September 21, 1922, said:

> Agriculture has obtained duties on almost every commodity on which it desired a tariff, and the rates are in most instances as high as was requested.

Moreover, the farmer was given the advantage, as were others, of the flexibility clause in that tariff, under which the Tariff Commission might investigate and recommend 50 per cent increases in duty. It is reported that the Tariff Commission has given more than half its time since 1922 to study of costs of production of farm products here and abroad, with the purpose in view of giving the farmers any additional increases justified. Wheat, butter, and some other farm products have benefited by increases made by this method.

The packer and stockyards act, the rural free delivery act, Federal aid for good roads, exemption in organization from the penalties of the Sherman Antitrust Act, through the Clayton Act and Capper-Volstead Act, and no end of other legislation has been enacted fairly promptly in response to farmer demand.

In brief, the farmer does not lack in the present status of laws "quantity" legislation, but may require more "quality" legislation, as I hope my later analysis of some such quantity legislation will clearly indicate.

As to necessity of amplification of existing laws and correction and extension of administrative service thereunder, I suggested analysis of present situation in transportation and credit. For decades, the Congress and all State legislatures proceeded on the theory that the farmer would prosper if supplied with sufficient and efficient transportation and abundant credit. The patient, too frequently represented by some uncle, usually diagnosed his own case, and the legislative doctor rolled the transportation or farm-credit pill. Thus, it was largely because of the farmers' repeated representations of freight-rate discriminations that we passed the interstate commerce act of 1887.

The chief object was to prohibit unjust and unreasonable charges. We strengthened it with the Elkins Act of 1903 and the Hepburn Act of 1906. As the patient was still complaining, we endeavored in the Esch-Cummins Act of 1920 to increase the dosage by setting before the commission a pattern or standard of reasonableness—a general guide. We deprived the railroads of their old competitive rights, but said that rates should be so adjusted that carriers as a whole or as rate groups might earn up to 6 per cent on the value of their property under honest, efficient, and economic management and with reasonable expenditures for maintenance of way, structures, and equipment. The 6 per cent earning was not to be charged on the outstanding securities but on the value of the property, and excess earnings were to be recaptured by the Government. There was to be no new issue of stocks or bonds without consent of the commission. Consolidation and pooling might be had only with the consent and under the direction of the commission. It seemed that at last the doctor had rolled a transportation pill worthy his learned reputation. The ailing patient was highly hopeful as he swallowed it. To make sure of the effectiveness of the pill, the doctor left his assistant, the commission, in charge of the case. What he was to do within the limitations prescribed was clearly set-out. What has been the result? The pains and aches which the patient originally had have been magnified, and although his good neighbors, including the President of the United States, have been scolding the commission and demanding action for a period of more than five years last past, nothing has resulted.

We have seen that the horizontal raises in 1920 in freight rates on the farmer's commodities, put into effect at a time his markets were declining, were wholly absorbed by him, and still remain his burden; that the level of these rates on 50 representative farm products arose to a point of over 50 per cent above the 1913 level; and that he furnished in 1927 something over 11 per cent of the total tonnage of railway freight in the United States and paid for its transportation nearly 20 per cent of the total gross income of the railways of the United States. As an illustration, by the index method, of these raises, let us take a typical cotton haul, from Tarboro, N. C., to Norfolk, Va. With freight rate obtaining in 1913 as our 100 base, this transportation rate arose to index of 262 in 1921, remained at 250 from 1922 to 1925, and has been at 240 since that date. And this is on cotton for export. It may be the fog on this point will the more quickly be lifted by stating that the rate raises in question have consumed a much greater quantity of the farmers' products than before the war. The New York Agricultural Experiment Station gives as an example the following: A farmer shipping potatoes in 1917 paid 4.9 pounds out of each 100 pounds for freight; after the raise, in 1921, he paid 18.3 pounds out of each 100 pounds. Some think the extent of the injury may best of all be driven home to the attention by stating proportions of wholesale prices of commodities consumed by transportation costs. They cite, for example, some of the results of the studies of Samuel Fraser and R. A. Phillips for the International Apple Shippers' Association of Rochester, N. Y., and for the Western Fruit Jobbers' Association of America. Their studies embodied the rates on 9,476 actual shipments of fruits and vegetables. Expressing the freight costs in percentage of wholesale price (not "farm value"), the results were: Boxed apples, 36.23 per cent; watermelons, 44.89 per cent; Maine potatoes, 35.15 per cent; Texas onions, 46.91 per cent; California lettuce, 47.15 per cent; Florida citrus, 26.64 per cent; Texas cabbage, 75.12 per cent. On 355 cars of northern potatoes, with average haul of only 250 miles, the freight consumed 20.15 per cent of the total wholesale prices obtained for the commodity. The inaptness of such percentage comparisons as to perishable rates lies in the ability of the railways to demonstrate by an equal number of contra illustrations much less percentages—that is, no matter who makes the study in a spirit of judicial investigation to arrive at a fair average, there can always be set up a less percentage table by a transportation-market expert. This comes about because of the great fluctuations in perishable markets. The railways' bureau of economics is thus placed in position to say that price fluctuations in perishables are usually several times freight rate from point of production to usual market; and hence, the railway economists argue, "the cost of transportation, as reflected by freight rate, is a secondary factor in those processes of distribution that control the price of the perishable." Specious argument to the unwise or the unthinking for maintenance of present rates! Remove the fog, tell the public the facts about our present pernicious perishables marketing system, and they will readily understand that the glut of to-day at a given market, yielding the farmer's fancy pack practically no price, may be the dearth of to-morrow in the same market, yielding an unstandardized pack of medium-quality product a comparatively high price! And it is behind such existing variations arising in this wholly uneconomic marketing system the railways would hide with the false defense heretofore noted, would canonize their existing unjustifiably high perishables freight rates by asserting they are less than the range of wrongful extreme fluctuations in price of these commodities due to the most inequitable and unholy marketing system on earth! Such subterfuge argument, printed and scattered throughout the land by the railways, is an indication of the extremity to which they are being pushed, and is also a good reflection of the unchanged opinion of the railways that the farmer remains unintelligent.

No end of similar examples—that is, rates similar to those heretofore cited on cotton—can be given, not only for other farm staples but also for farm perishables, and not only for domestic delivery of farm staples but also when destined for export. My colleague, Mr. GARBER, of Oklahoma, pointed out in a speech in this House on May 17 last no end of comparisons showing injustice in high and preferential rates obtaining and which affect farmers of the Great Plains States, and rightly insisted there should be promptly formulated a correct basis of preferential rates for farm staples for exportation, comparable with preferentials on freight haul long given to manufactured products for exportation, and that such remedy would go far toward the solution of the problem of our exportable products surpluses.

The fog concerning the actual working out in practice of this "quantity legislation" of the past, in its relation to present exorbitant freight-haul prices on farm products, should be dispelled.

The public utility commissions of some of the States are beginning to enunciate new bases to quicken procedure. This should be notice to the railways that it is as incumbent upon them as upon the shippers to seek prompt, definite, equitable readjustments of rates by firm and proper action of the Interstate Commerce Commission. The Massachusetts Department of Public Utilities has recommended the obviation of valuation difficulties by compelling each company to negotiate a contract with the State fixing a valuation approximately at the amount actually paid in by investors and agreeing in the future to accept the commission's regulations as to rates, without appeal to the courts, provided such regulation does not prevent the payment of fair dividends, tending to keep the stock on a wholly unwatered basis at par value.

Assuming the Government acted aright, largely in response to farmers' demands, in undertaking Federal regulation of our great interstate transportation facilities, then must we not now admit there is good foundation for the present charge by the farmers that the Government has to date proven inefficient in its stewardship relating to such regulation? It is insufficient answer, so far as this charge against the Government is concerned, that the Interstate Commerce Commission should be excused for its nonaction on the ground of its having been overloaded with other duties under many other acts of Congress. If Congress does not properly set up machinery to accomplish effectively the results it imposes by law upon the commission to obtain, nevertheless the penalty of its neglect should not continue to be borne by the most unfortunate class in our present economic unbalancing. If under existing laws the commission assumes its rate-fixing duties are limited to adjustments by decisions of issues in specific contests which arise on complaints for hearing, then let us proceed to specify more clearly and definitely its functions and duties in this regard and specifically charge it with performance and accomplishment within a specified time limit, definitely stating that one reason for its existence and the first purpose of its creation, and its first duty, was and is properly to adjust rates which strangle agriculture; not to stab agriculture in the back with exorbitant rates of its own making. As it is now popular for legislative bodies to make declarations of public policy, maybe it is time for the Congress to serve notice on behalf of the injured and suffering farmers that their funeral oration shall not in any event be an unholy freight-rate schedule born of the suggestion of one great bureau to another to carry out a delayed policy of deflation.

Let us not mince words or beg the question. The farmers charge this Government with creating these schedules under which they can not survive. Let us give them fair opportunity and restore their confidence in the justness of this Government by declaring this confiscating freight-rate schedule a bastard child. And if it be argued that under existing laws due consideration of a proper rate structure can not be had until valuations can be fixed, let us determine by effective legislation that the railroads shall be compelled, within a fixed limit of time, to make definite sworn representations as to the exact unwatered cash investment there is in their respective utilities; and, reserving the right further to investigate into the contents of these sworn representations, let us demand that the commission shall tentatively use such bases of investment as direct guides in considering proper earnings in relation to a freight-rate structure builded upon a fair interpretation of the well-known rule of "what the traffic will bear and continue to flow in volume."

If it be said that such legislation is preemptory or has in it any element of confiscation, then let us debate it from alpha to omega, each Representative being heard throughout this land, so that the people may judge as to the quality of his trusteeship in the handling of their legislative affairs through a government of equal opportunity to all. Let all fog be dispelled as to the factor which farmer patronage has in relation to railroad and industrial life generally. Let the investor in railway stocks and securities come to know all the facts, and he will no longer feel secure through the further attempt in maintaining railway income through economic peonizing of the farmer, upon whose prosperity depends in final analysis the total tonnage haul of this country.

This railway freight situation is just one of many uneconomic conditions which in practice have resulted from legislation lacking in completeness and "quality" enacted in response largely to farmer demand. He wanted sufficient and efficient transportation. We gave it to him, but under conditions so much more favorable to other industries as to prove a death knell to his farming investment. It is no defense to state that the railways of the United States have the lowest capitalization per mile of any railways in the world, pay the highest wages to their employees of any railways in the world, and out of the lowest rates per mile of any railways in the world. Granted that this status be true, the inequities of the distribution of the quantitative sources of income of these railways are apparent and must be adjusted if agriculture is to survive, which in effect is saying if manufacturing and industries generally are to survive; yes, if the railways themselves would survive.

I am not a so-called "antirailway man." Railways and railway investment must have fair treatment; but I know that fair treatment in earnings for the railways need not involve unfair treatment by confiscatory freight rates to farmers. Every sensible capitalist in the great railway industry must on reflection realize that no officer of his road works harder against its best interests than the one who works exclusively for it. This is another case of not seeing the forest for the trees. Farm depression and farm relief are broadgauge railway questions, and the Congress needs now the helpful suggestions for solution which should be forthcoming from all, including the railways.

The other thing which, as I have stated, the farmer so long demanded was credit. They first wanted long-time rural credit and we passed the Federal farm loan act of 1916. As one of the results of the investigation made by the Joint Agricultural Commission of Congress in 1921, the farmers' demand for intermediate credit, i. e., for a period of not less than six months nor more than three years, was met by the Congress passing the agricultural credits act of 1923. Under the Federal reserve act of 1914, with its amendments, the Federal reserve bank was, upon the indorsement of its member banks, to discount notes, drafts, and bills of exchange issued or drawn for agricultural purposes or the proceeds of which were to be used for such purposes—the Federal Reserve Board to determine or define the character of the paper thus eligible for discount within the meaning of the act; but notes, drafts, and bills thus admitted to discount were to have a maturity at time of discount of not more than 90 days. It was, however, further provided that any Federal reserve bank might discount an acceptance, indorsed by at least one member bank, provided such acceptance was drawn for an agricultural purpose, secured at the time of acceptance by warehouse receipts or other such documents conveying or securing title covering regularly marketable staples, such acceptances to have maturity at time of discount of not more than six months' sight. There was a further provision that upon the indorsement of any of its member banks any Federal reserve bank might, subject to regulations and limitation to be prescribed by the Federal Reserve Board, discount notes, drafts, and bills of exchange issued or drawn for an agriculture purpose or based upon livestock and having a maturity, at the time of discount, not exceeding nine months; and that such paper might be offered as collateral security for the issuance of Federal reserve notes if the maturities did not exceed six months, and also if these maturities did exceed six months, provided they were secured by warehouse receipts or other such negotiable documents conveying or securing title to marketable staple agricultural products or by chattel mortgage on livestock which was being fattened for market.

It was undoubtedly thought by the public and by the majority of the Members of the Congress that with the passage of the agricultural credits act provision had at last been made for the extension of all classes of credit required by the farmers. The doctor had rolled the credit pill for his farmer patient. It was at least evident there had been quantity legislation. In order that we may correctly determine whether or not this dosage was efficacious, i. e., whether this legislation was complete and of good quality so far as development and prosperity of agriculture are concerned, let us a little further describe the machinery and then examine some figures and facts. It must be remembered at all times that the advantage thought to be obtained by these laws was, as stated in the Federal farm loan act, "to provide capital for agricultural development, to create standard forms of investment based upon farm mortgages, to equalize rates of interest on farm loans," and as stated in the agricultural credits act, "to provide additional credit facilities for the agricultural and livestock industries of the United States." Under the Federal farm loan act 12 Federal land banks were set up and the capital was subscribed by the Government. These banks were under the management of the Federal Farm Loan Board, which was authorized to grant charters for the joint-stock banks, which were to engage in the same business as the Federal land banks. In retrospect this semiduplication was probably not worth while. The Federal land banks were to make no loans except through so-called national farm-loan associations, which were to be created by methods prescribed, or through so-called agents, being banks or trust companies chartered by the State wherein they operated. To no one borrower were these Federal land banks to lend more than $25,000, with preference expressed for the borrowers of $10,000 or less. The joint-stock banks did not have this limitation. Both sets of banks were limited to loans not exceeding 50 per cent of the value of the land mortgaged and 20 per cent of the value of permanent insured improvements thereon, such values to be ascertained by methods of appraisal. The action of each Federal land bank was confined to its bank district. The action of the joint-stock bank was confined to its State and adjoining States.

The purposes for which the borrowed money could be expended were specifically set forth when the loan was made of the Federal land banks, but the joint-stock land banks could lend for other purposes than those specified as limiting Federal land banks. The Federal land banks could lend only to persons who at the time were engaged, or within a brief time thereafter were to be engaged, in the cultivation of the farm mortgaged. There was no such specific limitation placed upon the lending of the joint-stock banks. Both sets of banks were to offer to the public tax-exempt bonds based upon their mortgage holdings. The Government made no subscription to the capital of the joint-stock banks. The Government's subscription of capital to the Federal land banks, to a total of approximately $9,000,000, has to date been paid down to approximately $439,000 by deductions from earnings. As under the act, these Federal land banks could increase their capital indefinitely, there really was no limit to the amount of this long-time farm-land credit. On September 30, 1928, the combined capital stock of the Federal land banks was over $64,000,000, and of this total nearly $63,000,000 was owned by national farm-loan associations as against approximately $750,000 owned by borrowers through the State banks acting as agents of these Federal land banks. As above stated, the Government's investment is now something over $400,000 only. To understand how it came about that these farmer associations now own practically all the capital of the Federal land banks, it should be explained that by a provision of the act a borrower was and is always required to devote 5 per cent of the sum borrowed to purchasing shares of the capital stock of these Federal land banks, and that upon his making such purchase it was and is required that his shares be put up as collateral, and it was and is further specified that when the debtor pays his debt the amount he has been required to pay for his shares is returned to him, and thereupon his shares of such capital stock are canceled. Thus he is made to become a stockholder, and 5 per cent of the capital he borrows is never delivered over to him although he pays a fixed rate of interest on it and is given as an offset problematical earnings on such stock during the period of time he is permitted to hold it. In fact, there was a provision in the act that this stock could be retired at par at the will of the bank. Therefore, without his consent, if ever the earnings on his temporary stock holding should equal or exceed the interest he was being charged upon this money, which he was never permitted to use, these Federal land banks could reverse the position as to liabilities and give the farmer the heavy end of the load. The result in operation of this grinding out and then cancelling stock, with its never being in the farmers' possession except as above noted, is that the Federal Farm Loan Board is the bank. They have always run the whole affair. They are responsible for all that has taken place. This condition of authority and control is likewise true as to the intermediate credit banks, and nearly equally true as to the joint-stock banks.

There can be no doubt of the good intent of the Congress generally to assist the farmers by the creation of this long-term farm credit and intermediate credit. The query is what has been the actual results obtained under these acts with the machinery which the Congress set up for their operation? The farmers are complaining about these banks. Have they just cause?

Both sets of land banks—the Federal land banks and the joint-stock banks—had operated a decade down to the end of 1927. The record discloses that during that period the Federal land banks closed 448,958 farm loans in the aggregate amount of $1,365,060,822, on 80,539,490 acres, with Federal land banks' appraised value of $3,783,649,222. This shows that on their combined appraised values of lands and buildings, the lendings of these banks totaled less than 28 per cent of their own valuations. During the same period the joint-stock land banks made 114,800 farm loans, in the amount of $790,304,655, on 32,347,000 acres, with their appraised valuation thereon of $2,049,244,265. This shows that the lendings to the farmers of these joint-stock land banks was on an average basis of less than 26 per cent of such bank's own valuations. Such data begin to throw light on the farmers' assertion that as this governmental machinery has been at work, it has been successful in using the farmers' assets to create an ever-increasing quantity of attractive tax-exempt bonds for the wealthy investing public, but has resulted in driving from the farm-lending field all the Scotch and old-line farm lending companies who had long served the individual or unorganized farmers, and has spread a very low first mortgage over the great area of more than 110,000,000 productive acres. Moreover, they assert it is now evident the machinery was set up more to promote cooperatives and cooperative borrowing than to relieve the great mass composed of these unorganized individual farmers. As to this contention, it is true the act itself specifically directs the Federal Farm Loan Board to prepare bulletins and to distribute same through the Department of Agriculture and to agricultural journals and farmers' organizations, setting forth the principles and advantages of amortized Federal farm loans and the protection offered debtors under the act, and instructing farmers how to organize and conduct farm loan associations, and generally to disseminate information for the further instruction of farmers regarding methods and principles of cooperative credit and cooperative organization. Also the act sets up the method whereby prospective farm borrowers may join together to form a so-called national farm loan association and prescribes no loans shall be made except to such national farm loan associations for its members or through State banks as agents of the Federal land banks where, after a time, it appears that no such national farm loan associations will be formed. However, to an agent bank is allowed by the act up to one-half of 1 per cent per annum upon the principal of all loans through it received and approved by the Federal farm loan bank—the actual expenses of appraisal of land, examining and certifying the title, and making, securing, and recording the mortgage papers being, of course, added to the principal of the loan. The unorganized or independent farmer who approaches any such so-called agent bank of the Federal land banks soon learns that before the Federal land banks will accept his paper, even though the appraisal and other conditions precedent are wholly satisfactory, such agent bank negotiating the loan must indorse same and become liable for the payment thereof, and for any default by the mortgagor, under the same terms and under the same penalties as if the loan had been made by such agent as principal. In other words, this independent farmer not being in a sufficiently important position of influence to induce this local State bank, even if it should be recognized as an agent of the Federal land bank, to become his guarantor by indorsement, and thereby under the act and Federal land bank rulings become the principal in case of default, can make no loan. He is denied by the very terms of the act itself from procuring under any circumstances any credit relief directly from this governmental agency. Under these circumstances he considers himself fortunate if even the local agent bank is willing to accommodate (?) him by approving "as agent" so foolishly small a loan in comparison with values as that negligible responsibility only is placed on such local bank.

By this method of mistreatment, in comparison with what is offered under the act to cooperatives, the independent or unorganized farmers, although far outnumbering cooperatives, have to date succeeded in borrowing about 8 per cent only of the total outstanding loan advances of these Federal land loan banks. If the independent farmer is not so fortunate as to find other farmers in his community who also wish to borrow and have acceptable security upon which to borrow, and are sufficient in number to meet the requirements of the act, and are willing to assume the personal financial responsibilities which come with the indorsement of paper to be created by the National Farm Loan Association, then he is in the position of a citizen who has paid his tax and otherwise loyally supported his Government, and has security and collateral of the kind which it specifies as sufficient for the borrowing of funds from one of its instrumentalities known as the Federal farm loan bank, and although in dire need of the use of such credit, he can not attain unto it because of the endless red tape and impossible conditions precedent—conditions set up by the act itself more in response to the prevailing miscapitalization for public use of the word "cooperative" than to common sense, having in mind that government is for greatest good of greatest number with equal opportunity to all.

Again, witness how this machinery operates disastrously to affect the farm-land investment of the farmers as a whole, whether or not having any direct or indirect relation to this set of Government banks, when in a period of extraordinary deflation, the farmers face a great emergency! If read with right intent, this act, as all others having to do with farm relief, should be interpreted to mean the machinery set up under it would at all times so act as to assist in stabilizing the farmer's business and investments. When we say "to provide capital for agricultural development, to create standard forms of investment based upon farm mortgages, to equalize rates of interest upon farm loans," and so forth, the farmer's contention is correct that we have expressed our purpose to assist him. When could such purpose be put to a greater test than when he is met with such an emergency as the recent deflation in farm values? If any agency of the Government had power to be influential at such a time in stabilizing farm-land values, it was this set of Government banks. They knew that due to not fault of the farmers themselves, but to unbalanced economic conditions following the World War, as was clearly shown at the hearings of the Joint Agricultural Investigation Committee in 1921, and the abruptness with which the deflation was set in motion, in part at least, through governmental agencies, there were no buyers for farm lands; and yet the Federal land board retained its policy of compelling the Federal land banks to charge off all real estate as and when acquired, except the Federal land bank of Spokane, which was permitted under certain conditions to include real estate in its assets. The farmers maintain not only that this practice, together with publicity given it, was a material factor in the further deflation of farm values, but also and particularly that such practice so affected the balance sheets of these Federal land banks that the officers thereof, in order to make a good paper showing, were forced to sell these lands. They further contend that one of the promised advantages of the enactment of the Federal farm loan act was to be prevention of unnecessary deflation of the farmer's permanent investment—that is, his land; that the land banks were empowered to hold the land for a number of years if necessary, and that no interest rate or depreciation was set; that these land banks were, therefore, in much better position to hold than were the commercial banks or insurance companies; that the appraisals of the Federal land banks, as we have seen, were always so extremely conservative that eventual loss could not possibly have taken place unless the whole country went into actual bankruptcy; that these banks dumped their land on the sluggish, deflated, and declining farm-land market at a time when deplorably low prices prevailed, and that thereby a further and horizontal deflation took place which was wholly unjustified. They cite as an example that one of these land banks sent to the auction block in one batch, parcels of land worth well over a million dollars, and received therefor three hundred and odd thousand dollars only.

As is pointed out by one critic, the indirect economic loss to the community and to the country through such actions by the Federal land banks was much more serious than the direct loss to these banks, because values of securities behind all good farm loans were accordingly affected and reduced and the equities of farmers in no way related to Federal land bank loans were thus written down or wiped out. The farmers contend there is great unbalance in the economics of the situation when such conditions as those just described can obtain and yet at the same time bonds based on their mortgages can be sold bearing 4 per cent interest. Was it because the average security was overample that at a time of great deflation the Federal land banks could afford to continue this charge-off policy in defiance of the spirit of the farm loan act? The farmers have a right to ask how it comes about that in the United States under our Federal farm loan system the advancements as loans are little more than 25 per cent on valuation, whereas in England, for example, under her loan system the advancements as loans are up to two-thirds of valuations under appraisals, and even then the rate of interest charged there is less than here? Anyway, they ask, is it worth consideration now whether or not any American farm borrower is assisted in the long run by being placed in a position to borrow at low interest rates up to a small proportion only of even these banks' appraisals of his holdings through a management so overconservative in lending as that it can and does write off all lands acquired and dump large blocks of same at auction on a highly deflating land market in such times as agriculture has been and is experiencing, thus everywhere shrinking or wiping out equities over and above these low loan values?

And the zest with which this governmental agency continues to hold down the farm-land market price is indicated by its 1927 report in this language:

> The board is urging all banks to see that their real estate sales departments are functioning efficiently and that their activities are directed intelligently.

Judging by the past, this language simply means that they will use all their acquired lands in such a way as to keep down market values for all farm lands. Even if they had not foreclosed and sold these lands, the policy of instituting unnecessarily at such a time numberless actions to foreclose, heralded in the news of the day all over the land, was wholly unjustified. It is not conceivable how this power of publicity, coupled with the market action of dumping lands, could have been used more disastrously abruptly to deflate farm-land prices. Several hundred cases in the southern Minnesota district, and more in the Durham (N. C.) district, involving about $3,000,000 in Minnesota and something less in North Carolina, and many suits in every district, were the order of the day. It is no defense to cite that after a time many of these foreclosures were dismissed. The publicity itself at such a time did incalculable harm. It is enough knowledge on which to base a conclusion that such precipitate action was wholly unwarranted when we know that the Federal land banks as a whole were sound, whether or not they ever realized a dollar on all the loans involved in all these then delinquent borrowers' transactions. The quantity of land involved in these failures and the total value thereof were small in comparison with the greatness of this institution and its assets. Hence the methods used by these governmental banking agencies and the time chosen to use them were both highly inappropriate, giving an outstanding exhibition of wrong use of governmental position further to unbalance economic conditions already very adversely affecting the destinies of American agriculturists.

And now it is intimated that the Federal Farm Loan Board thinks it is about time to reappraise the lands under its mortgages. In other words, when the farmer has been struggling for the past seven years under his production dollar having an average 81 cents purchasing power for his nonagricultural necessities, and with his land values still greatly overdeflated, largely due to the acts of these land banks, the Federal Farm Loan Board may order reappraisal of lands on basis of their present earning power! Earning power is the basis of appraisement fixed by the act.

Let us digress for a moment. The finding by any governmental agency is a guide and pattern for all. For example, when the Federal Trade Commission found on behalf of the complaining consuming public that 10 cents was a maximum price per pound which the Raisin Growers' Association of California could charge, notwithstanding it was then offering and receiving at auction for larger than usual tonnage blocks of its product as high as 15 cents, it stamped these growers as unfair in their dealings. I do not say that was the intent. I assert that was the result. The members of that great cooperative thereupon abandoned their contracts, and the association failed. With the help of the financiers of San Francisco and Los Angeles a new association was formed along lines acclaimed as most modern and under what was reputed to be efficient management; but Uncle Sam had said in effect by this finding that these raisin growers had been unfair in their price demands for their product, and the new association has never prospered and there are growing indications of its giving up the ghost, even though this Government, through the instrumentality of the intermediate credit banks, has lent this cooperative up to approximately $6,000,000.

Compare this result of governmental activity in cooperative affairs, and its far-reaching effects on the welfare of one community in one State, with the deflating influence of the above-recited actions of these sectionally scattered Federal land banks on land prices all over the United States! And how about reappraisal? Is there not much ground for the farmers asserting that not in a decade will farm-land prices recover from blows already received, even if parity for their dollar is quickly established and no reappraisement before that time is undertaken? Are we to continue to remain so far aloof from the activities of these governmental banking agencies, reputedly created to assist in farm relief, that now in the time of the farmers' great distress, we would witness, without objection, any such reappraisal? Shall we thus permit the fixing farm-land prices for the different parts of the whole United States and for a decade to come, on appraisals based on present earnings, under what is on all sides admittedly a wholly unbalanced condition, which must be remedied if the prosperity of not only agriculture but also the whole country is to be vouchsafed?

I believe the farmers are entitled to have the fog removed from this whole Federal land-banking situation; that they are right in their contention the purpose of the original act was to open credit directly to them at a price to be determined by open bidding and not private underwriting of their bond offerings as has been the practice of the Federal Farm Loan Board from the beginning; that they are right in their contention their ownership of stock should no longer remain a fiction but be recognized as a fact, they having paid $63,000,000 for it, and the Government's stock holding now amounting to only a little over $400,000. Shall we set up a credit organization like these Federal land banks for farmers' relief, compel them to buy nearly all its stock but allow them to assume no responsibility or have any authority, and then so manipulate the machinery as not to permit these farmer owners to save themselves, protect their families and their property?

As has been stated, the purpose of the agricultural credits act was to create an outlet for farmers' paper of not less than six months nor more than three years maturity. The limit of bond issuance by the Federal land banks was placed at twenty times the capital and surplus; of the joint-stock banks, fifteen times the capital and surplus. The Federal intermediate-credit banks were authorized to borrow money and to issue and sell collateral trust debentures or other similar obligations up to ten times the amount of paid-up capital and surplus. The paid-up capital stock of each such intermediate bank was $5,000,000; that is, $60,000,000 total for all these banks. The Government subscribed for the stock. One-half the earnings of these banks was to be paid to the United States Treasury until this capital was returned. The Government had to date of last report paid in $25,000,000 of this capital, and approximately $2,000,000 had already been paid back from earnings. These Federal intermediate-credit banks, the same as the joint-stock banks, were placed under the Federal Farm Loan Board. The policy of this one board controls all these governmental agencies in agricultural banking activities, save and except the short commercial paper which, as we have seen, can be handled under the limitations of the Federal reserve act by the Federal reserve banks. These intermediate-credit banks have power under the act to discount for or purchase from any national bank, and/or any State bank, trust company, agricultural credit corporation, incorporated livestock loan company, savings institution, cooperative bank, cooperative credit or marketing association of agricultural producers organized under the laws of any State, and/or any other Federal intermediate-credit bank, with its indorsement, any note, draft, bill of exchange, debenture, or other such obligation, the proceeds of which have been advanced or used in the first instance for any agricultural purpose, or for raising, breeding, fattening, or marketing of livestock; also to make loans or advances direct to any cooperative association organized under the laws of any State and composed of persons engaged in producing, or producing and marketing, staple agricultural products or livestock, if the notes or other such obligations representing such loans are secured by warehouse receipts, and/or shipping documents covering such products, and/or mortgages on livestock; provided that no such loan or advance shall exceed 75 per cent of the market value of the products covered by such warehouse receipts, and/or shipping documents, or of the livestock covered by such mortgages. The rates of interest and discount are such as prevail with the Federal Farm Loan Board.

Here again in this act we find the Government engaged in compelling the farmer to join some prescribed association in order that he may achieve any credit standing later. I wish to say more about this thread, which for some time past we find running all through agricultural legislation, setting-up "something more for the unorganized farmer to shoot at," something for him to join if he is fortunate enough to be so situated that he can; but if he is not, then no matter what his land holdings or crops position, penalizing him by not recognizing his values as security for anything, not even enough to buy mother the new dress or to send Anne to school. At this point it is sufficient to state that under this intermediate credits act there is no provision made for credit extension to the unorganized or individual farmer, even though he has harvested and placed his crop in a Government-licensed or other warehouse regarded as safe by these governmental banking agencies, but there is special and complete provision for the making of direct loans to the organized farmers. And the result has been what? The total credit by direct loans has flowed to and been used solely by a minority of producers desiring credit whose production is a small part of total production. Moreover, under this act relief by lending has been offered in certain instances and locations only, particularly in the highly specialized commodity production communities. The diversified-products farmer has had no chance. The farmer unorganized or individual is by the act itself denied any loan, no matter what his collateral. Let us examine one of the recent statements of the Federal Land Board relating to these intermediate banks. On December 31, 1927, these direct loans, all to cooperative associations, totaled about $32,000,000, divided as follows: Tobacco cooperative associations, about four and a quarter million dollars; cotton, nearly fifteen millions; wheat, about two and a half millions; raisins, about six millions; canned fruits and vegetables, about eleven hundred thousand dollars; rice, nearly two millions; dried fruits, about half a million; wool, about four hundred thousand; and the balance divided between beans, alfalfa seed, red-top seed, and honey. The geography of these loans discloses how in practice the speciality cooperatives in highly specialized commodity production are the only beneficiaries of this intermediate system. The quick extreme illustration is the northeastern United States, with Springfield, Mass., as the bank's headquarters, and $50,000 loans outstanding; and the Berkeley Intermediate Bank, serving in the California district, with approximately $8,400,000.

In 35 States banks had rediscounted some agricultural paper of some kind, the total amounting to approximately $44,000,000; but only approximately ten millions of this was other than livestock paper of incorporated livestock loan companies. Therefore this class of paper acceptable for discount shows big balances in livestock specialty sections, such as over $5,400,000 to western Texas cattle, $1,300,000 to New Mexico cattle, over $2,100,000 to Arizona cattle. Even Idaho's combined livestock discounts stood at over $1,000,000, but Pennsylvania livestock owners did not have a penny. We have seen that Pennsylvania has twice as many horses as Idaho, over seven times as many mules, over twice as many cattle, over seven times as many dairy cows, three times as many swine, and over eight times as many chickens! Why can not the farmer of Pennsylvania, New York, Massachusetts, Virginia, the Carolinas, Georgia, New Hampshire, and so forth, reach out and attain unto this discount advantage? The answer is that he is unorganized as incorporated livestock companies. The bulk and value of his livestock holdings may exceed those of farmers in the States receiving the benefit, but there the holdings are concentrated in a specialty business, while here the holdings are largely made up of small "ownings" by individual farmers engaged in diversified farming. For the same reason such States as Massachusetts, New York, and Pennsylvania have never had a direct loan in the history of the bank. Connecticut had a specialty it could organize (tobacco), and it borrowed twenty-three millions; and Kentucky, Virginia, and the Carolinas tobacco men could do the same—Kentucky getting about $68,000,000, Virginia about $60,000,000, North Carolina $11,000,000, and South Carolina over $19,000,000 from organization of the intermediate bank to end of 1927.

I have probably reviewed enough facts to illustrate that this set of Federal banks functions for credit relief for specialty farmers only, and chiefly only in single commodity highly specializing communities. It furnishes relief to a particular class of the whole class needing relief. Under administration it is a good example of government of unequal opportunity.

One of the big reasons urged for the enactment of the agricultural credits act by the Sixty-seventh Congress was the reported inability of local banks to handle the situation, but after such enactment local banks created and ever since have handled less agricultural paper of kind discountable with Federal intermediate banks. In brief, they immediately adopted the viewpoint that Uncle Sam had gone into banking and was bidding to handle a class of paper which was full of detail for them, and hence somewhat troublesome, and so they would let Uncle Sam do it; but best of all, if they promoted Uncle Sam's business they would avoid indorsement liability on all this class of paper. The whole result is that so far as the individual and unorganized farmer is concerned, operations under this agricultural credits act has put his local bank farther from him and less available for his use.

In brief, operations under the act do not, mainly because of limitations set forth in the act itself, give general credit relief or equal opportunity to members of the distressed class to procure it or benefit by it. I shall later refer to this situation in discussing the proposed use of cooperative organizations as mediums for making available or distributing farm relief.

So much by way of my promised analysis of Federal transportation and Federal agricultural credits legislation enacted at request of different farmers' organizations representing themselves as representing "the farmers" and, of course, the best interests of the farmers of this country—that is, farming as a whole. It would appear to be about time that those in majority in numbers and producing the bulk in tonnage and value of our farm products should be protected in farm-relief legislation and in administration under it; in brief, that all in like distress be given equal opportunity to qualify in fact so as to share the benefits, whether white or black, Jew or Gentile, wheat farmer or potato raiser, organized or unorganized.

It seems illogical to devote time to discussion of anything else until causes and effects in this farm crisis are fully understood, but there is again danger of a big crop of "quantity" instead of "quality" agricultural legislation. Judging by the methods used in the past to produce such results, it behooves some of us not logically to stick too long by the task of insisting that at all times the public must first be advised of the causes and effects before being asked to evolve the remedy, but early to discern purposes and to weigh leadership and to point out results should the mechanisms proposed for rendering aid be used. In any event, there is danger that study and analysis of causes and effects of farm depression and logical plans for relief will be curtailed, if not eliminated, by the blinding utopias promised under the workings of money or credit distributions through conceived mechanisms for the application of farm relief. There is already voluminous prattle as to these mechanisms. I am not confident this early prattle is not an echo of this generation's ostentatious superdevotion to service, which Chesterton so pointedly distinguishes as idolatry of the intermediate to the oblivion of the ultimate, and which another noted writer has characterized as possessing many elements of fraud against the public's good. There is on every hand evidence of eager willingness to put the aid (so far as dollars may be deemed an element in aid) into motion. There is a strong tendency to standardize the aid to fit some pet conception of mechanism for application of aid. There is no end of talk about rendering the service and the machinery by which this rendering is to be accomplished. Following the same trend which was responsible for such quantity legislation as the transportation and credit acts we have analyzed, this talk of mechanisms centers around "cooperatives."

Before analyzing cooperatives at some length, let us understand the more general requisites which any proper relief will demand in such mechanisms. We may only generalize because until such proper relief shall have been determined upon no details of any mechanisms should be promoted.

If I know anything about the composite character of American farmers, it is that they would not set out with any plan to take funds from the Federal Treasury under any scheme for expenditure thereof, which (as even less than deep study would show) on its very face at the outset contemplates in the aggregate losses only. If this is correct, several contemplated plans, including as mechanisms for operation so-called gigantic and federated cooperatives, should not be adopted. If by "farmers" one means the majority of the men who own farms and who do the farm work and produce the bulk of farm crops, whether measured by tonnage or value, then farmers are against limiting relief to or application of relief through cooperative associations, whether existing voluntarily or forced into existence by legislation, because by any such plan these independent farmers receive no relief; because by such plan and through such mechanisms a classified minority only of the class in distress will again be favored. We must not avoid the intricacies which may beset the obtaining of universality of application of the remedy or remedies we finally conceive to be best. Above all, we must not again avoid such difficulty by hiding behind a false picture created in part by our past legislative actions promoting cooperative associations as adaptable and useful in applying aid, whether in the nature of credit or improved facilities. This error of the past has arisen chiefly by traveling the easier route of conceiving a mechanism and then fitting the aid to it.

The plan and the mechanism for its application must this time not result in extending credit only to single-crop communities raising storable staples or livestock. That may be all right for the Porto Rico coffee raisers, giving them use of $3,000,000 in the first 30 months of lending to them, but this time the independent unorganized farmers—that is, the majority of the distressed class—must be recognized.

The majority will always be thus unorganized for reasons appearing as we later discuss in detail cooperative associations. Anyway, if the Government were to cease this endless setting-up of patterns of cooperatives and limiting service to members of such patterns, and were to make aid available to all voluntarily created cooperative associations, still the application would be to the minority only of farmers. Moreover, as so many cooperatives have purposes other than marketing, as many objects as the hairs on one's head, it does not happen that it is just to compel the individual farmer to join any cooperative in order to qualify as a citizen to whom credit facilities granted other farmers should be extended. It is no more fair to compel such citizen to join some cooperative with objects or plans in which he does not believe than it would be to compel a Republican, in order to gain this or that relief for his family, to join Tammany. It is not surprising that the Federal Trade Commission in a recent review of conditions discovered some so-called marketing cooperative associations composed of very limited memberships of chief landowners of special commodity communities, which associations would not admit others to membership but some of which handled on their own ideas of what was an equitable charge the "outside production." This angle of so-called cooperation is not to be unexpected. This situation only the further illustrates the necessity of not limiting the application of relief by the limitations of mechanisms adopted to make it available or usable.

In thinking of plans, and later of mechanisms for working them out, we must continually keep in mind (a) that a Government "of the people, by the people, and for the people" can never afford to adopt a relief plan which creates credit facilities or otherwise extends aid to a part only of the whole class in distress; (b) that under all circumstances, there must be equal opportunity for all; (c) that no matter how seductive the word "cooperative" may be, the Congress should not hide behind it to avoid whatever intricate problems there may be in the universal equitable distribution to all farmers of any credit or other national aid finally given.

Now, let use understand what is meant by "cooperative association," how it came about so many were formed in past 10 or 12 years, what work these associations can and what work they can not successfully undertake, as shown by their history, and generally their late past and present status.

About World War time, the word "cooperative" became contagious. You may remember the old saying, "Greek meets Greek—a restaurant"! Well, about the time of the great postwar deflation, it might almost be said (but only as to particular sections of our country), "farmer meets farmer—a cooperative"!

The usual method remaining for a farmer to adopt in case of distress is to increase his production per acre. All the census data clearly demonstrate the agriculturist has kept pace with the industrialist in output efficiency per worker—that is, the farmer has done so in all the lines of farming which adapt themselves to machinery aid, being particularly the grain staples. This relief which had long been the farmer's self-aid in times of distress—that is, the increase of his per acre production—would have always led eventually to overproduction and low price. It so happened that in answer to this country's call of patriotism, farmers at war time plowed up not a little of their 600,000,000 acres of meadow and woodlots and planted same to the staples. Wheat acreage increased 67 per cent in two years, cotton 53 per cent in four years. Therefore, when postwar deflation came upon us in 1920, this country's total production of staples was greater than ever before and far beyond the domestic requirements of our population. At first a market for the surplus could be had abroad, because, although Europe was battered, the Allies still had approximately two and one-half billion dollars of our money lent for war purposes which they had not expended for war purposes. Therefore, they yet had purchasing funds.

During the war period these ally nations had fed well both their military and civilian populations—that is, the consumption per capita of staples had been large. As the two and one-half billion dollars dwindled, and as these nations swung back into field work and foodstuff production, they also began consuming per capita less of these American-grown staple-food products, and also in their purchases here they began specifying substitutes. Thus cheaper bread grains began taking the place of wheat. Farming is a biological rather than a manufacturing business. Once the farmer has gone into production on an increased scale, equipping for so doing by proper machinery, animals, and so forth, he can not rapidly, even if he would, forsake the capital outlay in his improved acres, write down his inventories, and shut off production. To do so would bring him immediately face to face with bankruptcy. There is even an absolute limitation upon his dismissal of employees. The average farm of the United States contains approximately 145 acres, and its workers are the head of the household and his family. That pay roll can not be discharged. Hence, at a time following his having made his increased capital investment patriotically to meet the demands of the Government for quantity and his having submitted to Government price fixing on his products, he found himself in debt on a decreasing price market but with ever-increasing costs for his necessities, and has ever since followed his old plan of attempting to relieve himself by producing still larger quantities—resulting unavoidably in surpluses, mainly in the staples. These surpluses being thrown upon world markets have, with the rest of the world's surplus, in turn tended to fix for him a lower price on the domestic market.

When the crisis of the deflation of 1920 came upon him, coupled with the unconscionable rise in his freight rates, he concluded that the prices for his product must somehow be raised. He knew the retail or consumers' prices were high, but he knew his farm prices were low. He decided he was entitled to a part of the brokerage of the existing marketing system. They talked it "in two's" over the fence, then in small congregations in the district schoolhouse, and then in general community gatherings at the village or county seat. Times were hard with them. Prices asked them for their necessities were high. With 1910–1914 as a 100 base, the farmer's dollar was worth 75 cents in 1921, namely the index price of necessities he purchased was 156 and of the products which he marketed was 116. His dollar was worth even less, because in these compilations of data whereupon index prices are fixed on farmers' products, many wholesale marketing prices are frequently used. There is a big difference between "farm value" and "wholesale market price" of farm products. When these hard times came upon them the farmers did not begin organizing to decrease the prices of the non-agricultural necessities they required but to increase the prices of their own products' offerings. For example, they did not organize to manufacture farm machinery, although on the 1910–1914 basis of 100 its index was 175. They did not strike against these prices asked them for their necessities. They only asked, and have continued only to ask, to be permitted to play in a fair game, where there is approximate equality in the purchasing power of the dollar, whether it be in the pocket of the manufacturer, earned through his investment and business, or in the pocket of the farmer, earned through his investment and business. How would they raise the farm value of their products? The suggestions were and are innumerable. The "Try-somethings" are beginning to outnumber the "Do-nothings"; and, with the "Try-somethings," the conservatives are rapidly gaining control.

Permit me to digress for a moment to say something about a few of the things the "Try-somethings" have in mind as worthy of adoption. The "Conservative Try-somethings" would undertake that only which can be done and which would assist in creating a real improvement in the situation. They would remove fogs and enact quality legislation; would make political relief incident to lasting actual farm relief. Thus, whether or not it is so-called good politics, they would remove or greatly modify the horizontal increases in freight rates imposed in 1920 on the farmers' products and insist that proper differentials on freight-haul charges on farmers' products to ports for export must be established in the rate structure. They would increase the tariffs on agricultural imports. They would eliminate further Government subsidized competition from all proposed arid and swamp land reclamation areas. They would increase in number our definitions of standards relating to farm products, and would broadly and definitely strengthen inspection operations for grading under such standards for cer-rolling or other demands. Concerning this all-important step will greatly assist in creating a correct type of marketing system for the farmers to the benefit of both producers and consumers. To the end that private capital may be logically induced to carry on a most necessary function of our country's activities—fair marketing in lines where it does not now exist—they would give assurance that it will not meet up with competition from United States Treasury funds brought forth as subsidies, low interest-bearing advancements without definite hope of repayment, or what not, in response to political or log-rolling, or other demands. Concerning this all-important step of proposed reform of the present marketing system, we have had enough of academic discussion. The facts are well known. The marketing of farm staples as a whole is being fairly economically done. The marketing of the perishable fruits and vegetables has been and is in deplorable condition.

The need is for impressing a proper facility or facilities into the trade channel—one so powerful in its workings as that upon its being adopted for use, all actual economies or so many as may possibly be had will follow—a utility of such strength as to impel avoidance of waste by the producer at point of production and shipping, proper packaging and loading, elimination of waste in transportation; one which will supply a nation-wide offering to a nation-wide demand, expressing itself definitely continuously, thus giving the widest possible domestic market, with price being fixed by a free working out of the price-influencing factors of the equation of supply and demand. Such ideal must not remain mere talk. Either it can or it can not be promptly attained. The "Conservative Try-somethings" assert that it can. They say remove the fogs which are hiding the true outlines and aspects of this farm relief problem. Arouse the brains of the industrial captains of this country to the realization that even their own selfish interests demand this solution, and that if the workable plan for it is brought forth and installed by capital, the Government will not use its legislative or bureaucratic powers or Federal Treasury funds in hampering its workings. Then the plan will be promptly evolved and installed. Above all, private capital thus to be invested must be assured it will not have the Government in business as a competitor; that the Government will remain in its place in regulating interstate commerce; will not engage in buying or selling, directly or indirectly, the products which enter into and comprise such commerce except, of course, to the extent required for use or consumption by its own direct departmental activities. If the Congress thus defines the position of this Government, it will reduce useless confusion of endless debate, which is little less than disturbance, to a definite issue for enlightened discussion, and action will follow. This should do more for practical farm relief than any other possible present step.

Now to return to my discussion of cooperatives and cooperative aims. For many decades, the farmers have tried in vain to change and improve the fundamentals underlying the marketing system. They have not succeeded. To-day the system is practically the same as obtained for a long period before the war. As I have stated, the marketing of perishables has long been and remains most uneconomic. The marketing of staples has for a long time been and is now fairly economic, and it is doubtful if in any event further economies will be impressed by introduction through cooperatives of new or additional middlemen for staples handling, whether or not such cooperatives are sustained by Government financing.

One of the objects cooperative associations assert must be obtained is control of "flow to market." They claim such control is necessary to establish "orderly marketing" and to maintain "price level." In our farm staples marketing, the flow to market channels does not control, and at least much of the time does not even influence price. Size of known carry-over plus crop estimates, with reliable preseason measuring of world demands, determines the price level before harvest and dumping. Let us prove it with cotton and wheat data. Cotton-marketing data are compiled not to fit the calendar year but the cotton marketing year extending from June to June. The so-called dumpage months are October, November, December, and January. Taking New Orleans price for middling spot cotton and the story is as follows: In 1905 the low level was June to September, with price increasing rapidly as delivery season began; in 1909, the price increased very rapidly from October to February; in 1910, the average price during dumping season was well toward the top level; in 1912, an abrupt rise began in October, and it held at or near the high mark throughout the dumping season; in 1913, the same situation was repeated; in 1915 there was a rise all during the months from October to February. Some claim that the war conditions make the following few years more or less uninterpretable in a general market study. I venture the opinion the analysis of prices then obtaining only confirms that even during war conditions the equation of world supply and demand still rules so absolutely that dumpage is not a factor. Anyway, and for what it is worth, it can be said that the high peak of 1916 was within this dumping period; that in 1917 there was "a low" in August and September but a sharp rise from October to February; that in 1918 there was a recession but "the low" was after February; that in 1919, the so-called great rise, being above the 30-cent mark, began about opening of and continued all the way through the dumping season. The so-called great fall began in May, 1919, and continued abruptly from a peak of over 40 cents to about 11 cents in March, 1921—a level which it held more or less generally until July, 1921. In 1922 the market began to rise at the beginning of and continued to rise throughout the dumping season. In 1923, October to February takes in all the high level and peak prices of that cotton marketing year. In 1924 the market stopped dropping at beginning of dumping season and continued to rise until February. The whole 1925 market year saw general persistent decline, with the low spot at the end. The November price was 18 cents. A year later the price was under 11 cents. The quantity flow to market during the dumping season was below the average. The declining price was, of course, nothing more or less than an expression of the price factors in the equation of world supply and demand—by far the most important of which are, as above stated, known carry-over supply plus crop estimate plus estimated use demands. Whether peace or war obtains, these factors are so nearly accurately known before the picking season is begun that the price range is set thereby and the world begins buying on such data, each purchasing when and at the price level at which he can use the product advantageously in his judgment for his purposes.

The Bureau of Agriculture's crop reporting board's July first estimate of cotton crop in the period 1915–1926 was 87 per cent correct against final ginnings. The percentage of accuracy increases with each month. Its December estimates for the period 1915–1926 reached 97 per cent accuracy. Time and again in Crops and Markets, the Agricultural Department's price reporter, we read sentences similar to this one:

> The more recent crumbling of prices is reported to have been due to more favorable weather throughout the Cotton Belt, leading to further increased estimates of production for the crop.

All the fog concerning dumping of farm staples and irregularity or regularity of flow of chief farm staples to market as being factors in fixing price of these world commodities should be cleared away forever.

The mere withholding or storing a part of these farm staples crops does not affect world prices based on supply in existence plus crop estimates plus forecast use demands. The buying world knows the holding can not continue. Even if it could and did, the result would be to raise the price for other producers than ourselves or to drive our world customers to use of substitutes.

Now, as to grain, it has time and again been proven that terminal storage is already so sufficient that dumping of grain has little or no effect on price. Thus when the farmers became frightened by the 1924 campaign speeches and dumped over 140,000,000 bushels of wheat on the primary United States markets over and above the usual big September and October flow, being by far the largest receipts in history for both Chicago and Duluth, the market rose in Chicago from the July price of $1.20 to the November price of $1.55. Nor do statistics support the contention that storage charges are high. For a period of 41 years the total spread between high and low months—including, of course, all storage and carrying charges over eight months' period annually—was 11 cents per bushel at Duluth; and in Chicago, over a 43-year period, with even longer average carrying and storage period annually, such total spread between high and low month was only 9 cents. Nor is there in the aggregate a lack of grain storage capacity. Grain storage is now built up to the amazing total of over a billion bushels, whereas the largest amount actually stored during any one period, which was under the United States Grain Corporation control, was 480,000,000 bushels. About 750,000,000 bushels of this billion bushels storage is in the country—that is, not in either the so-called primary markets like Chicago, Duluth, Kansas City, Omaha, and so forth, or the so-called secondary markets like Buffalo, Baltimore, Cincinnati, Philadelphia, Indianapolis, and so forth.

As dumpage neither controls nor usually influences domestic price, so also United States surplus does not control domestic price but only tends to lower that price to the extent that such domestic surplus is a part of the world surplus. We have been exporting wheat for over a hundred years. We have always raised a surplus. It is a world market commodity and it has never been disposed of by withholding and it never will be. A poorly advised Government may undertake it through some cooperative or other agency it creates; but, if so, the people will pay the bill. No one will win; all will lose. Flow of a world commodity into a market can not be more properly guided than by response to price, and any United States storage against natural world flow will only result in increased price for the time being for producers of other countries.

Our world-wise exporters have at their command not only all the data which any surplus corporation set up by the Government will have (unless our Government in an endeavor to support its creature abandons its time-honored policy of promptly distributing its market information), but also have the knowledge and experience which their life work has brought to them. In all the discussion, no one has arisen to say that the exporters of farm staples have made big profits in the actual handling and exporting of grain. It is a world market. Competition is too keen to admit large brokerage. True, grain exporters, because of early knowledge of world production conditions and their ability to interpret such data not infrequently make fortunes by speculation in futures. The setting up by the Government of a surplus corporation will not alter this condition. Futures trading has been legalized. New legislation may eventually change this somewhat; may limit futures trading to hedging by licensed or other legitimate dealers as distinguished from speculators; may confine the total of "future trades" at an exchange to some number of times "the spot" or actual goods traded in. If a big surplus and export corporation were to be set up by the Government, as several western wheat-State legislators advise, would they permit its use of future trading "to hedge losses" which its market experts would advise otherwise must follow? These are the men who would entirely destroy futures trading. I believe it may be somewhat limited, to the benefit of all, but "hedging" has a place in the rightful operation of millers and others. If it had been better understood by the farmer-shippers and shipping pools, they could have used it much more universally to their benefit. The world data as to staples, as far as the Government has them, are available at any time to all of us. If we would speculate in futures, as distinguished from hedging, it might be well for us first to engage for a lifetime in grain dealing and exportation. That would be a good preparatory course.

Is it sensible activity for this Government to induce or impel groups of farmers to go into so-called farming cooperatives whose business it is to pool, withhold, store, and export—that is, in brief, to put these farmers against the hardest trading game in the world? The old days of grain-buying monopolies and "corners" are gone; legislated out of existence. Except for embargoes and tariffs, there is a free world market. Neither this Government nor any instrumentality by it created can control it. If, in a given year, the world supply, including our surplus, is so large that there is an unusual world oversupply, then the price of our export will be very low, whether or not the Government, directly or indirectly, undertakes the handling of it.

It is the high-cost producer who is most penalized by surpluses. The consuming public is interested in surpluses. The consuming public is interested in supporting the bulk-line producers of farm staples, not the producer who is so unfortunately situated that for the economic welfare of the public he should go out of business because in normal times and under balanced economic conditions his costs of production would prohibit his success. The thinking farmers want no new governmental machinery created to support at their expense and to the detriment of the consumers' interests these producers whose situation under normal conditions would be hopeless. We must either reduce the cost of producing the surplus, which in part should be accomplished by proper transportation rates and establishment of proper differentials on haul charges to ports for export, or without doing anything permit world prices on these export staple commodities to control, so far as may be, the acreage devoted to their raising. In 1914 our production of wheat was 763,000,000 bushels, and we exported 19.1 per cent. In 1927 our production was 37,000,000 bushels less than in 1923, but nevertheless had only been reduced to 831,000,000 bushels. Because of world supply-and-demand conditions, and nothing else, we were fortunate enough to export 26 per cent of this.

I repeat, there is absolutely no reason for anyone to believe that a surplus corporation, or any other agency which this Government can set up, will affect the world price level of this product raised so generally throughout the world. Therefore, if an attempt is to be made yearly to designate how much of each variety and grade is necessary for domestic consumption, with the balance to be regarded as surplus, and such surplus is to be handled by Government agencies, then the farmers and all should know (a) that the Government is entering into a business which at the outset contemplates loss in handling, from the viewpoint of domestic price levels hoped to be sustained by segregating such surplus for export sale; (b) that in order to set up fictitious earnings for any surplus corporation, an assumed base price must be annually set below the world price actually obtainable; (c) that if Government Treasury funds or usable Government credit is to be advanced to such a corporation, to be repaid from earnings (?), these earnings must be of the character described; (d) that false earnings may supply temporary political capital but such bogus dollars do not pass current long, and somebody (under several contemplated plans, it would be the United States Treasury) must pay the bill; (e) that no plan has yet been evolved whereby the bill for the loss on the part exported will be met by those who benefit by any higher domestic price hoped to be sustained on the part domestically consumed; (f) that the conception of inducing or compelling all wheat producers to join any cooperative or any surplus-control pool is a fancy on paper and will so remain as long as those outside the pool may enjoy the benefit, if any, of such pooling, without the liabilities of the back charge or assessment which it has been proposed shall be made, directly or indirectly, against the cooperative or pool members; (g) that the adoption of any such surplus export cooperative idea, as a domestic price-level raiser, carries with it at the outset the burden resulting from continuing to sustain those growers who produce at costs above the production costs of bulk-line producers—that is, who produce at a cost above the cost of those who produce, say, 85 per cent of total yield; (h) that these high-production-cost growers (whose yield is, say, 15 per cent of the total) can remain unpenalized outside the pool and mostly survive, thus always adding to the penalty of those within the pool; (i) that over the next 10-year period, 15 per cent of total domestic production will probably equal total exported quantity; (j) that reason as one may, he must eventually conclude pooling and withholding for price fixing, even if temporarily successful (which in these world products, it will not be) would only lead to a surplus within and outside the pool, which has always meant and will always mean financial destruction of the pool.

In clearly recognizing the urgent necessity for farm relief, let us not be carried away by any temporary popularity of any plan for aid not founded on recognition of and proper weight-giving to all the facts. There is no place in such serious work for "an enthusiasm for an enthusiasm." Because a few, or even if many, honest but not fully informed men enthusiastically promote an idea, let us not evince an enthusiasm for their enthusiasm but let us at least distinguish ourselves by carefully examining and weighing for ourselves all the facts, data, and information available, and with such enlightenment, let us arrive at our own conclusions and our own enthusiasms.

In marketing the staples, cooperative associations too frequently offer as an inducement to the farmers to join that they will increase facilities and create wider market and thus produce better prices; but world-wide trading posts and exchanges, together with ample domestic storage, has stabilized staples prices as far as facilities and wide market can do so. Save and except as affected by voluminous speculative futures trading, the variations in price of farm staples have long been normal reflections of the price-fixing factors of the equation of supply and demand, and in my opinion no Federal legislative panacea will be found which over any considerable period of time will greatly improve these conditions surrounding farm staples marketing; that is, improve price conditions at the marketing end. The compelling of boards of trade and exchanges properly to regulate futures trading may be an important matter which can be legislatively handled now. The creation of any surplus or exporting corporation would not in and of itself assist in this matter.

Any legislation designed to support price in defiance of factors reflecting a normal expression of the equation of supply and demand must eventually fail. The staples "surplus and export cooperative" advocates should not camouflage.

In the improvement which is taking place at the production end of marketing, much remains to be done. In this sphere of action cooperatives may properly function to the great benefit of the farming and livestock industry. This sphere has to do with right seed, right sires, right cleaning or processing, right packaging, proper loading, and so forth. This is the so-called sociological sphere of cooperatives. It is in this sphere that agricultural colleges, county agents, Government bureaus for dissemination of agricultural knowledge, and other similar instructing forces can synchronize and work effectively. In this sphere of action legislative assistance has been given and much more can be given to the farmers. The most worthwhile practical legislative aid has been the setting forth of proper definitions of standards and grades thereunder, to the end that by reference thereto the farmer can define his product by description in words recognized by the Government as proper in trading. To remove possibility of the farmer's not properly grading his product under such definitions of standards and grades thereunder, legislation has already provided that Government inspectors may be employed by the producers to effect such grading and to certify thereto. Thus the farmer's offers to the market may now be specific; i. e., he can offer carefully described and properly, authoritatively certified products. While we have by legislation heretofore outlined this inspection plan and made, the service available here and there, through joint action with several States, there is yet much to be done before this advantage to the producer is correctly universally applied. As the working of this plan now stands, it is really a State inspection bearing general approval of the Government. This is insufficient. The market objects to the results, specifying great lack of uniformity in grading and corresponding certification. The market wants Federal inspection uninfluenced by local conditions before it will give its full confidence and cooperation to the plan. Certification will command producer patronage at producer's expense only to the extent that it creates advantages in the market. It is increasingly evident that in this inspection grading service applicable to farmers' products involved in interstate commerce, the Government must function as a wholly independent agency, applying knowledge through competent graders wholly beyond the influences of local State conditions.

Here, then, is a case where fog in the market can be dispelled, and the Government can greatly assist by further legislation and administration thereunder to facilitate and stabilize the farmer's business without itself going into business. At the request of the contemplating vendor it can, at his expense, look with unprejudiced eyes at his product and certify as to its grade. For a good and quick illustration of the value of standardized definitions we have but to remember the cotton situation. For 40 years the trade had been attempting, without Government legislative aid, to standardize the product. At the end of that time the issue of standardization of cotton was in a worse condition than in the beginning. Liverpool, which was the cotton-buying center, was establishing all grades for the world, and in doing so was fixing upon grades which differed materially in many respects from usual American market grades. Moreover, Liverpool complicated the situation by fixing upon three standards for American cotton before its grading thereunder began, namely, a standard known as "American standard," another known as "Gulf standard," and another known as "Texas standard." Under the cotton standards act, during the eight years extending from 1914 to 1922, United States standards for American cotton came into general use and were impressed for all cotton trading in America; and now, for all practical purposes, these United States grades have been adopted by all foreign exchanges and are known as "universal cotton standards." I do not think so well of the American standards act of 1916, as to the grains, believing that we can do more legislatively and administratively to the benefit of the farmers in the matter of grain classifications; that is, I believe we can in Government grading more nearly fix the actual milling grade; that in our definitions for standards and grades we can incorporate more of the factors which enter into the millers' determination of grade values. As to grain grading, past legislation is satisfactory to the dealers. As the matter now stands the Grain Dealers National Association wrote the President's Agricultural Commission on January 22, 1925, that "United States grades are now as standard and uniform as any standard grades in the world." The dealers are satisfied; the farmers are not.

It is to be noted that beneficial standardization acts, and inspection thereunder, apply to the product whether in the hands of the so-called independent farmer or a cooperative association or others. This is important. The benefit is directly general.

When the fashion of forming cooperatives came upon us, the legislatures of the various States became busy making declarations of public policy in the attempt to do away with the antitrust and monopoly laws as affecting farmers' organizations. At first, the courts, even in such great agricultural States as Iowa, remained firm in the old-time rules of law applicable to the situation, but now all are concluding that if the legislatures thus announce public policy, they will follow it so far as possible. The Federal Government gave impetus to this reputed reform by the Capper Act. However, fog remains. The public is confused in its conclusions. It seemingly regards the confirmation of exemption in organizing as equivalent to exemption in operating, even to the extent of recognition of pooling and withholding for price fixing. The consuming public should not be frightened or take positions against the farmer or fail to assist in finding the remedy because of these recent legislative declarations of public policy and court decisions relating thereto. As against monopoly and price fixing, the consumers are protected not only by the whole history of the common law but by the reservations in the Capper Act itself. Moreover, the Federal Trade Commission act remains a guaranty to the consuming public against extortion. It is not the consumers who should be frightened. It is the farmers who should beware and not be misled. They are prone to regard the exemptions extended to them regarding organizing as the equivalent of approval of monopoly—pooling of products and right to fix price. There can be no doubt that in times like these even our courts go far in an endeavor to assist by finding this or that as "not unduly influencing the price," but this very elasticity in decreeing is a warning that when the shoe is on the other foot, the farmer will find a shrinkage in judicial liberality.

We have seen how it was when in 1920 the actions of the California Associated Raisin Cooperative tended to fix high price. That was just before deflation. Times were good. Let us remember the facts. These raisin growers raised their price to about 15 cents. The Federal Trade Commission made investigation. The raisin men proved the public was willing to pay the price by offering at public auction in New York City larger than usual blocks and obtaining a bid-up price equal to or a little greater than what the association had been asking. From the cooperative's viewpoint this was a complete defense. From the viewpoint of the Government, expressed through the findings of the Trade Commission, it was no defense whatever, and this association was enjoined from charging more than 10 cents per pound. Also, it is to be remembered that in that case the cooperative was enjoined from—agreeing, combining, or conspiring, either among its members or with others, to limit, restrict, or lessen the supply of raisins or to curtail or decrease production thereof.

Whenever a wave of enthusiasm for organization goes over this country, it will be found the organizers use many "catch phrases," supposedly descriptive of something good which it is the object of the organization to attain or of something bad of which it will always be guiltless. In this farm crisis and cooperative wave, the agricultural papers, the literature of the Agricultural Department of the Government, and even the decrees of our courts are filled with repetition of such slogans as "orderly marketing," "limited monopoly," "no undue enhancement of prices," and so forth. The printing presses of the agricultural colleges of the different States and of the State legislatures and of Government departments here at Washington and the typewriters of the lawyers throughout the land have been kept busy during the past few years in setting forth no end of arguments in an endeavor to show that "withholding for orderly marketing" may be accomplished "without pooling" in the sense that has been prohibited from the old English days until the present time. There is to be a beneficent restraint of trade!

Is there not much ruse in all this? Would not in the end much greater benefit result, and more effective remedial measures be the more quickly had, if farmers like myself, whose products are handled by cooperatives, came forward and frankly and fearlessly set forth the whole unvarnished truth to the consuming American public? Said that in "marketing cooperatives" the real object which induces membership and holds the association together is to gain the highest price possible, and that while there may be a distinction between "highest price possible" and "a fixed price," nevertheless it has from time to time been the judgment of American farmers here and there, that neither could be obtained without pooling and withholding, and that in doing so they always tried their level best to fix a high price, and only came down when either the association was bankrupt or their members' clamor for cash overcame initial enthusiasm to make the buyers "pay plenty." I believe we should further fearlessly and frankly state that we appreciate the efforts of the Government departments, the Federal Reserve Board, and others, in their brave approaches to attempt to create and define a distinction between "withholding for highest price" and "withholding for fixing price," but let us at same time tell them honestly that we do not know what in practice that difference is, and it is very evident from their attempts at definition that they too are lost in the twilight zone, if any there be, separating the two conditions. Let us admit that so beset with attractiveness is this eternal hope of ability to fix prices that were the power ours we would fix them at a level which would give us at least a fair and just return on our investment and for our labor and for the proper support of our families and the education of our children, and also for luxuries for our families up to the same high standard now obtaining with the American people generally, farmers alone excepted.

As matters now stand, the farmers are not pursuing such frank course but are struggling to gain a fair economic position by relying on clever lawyers to draw instruments, and on moral and political power with courts, and by similar methods adopted in their approaches to Government departments and to the Federal reserve and other bureaus. Out of sympathy for their position, the Federal departments and bureaus have been assuming judicial authority, announcing almost daily decisions which may be momentarily somewhat helpful but are not authoritative. Thus, for example, we find the great Federal Reserve Board approving of advances made for the purpose of "withholding for orderly marketing" but stating that it would not approve loans for "withholding for price fixing." Can not the farmer see that he can not build stability into his financial status by relying on such bureaucratic decisions as this? Can not he understand that if prosperous times were ever to come to him, influences innumerable would be brought to bear upon the Federal reserve to declare advances which were once classed as lawful because the use thereof was for "withholding for orderly marketing" as nothing more than "withholding for price fixing"? Are the farmers of this country in their dire dilemma ready thus to have their business booted about? Are they ready to become spaniels at the heel of interpretation of their affairs by bureaus and departments? Are they ready to have public utility character impressed on their business, and this in such a way as to lead the public tentatively to consent that price fixing is all right if done by the ruling of some official or bureau but all wrong if done by the farmers themselves? Is the Government itself ready, at this stage in its history, to adopt price fixing on food products, directly or indirectly, by bureaucratic acts rather than abide for the protection of its people on limitations as fixed from time to time by the decrees of its courts? Price fixing is never right. My advice to both producers and consumers is to cling for protection to the courts. Place no reliance for future prosperity on bureau rulings. Stop running after bureaus for decisions. Stop importuning your legislative representatives to create more bureaus. Go ahead. Our courts are operating. They are the safeguard of all our people in the application of law to changing social conditions. The Congress and State legislatures, being so directly responsible to the people, may be depended upon to reflect by declaration latest public policy. The courts will adopt such declarations as binding on them just as far as they can and yet foster and maintain justice. No declaration by the Congress or State legislatures permitting monopoly for price fixing of food products will be sustained by them. No bureaucratic ruling tending to permit such condition will be effective over any period of time.

If the object of a marketing cooperative is price fixing, then there is the germ of death in its very creation, because, as we have seen, any high price obtained at any time by pooling a farm product only leads to surplus production within as well as outside the pool, thus bringing destruction of the pool and the price. The longer the life of the pool and the greater its control of price during its existence, the greater the horizontal decline in price and the greater the calamity when its existence inevitably ends. There is no place in our social structure for price fixing—not even for price determination save and except in response to the unyielding exactions of the law of supply and demand. All realize, of course, that the operation of such law is mainly reflected in price levels, expressive of the price of the mass of a grade or class, and that the owner of a product which is a component part of such mass has every right and should bargain to obtain the best price possible for his product of the grade or class. Even if under any conceived federated or other combination cooperative, a pooling for bargaining or marketing should take place of all of a product, then the price level for the mass of any grade or class would not rise because of such single control. The single control would have no effect on supply and demand. It would deny existence of bargaining power to the owners of component parts of the mass. Unless the Government itself is going into the business of buying and selling, the consumers may object to prices at any time by demanding Federal investigation, so that even if the proponents of many of these relief plans are sincere in their desire to lend United States Treasury funds to cooperatives of their own patterning, so that, as they assert, a high domestic price level may be sustained, it should be known by all in advance that thereby supply and demand will not be frightened into abdicating their world thrones. And it must not be forgotten that even if the Government itself were to purchase the commodity and fix the domestic price, it can not control the use of substitutes unless we are to destroy all private investment and industry, enlist all under Army regulations, compel capital and labor to produce, and divide arbitrarily all that is produced. Let us not be so foolish as to force pooling by legislation.

In any event, consumers are in the majority, and as long as consumption and price are related they will have the last say. Were we thus to endeavor to legislate economics, injecting false hopes and then supporting them with the people's money, we would have taken a first step in a policy which if pursued to its logical end would not only disrupt our whole social structure but also would bankrupt the Nation.

We must not be misled by evasions produced by the clever lawyers to the effect that pooling and withholding is not for purposes of price fixing but for "orderly marketing." If by "orderly marketing" they mean "marketing the commodity at the right time and place, in the right quantity and quality," then with farm staples approximately nearest approach to "orderly marketing" already exists. The improvements suggested have to do with improved definitions for standards and grades and with regulations as to mixing grades, and with fixing some limit on trading in futures. Because of the nature of staples, their standardization, ample storage facilities, exchanges, future trading, and world market, we have seen that disorder in flow to market is not a price-determining factor. "Orderly marketing" is "a catch phrase" when applied to farm staples. It is applicable only to perishables.

Let us look this matter squarely in the face. Price control and price fixing are Siamese twins. Take away from cooperative marketing associations the express hope of its members that through cooperative effort their respective organizations will control the price of the commodities respectively handled and these associations would disappear as "marketing cooperatives."

Now is the time for frankness. Aid is needed in correcting the unbalanced condition. Let us avoid evasions. Cooperatives should now admit that uniform noncompetitive prices are generally discriminatory prices; that monopolistic power begins as limitation of competition is born. Stop talking about federating cooperatives and thus controlling first all or even nearly all of a particular commodity and second further federating and thus controlling all farm products. Such talk arises from stories of big profits through mass production in manufacturing—so-called "big business" in industrial production.

To the extent that cooperatives can induce reduction of production costs by working in the sociological sphere of educating its members to use right seeds, right sires, right methods of seed-bed preparation, fertilization, spraying, cultivation, harvesting, culling, packaging and car loading, and to the full extent these right acts have to do with marketing, their marketing field is open to them and they should occupy it, and the Congress and all legislative bodies should assist in every way possible. However, whether the farmer cooperative, through a representative, goes, or the farmer, as an individual, goes into our present markets to sell his product, he is as a man apart. When the car door is sealed and the shipment begins to roll, the destiny of his season's toil, represented by that shipment, is in other hands than his own. If the product is staples, he will get, as we have seen, a terminal price which reflects fairly correctly the general domestic or world price. His going to market would not change that. If his product is a perishable, his guess or the country assembler's guess of where to ship and what he will get is just as good as any cooperative's guess, because he is several freight days away from market, and under the present marketing system, with no perishables market exchanges in operation, and storage being impossible for any length of time, and with a glut of to-day in any market probably being a dearth of to-morrow in same market, no one knows what he will receive, if anything, as net proceeds. There is much improvement necessary and possible, but the plan therefor should include helping all, whether cooperative or independent. Herein above I have expressed the views of the "Conservative Try-somethings" as to what is needed and how it can be had.

I am a hearty supporter of Mr. Hoover's declaration:

> It is false liberalism that interprets itself into the Government operation of commercial business. Every step of bureaucratizing of business in our country poisons the very roots of liberalism—that is, political equality, free speech, free assembly, free press, and equality of opportunity.

The marketing of farm products is commercial business. It is false liberalism which interprets itself into the marketing of farm products. The business must not be bureaucratized.

The Government can and should serve a useful purpose by announcing definitely that private capital, which will come forward and assist in solving the marketing difficulties of farmers-cooperatives and independents alike—so all in distress will have equal opportunity to gain relief—will neither now nor later meet up with Government competition in business. Until this declaration of public policy is definitely announced by the Congress, private capital will busy itself in other fields of endeavor. The farmers need this help of private capital now. It is too much to hope that private capital will assist cooperatives, as such, in marketing. In certain highly specialized commodity-producing communities, bankers' pools may assist over a temporary "hump," but when the Government went into the farm-banking business, private banking quit it just as far as possible; and because, as we have seen, the Government has to date made a poor job of general relief through its banking; farm-credit distress is still with us. The appeal to private capital must be for installation of a plan which will help the unorganized farmer as well as the cooperative, and on equal terms.

A few facts, as disclosed by the latest Government full review of cooperative statistical data in 1925, will suffice to illustrate why relief to cooperatives, even if given to all cooperatives, would not be general relief to the farmers. Two-thirds of total business handled by cooperative associations cover only the items of grain, dairy products, and livestock. All but 26.7 per cent of all cooperative associations, which have to do with marketing, operate in 12 States only. According to the study of the Federal Trade Commission, completed during the past year, figures repeatedly given crediting cooperatives with marketing bulk of wheat are misleading because they include all wheat delivered to so-called farmers' elevators, which have to do with assembling, but from which each patron's delivery is handled separately. It finds that the data of the many state-wide wheat-pool associations, which had to do with marketing in bulk, show in no season they handled more than 3.4 per cent of the country's total production. Dairying is the biggest cooperative field of endeavor, nearly 20 per cent of total membership of cooperatives being engaged in that activity. About 15 per cent of total cooperative membership is in livestock shipping associations. Tobacco was well represented until recently all the big tobacco cooperatives failed. Thus, also, have the big Minnesota Potato Growers' Exchange and the big Maine Potato Growers' Exchange recently failed. The Equity Cooperative Exchange, United States Grain Growers, the Grain Marketing Co., being all large grain cooperatives, and most of the State wheat pools have failed. Some of the large dairying cooperatives have failed. In fact, the list of failures of big cooperatives in recent years is a long one.

There are some significant findings by the Federal Trade Commission, scattered here and there through its report, such as—

> If the association had confined its activities to centers or districts where a large volume was produced, the overhead and expense of distribution per case would have been materially reduced and sales would have been effected to better advantage.

The foregoing was in explanation of the failure of a cooperative. Then, in speaking of successful cooperatives, we read in the report:

> There are many others also, but the outstanding feature of their success, aside from efficient management, is that they confine their activities to small areas and to localities where the farmers specialize. * * *

These findings reflect my view that the limitations on successful cooperation in producing, standardizing, and preparing for market are particularly climatological and geographical. Big geography soon spells defeat for cooperatives. Special climate insures specialties in food production, induces community specialization, lays the basis for cooperation in production. However, the only advantage to date wrought for themselves by cooperatives in marketing work have been at the production, standardizing, and packaging end—that is, at the farm end.

By advertising specialties and by dealer service a specialty group may pull through the present marketing system and to the retailers' shelves more of its product and cause it to be continually displayed in an attractive manner, and thus increase sales by displacing other farmers' productions, which would otherwise be used, but in the existing wholesale and jobbers' marketing system itself—that is, in the market place—cooperatives have accomplished practically nothing toward much needed economic reforms. In the staples system, as we have seen, there is little of value to accomplish. In all the markets they have tried adding men to the wholesale market place, but the sales returns have not been improved. That is because the system as it exists has always been stronger than any reform ideas these associations have had plus the messengers they sent to Garcia. In total marketing costs to members or patrons, the Federal Trade Commission found few lines where the cooperative total charge was less than independent dealer's charge. All in all, the more one studies the situation, the more it is evident that there are many reasons, among them great diversified farming interests and the large unspecialized producing communities, why cooperative organizations will never include the majority of farmers, and why a broadly geographically spread commodity cooperative is doomed to fail, and why even a state-wide cooperative handling a commodity production of different grades (that is, where the separate sections of the State, due to marked differences in soil or climate or whatnot raise different qualities of the same commodity) is covering too large a field to insure longevity. It really looks as if man's ingenuity in combining growers and endeavoring to hold them together in large-scale marketing units would be baffled by these perplexities of nature and conditions. For these reasons, and many others above mentioned, it appears "we farmers" in any event may as well stick by our guns and continue to look for security for our investment and parity for our dollar by fighting, among other things, any monopoly wherever and whenever its head appears, instead of putting forth any endeavor ourselves to approach monopoly by circumscribing legitimate competition between our producers of different commodities or appreciably different qualities of same commodity produced at widely distant localities under different soil and climatic conditions.

A strong issue in the last presidential campaign was: Shall the Government own and operate any business in competition with its citizens? So far as this issue was dominant, the people voted it should not. Our incoming President may be relied on to carry out that mandate. Any dream that the Government is going into the business of buying and selling farm products, directly or indirectly, must be forever forsaken. As farmers, then, our hope for improvement in marketing (that is, marketing at the city end of the business) lies in encouraging investors to come to our aid by installing proper facilities and by nationwide operation thereof. We have seen that they stand ready when wholly assured of no Government competition. As such further and final assurance to private capital, I believe the unequivocal declaration by the Congress of this public policy in regard to private business is the first most effective step when can be taken for farm relief.

I recommend to the serious consideration of all, the policies and proposals of the "Conservative Try-somethings." Let us do now what can be done. Then there will be plenty of time in which to talk over dreams and all that can not be done.

Have we now cleared away some of the fog obscuring correct viewpoint as to (a) location of farming and farm depression; (b) where aid is needed and by whom; (c) who is and who should be interested in farm relief; (d) the present relation of farming to industry generally; (e) the actual position of the farmer during past seven years in comparison with our city citizens' position; (f) the treatment our farmers have received at the hands of some Government agencies, including the Interstate Commerce Commission and the Federal Farm Loan Board; (g) the logical propriety of tracing effects back to causes and evolving the remedy before endlessly discussing the machinery for application of aid; (h) the inequality resulting in the past from Government promotion of cooperatives and confining possibility of relief to members thereof; (i) the farmers having obtained in the past no end of "quantity legislation" and the need for "quality legislation," and why some past so-called relief legislation was ineffectual in operation; (j) probable results of forcing commodity pooling by continuing legislatively to create machinery for "withholding"; (k) the sufficiency of present farm staples marketing system and the insufficiency of present farm perishables marketing system; (l) the facts as to "flow to market" not affecting price of staples, and the folly of promoting a gigantic or any surplus control or export corporation for farm staples; (m) the extent of exemption of cooperatives from antitrust, monopoly, and restraint of trade laws; (n) the present status of cooperative marketing associations and what they have failed to accomplish; (o) the success and importance of cooperative work at the farm end of the business; (p) the climatological and geographical factors preventing realization of the scheme of federating for control and sale of all or nearly all of any one commodity, much less all or nearly all of all commodities; (q) the unfairness of the Government promoting so-called cooperatives which, under prescribed conditions precedent, can at best represent a small part only of the whole class in distress, and then proffering credit or other aid through such cooperatives to such part only of the class; (r) the necessity of putting credit or other aid extended through governmental agencies within reach of every distressed member of the class—that is, for example, not reducing freight rates for members of certain cooperatives only but equally for all farmers in same geographical situation, which illustration is not far-fetched in applicability when we recall that under the operations of the Federal farm loan system the individual or unorganized farmer with all-sufficient collateral is denied relief while certain specified cooperatives with like collateral may and do obtain it; (s) Government staying out of commercial business, and so declaring as a public policy, thus assuring private capital, which would come to aid in this situation, that it will not meet up with Government competition backed by Federal Treasury money; (t) the absolute necessity for balancing the present wholly unbalanced relationship between farming and industry generally, and some of the vital things not to do and several of the vital things to do to accomplish this, and how to go about procuring them.

CARL SCHURZ

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, 100 years ago, March 2, Carl Schurz was born in Liblar, near Cologne, Germany. Following the revolution of 1848, in which he played a prominent part, he found it necessary to leave his native country.

In later years Mr. Schurz became a resident of Missouri and, among the names of the many illustrious men who have served my State in the United States Senate, will be found that of Carl Schurz. His period of service extended from March 4, 1869, until March 3, 1875. He did not seek reelection but two years later became Secretary of the Interior in the Cabinet of President Hayes, remaining in that position for four years.

Throughout the country the one hundredth anniversary of his birth is being celebrated.

Mr. Carlos Hurd, a writer of note, member of the staff of the St. Louis Post-Dispatch, is the author of a most interesting article concerning this man who played such a prominent part in our history which, under leave granted, I include in my remarks:

CENTENARY OF CARL SCHURZ, GERMAN EXILE WHO ADVISED UNITED STATES PRESIDENTS

By Carlos F. Hurd, of the Post-Dispatch staff

Carl Schurz, adopted American, man without a party, civil-service reformer, anti-imperialist, Senator and Cabinet member, counselor and critic of presidents, will be commemorated widely in the next few days. To-morrow is the centenary of his birth, which was at Liblar, Prussia, March 2, 1829. He died in New York in May, 1906.

Gatherings in 30 cities will be held in honor of the soldier, statesman, and editor who became a resident of St. Louis in 1867, and represented Missouri in the United States Senate from 1869 to 1875.

The chief observance here will be a dinner at Hotel Jefferson Tuesday night, March 12, arranged by the Steuben Society in conjunction with other organizations. Speakers will be Richard Einsiedel, managing editor of the Westliche Post, which Schurz once directed; Oscar W. Burg, head of the Steuben Society; Luther Ely Smith, attorney and student of history; Edgar R. Rombauer, attorney and son of an intimate associate of Schurz, and Richard Bartholdt, former Congressman.

GENERAL IN UNION ARMY

As a youth of 19, Carl Schurz took part in the German revolutionary movement of 1848, and with others of the forty-eighters was compelled to flee to Switzerland. He returned to Germany secretly in 1850, and aided in the escape of a comrade, Gottfried Kinkel, from the fortress of Spandau. In Paris he was a newspaper correspondent, and in London he was a teacher, before he came to the United States in 1852, settling first in Milwaukee. For his activity in the campaign of 1860, he was made minister to Spain by President Lincoln, but he resigned to join the Union Army, in which he became a major general, having important part in the Chancellorsville, Gettysburg, and Chattanooga engagements.

After the close of the Civil War, Schurz was delegated by President Johnson to investigate conditions in the States of the late Confederacy. His report, made public in December, 1866, soon became a powerful weapon of the Republican congressional majority against Johnson's southern policy. Schurz held that national control of the Southern States was necessary, and that the Government should announce its purpose to continue such control until free labor should be fully developed and firmly established in the South. He said the negro should have the ballot, and that negro suffrage should be made a condition precedent to readmitting the Southern States to the Union.

DIFFERED WITH GENERAL GRANT

Schurz's report was much less favorable to the South than one made about the same time by Gen. U. S. Grant, who made a brief tour of four Southern States, and who reported that, though "small garrisons" might be needed for a time, the South had accepted the results of the war in good faith. Within a few years, the positions of Schurz and Grant on the southern question were nearly reversed, and Schurz became a champion of the South and an opponent of the military control maintained by Grant as President.

Newspaper work in Washington, as correspondent of Horace Greeley's New York Tribune, and in Detroit, where he founded the Post, preceded the coming of Schurz to St. Louis. His St. Louis career has been described by the late Denton J. Snider, philosopher and writer of books, himself a newcomer in St. Louis in the period after the war.

"Undoubtedly," Snider wrote, "the German element of the city had prepared the way for him, inasmuch as he at once became a chief editor of the Westliche Post, then probably the most influential German newspaper of the country. This step was only preparatory to the greater ambition, namely, the Missouri Senatorship, which was foreseen to lie in the hands of the Germans, could they but find the proper man.

TO UNITED STATES SENATE IN 1869

"He was elected Senator by the Missouri Legislature in 1869, and his six-year term was the highest fulfillment of himself as well as of the German era of St. Louis. He was then 40 years old, at his best intellectually and physically. He never quite got rid of a German accent, though he improved much; he would still Teutonize strongly certain words like 'poobleek.' His English ran correct and fluent enough, but when it came to the more subtle figures of poetry, he could not command them from their first gushing sources. Still I am inclined to think that the most wonderful and lasting part of his career was Schurz the orator.

"And he always gave a genuine moral uplift, not very congenial with practical politics, even if in his own career he turned now and then a surprising political somersault. For with all his moralism, he could round a sharp corner in a pinch. But nobody ever justly thought him corrupt or only a timeserver, even when he served time a little.

"Schurz said that he acquired his mastery of oratorical English chiefly from the Letters of Junius; I hold this deeply characteristic of Schurz. Junius is the English classic of invective and malediction, with which Schurz had too much affinity. Junius only intensified in Schurz a mental quality of which nature had given him more than enough. He was an innate fault finder; he confesses to a natural love of contention.

BROKE UP HIS OWN PARTY

"In Missouri his was the hand that shivered into fragments his own party which had elected him Senator, and so completely did it fall asunder that it could not again for a generation win a victory in the State. He was right in opposing disfranchisement, which ought never to have been enacted, certainly not in the way it was. Missouri had shown herself overwhelmingly loyal to the Union from the start without disfranchisement, which thus could have no true meaning outside of hatred and corruption.

"Accordingly Schurz, the German interloper, as he was often called, soon fell out with the old leaders who had sustained the battle of emancipation, and of the Union, Governor Brown, General Blair, the hero of Camp Jackson, and especially his fellow Senator, Charles D. Drake. Well might the returned Confederates erect to Schurz a monument, for through him they, a decided minority, won political control of the State, and kept it for decades. To be sure, he cut his own throat in the process, a feat which he succeeded in performing more than once; and he witnessed his own triumphant selfnegation when he was succeeded in 1875 by Cockrell, a former Confederate General.

LOOKED LIKE NEW ENGLANDER

"Schurz was often the lofty stimulating moralist, but he could drop back into the platitudinous moralizer, especially when hard pushed for a stop-gap to fill out some vacancy in his oratory. From this side of him came his sympathy with New England, mental and even physical, for to me Schurz looked more like a Yankee than a typical German, being meager-fleshed, thin-faced, and with a glance of Puritanic severity almost cutting from behind those blue-eyed spectacles of his. He never appeared to me the burly Teuton, still less the jolly Rhinelander given over to infinite gustation and imbibition, though Schurz was from the Rhine, and could brighten up in praise of its Johannisberger and its other appetitive delicacies."

In the Senate, Schurz became a leader of the moderate Republicans in opposing some coercive measures proposed for the South, and he had a part in defeating a plan for keeping a minority State government in power in Georgia. He joined the Republican majority in supporting legislation for the enforcement of the fourteenth and fifteenth amendments. He voted against legislation to suppress the Ku-Klux Klan, on constitutional grounds and those of policy. He favored universal amnesty.

In 1870 Schurz headed what became known as the Liberal Republican movement in Missouri, which demanded the removal of war disabilities. This movement elected B. Gratz Brown governor. It became the basis of the national Liberal Republican convention of 1872 in Cincinnati, which nominated Horace Greeley for President. Joseph Pulitzer, an active figure in the Missouri Liberal Republican movement, was one of the secretaries of the Cincinnati convention, held six years before he founded the Post-Dispatch.

RÔLE IN 1872 CONVENTION

Schurz was made president of the convention, a position in which he exercised comparatively little influence on the nominations. He favored Charles Francis Adams for the presidential nomination, and frowned on the slogan, "Anybody to beat Grant," as a paltry and unworthy expression. The convention nominated Greeley and Governor Brown, who were later indorsed by the Democracy, and were overwhelmingly defeated by Grant and Wilson. A feature of the campaign was Thomas Nast's famous cartoon series in Harper's Weekly in which Greeley's bucolic whiskers and Schurz's sharp features and spectacles were prominent. Brown was never caricatured by Nast as a person. He was represented by a tag, bearing his name, attached to Greeley's coat tails.

The presidential year of 1876, the year following Schurz's retirement from the Senate, found him back in the councils of the Republican Party, working for the nomination of Benjamin H. Bristow and against James G. Blaine. When Rutherford B. Hayes was nominated, Schurz urged him to strong commitments for sound money, civil-service reform, and restoration of local self-government in the South. Hayes's response was sufficiently satisfactory to make Schurz his earnest supporter.

Schurz expressed lack of confidence in the Democratic nominee, Samuel J. Tilden. He counseled a just settlement of the Tilden-Hayes election contest, and he approved and defended the settlement made by the Electoral Commission. He advised Hayes as to a full list of Cabinet appointments, and himself accepted the post of Secretary of the Interior.

CONSTANT FIGHT IN OFFICE

He found service in this department, as he described it later, "a constant fight with the sharks that surround the Indian Bureau, the Land Office, the Pension and Patent Offices." He was obliged to engage in controversy with Mrs. Helen Hunt Jackson and other friends of the Indians, who demanded the return of the Poncas from Indian Territory to Dakota, whence they had been removed under the Grant administration. Schurz held that, whatever wrongs the Poncas had suffered, no good would be done by returning them to Dakota, where they would be in danger of attack by their old enemies, the warlike Sioux.

He had not remained a Missourian long after leaving the Senate. New York was his home much of the time thereafter. Through the 1880 campaign he remained in the Republican camp, opposing the Grant third-term movement, supporting Garfield vigorously, and giving him much advice, one detail of which was that Garfield should not let Chauncey Ives Filley of St. Louis have any part in his administration. After leaving the Cabinet, he was for several years editor of the New York Evening Post, and contended in its columns for civil service reform to remedy the abuses of the spoils system. Legislation establishing this reform was first enacted by Congress in the middle of the Garfield-Arthur administration.

Schurz endeavored to prevent the nomination of Blaine for President in 1884, and became a supporter of Grover Cleveland. His speeches in the campaign were detailed recitals of the charges that Blaine, as Speaker of the House, had been gainfully connected with railroad enterprises depending on congressional favor.

Schurz stuck to Cleveland in the 1888 and 1892 campaigns, and continued to advise him, particularly as to the upholding of civil service reform. The issue of imperialism, against which Schurz had contended when President Grant proposed to annex Santo Domingo, appeared again in the proposals for attaching the Hawaiian Islands to this Nation. Schurz uttered many warnings against Hawaiian annexation, and Cleveland used his official power to retard it, although the popular desire increasingly favored it.

When the Bland-Teller free-silver forces captured the Democratic Party in the mid-nineties, Schurz's allegiance to the principle of sound money drove him back into the Republican Party. His speech in Chicago was probably the most widely circulated of the McKinley campaign literature. The conclusion of this speech was especially picturesque:

"Mr. Bryan has a taste for scriptural illustration. He will remember how Christ was taken up on a high mountain, and was promised all the glories of the world if he would fall down and worship the devil. He will also remember what Christ answered. So the tempter now takes the American people up the mountain and says, 'I will take from you half of your debts if you will worship me.' But brave old 'Uncle Sam' rises up in all his dignity, manly pride, and honest wrath, and speaks in thunder tones, 'Get thee behind me, Satan. For it is written that thou shalt worship the God of truth, honor, and righteousness, and Him alone shalt thou serve.' This will be the voice of the American people on the 3d of November."

The issue of imperialism soon came between Schurz and President McKinley, and Schurz opposed the administration's policy in many speeches and articles. In 1900 he first favored an independent Republican nomination as a means of beating McKinley, and when this plan failed, he was driven to support Bryan, though toward the end of the campaign he had no hope that McKinley's reelection could be prevented.

Because of Theodore Roosevelt's attitude on imperialism and his "exceptionally bellicose temperament," Schurz refused to support him for Governor of New York in 1898, although they had been fellow crusaders for civil service reform. In 1904, the last campaign of Schurz's life, he backed Judge Parker against Roosevelt.

One of the last letters was written to President Roosevelt in September, 1905, to congratulate him on his successful negotiation of peace between Russia and Japan, which Schurz termed "one of the most meritorious and brilliant achievements of our age." Roosevelt could not resist the temptation to reply that if he had been "one of the conventional type of peace advocates," he could not have rendered this service. Schurz wrote him again, not so much to keep up the argument as to suggest that the President take action to bring about an international agreement for limitation of armaments.

AMERICAN ARCHEOLOGISTS FIND WEALTH OF HISTORICAL EVIDENCE IN NEW MEXICO

Mr. MORROW. Mr. Speaker, under consent given to extend my remarks I desire to insert in the RECORD an article published in the Washington Star under date of December 29, 1928, entitled "America's Archeology Worth Bragging About—Discoveries in New Mexico Show Ceramic Work of 400 B. C.—Every State Has Prehistoric Remains."

As this article applies directly to my State of New Mexico and is of great historic value in the study of archeology, I am desirous that the same be inserted in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

[From the Washington Star, December 30, 1928]

AMERICA'S ARCHEOLOGY WORTH BRAGGING ABOUT—DISCOVERIES IN NEW MEXICO SHOW CERAMIC WORK OF 400 B. C.—EVERY STATE HAS PREHISTORIC REMAINS

By Ralph V. D. Magoffin

The perennial joke of Rome shows no tendency to die. Nearly every tourist follows the dictum, "Wait and see the Colosseum by moonlight"—all those visitors who, touristwise, have not interlunarily fitted to go down to see the Colosseum by moonlight. The guides then spread their sayings over Rome. About 90 per cent of all the tourists, be they from France, Germany, England, or America, all say, or are said to have said, "Yes, the Colosseum is weirdly beautiful, but how much more wonderful it would all be if only they had the same moon here that we have at home!" That is the true spirit at all events of what is known popularly as the "patriotic brag."

Many are the stories that are current of what Americans traveling abroad have said in exuberant praise of things in this country. Perhaps the best one, with "reverse English," is that told of the German professor of geology who visited this country some years ago. He was shown many things and had them explained to him fulsomely. But when he walked out from El Tovar to the edge of the Grand Canyon, he lost his power of expression for a time. When he could speak, he said, "Well, here is something that not even an American can exaggerate."

BRAGGING CALLED GENERAL

Now we do not brag any more about our things than foreigners do about theirs. It is only that most of us can not talk in his own language on equal terms with a foreigner. But those who can say that he talks just as much about money as we do, the only difference being that he talks of it in smaller denominations. He stresses the scenery of his own country more than we ours, and when it comes to comment on the superior cultural, historic, and artistic glories which his country possesses over that of any other, then, really, we can not hold a candle to him.

Perhaps there is one stage more than others, however, from which we have allowed ourselves to be "backed off the boards." That is the stage on which archeology has played its part. There is a reason for it. We came into the field of scientific archeology centuries later than did certain of the European countries. Besides that, the ancient dead were much more numerous in India, Mesopotamia and the Mediterranean area than they were over here, and having had there a more or less continued population more of the ancient monuments and artifacts remained there than here.

But the most pertinent fact is that the peoples who now live on the same sites or in the same general localities claim to be, as they in some part are, the descendants of the earlier peoples and the heirs of their civilizations. We do not claim to be either the descendants or the heirs of Western Hemisphere autochthons, because we do not yet know whether there were any, or of Mayan Aztec, mound builder or Indian aborigines. Therefore we have not an equal amount at stake, and we have not had to defend atrocities, inhumanities, or even the peculiarities of our local forebears.

BEGIN TO STUDY INDIANS.

We have begun, however, to realize that there are in this Western Hemisphere antiquities of civilizations that go back centuries farther than we had ever supposed. It seems to have been the Germans who first waked us up to the fact. It was nearly 75 years ago that their professors and students of antiquity began to study the American Indian.

The splendid example of Indian basketry, pottery, weapons, artifacts, and skeletal remains which the Germans obtained in this country and took back to Berlin and other places gave to Germany a museum of American archeology better than anything there was here. It took years of hard work before the scientists of the Smithsonian Institution forged ahead with the collection which outranked all others.

American archeology began here, as might be expected, gradually, accidentally, fortuitously. Our early colonists tried rather to avoid the Indian arrowheads than to hunt for them. But, as the red man diminished in numbers before the white man, he gained more than proportionately in sentiment; or, to put it badly, as the Indian gave up taking the scalp lock, he gained a halo. Arrowheads, as they were ploughed up, became the nucleus of thousands of private collections, many of which have now been concentrated in local museums.

SPECIMENS IN MANY STATES.

The mounds and earthworks in South Carolina, Kentucky, Ohio, Wisconsin, and Minnesota became objects of archeological and historical study and the thousands of bone, flint, shell, pearl, red sandstone, copper, and polished stone artifacts of useful or ornamental styles were collected, compared, tabulated, published, and localized.

The potholes in the rocks of the Susquehanna, the marks on the walls of caves in the Ozarks, the burials in the mounds of southern Illinois, the serpentine and other animal shapes of low mounds in hundreds of Midwestern localities came in for their share of private, then local, then popular interest.

The Spaniard overran Mexico and Peru before we were ready to start west of the Alleghenies. He seized all the gold in sight, and even made long marches up into New Mexico and thereabouts hunting for the fabled gold of the Seven Cities of Cibola. But he was worse off than Goethe, who walked in Rome over the ancient forum without knowing it.

The Spaniard not only did not know he was marching over the graves and monuments of bygone civilization, but he did not care. But now, we have begun to know it, and we care a great deal. It might easily be forgiven if we began to "talk much bigger" than we do about the splendid remains of the early inhabitants of this hemisphere.

RICH FINDS IN MEXICO

There is plenty of room for pride in the fine pyramids, the wonderful decorative relief carvings, the artistic beauty of the turquoise mosaics; in the perfect naturalism of carved animal forms and the meticulous skill of the workmen who made thousands of miniature gods and figurines in clay, stone, and gold, with which the culture sites of the pre-Aztec Mayas in Yucatan and Guatemala abound.

Here the fine work of late by Morley, Morris, and others under the Carnegie Institution, of Washington, should come in for more than a meed of praise. The four great tomes issued a few weeks ago by the Government of Mexico as its contribution to the Twenty-third International Congress of Americanists, which met in New York, have illustrations of the monumental remains in Mexico that are nothing short of astounding.

There are prehistoric remains in every one of the States. In many States there are archeological societies which have helped to gather the local antiquities into museums. It is, however, in the Southwest that lie buried the greatest reservoirs of America's prehistory. It was this dimly apprehended fact that led the Archeological Institute of America more than 20 years ago to found its School of American Archeology at Santa Fe, in the heart of the region of American antiquities.

From that school as a center, under the wise and able direction of Dr. Edgar L. Hewett, now also the head of the department of archeology and anthropology in the University of New Mexico, explorations have marked numberless future sites for work, and excavations have laid bare many early pueblos. In this work many of our universities and schools have also engaged, among which the work of Harvard and Phillips Andover particularly, under Kidder, and of the University of Minnesota deserve special mention.

The most remarkable of the prehistoric cliff-dwelling sites in this country are in the side canyons of the Mancos River in southwestern Colorado. Hundreds of these interesting villages are inside the limits of the 49,126 acres which have been set aside by the Government as the Mesa Verde National Park. The names of Bandelier and W. H. Holmes, for many years Chief of the Bureau of Ethnology, are linked forever with the early days of scientific work in the sites of the cliff dwellers.

The other type of prehistoric sites, which are many times more numerous than the cliff dwellings, is the pueblo, a large-scale community house. New Mexico and Arizona are full of them. They dot the tops of innumerable mesas; they line the side valleys and canyons of the Rio Grande; there are hundreds in the great Pajarito Plateau on which the Santa Fe is situated.

DATE BACK CENTURIES

The Hopi villages, Pueblo Bonito and Chettro Ketl in Chaco Canyon, Gran Quivira and the Rito de los Frijoles, to single some out of many, are the real things, and they date back centuries before such tourist show places as Puye and Taos.

The same question arises in connection with the excavation of ancient culture sites in our Southwest as did, and to some extent still does, arise in the Mediterranean, Near and Far East, prehistoric centers. How old are they, and how does one know?

The protagonists of the Maya culture in Yucatan now have certain dates that reach back before the birth of Christ. So have the excavators in the pueblo sites in New Mexico. The dates of the former are arrived at by the deciphering of the Maya chronological inscriptions; those of the latter by comparative ceramics.

It has come to be the most widely admitted fact in archeological discovery that the finds of pottery, both whole and in shreds, give the most exact chronological yardstick that science knows. It comes much closer in its figures than does geology, and it reaches back centuries and millennia before there was writing of any kind.

EXCAVATION IN NEW MEXICO

An account of a single excavation, choosing one out of many, ought to do more to explain and clarify the methods and results of a dig on United States soil than any amount of argument. By good chance such an excavation was conducted last summer in the Mimbres Valley in southwestern New Mexico. It was done by a joint expedition of the University of Minnesota, under Prof. Albert E. Jenks, and the School of American Research at Santa Fe, under Wesley Bradfield.

That part of the work which dealt with the chronological data from pottery was under the charge of Mr. Bradfield, perhaps now the leading authority in this country on ceramic chronology.

The School of American Research is particularly well equipped to do singly or in a joint enterprise such an American excavation. Director Hewett is the best all-around American archeologist we have, and he has also the necessary knowledge of a comparative kind gained in actual work and surveys in the foreign fields of Mesopotamia, Palestine, Egypt, Africa, Greece, and Italy. In Kenneth M. Chapman the school at Santa Fe has the best expert on the art and decorative side of ceramics and in Wesley Bradfield the leading authority on chronological ceramic data, based on provenience, technique, and material.

DIG IN CAMERON CREEK AREA

The site dug last summer in the Cameron Creek district of the Mimbres Valley is an extraordinary one. It is remote enough to have remained virtually untouched, although from the ruins one can see Fort Bayard in the distance outlined in white against the base of the mountain range.

Naturally, the rooms nearest the surface were of the later periods. At first one might wonder why some of these later period surface rooms were so clearly marked out as ceremonial rooms, coming, as one likely would, from cliff dwellings or pueblos where the ceremonial kivas (or rooms) were underground and at a lower level than the living rooms.

But when one is taken into an underground pitroom where objects of a ceremonial character, that proved its use, were found, and is shown the prior, older entrance when that pitroom was used as a living room, the transition from house to ceremonial use, as the levels of the pueblo rise, begins to grow clear.

Cameron Creek, which runs through the Mimbres Valley, shows considerable erosion below the recently excavated pueblo. The south end of the pueblo was recognized by the thousands of wall stones which had been carried away by the creek when in flood. When the excavation began, it was found that virtually nothing remained of the surface houses except the foundations. What had not been carried away by the water had been taken, after the abandonment of the surface rooms, for the construction of other rooms toward the north.

DISCOVERS ANCIENT GRAVE

There happened to be about 50 or more visitors the day the first pit-burial was found. It was under the floor of a pitroom of the middle or early middle period of the pueblo. It was the grave of an adult woman. On the bone of her left arm above the elbow were four shell bracelets. Long strings of beads and two beautifully carved bracelets of shell came to light at the bottom of the pit to the right of the skull. Four broken bowls and pots were on the floor of the room at the right.

The bowls were broken, as was expected. In the graves and tombs in the Mediterranean area the pottery buried with the dead is usually found unbroken. In the American pueblos, after the body was buried face downward and in a contracted kneeling or crouching position, a large bowl was purposely broken down over the head and shoulders, and the other bowls, for the most part, were either broken or had a hole punched in them. It took nearly four hours to excavate the small pit grave just described, because the fine gravel had to be scooped or dusted up very carefully and then every cupful of it sifted.

ASHES IN FIRE PITS

The second level was found about 7 feet below the surface. The rooms were much deeper and the work of excavation, therefore, necessarily was much slower than in the surface rooms. Some of the hardest work was experienced in clearing out the rooms at the south end of the West House mound. Most of July was passed in this section of the pueblo. In one of the latest used rooms the fire pits were found still full of ashes. The floor was covered with scattered pottery. The stubs of the posts which had been used to hold up the roof were also brought to light.

Late in July two of the students from the University of Minnesota were assigned to the excavation of a certain room which gave evidence of having been an abandoned storeroom. These students had the luck of the week. They came upon a real nest of skeletons, 19 in all, all with bowls over their heads in the usual fashion. The bodies had been buried in this abandoned room during the course of several centuries. Many of the bodies had been buried with their necklaces of shell beads, and about half were still wearing their shell bracelets on the bones of their arms, in every case on the left arm.

REVEAL THOUSANDS OF RELICS

Mr. Bradfield was fortunate in one of his earlier finds, in 1925, in the Cameron Creek district. He found what seemed to be a stone slab. This, when freed, was found to be very thin and to be the cover of a jar, or olla, of the early corrugated type, the rim of which was exactly 1 inch above the floor level. It had been used as a storage bin.

The bowls and sherds found in this Cameron Creek excavation in the Mimbres will run into the thousands. But more important is the fact that in them Mr. Bradfield has obtained practically a complete ceramic line running back as far as the beginning of the Christian era. Most of the bowls are of the black and white type, the type in which the Pueblo Indians outdid the better-known Greek artists. Many are of polychrome ware. The paintings show many interesting life forms, and the highly developed linear, circular, zigzag, and geometric designs which were later than the life forms.

One painting of a date early in the Christian era is of a hunter carrying in a deer which he has killed. Another gives a faithful picture of the now nearly extinct Rocky Mountain spotted quail. Another, and one of the most interesting, is of a rabbit inside the curve of the new moon. The "Rabbit in the Moon" is a fairy tale still current in the pueblos to-day.

RESULTS OF EXCAVATION

The main facts which form the excavation last summer in the Mimbres Valley-Cameron Creek dig are the following:

(1) The pottery shows the highest development of design known in the American Southwest.

(2) The pottery extends over a period that exceeds 2,000 years from the early experimental stages of ceramics, probably inside the horizon of "Basket Maker 3" (Kidder) to the time of the abandonment of the pueblo.

(3) The development of room and house from the upper floor levels with upright posts and brush walls down through the circular and rectangular underground pitrooms tallies with the chronology of the pottery.

(4) The proof is found of the beginning of the communal room in the underground circular house, which extended then to the rectangular underground ceremonial room, which was entered through the roof.

BURIALS UNDER FLOORS

(5) Burials were found only under the floors of rooms occupied in the middle period.

(6) The shell bracelets and many of the shells for beads, identified as provenient in the Gulf of California, prove early commercial connections with the West and South.

(7) The remains of corn, squash, and beans found in storage ollas, or in caches, give some of the foods of the Pueblo Indians in the Mimbres.

(8) The skeletons give an average height of the early inhabitants as from 6 feet 5 inches to 5 feet 7 inches.

(9) No European articles were found in the upper levels of the pueblo. Therefore the site had been abandoned before the arrival of the Spaniards in the sixteenth century.

The evidence throws the earliest ceramic pieces back to a date approximately 400 B. C. Surely this excavation is an important piece of early American scientific work. Too much credit can not be given to the joint expedition of 1928 in the Mimbres Valley of New Mexico of the University of Minnesota under Professor Jenks and the Archeological Institute's School of American Research under the able hands of Wesley Bradfield.

BUTTER SUBSTITUTES AND THE TARIFF

Mr. SELVIG. Mr. Speaker and Members of the House, the Committee on Agriculture on May 11, 1928, reported favorably H. R. 10958, a bill to amend the definition of oleomargarine to impose a tax on butter substitutes. There was no minority report filed. On February 21, 1929, after a hearing held on January 18, 1929, the Committee on Rules favorably reported this bill to the House (H. Res. 333, Rept. 2625).

It is apparent at this stage of the session, when appropriation bills and conference reports have the right of way, that this important bill will not come before the House for action, due to the inevitable jam at the close of the session.

This is a source of great regret to the many Members who desired that the House should express its judgment regarding it during the present session of Congress.

It is a misfortune that this bill has not been considered by the membership of the House and voted upon. It simply postpones the day when there must be an end to the intolerable situation which confronts both the dairy interests of the country and the consumers as well.

Mr. Speaker, I desire briefly to explain this bill and to point out to the farmers of the United States the menace to them of the increasing importations of vegetable oils. I do this now in order to urge consideration of this important measure as a part of the farm-relief program to be taken up at the special session to be called early in April. This bill should be included as a part of that program.

PURPOSE OF H. R. 10958

Now, Mr. Speaker, what does H. R. 10958 propose to accomplish? Let me answer that question. This bill merely extends the definition of oleomargarine. It simply brings in under the scope of the oleomargarine act passed 43 years ago products colored in the semblance of butter. It merely includes such new products which scientific knowledge has invented which have been introduced into the markets of the country since the original oleomargarine law was passed.

The reason for urging the enactment of this bill is because the courts have ruled that the so-called cooking compounds do not come under the present provisions of that law. This bill simply adds to the regular oleomargarine law, broadens the present law, to protect the consumers and producers of butter against another substitute.

BUTTER SUBSTITUTES

It is generally admitted that these nut margarines, these so-called cooking compounds, are made in imitation of butter or in semblance of butter. Ample evidence in support of this contention was presented in the hearings both before the Agricultural Committee and the Rules Committee.

Even the opponents of this bill do not contend that these nut margarines are as good as butter. It is admitted that they are made largely from coconut oil, for the most part imported from the Philippine Islands duty free.

Nobody contends that they contain the health-giving vitamins that set butter apart as a food in a class by itself. If this be true, why should not these products be classed as oleomargarine?

The deceptiveness of the product is obvious to all. This deceptiveness is such that even an expert can not determine from appearance, taste, or odor the difference between butter, oleomargarine, and the nut-margarine product under discussion this afternoon.

Why do they try to imitate butter? This is one question that has not been satisfactorily answered by the opponents of this legislation.

If it is the honest interest of the manufacturers to have these nut margarines used as a shortening product, why do they in every way try to have them imitate butter?

Lard and shortening products sell at 11 or 12 cents per pound. They contain only about 1 per cent of moisture. The substitutes, which the bill recommended by the Agricultural Committee would classify as oleomargarine, are not sold as a shortening, which sells at 11 or 12 cents per pound, but are made to look and taste like butter in order to command a better price.

BILL RECOMMENDED BY COMMITTEE

Many, if not all, of the Members of this House are sincerely and vitally concerned with the welfare of our farmers. I am not going to make a speech on the general subject of farm relief now, but I want to point out that the distinguished members of the great Agricultural Committee of this House, after giving this bill full consideration, recommend it to pass. The members of that committee can well be called the guardians of the agricultural interests of our country. No one who is interested in the most important problem confronting the United States, which, as I have frequently reiterated before this body, is the agricultural problem, needs to apologize for trying to safeguard this vital interest. He should be proud to give his support to every legitimate measure for the benefit of that great industry.

To safeguard the dairy industry and to aid agriculture demands that these nut margarines should be classed under the law as oleomargarine. They are manufactured by the same identical process as butter. They are sold as a substitute for butter. What justification is there for permitting them to remain outside that law?

Why should the farmers of the United States submit to having the legitimate products of agriculture come into unfair competition with the product of foreign vegetable oils?

MUST SAFEGUARD DAIRYING

The dairying industry of the United States must be safeguarded. It is one of the most important sources of the Nation's agricultural income. In many regions it is the only branch of farming that yields anything like a favorable return upon time, capital, and labor invested.

The nut-margarine business strikes a body blow at dairying. The welfare of our Nation depends upon safeguarding the dairy industry. Dairying, unlike many other branches of farming, conserves soil fertility. Wise statesmanship will increasingly stress this point.

We must not lose sight of the fact that butter and milk are superior foods, indispensable for children. The vitamins in these foods are necessities. We are not thinking simply dollars and cents in urging that favorable consideration be given this measure. To my mind we touch upon a vital problem of our country's welfare.

Representatives of all the principal national farm organizations testified in favor of giving our dairy farmers this protection. Evidence was presented which showed not only the widespread distribution of these so-called cooking compounds sold in semblance of butter, but that there has been a tremendous increase in their production.

VEGETABLE-OIL IMPORTATIONS

We are facing a condition, not a theory. Imports of vegetable oils amounting in value to at least $150,000,000 this year are in direct competition with our livestock producers.

These are conservative figures. Coconut-oil production in the Philippines now runs around 1,000,000,000 pounds per year. More than half—530,000,000 pounds—in 1928 was shipped into the United States, replacing American farm-produced oils and fats.

The significant fact in this connection is that the so-called cooking compounds are manufactured principally from vegetable oils imported free of duty.

With both parties pledged to support relief for agriculture, the provisions of this bill should be considered and adopted during the special session.

This bill will aid our farmers. No one who has given it thought and study can deny that fact.

Congress and the new administration have an unprecedented opportunity of making 1929 an outstanding year from the standpoint of rehabilitating agriculture. To have 1929 go into history as a great year for the farmers would redound to the permanent credit and record both of the Seventy-first Congress and of the administration under the leadership of President Hoover.

To enact this bill as a part of a more comprehensive farm program will be a noteworthy step. It should be done.

TARIFF REVISION NEEDED

Promised tariff revision in the interests of the farmers is to be undertaken at the special session, in addition to the beginning, at least, of the solution of the much-vexed farm surplus problem. Something ought, also, to be done to lower the transportation rates on agricultural products. The further development of our inland waterways should be fostered. All of these measures are vital and should be given consideration.

These are all important phases of the farm problem. They are worthy of our best efforts for their solution. I shall not at this time discuss all of these problems, but wish to present in somewhat greater detail the menace of the increasing imports of vegetable oils.

The acquisition of the Philippine Islands 30 years ago, a close student of our agricultural industry recently said, is costing the American farmers at least $150,000,000 this year. These figures are conservative. Others say that the real cost is several times that much.

PHILIPPINE IMPORTS

I stated a few minutes ago that coconut-oil production in the Philippines now runs around 1,000,000,000 pounds per year, and that half of this is shipped into the United States. In this country coconut oil replaces American farm-produced oils and fats, pound for pound, and forces the higher-priced American products out of the United States into the cheaper foreign trade. This coconut oil goes principally to the soap and oleomargarine manufacturers and thus competes with the producers of lard, butter, cottonseed, soy beans, peanuts, flax, and even, to some extent, with corn.

Of the 575,000,000 pounds imported in 1927, 88 per cent came from the Philippines.

How does this vast importation affect the American farmers? One had but to listen to the testimony presented before the Ways and Mean Committee to learn of this. All the witnesses were agreed that bringing 575,000,000 pounds of vegetable oils into the country simply takes away the market from 575,000,000 pounds of oils and fats produced on American farms, or almost 10 per cent of all the farm oils and fats in the United States.

As was stated in a recent study of this problem, the native who harvests cocoanuts in the jungles of Luzon is thus a considerable factor in holding down prices of hogs in the Middle West, of soy beans in Illinois and North Carolina, of cotton and peanuts in the South, of flax in the Northwest, and of dairy products all over the United States. At least 75 per cent of all the farmers in the Nation are affected in a substantial way by this form of competition.

VEGETABLE OIL IMPORTS ARE INCREASING

What will happen in 5, 10, or 15 years hence? The producers of the country have a right to ask this question. This we know: The Philippine coconut industry is expanding at a tremendous rate. It is estimated that within five years the Philippine coconut-oil production will be above 1,600,000,000 pounds and above 2,000,000,000 pounds by 1939. Something must be done to stop this flood of oil.

The tariff on vegetable oil will be of no avail unless it is applied to oil coming from the Philippines, as well as to oil produced in foreign countries. This was emphasized in the tariff speech which I gave on May 6, 1928. It is the most important single point in the entire range of the farm-tariff situation.

What is the situation with respect to the total production of fats and oils in the United States? A recent study by Mr. Herman Steen, which appeared in Wallace's Farmer, gives interesting information on this point. I quote:

> In 1927 American farmers produced 7,643,000,000 pounds of all fats and oils.

The importations into the United States of vegetable oils in 1927 included 575,000,000 pounds of coconut oil and 478,000,000 pounds of other vegetable oils. They came in because they are produced by cheap labor, principally from the Tropics. Our exports of lard during the same year amounted to 702,000,000 pounds. This was sold in a market that tends to be lower than our domestic market.

TARIFF PROTECTION NEEDED

In my testimony before the Ways and Means Committee on the agricultural tariff schedules I stated:

The American farmer can not compete with imported agricultural products created through cheap foreign labor and lower standards of living, nor can he compete in foreign markets for the sale of his products at world price levels arising out of foreign-production standards and foreign-buying power.

Tariff protection is the key to the situation. The imposition of tariff duties is an essential requirement in rounding out our protective-tariff policy to include all competitive agricultural imports.

I will place in the RECORD the principles which are offered as suggestions in formulating a protective-tariff policy for the benefit of agriculture. These are quoted from my testimony presented to the Ways and Means Committee on January 24, 1929:

PRINCIPLES PERTAINING TO PROTECTION FOR AGRICULTURE

1. The fundamental reason why increased duties are requested for these agricultural products is to preserve the American market for American products.

2. The increases in duties are asked for in order to place agricultural products on a basis of parity with industry. A general increase in all of the tariff schedules included in our present tariff act will nullify benefits to the farmers in case the farmers' costs of production and living expenses are thereby materially increased. Consideration should be given to present duties which greatly increase the farmers' costs in order to reduce them or to eliminate them.

3. The increases recommended in this presentation have for their purpose the vitally important policy of giving adequate protection to those branches of the agricultural industry which make for more extensive diversification.

4. In granting increased protection to the livestock and dairy farmers the policy of conservation of soil fertility is supported.

5. It will be observed that increased duties are recommended in some schedules where the imports are small in proportion to the domestic production. These imports, even though limited, unduly disturb the price level to a far greater extent than their volume would justify.

6. Increasing the duties on farm products which are now on a domestic basis will be of direct benefit to the producers as this will tend to divert production from the so-called "surplus" crops and thereby effect an improvement in the foreign markets for the surplus which is now sold abroad. It has been well said that the much discussed surplus does not come chiefly from American farms. We import our surplus.

7. Agriculture is now more desperately faced with foreign importations than is industry. Capital furnished by United States financiers is invested in foreign lands, where, with the cheap labor available, it is used to increase the annual production of competitive agricultural commodities which find their way into the United States.

8. An agricultural tariff policy should be formulated which will encourage the domestic production of commodities to supply our needs instead of depending upon foreign countries for competitive imports.

9. Such a policy should recognize that imports of competitive agricultural products displace millions of acres of lands, which in turn displace thousands of farmers.

10. Such a policy should encourage the replacing of imported farm products with native products as far as possible. This would tend to draw increased quantities of raw materials from our American farmers.

11. The American farmer can not compete with imported agricultural products created through cheap foreign labor and lower standards of living, nor can he compete in foreign markets for the sale of his products at world price levels arising out of foreign-production standards and foreign-buying power.

12. In agriculture, production can not be controlled. A wise governmental policy can, however, encourage changes in the trends of production. Such a policy should be put forth to give protection to those agricultural products which in the long run it would be to the interests of our country to produce enough of to meet domestic needs.

These principles, if followed in the forthcoming tariff bill, will assist in rehabilitating agriculture.

Again coming back to the vegetable-oils importations, about one-third of these importations is animal and fish oils and fats, including lard, tallow, fish oil, and whale oil. The total comes to 2,781,000,000 pounds, about 2,000,000,000 of which is lard.

The second group is vegetable oil, totaling 2,766,000,000 pounds. Cottonseed oil makes up about two-thirds of this and the balance is soy-bean oil, linseed oil, peanut oil, corn oil, and a few minor kinds like sunflower-seed oil.

OVER 1,000,000,000 POUNDS IMPORTED

I quote again from the study made by Mr. Steen:

The net result of all this commerce in the various oils is that 1,053,000,000 pounds of foreign and Philippine vegetable oils are brought into the United States. They come in because they are produced with cheap native labor in Asia and Africa and produced under conditions of living lower than have ever been tolerated in North America. At the same time, Americans have been obliged to export 979,000,000 pounds of fats and oils (702,000,000 pounds of which is lard), mostly to Europe, where it sells in a market which tends to be lower than the American market. Nevertheless, the export surplus determines the price for the whole American output, and so the prices of American farm products which are used for fats and oils are determined by cheap oriental labor at one end of the line and by a cheap European market at the other.

FARMERS ARE VITALLY INTERESTED

The farm organizations and spokesmen for agriculture generally are demanding that fats and oils be dealt with as a unit in the forthcoming tariff legislation. This is necessary on account of the ease in substituting one oil for another in the various industries.

In 1927 the import figures reported by the Department of Commerce tell us that the United States imported more than $147,000,000 worth of vegetable oil, and that the average duty paid was slightly over 4 per cent. The free admission of coconut oil from the Philippine Islands cut the average ad valorem equivalent of the duty to that low rate.

The agricultural interests are vitally interested in H. R. 10958. They are also tremendously concerned in what the Ways and Means Committee and Congress will do during the next few months with regard to the tariff.

Congress will, I am sure, seek to accord to that great industry every consideration and aid. The farm groups presented a strong case before the committee. They were given sympathetic consideration. Many practical difficulties must be met and overcome, but with a will to give real and substantial help to agriculture a way will be found to do it.

NORTHERN PACIFIC LAND GRANTS

Mr. COLTON. Mr. Speaker, by the act of July 2, 1864, and the joint resolution of May 31, 1870, Congress granted certain public lands to the Northern Pacific Railroad Co. to aid in the construction of a railroad from Lake Superior to Puget Sound.

On February 27, 1929, the House passed H. R. 17212, to amend the act of July 2, 1864, and the resolution of May 31, 1870, to declare forfeited to the United States certain claimed rights asserted by the Northern Pacific Co., or its successor, the Northern Pacific Railway Co., and to direct the institution and prosecution of proceedings looking to the adjustment of the Northern Pacific land grants, and for other purposes.

I should like to incorporate in the RECORD a copy of H. R. 17212 as it was reported to the House and a copy of House Report No. 2628 that was prepared to accompany the bill. The bill and the report were prepared by the joint committee of Congress appointed to investigate the Northern Pacific land grants under the resolution June 5, 1924.

H. R. 17212, as it was reported to the House, is as follows:

A bill (H. R. 17212) to alter and amend an act entitled "An act granting lands to aid in the construction of a railroad and telegraph line from Lake Superior to Puget Sound, on the Pacific coast, by the northern route," approved July 2, 1864, and to alter and amend a joint resolution entitled "Joint resolution authorizing the Northern Pacific Railroad Co. to issue its bonds for the construction of its road and to secure the same by mortgage, and for other purposes," approved May 31, 1870; to declare forfeited to the United States certain claimed rights asserted by the Northern Pacific Railroad Co., or the Northern Pacific Railway Co.; to direct the institution and prosecution of proceedings looking to the adjustment of the grant, and for other purposes

Whereas by act of Congress of July 2, 1864 (13 Stat. L. 365), and by joint resolution of Congress adopted on May 31, 1870 (16 Stat. L. 378), public lands of the United States were granted to the Northern Pacific Railroad Co. to aid in the construction of certain railroad and telegraph lines therein specified, which grants were made and accepted upon certain conditions therein expressed, and which granting acts contained covenants relating to the disposition by said Northern Pacific Railroad Co. of certain of the lands therein granted; and

Whereas the said Northern Pacific Railroad Co., and its successor, the Northern Pacific Railway Co., have failed to comply with the conditions of said grants, and have failed to perform the covenants of said grants relative to the disposition of certain lands therein granted; and

Whereas the said grants have not been fully adjusted, and the Northern Pacific Railroad Co. and/or its successor, the Northern Pacific Railway Co., are asserting the right to select lands within the indemnity limits of said grants to satisfy a claimed deficiency, and, among others, controversies have arisen between the United States and said companies respecting the construction, operation, and effect of said grants as to whether, through fraud or through misapprehension as to the proper construction of such grants, or otherwise, lands have been wrongfully patented or certified to one or both of said companies, and as to what the rights of the United States and said companies, and those claiming under them are with respect to such lands, and as to the amount, if any, of lands to which said companies may be entitled in satisfaction of said grants, and the claims of said companies, or either of them, of the right to select additional lands within the indemnity limits, constitute a cloud upon the title of the United States to such lands; and

Whereas Congress in the passage of said act of July 2, 1864, reserved the right to add to, alter, amend, or repeal said act, and in the adoption of said joint resolution of May 31, 1870, reserved the right to alter or amend said joint resolution at any time, having due regard for the rights of said company: Therefore

Be it enacted, etc., That any and all lands within the indemnity limits of the land grants made by Congress to the Northern Pacific Railroad Co. under the act of July 2, 1864, and the resolution of May 31, 1870, which, on June 5, 1924, were embraced within the exterior boundaries of any national forest or other Government reservation and which, in the event of a deficiency in the said land grants to the Northern Pacific Railroad Co. upon the dates of the withdrawals of the said indemnity lands for governmental purposes, would be, or were, available to the Northern Pacific Railroad Co. or its successor, the Northern Pacific Railway Co., by indemnity selection or otherwise in satisfaction of such deficiency in said land grants, are hereby taken out of and removed from the operation of the said land grants, and are hereby retained by the United States as part and parcel of the Government reservations wherein they are situate, relieved and freed from all claims, if any exist, which the Northern Pacific Railroad Co. or its successor, the Northern Pacific Railway Co., may have to acquire the said lands by indemnity selection or otherwise in satisfaction of the said land grants: Provided, That for any or all of the aforesaid indemnity lands hereby retained by the United States under this act the Northern Pacific Railroad Co. or its successor, the Northern Pacific Railway Co., or any subsidiary of either or both, or any subsidiary of a subsidiary of either or both, shall be entitled to and shall receive compensation from the United States to the extent and in the amounts, if any, the courts hold that compensation is due from the United States.

SEC. 2. That all of the unsatisfied indemnity selection rights, if any exist, claimed by the Northern Pacific Railroad Co. or its successor, the Northern Pacific Railway Co., or any subsidiary of either or both, or any subsidiary of a subsidiary of either or both, or by any grantee or assignee of either or both, together with all claims to additional lands under and by virtue of the land grants contained in the act of July 2, 1864, and resolution of May 31, 1870, or any other acts of Congress supplemental or relating thereto, are hereby declared forfeited to the United States.

SEC. 3. The rights reserved to the United States in the act of July 2, 1864, to add to, alter, amend, or repeal said act, and in the resolution of May 31, 1870, to alter or amend said resolution, are not to be considered as fully exercised, waived, or destroyed by this act or the exercise of the authority conferred hereby; and the passage of this act shall not be construed as in anywise evidencing the purpose or intention of Congress to depart from the policy of the United States expressed in the resolution of May 31, 1870, relative to the disposition of granted lands by said grantee, and the right is hereby reserved to the United States to, at any time, enact further legislation relating thereto.

SEC. 4. The provisions of this act shall not be construed as affecting the present title of the Northern Pacific Railroad Co. or its successor, the Northern Pacific Railway Co., or any subsidiary of either or both, in the right of way of said road or lands actually used in good faith by the Northern Pacific Railway Co. in the operation of said road.

SEC. 5. The Attorney General is hereby authorized and directed forthwith to institute and prosecute such suit or suits as may, in his judgment, be required to remove the cloud cast upon the title to lands belonging to the United States as a result of the claim of said companies, and to have all said controversies and disputes respecting the operation and effect of said grants, and actions taken under them, judicially determined, and a full accounting had between the United States and said companies, and a determination made of the extent, if any, to which the said companies, or either of them, may be entitled to have patented to them additional lands of the United States in satisfaction of said grants, and as to whether either of the said companies is lawfully entitled to all or any part of the lands within the indemnity limits for which patents have not issued, and the extent to which the United States may be entitled to recover lands wrongfully patented or certified. In the judicial proceedings contemplated by this act there shall be presented, and the court or courts shall consider, make findings relating to, and determine to what extent the terms, conditions, and covenants, expressed or implied, in said granting acts have been performed by the United States and by the Northern Pacific Railroad Co. or its successors, including the legal effect of the foreclosure of any and all mortgages which said Northern Pacific Railroad Co. claims to have placed on said granted lands by virtue of authority conferred in the said resolution of May 31, 1870, and the extent to which said proceedings and foreclosures meet the requirements of said resolution with respect to the disposition of said granted lands, and relative to what lands, if any, have been wrongfully or erroneously patented or certified to said companies, or either of them, as the result of fraud, mistake of law or fact, or through legislative or administrative misapprehension as to the proper construction of said grants or acts supplemental or relating thereto, or otherwise, and the United States and the Northern Pacific Railroad Co., or the Northern Pacific Railway Co., or any other proper person, shall be entitled to have heard and determined by the court all questions of law and fact, and all other claims and matters which may be germane to a full and complete adjudication of the respective rights of the United States and said companies, or their successors in interest under said act of July 2, 1864, and said joint resolution of May 31, 1870, and in other acts or resolutions supplemental thereto, and all other questions of law and fact presented to the joint congressional committee appointed under authority of the joint resolution of Congress of June 5, 1924 (43 Stat. p. 461), notwithstanding that such matters may not be specifically mentioned in this enactment.

SEC. 6. All lands received by the Northern Pacific Railroad Co. or its successors, the Northern Pacific Railway Co., under said grants or acts of Congress supplemental or relating thereto which have not been earned, but which have been for any reason erroneously credited or patented to either of said companies, or its or their successors, shall be fully accounted for by said companies, either by restitution of the land itself, where the said lands have not passed into the hands of innocent purchasers for value, or otherwise, in accordance with the findings and decrees of the courts. In fixing the amount, if any, the said companies are entitled to receive on account of the retention by the United States of indemnity lands within national forests and other Government reservations, as by this enactment provided, the court shall determine the full value of the interest which may be rightfully claimed by said companies, or either of them, in said lands under the terms of said grants, and shall determine what quantities in lands or values said companies have received in excess of the full amounts they were entitled to receive, either as a result of breaches of the terms, conditions, or covenants, either expressed or implied, of said granting acts by said companies, or either of them, or through mistake of law or fact, or through misapprehension as to the proper construction of said grants, or as a result of fraud, or otherwise, and said excess lands and values, if any, shall be charged against said companies in the judgments and decrees of said court. To carry out this enactment the court may render such judgments and decrees as law and equity may require.

SEC. 7. The suit, or suits, herein authorized shall be brought in a district court of the United States for some district within the States of Wisconsin, Minnesota, North Dakota, Montana, Idaho, Washington, or Oregon, and may be consolidated with any other actions now pending between the same parties in the same court involving the subject matter, and any such court shall in any such suit have jurisdiction to hear and determine all matters and things submitted to it in pursuance of the provisions of this act, and in any such suit brought by the Attorney General hereunder any persons having an interest in or lien upon any lands included in the lands claimed by the United States, or by said companies, or any interest in the proceeds or avails thereof may be made parties. On filing the complaint in such cause, writs of subpœna may be issued by the court against any parties defendant, which writs shall run into any districts and shall be served, as any other like process, by the respective marshals of such districts. The judgment, or judgments, which may be rendered in said district court shall be subject to review on appeal by the United States circuit court of appeals for the circuit which includes the district in which the suit is brought, and the judgment, or judgments, of such United States circuit court of appeals shall be reviewable by the Supreme Court of the United States, as in other cases. Any case begun in accordance with this act shall be expedited in every way, and be assigned for hearing at the earliest practicable day in any court in which it may be pending. Congress shall be given a reasonable time, which shall be fixed by the court, within which it may enact such legislation and appropriate such sums of money as may be necessary to meet the requirements of any final judgment resulting by reason of the litigation herein provided for.

SEC. 8. It shall be the duty of the Attorney General to report to the Congress of the United States any final determinations rendered in such suit or proceedings, and the Attorney General, the Secretary of the Interior, and the Secretary of Agriculture shall thereafter submit to Congress recommendations for the enactment of such legislation, if any, as may be deemed by them to be desirable in the interests of the United States in connection with the execution of said decree or otherwise.

SEC. 9. That the Secretary of the Interior is hereby directed to withhold his approval of the adjustment of the Northern Pacific land grants under the act of July 2, 1864, and the joint resolution of May 31, 1870, and other acts relating thereto; and he is also hereby directed to withhold the issuance of any further patents and muniments of title under said act and the said resolution, or any legislative enactments supplemental thereto, or connected therewith, until the suit or suits contemplated by this act shall have been finally determined: Provided, That this act shall not prevent the adjudication of any claims arising under the public land laws where the claimants are not seeking title through the grants to the Northern Pacific Railroad Co., or its successors, or any acts in modification thereof or supplemental thereto.

House Report No. 2628 is as follows:

[H. Rept. No. 2628, 70th Cong., 2d sess.]

NORTHERN PACIFIC LAND GRANTS

Mr. COLTON, from the Joint Congressional Committee to Investigate Northern Pacific Railroad Land Grants, submitted the following report (to accompany H. R. 17212):

The joint congressional committee appointed to investigate Northern Pacific land grants submitted the following report to accompany H. R. 17212, to alter and amend an act entitled "An act granting lands to aid in the construction of a railroad and telegraph line from Lake Superior to Puget Sound, on the Pacific coast, by the northern route," approved July 2, 1864, and to alter and amend a joint resolution entitled "Joint resolution authorizing the Northern Pacific Railroad Co. to issue its bonds for the construction of its road and to secure the same by mortgage, and for other purposes," approved May 31, 1870; to declare forfeited to the United States certain claimed rights asserted by the Northern Pacific Railroad Co. or the Northern Pacific Railway Co.; to direct the institution and prosecution of proceedings looking to the adjustment of the grant, and for other purposes, with the recommendation that it do pass without amendment.

On February 23, 1924, the Hon. Calvin Coolidge, President of the United States, called the attention of the chairman of the Public Lands Committee of the House of Representatives to the fact that the Northern Pacific Railway Co. was asserting claims to large areas of valuable timberland within the national forests to satisfy a claimed deficiency in the land grant made by the act of July 2, 1864 (13 Stat. 365), and the joint resolution of May 31, 1870 (16 Stat. 378); that the loss of public title to resources which had been protected and developed for many years at public cost was threatened, and that the grants had not been fully adjusted.

The President advised that certain statements contained in a letter from the Secretary of Agriculture raised serious questions as to the extent to which the railroad company may have obtained undue benefits from the grant and also as to the extent of its compliance with the obligations imposed upon it by the legislation which conferred the grants. He further stated that he believed these questions should be fully determined before a final settlement of the matter is effected and before further public lands were patented to the company, and recommended that the entire matter receive the attention of Congress, and that such action be taken as would look to the fullest protection of the public interests concerned. After preliminary hearings, held by the Public Lands Committee of the House, Congress adopted the resolution approved June 5, 1924 (43 Stat. 461), by virtue of which your committee was appointed. This committee was "empowered and directed to make a thorough and complete investigation of the land grants of the Northern Pacific Railroad Co. and its successor, the Northern Pacific Railway Co., under the act of July 2, 1864 (13 Stat. 365), and the joint resolution of May 31, 1870 (16 Stat. 378), and any further acts of Congress supplemental thereto or connected therewith, and the facts and the law pertaining thereto and arising therefrom, and to report to Congress its conclusions and recommendations based thereon." By joint resolution approved May 28, 1928, this committee was given leave to report at any time, by bill or otherwise.

Extensive hearings have been had, at which representatives of the Department of Agriculture, the Department of the Interior, and the Northern Pacific Railway Co. were present. The privilege of calling and examining witnesses and being heard in argument was extended to all interested persons. A number of witnesses have been called and examined and legal representatives of the governmental departments and of the company have been heard on the propositions of law and facts involved. Your committee has made a detailed study of all the circumstances and facts connected with the points raised in this controversy and the law applicable thereto. Ninety-four days of hearings have been held and proceedings covering over 5,500 pages have been printed.

The record shows that by the act of July 2, 1864, and the resolution of May 31, 1870, a vast area of the public domain was granted to the Northern Pacific Railroad Co. to aid in the construction of a railroad and telegraph line from Lake Superior to Puget Sound; that the grants contain certain terms, conditions, and covenants imposing certain obligations upon the United States and upon the company; that these obligations have not been fully complied with by the company; that the company has already received upwards of 35,000,000 acres of land under the grants concerning part of which controversies have arisen; that questions of fact and of law have arisen from time to time in the administration of the grants; that the Northern Pacific Railway Co. now claims that a large deficiency in the grants still exists, and further claims the right to satisfy the deficiency by the selection of lands within national forests and other Government reservations within the indemnity limits of the grants; that large sums of public money have been expended during the past 25 years on the lands within these national forests and other Government reservations, which lands the company claims the right to select; that the public interests require that these lands be retained by the United States; that it is desirable that a speedy and final adjustment of the grants be had; that the decision of the courts be obtained on the controverted questions of law and fact, and that the respective rights of the United States and the Northern Pacific Railroad Co. and/or its successor, the Northern Pacific Railway Co., be fully and finally established.

We are presenting with this report a bill under which it is contemplated that proper proceedings shall be instituted by the Attorney General of the United States to procure a final and complete determination of the respective rights of the United States and the Northern Pacific Railway Co. to the end that the grants shall be finally adjusted and the interests of the United States and the grantee shall be fully protected. We are convinced that such legislation is necessary to protect the interests of the United States and to determine the issues involved.

The provisions of the bill may be summarized, in general, as follows:

By the first section all lands, surveyed or unsurveyed, within the indemnity limits of the grants and within the exterior boundaries of national forest and other Government reservations are removed from the operation of the land grants and retained by the United States as part of the reservations within which they are situate, relieved and freed from all claims, if any exist, which the Northern Pacific Railroad Co. or its successor, the Northern Pacific Railway Co., may have to acquire them as indemnity selections or otherwise, and provision is made that the railroad company or its successor shall be entitled to be compensated to the extent and in the amounts, if any, the courts hold compensation is due.

By section 2 all unsatisfied indemnity selection rights, if any exist, claimed by the company, or its successor, together with all claims to additional lands by virtue of the grants are declared forfeited. (The committee having considered all the facts and circumstances believes that this limited forfeiture is justified.)

Section 3 retains for the United States the right to enact additional legislation on the subject.

Section 4 provides that the act shall not be construed as affecting the present title of the company or its successors in the right of way, acquired under the grants, or lands actually used in good faith by the Northern Pacific Railway Co. in the operation of its road, such as lands used for depots, station buildings, work shops, machine shops, switches, side tracks, and water stations.

Section 5 directs the Attorney General to institute proceedings to accomplish the objects mentioned therein and in the act in its entirety.

Section 6 requires that an accounting be had and authorizes the rendering of such judgments and decrees as law and equity may require.

Section 7 relates to the fixing of jurisdiction and to matters of procedure.

Section 8 makes it the duty of the Attorney General to report to Congress any final determinations rendered in the proceedings and requires the Attorney General, the Secretary of the Interior, and the Secretary of Agriculture to submit to Congress such recommendations for the enactment of legislation, if any, as they deem desirable in the interests of the United States in connection with the execution of said judgments and decrees, or otherwise.

By section 9 the Secretary of the Interior is directed to withhold his approval of the adjustment of the grants and related acts, and to withhold the issuance of further patents or muniments of title under the grants, and under acts supplemental thereto until the proceedings contemplated by this act have been finally determined, provided that the act shall not prevent the adjudication of any claims arising under the public land laws where the claimants are not seeking title thereto under the grants to the Northern Pacific Railroad Co. or its successor, or under any acts in modification thereof or supplemental thereto.

Your committee, in making the foregoing summary of the purposes of the various sections of the bill, does not intend that the summary shall be taken as limiting or restricting their meaning as more fully set out and reflected in the bill itself.

The committee unanimously recommends that the bill be passed.

Respectfully submitted.

The congressional investigation of the Northern Pacific land grants had its inception in the right asserted by the Northern Pacific Railway Co., the successor of the Northern Pacific Railroad Co., to select or otherwise acquire certain national-forest lands in satisfaction of the land grants.

In 1904 certain lands within the indemnity limits of the Northern Pacific land grants were withdrawn by the United States for national-forest purposes under the then prevailing construction of the law that such withdrawals were valid as against the grantee railroad company and its successor. The Northern Pacific Railway Co. contended that the Government could not make these withdrawals in the face of an unsatisfied deficiency in the acreage of the land grants. In litigation that grew out of the controversy the Supreme Court held (256 U. S. 51) that the Government could not make the withdrawals if the withdrawn lands were needed to make up the acreage the railroad company was entitled to receive under the granting acts. The Supreme Court held, however, that the figures before it were inadequate for the purpose of determining whether a shortage existed in the land grants and, in effect, returned the case to the Interior Department for a recount of the acreage.

At this point the Forest Service of the Agriculture Department entered the case, suggesting that if proper deductions were made a deficiency would not be found to exist in the acreage of the grants. The Forest Service suggested that the Northern Pacific Railroad Co. had failed to comply with certain of its obligations under the granting acts and that through collusive land sales, erroneous construction of the law, and otherwise the grantee railroad company and its successor had received acres and values in excess of what they were entitled to under the land grants. The Forest Service also suggested that the land grants were subject to forfeiture.

Following a consideration of the matters presented by the Forest Service, the Secretary of the Interior held that the previous tentative adjustment figures were 1,200,000 too high in favor of the Northern Pacific, left certain other questions open for further consideration, and stated that Congress alone was authorized to act upon certain other questions presented to him by the Forest Service.

By joint letter of February 12, 1924, addressed to the Hon. N. J. Sinnott, chairman of the Public Lands Committee of the House, Secretaries Wallace and Work recommended a congressional investigation of the Northern Pacific land grants. President Coolidge, by letter of February 23, 1924, made a similar recommendation to Mr. Sinnott.

Following preliminary hearings held before the House Committee on the Public Lands and the Senate Committee on Public Lands and Surveys, Congress passed the joint resolution of June 5, 1924, providing for an investigation of the Northern Pacific land grants by a joint committee of Congress, the committee to be made up of five members of the Senate and five members of the House.

Your committee appointed under the resolution June 5, 1924, of which I have the honor to be the chairman, has held hearings in this matter, which is an involved and important one. The record as it now appears consists of over 5,500 printed pages.

The testimony taken at the hearings shows that the Northern Pacific Railroad Co., or its successor, the Northern Pacific Railway Co., has not made a full compliance with the obligations, expressed and implied, that were contained in the act of July 2, 1864, and the resolution of May 1, 1870.

Your committee is of the opinion that the grantee railroad company and its successor are not now entitled to the same compensation from the United States they would have been entitled to receive had they made a full and complete compliance with the obligations that were contained in the act of July 2, 1864, and the resolution of May 1, 1870, and which the grantee railroad company obligated itself to perform.

Likewise, your committee is of the opinion that the grantee railroad company or its successor should not now be permitted to profit under the land grants at the expense of the United States through transactions that were collusive, fraudulent, or otherwise illegal. The testimony taken at the hearings shows that there were such transactions. Your committee is of the opinion that the grantee railroad company or its successor is not entitled to any further lands from the United States.

It was, therefore, the unanimous opinion of your committee that the enactment of H. R. 17212 is necessary for the proper protection of the interests of the United States. The bill if enacted will permit the United States to go into the courts on a comprehensive basis and at the same time it will afford the grantee railroad company or its successor an opportunity to be fully heard in support of such contentions as it may desire to make in opposition to any position taken by the United States in the court proceedings.

Under the first section of H. R. 17212 the United States retains title to the lands within the national forests and other Government reservations that might be subject to acquisition by the Northern Pacific Railway Co., in the event it should be found that there is an unsatisfied deficiency in the acreage of the grants. The section removes these lands from the operation of the grants and provides that the railroad company shall be entitled to compensation in the event the courts find that compensation is due from the United States. This action is taken under the power reserved by Congress to repeal, alter, or amend the grants. As yet an unsatisfied deficiency has not been found to exist in the land grants. Should it be found that there is no deficiency in the acreage of the grants, these reserved lands may be held by the United States without making compensation therefor. The national forest lands are integral parts of the reservations in which they are located, and public policy requires that title to these lands be retained by the United States, even though payment has to be made for them.

Section 2 declares a forfeiture by the United States of the unsatisfied indemnity selection rights, if any exist, which are held by the grantee, Northern Pacific Railroad Co., or its successor, the Northern Pacific Railway Co. The forfeiture does not affect any land to which title has passed from the United States. The extent of the forfeiture of the unsatisfied indemnity rights is necessarily dependent upon what the courts hold the grantee railroad company or its successor is entitled to receive under the granting acts. Since the decision of the Supreme Court in Two hundred and fifty-sixth United States, 51, the Secretary of the Interior has held that the Northern Pacific Railway Co. has been credited with approximately 1,200,000 acres over and above what it is entitled to receive. This deduction and the acreage covered by several other major points, as yet not finally decided, will be directly reflected in the amount of the forfeiture covered by this section.

Under the act of July 2, 1864, as amended, the Northern Pacific Railroad Co. was required to complete its railroad by July 4, 1879. This date has never been extended by Congress. A special provision covering the construction of the railroad between Portland, Oreg., and the western terminus of the road (later fixed at Tacoma) was contained in the resolution of May 31, 1870. Of the Northern Pacific Railroad covered by the act of July 4, 1864, and the resolution of May 31, 1870, approximately 530 miles were constructed within the time limits prescribed by Congress, 1,507 miles were constructed out of time and in violation of the provisions of the congressional enactment, and approximately 215 miles of the main-line railroad—the section between Wallula, Wash., and Portland, Oreg.—have never been constructed. The minimum requirement that not less than 100 miles of railroad be completed each year, as required by the act of July 1, 1868, was violated by the grantee company in that there was a cessation of railroad construction from approximately 1874 to 1879.

The requirement that the railroad be completed within the time limit prescribed by Congress was a condition subsequent. The failure of the grantee railroad company to complete the railroad within the time limit prescribed constituted a breach of this condition subsequent and rendered the grant subject to forfeiture by Congress. This feature of the case was dealt with at length in the proceedings before your committee, by counsel for the Government and for the Northern Pacific Railway Co., the contention being made for the railway company that any right the United States may have had to declare a forfeiture had been waived.

In the Oregon and California land-grant case (238 U. S. 393) the question of waiver was raised, but the Supreme Court rejected the contention of the railroad, stating:

> We may observe again that the acts of Congress are laws as well as grants and have the constancy of laws as well as their command and are operative and obligatory until repealed. This comment applies to and answers all the other contentions of the railroad company based on waiver, acquiescence, and estoppel, and even to the defenses of laches and the statute of limitations. The laws which are urged as giving such defenses and as taking away or modifying the remedies under review have no application. It would extend this opinion too much to enter upon their discussion.

The Supreme Court again considered the Oregon and California land-grant case. In referring (243 U. S. 549) to the earlier decision in Two hundred and thirty-eighth United States and the land grants, the court said:

> And we gave emphasis to them as laws and the necessity of obedience to them as such, the remission of their obligation to be obtained "through appeal to Congress" and not by an evasion of them or a defiance of them.

Your committee having in mind that the granting acts to the Northern Pacific Railroad Co. were laws as well as grants were unanimously of the opinion that Congress now has the right to declare the forfeiture provided by section 2 of H. R. 17212 and that such a forfeiture, by reason of the facts as disclosed at the hearings, should be declared. In this connection it should be borne in mind that any forfeiture declared by Congress is subject to review in the courts if the grantee railroad company or its successor desires to contest the forfeiture.

In arriving at the conclusion that the forfeiture should be declared, your committee was influenced by, among other things: (a) The failure of the grantee company to construct the railroad within the time specified and otherwise, as required by the granting acts; (b) the fraudulent and illegal mineral classifications under the act of February 26, 1895; (c) the collusive sales of the granted lands in violation of and in evasion of the provisions of the resolution of May 31, 1870, in connection with the foreclosure of the mortgages coincident with the 1875 and the 1896 reorganizations of the Northern Pacific Railroad Co.

The United States was not a party to any of these proceedings: (d) The failure of the Northern Pacific Railroad Co. to dispose of any of the granted lands through settlement and preemption after July 4, 1884, as required by the resolution of May 31, 1870; (e) the benefits obtained by the Northern Pacific Railroad Co. through the illegal withdrawals on general route and through the illegal withdrawals of indemnity lands; (f) the disposition of the capital stock of the Northern Pacific Railroad Co. under the original interests agreements in violation of section 10 of the act of July 2, 1864; (g) the issuance of the capital stock before and after the 1875 reorganization, without compensation being made therefor; (h) the illegal disposition of granted lands for preferred stock and the illegal cancellation of the preferred stock; (i) the laches of the Northern Pacific Railroad Co. in making indemnity selections while lands were available; (k) the affiliated land and construction companies; (l) the additional values received by the grantee or its successor under supplemental acts of Congress. These propositions were given weight, singly and collectively, by your committee in arriving at the conclusion that the forfeiture covered by section 2 of H. R. 17212 be declared.

Section 3 provides that the right to alter or amend the act of July 2, 1864, and the resolution of May 31, 1870, is not to be considered as fully exercised, waived, or destroyed by the act or evidencing on the part of Congress to depart from the policy expressed in the resolution of May 31, 1870, relative to the disposition of the granted lands.

Section 4 protects in the railway company its right of way or lands used in good faith in the operation of the railroad.

Section 5 directs the Attorney General to institute suit to accomplish the objects mentioned therein and in the act in its entirety.

Section 6 requires that an accounting be had and authorizes the rendering of such judgments and decrees as equity may require.

Section 7 relates to the fixing of jurisdiction and to matters of procedure.

Section 8 makes it the duty of the Attorney General to report to Congress any final determinations in the proceedings and requires the Attorney General, the Secretary of the Interior, and the Secretary of Agriculture to submit to Congress such recommendations for the enactment of legislation they may deem desirable in the interests of the United States in connection with judgments, decrees, or otherwise.

Section 9 suspends the adjustment of the grants and withholds the issuance of patents until the suit or suits contemplated by the act have been finally determined.

In concluding these remarks in connection with H. R. 17212, I desire to point out that shortly after the conclusion of the taking of testimony by your committee an analysis was made of the record of the hearings by the Department of Justice. On February 8, 1928, a memorandum was transmitted to your committee by the Attorney General. This memorandum states that grantee railroad company and its successor have received under the grants many thousands of acres of land that they have not earned and are not entitled to, besides additional value. The memorandum holds that the right of forfeiture exists in the United States.

I may say for anyone who has not had an opportunity to familiarize himself with the case by reading the entire record that a résumé may be found in parts 9 to 14, inclusive, wherein the briefs and digest are printed.

MEANING OF INDIAN TRIBE NAMES

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Mr. Speaker, the Interior Department appropriations subcommittee, of which I am a member, in conducting its very extensive hearings, personal investigations in the various States, and consideration of the conditions, needs, and rights of the vast number of Indian tribes throughout the country, are confronted annually with a large and interesting variety of Indian names. Members of Congress have been using and trying to pronounce these names in legislation and in the preparation and consideration of the Interior Department appropriation bill for a hundred years or more. The appropriations of money and the conditions upon which these appropriations, aggregating many millions of dollars, are made constitute a very large and important part of that bill. The committee members and Members of Congress use those names year in and year out without ever knowing what the names mean or signify or from whence they came.

In our hearings upon this year's bill it occurred to me that it would be at least interesting, and possibly historically important and instructive, to give the House and the country, as far as possible, the origin, meaning, and signification of all these Indian names contained in this very large annual supply bill.

With that object in view I requested the Bureau of American Ethnology to take this bill (H. R. 15089) and make a research as to all of the Indian names that it contains and give us the result of their investigation.

That bureau has just completed that research and furnished me that information, and I insert it herewith as a part of my remarks:

MEANINGS OF INDIAN TRIBE NAMES

The tribe was everywhere distinguished by the Indians and each Indian language has one or more names for the tribe of its speakers and also for surrounding tribes, some of which may be several hundred miles away. The Indian languages vary in that some of them have a special word for tribe, whereas others merely press the word for people into service as a designation for tribe. Thus, in the Mohave language of California and Arizona, the terms for tribe is sitimulva, while the word for people is pi'ipach. But in the Karuk language of northern California the word 'ara'r is made to serve both for tribe and people.

Where there is more than one name for a tribe it appears that we can distinguish between real or proper names and nicknames. Some of these nicknames have become much used, even to the suppression of the old tribal names. We find nicknames such as redlegs, yampa eaters, loose jaws, tough mouths, protruding bellies, snake eaters, and many others. The real old names of the tribes frequently have obscure etymology. Thus the word Mohave apparently means "they crossed over," but to the ordinary Indian it is nothing but a name.

The names of tribes, as well as the languages generally, had havoc played with them when the country was overrun by Europeans. The social organization of the Indians was broken up and a great majority of the tribe names went out of use, being forgotten completely or supplanted by names given by some other tribe or from the Spanish, French, or English languages. It happens, therefore, that at this late day the investigator is often unable to obtain the names of tribes, the word for people being naturally offered as a substitute. But wherever the situation can be thoroughly probed, it is found that earlier generations had their tribe names, and used them in number and with nicety. Where the more proper designation of a tribe could not be obtained, the word for people has sometimes been forced into ethnological literature, as, for instance, in the case of the Wintun of northern California.

Historical manuscripts often come to the rescue in revealing earlier names of tribes, and a study of the subject should include a complete list of the mentionings by the earliest and later writers.

No general treatise on the tribe names of the United States has ever been prepared, but such a work would serve two purposes. It would give the history of the nomenclature of the tribe, which would everywhere be of special local interest, and it would place together materials which would be the basis of a general study of tribal naming. Only by such a comprehensive work can we arrive at an understanding of the method of designating peoples and a determination of the descriptive or other character of the names applied.

ACOMA

People of readiness. From Hak'u, the native name of Acoma Pueblo, and meaning readiness, preparedness; plus -ma, people.

APACHE

Men, warriors. From Yuman ipach, plural of ipa, man, warrior.

ARAPAHOE

Trader. From Pawnee tirapihu, one who trades.

BANNOCK

From Panaiti, the name of the Bannocks for their own tribe, of meaning unknown to them. The "p" is as in Spanish, being unaspirated, sounding halfway like a "b," and was taken of into English as "b." The "ck" of the English form is a mishearing for "t."

BELKNAP

A British family name in origin, according to one etymology meaning bell boy, from bell plus knap, boy.

CHEMAWA

Etymology unknown.

CHEROKEE

Cave people. From Choctaw chiluk, cave, plus -ki, people. The etymology is corroborated by the Iriquois name for the Cherokee, Oyata' gehronoñ', meaning inhabitants of the cave country.

CHICKASAW

Rebel. The name of the tribe is said by the Chickasaws themselves to mean rebel, although the etymology of the parts of the word remain obscure.

CHIPPEWA

Pucker by roasting. From odjib, to pucker, plus ubway, to roast. Why the name was applied remains obscure.

CHOCTAW

River Indians. From hahcha, river, the ordinary Choctaw word for river, plus -ta, at. It is supposed that a group of Choctaw living on the Pearl River, Miss., first had this name applied to them as a tribal designation.

COEUR D'ALENE

Awl heart. From French coeur, heart, plus alene, awl. It is not known why this curious name was applied; a study of early sources does not reveal the reason.

COMANCHE

Etymology unknown. The Shoshoni form is according to Gebow, 1868, "Caw-mainsh."

CREEK

This English name applied to the tribe at first referred to the Indians living on the Ocmulgee River, Ga., which was termed "Chisee Creek," and later they were spoken of merely as the Creek Indians.

CROW

This is a translation of the French name for the tribe, which is corbeau, crow. The French name in turn is a translation of Absároke, name of the Crow Tribe in their own language, and meaning, it is said, crow people.

EUCHEE

More commonly spelled Yuchi. In the language of the Yuchi this word means "there," and is said to have been applied as a nickname because the Indians answer "yuchi" when asked where they came from.

EUFAULA

Etymology unknown. This is the name of a Creek town near Talladega, Ala. It is evidently the old name of the town, and we have spellings of it from the eighteenth century, e. g., Euphalau in Alcedo, Diccionario Geografico, 1787.

FLATHEAD

So called from the custom of tying a board to the top of the cradle so that it presses on and flattens the parietal region of the baby's head.

FOX

Translation of wagosh, meaning red fox, the name of one of the Fox clans in the native language.

GILA

Etymology unknown. It is first used by Benavides, 1630, in the spelling Xila. It is supposed to be the name of an Apache village west of Socorro, N. Mex.

HOPI

From Hopitö Shinömö, meaning quiet people. The tribe was earlier known as Moqui, and still is known by that name among those using the Spanish language in the Southwest.

IGNACIO

A Spanish personal name applied to the town of this name in southern Colorado.

JICARILLA

Little basket. This is the diminutive of Spanish jícara, applied to both a wooden tray and a basket. It appears that the name jicarilla was applied to the great dome-shaped peak of that name in north-central New Mexico, and that from that place name it was extended to apply to the Apaches who lived in the region. The name was evidently applied to the peak because of its resemblance to a wooden pan or basket.

KESHENA

Etymology unknown. This Wisconsin place name is evidently of Ojibway origin, but a study of Baraga's Ojibway dictionary does not reveal its meaning.

KIOWA

From the native name of the tribe Kaegua, of unknown meaning to the oldest living Indians. Sometimes they are called for short in the native language Gua.

KLAMATH

People. By a curious corruption from maklaks, people, Indians, the Klamath Indians' own name for themselves. The name is also applied to the river, and loosely to all the tribes on the river.

KOOTENAI

Meaning unknown. From Kutonaqa, one of the names applied to the tribe in the native language.

LAC DU FLAMBEAU

Torch lake. From French lac, lake, and flambeau, torch; also applied to a taper.

LAGUNA

Lake. The ordinary Spanish word for lake. There is a dry lake bed southwest of the pueblo which gave to it the name of Kawaika, meaning lake place, translated into Spanish as Laguna. Many myths cluster about this ancient lake.

LAPWAI

Etymology unknown.

MACKINAC

Turtle. From Ojibway makinâk, turtle.

MENOMINEE

Good seed people, referring to the wild rice. From menominiwok, from meno, good, plus min, wild rice; also seed, plus -iwok, plural ending.

MESCALERO

Mescal person. This is a Spanish term referring to the use as food by these Indians of the mescal or Spanish bayonet, the plants of which were cut before they flowered and were roasted in a pit, furnishing a sugary, tough-fibered food of dark-brown color.

NAMBE

Mound of earth. This meaning has been determined through information obtained from the old cacique of Nambe, now deceased, who remembered the meaning of the name in the most satisfactory way.

NAVAJO

Large field. From the Tewa nava, field that is sown, garden, plus -yo, big. The tribe was so called because they had large fields in their canyons, and the Spanish at Santa Fe adopted it from the near-by Tewa.

OMAHA

Those going against the wind or current. This name was etymologized by Miss Fletcher with satisfaction.

ONIGUM

Etymology unknown.

ORAIBI

Meaning unknown. The native name for the village is Urayvi, the first two syllables having no known meaning, and -vi meaning at.

OSAGE

Meaning unknown. From Wazhazhe, native name of the tribe, and transmitted to the English through the French language.

PAIUTE

Meaning unknown. Probably the first syllable means water, though it is also used as a prefix meaning large.

PAPAGO

Bean people. From papah, bean, plus ootam, people. These Indians had beans of several kinds since prehistoric times.

PAWNEE

Horn. From the native name pariki, horn, referring to a way of stiffening the scalplock with grease so that it stood up like a horn.

PIMA

No. The native adverb meaning no was applied by the Spanish as a nickname for the tribe.

PONCA

Meaning unknown. From Panka, name of the tribe in its own and neighboring languages that are closely related.

POTAWATOMIE

People of the place of fire, referring to these Indians having dwelt at one time (1616) at a place called "at the fire" located on the west shore of Lake Huron. From potawatamink, fire at people.

PUEBLO

OKEFENOKEE OBSERVATIONS

Mr. LANKFORD. Mr. Speaker, I have just finished reading, the second time, the history of the Okefenokee Swamp, by McQueen and Mizell. It is a very interesting narrative and any one interested in the great swamp would do well to read it.

In their introduction the authors say that "Mr. Mizell furnished most of the data and Mr. McQueen wrote it up and the result is this little volume." It goes as containing the true history of the great Okefenokee Swamp, the real wonder spot of the Southeast.

It is the earnest desire that this little effort will aid in some small way the movement now on foot to have this place set apart by the Federal Government as one of the national game and bird sanctuaries. It should be done.

I quite agree with these authors, the National Government should either set this wonderful section apart as a national game and bird sanctuary or as a national park. There are now pending in Congress bills for both purposes.

I was reared only a few miles north of this great swamp and have always been deeply interested in this wonderland. This interest grows as time passes and I learn more of its beauties and mysteries.

NAME

Okefenokee means trembling earth. Like all other Indian names, it has gradually evolved from a word sounding something similar to the present name but spelled very differently. The word Potomac, for instance, was, even in George Washington's time, spelled Pawtawmack. Okefenokee on some of the old maps of Georgia was spelled Ekanfinaka, while in Whites Historical Collection of Georgia, printed in 1854, the name is spelled "E-fi-no-cau," from "Ecunnau," meaning earth, and "finocau," meaning quivering, making the Indian word quivering earth.

This name was given to the swamp because there are sections where one, by stamping his foot, can easily make the earth quiver or tremble for quite a distance. The name is truly descriptive of the place.

AGE

Here is a wonderful field for the geologist. He may study and theorize and learn much of this section, but, as is ever the case, he must at last leave the great problem without a final solution. The quivering earth only hints at the unsolved mysteries of the past. Now, here is a section of swamp, of lakes, of islands, and of forest. Long before the white man came there must have been a large lake filled with islands on a plateau, on a promontory or even on an island itself, for the surrounding country is even now lower than the Okefenokee.

PLATEAU

The Okefenokee is the end of a ridge or plateau extending from the mountains almost to the sea. It operates as a divide from the Alleghenies to the Florida Peninsula, sending the rivers on the east side to the Atlantic and on the west side to the Gulf. Geologists tell us that this entire section was once the bottom of the ocean. If this is true and this section arose from the sea, then the Okefenokee must have appeared first.

FABLED ATLANTIS

What a wonderful field for the archæologist. On the numerous islands are mounds built by a race which the Indians say preceded them. Skeletons from these ancient tombs of the past disclose that a race of giants once made their homes here. Their pottery, tools, and weapons show a high degree of workmanship not credited to the Seminoles or to any of the Creek Nation. Did the Okefenokee arise from the sea or was it a part of the fabled Atlantis which we are told sank into the Atlantic, and are these islands, lakes, and forest a remnant of that unknown past? Does the Okefenokee hold in its bosom part of that unknown and fabled land? Is it with all of its flowers, birds, lakes, rivers, trees, and everlasting beauty only an abandoned and forgotten garden of the giants of the past?

RIVERS

No river flows into the Okefenokee. A few small streams enter it, principally from the north. Two rivers flow out of it. Each of these—the Suwanee and the St. Marys—after flowing out of the swamp flow partly around the swamp before changing their course for the sea. The Satilla River, rising to the north of the Okefenokee, flows some distance directly toward the swamp, then changes its course, and flows nearly half around it before finally changing its course eastward to the Atlantic. The Ocmulgee rises in north Georgia and for nearly half the distance across the State flows directly toward the Okefenokee until within about 50 miles of the swamp, then changes its course and begins to flow around the swamp. It maintains this circular course until it joins the Oconee, and then the Altamaha proceeds on the circular course to the sea. This all demonstrates that the Okefenokee, although a level plateau and near the Atlantic, is much higher than the surrounding country.

RABIE SWAMP

About 25 miles northwest of the Okefenokee and on the same divide or elevation is a swamp much smaller, though in many particulars as interesting as the great swamp. This interesting section is known as Rabie Swamp and covers some 12 or 15 square miles in the northern part of Clinch County. Suwannoochee Creek flows out of Rabie on the southwest side and proceeds on the west side of the divide in the direction of the Okefenokee, but joins the Suwanee River near the great swamp, and thus enters the Gulf of Mexico. Red Bluff Creek flows out of Rabie on the eastern side and finally finds its way to the Atlantic through the Satilla River.

THE RIDGEWAY

There is a very interesting formation in Rabie swamp known as the Ridgeway. Along the edge of the swamp for some distance on the east side is a bank of snow-white sand, which enters the swamp at Bethany Primitive Baptist (Rabie) Church and emerges from the swamp some 7 miles from the church. It enters the swamp near the point where the Suwannoochee leaves the swamp in its course toward the Gulf and comes out of the swamp near the point where Redbluff Creek leaves the swamp in its journey to the Atlantic Ocean. Both of these streams, though, flow out of the swamp on the same side of the Ridgeway, which is entirely on the Atlantic side of the swamp. The Ridgeway is about 10 miles in length, about 7 miles of which is in the swamp, is about 300 feet wide, is practically straight, and has rather deep ponds, sloughs, or lakes on either side. Geologists have told me that the Ridgeway is very probably an old shore line where the Atlantic's waves once rolled.

PEOPLE OF OKEFENOKEE SECTION

A few magazine writers and others have seen proper to criticize the folks living in and near the great Okefenokee. I gladly join my good friends, Messrs. A. S. McQueen and Hamp Mizell, authors of the History of the Okefenokee Swamp, in their defense of the splendid citizenry of the Okefenokee section. I was raised among these good people and utter the truth when I say there are no truer, more honest, more upright people on earth. I taught school a few miles north of the great swamp, lived in the homes of these good people, and learned to love them for their real worth. There is a patriotism, a love of country, and a love of folks here which I have never seen excelled elsewhere and which is evidenced by these good people often sacrificing their own welfare and comfort for the sake of others. Every one of them will cheerfully act the Good Samaritan whenever opportunity presents itself. It is not in their hearts to pass the sick, needy, or hungry, even when by lending a helping hand they ofttimes deprive themselves of some of the comforts of life. If we can keep our citizenship one-half as pure, as patriotic, and as noble as are these people, our Government will last as long as time shall endure.

These good people moved to this section of Georgia in the early days in order that they might enjoy the wonderful climate and have the benefit of thousands of wild game and fish in the wonderful streams and lakes. I know this caused my ancestors on both sides to adopt this section as their home. My grandfather Lankford lived in his humble home on the banks of Red Bluff Creek, which I mentioned heretofore as flowing out of Rabie on its course to the Atlantic. After my father was born on Red Bluff Creek, my grandfather Lankford moved to Berrien County, but settled on the banks of the Alapaha River. Then he moved to Florida and lived a while on the banks of the Steinhatchee River. He later came back to Georgia and settled near the edge of Rabie Swamp, where he died. Every time he moved he settled near a river or great swamp. My grandfather Monk, on my mother's side, after being sheriff of Lowndes County and living near the Withlacoochee River, moved to Clinch County and settled on the Suwannoochee Creek, near where Du Pont, Ga., is now located. He married my grandmother, Mahala Rice, daughter of John Guess Rice, who in 1830 had moved from near Bethsaida, or Bethesda Primitive Baptist Church, in old Barnwell district, South Carolina, to the banks of the same Suwannoochee Creek. My mother was born here, near the Suwannoochee Creek and within a short distance from the present Atlantic Coast Line right of way. While she was still a small girl the railroad was built through my grandfather's field, and he, preferring the quiet of the primeval forest, moved about 7 miles farther north away from the railroad and settled on the headwaters of the same Suwannoochee Creek, near a small swamp, about 3 miles in circumference, known then and now as Devils Bay.

These good people selected homes near these streams and swamps because it was a goodly land. I know these people and I know these streams and the wonderful fishing grounds in these swamps.

There is a splendid lake in Suwannoochee Creek near Du Pont which bears the name of my grandfather Rice. Within less than a mile of where I was born on the Devils Bay is a swamp commonly called the Old Flats, covering several square miles, in which are many most splendid lakes where fish still abound. There is one lake in particular that I remember well, known as the Ab Lake, which got its name from my good old friend Mr. Abner Sirmans, who lived near by in the earlier days. When a boy I delighted to tramp for hours through these most interesting swamps. I ofttimes wish I could be a boy again and enjoy once again these delights. One can not live in the great woods near nature and nature's God and become little and mean. Out in the woods among the trees the birds sing sweeter, the flowers bloom prettier, and the stars at night shine brighter. Here are the trees, the streams, the lakes, and a sky not seen elsewhere. Out in the woods are men and women and God.

CHURCHES AND SCHOOLS

If you wish to determine the character of a man, ascertain and measure his love for children, for his mother, and for his God. If you wish to know of the weakness or greatness of a people, study their schools and their churches.

The people of the Okefenokee region not only have a most splendid school system in every community but have given their children splendid school advantages for many, many years past.

I have said so much about swamp sections, let me tell of one school in the midst of these swamps. I refer to Camp Creek School, located on the creek which obtained its name because the early settlers camped there while making war upon the Indians. This school is within a mile of my old home in Clinch County. There are large swamps close by, and not a single foot of cultivated land can be seen from this little plank schoolhouse. It matters not what direction one may look, he sees a creek, a swamp, or a pond. No other house is in sight. This does not mean that no folks live in the neighborhood. Just across the creek, behind the bays and ponds, on every hand are as good people as ever lived anywhere. Here are people who are willing to sacrifice all they have to give their boys and girls a chance. Here are the homes where fathers and mothers lived 30 years ago who said they would give their children a chance. From that school within 30 years have gone out dozens of teachers to teach in other schools, hundreds of boys and girls to make successful men and women, 7 or 8 lawyers, 4 or 5 physicians, a dozen or more county officials, 4 State representatives, 3 State senators, 1 assistant State school superintendent, 1 solicitor general, 3 judges of the superior court, and 1 Member of Congress.

Not only do these people show their merit by their schools but also by their churches. Ofttimes their church buildings are modest, but there is evident on every hand a devotion and a genuineness of worship not seen in buildings of more pretentious architecture.

Probably more people in this section belong to the Primitive Baptist faith than to any other. This faith has predominated ever since the white man first settled near the great swamp and in the counties near the Okefenokee.

My people before me were all Primitive Baptist. I was raised in a Primitive Baptist community, and first attended church at Bethany Primitive Baptist (Rabie) Church. A half dozen or more Primitive Baptist preachers are relatives of mine. I do not belong to this church, but I feel more at home with these people than in any other church. I am sure that no people with such a faith, with such an honesty of purpose, and with such a nobleness of character as these people have will ever fail to measure up to the very highest standards of citizenship.

I heard a story some time ago which illustrates rather fully just how I feel about these good people. The story is that a man dreamed that he died and went to heaven. Upon his arrival at the great white throne he found a large gathering of all the other denominations, such as Methodist, Missionary Baptist, Presbyterians, and so on, but found no Primitive Baptist. He wondered why this was. He then wandered over the hill and found a crowd of Primitive Baptists off there by themselves having a good time. Still his wonder grew, so he finally came back and said, "St. Peter, I want you to tell me one thing, please. I want to know why you let that crowd of Primitive Baptists stay off there by themselves." St. Peter said, "I don't mind telling you. They are the only folks I can trust off by themselves."

FIRST SETTLEMENTS ON STREAMS

Not only did these people first settle near the streams, lakes, and waterways but this has been the custom of all immigrants. The first English settlement in the United States was on James River. The first in Georgia was on the Savannah River. History is full of the early settlement of river and ocean fronts. Robert E. Lee was born on the banks of the Potomac. George Washington made his home at Mount Vernon on the Potomac. Lee lived until the Civil War at his Arlington home on the Potomac. In fact, practically all the large cities are on large rivers or splendid harbors near the sea.

OKEFENOKEE INDIANS

The Indians made their homes in the Okefenokee section long before the coming of the white man. They left their mounds everywhere. They evidently waged fierce and sanguinary conflicts along the rivers and creeks of this section. When plowing as a boy I turned up scores of Indian arrowheads and other flint and stone implements of these aborigines. They were so numerous until we passed them without pausing to save them.

Those familiar with the customs of the American Indian tell me that the abundance of arrowheads at any one place indicates that a battle was once waged there. The Indian while hunting wild game does not lose his arrow, but retrieves it after it is shot. They are too hard to make to be thrown away with each effort to kill game. In battle ofttimes the owner is killed and then again there is not time left to regain each arrow, and many are finally lost. Many battles must have been waged by these people along the Suwannoochee, the Suwannee, and even in and near Devils Bay, Rabie and Okefenokee Swamps. Here was a primeval forest of great pine, oak, cypress, and magnolia, in the shade of which the Indian fought his battles and lived. This was his home. The names of two rivers, the Alapaha and the Altamaha, mean homeland or abiding place.

FLOWERS AND BIRDS

Flowers bloom in abundance everywhere. In this short statement I must content myself with leaving to some future time a more complete description of the flora and many other most interesting features of the Okefenokee and the near-by sections. I do want to mention the birds of this section and quote from McQueen and Mizell's History of the Okefenokee, as follows:

Scientists who have visited the swamp estimate that there are about 85 species of birds in this wonder spot during the summer months and about 90 during the winter; these range from the lordly eagle, great sand-hill crane, heron, American plumed egret, about nine different species of wild duck, various water fowls, from the cormorant or water turkey, Indian pullet, baldheaded gannet, and the smaller water fowl down to the didapper duck and all the different small species of birds common to this section, including the bobwhites, snipe, plover, etc. In the outlying sections and on the outlying islands the magnificent wild turkey is still to be found.

A volume could be written about each of these, and then there is other wild game life equally as interesting.

ISLANDS AND LAKES

There are about 30 islands which have been honored with names and hundreds of smaller ones as yet unnamed. The section is a veritable land of lakes, each of which is most interesting.

MARSHES OR PRAIRIES

There are hundreds of prairies or marshes ranging from an acre in size to Grand and Chase Prairies three and a half miles wide and five miles long. These prairies are open, level tracts covered with subtropical flowers and water plants. They are very beautiful. One noted visitor in speaking of Chase Prairie described it as "one of the most remarkable landscapes in the world."

FARM RELIEF

Mr. LANKFORD. Mr. Speaker, several Senators and Members of the House have asked me to furnish them a brief written statement concerning the plan and purposes of my bill, H. R. 77, for farm relief. I am very happy to comply with these requests, and feel that by availing myself of the general privilege of making extensions in the RECORD, I may at this time make a contribution to the solution of the farm problem. I am therefore discussing very briefly the purpose and plan of my bill.

The purpose of my bill is to provide for the farmers the economic independence enjoyed by other businesses and enterprises.

My plan is to offer the farmers the very best possible governmental assistance, provided the farmers themselves will effectively organize and by voluntary contract control production and marketing, thus eliminating the overproduction evil. I would offer them help so wonderful as to cause them to easily see that they would not at all be entitled to the relief without effective organization on their part, thus causing them to organize gladly. I would help them organize so as to become recipients of the great benefits offered them, and thus bring about mutual arrangements under which the Government would be doing only that which the farmer can not now do for himself and the farmer be doing all that he can do without governmental aid, a program which when fully installed will make the farmers of the Nation independent and able to manage their own affairs without further or future aid from their Government. In its last analysis my plan seeks to effect a voluntary organization of the farmers so thorough and efficient as to make the farmers masters of their own fortune and not in any sense longer dependent upon governmental assistance. Now for the details or mechanics of my plan.

The bill is patterned after the War Finance Corporation act, the first sections being identical with that act, except that the bill proposes to create the farmers' finance corporation rather than the War Finance Corporation. This corporation is to be authorized to make loans through the banks of the Nation, much the same as the War Finance Corporation, directly to the producers of basic agricultural commodities. The loans are to bear 4 per cent interest, be made for the full amount of the average price of the commodity for the last 10 years, with the commodity as the sole and only collateral, with maturity postponed until the sale of the commodity, and without any right on the part of the farmers' corporation to collect any part of the loan not repaid by the sale of the commodity. Thus the farmer will in effect be receiving as a part of the sale price of his commodity an amount equal to the average price for which he usually sells the commodity, thereby establishing the average price of the commodity as the minimum price of the same.

It takes two to make a contract, and no one could expect a Government-owned corporation to be required by Congress to render so great a benefit to the farmers without them agreeing to do something on their part to make the corporation secure in the loans made. There should be and must be a mutuality of contract, with a good and sufficient consideration flowing, and to flow between the farmers, the bank through which they are to get their loans, and the farmers' finance corporation.

Therefore the bill provides that before any of the loans mentioned are made farmers planting 75 per cent of the acreage of cotton, for instance, grown in the United States shall have signed and abided by contracts with each other, with their banks, and with the corporation, agreeing and obligating themselves that the cotton advisory council be authorized to control within reasonable limits the acreage planted, so as to hold production within reasonable bounds, and that the farmer will not sell any of the particular basic commodity without express authority from the advisory council. Briefly stated, by my plan Congress would simply propose to the farmers that if they would by mutual contracts control their production and marketing, then the farmers' finance corporation would by loans enable the farmers to name within reason the selling price of the products of their own toil.

The farmer would be required to hold his product off the market until it could be sold for enough to repay the loan, all charges, such as storage, insurance, interest, and so forth, and such an additional amount to the farmer as would remain from the sale of the commodity at a fair price. The farmer would be able to hold his products, for he could borrow at a very low rate of interest the reasonable value of his product. The farmer would contract to curtail his production, providing his friends decided it best for him to do so, on condition that all farmers make a similar reduction, and provided he received more for the lesser amount produced than he would if he produced without limit. My bill provides simply that the Government make an offer to the farmers to help them solve their great farm problem, provided the farmers contract to control the great overproduction and surplus menace.

All other farm relief bills are either silent as to the all-important factor of production control or seek through penalties or other equally vicious methods to control production. This plan seeks to control production and marketing by the voluntary act of the farmer entered into as a part and parcel of the farm-relief scheme itself. All other bills dodge to a great extent this vital feature of the surplus-production control. My bill recognizes this as the heart of the farm-relief plan, and deals with it in a way that must be effective if operation is secured under the scheme. There can be no effective farm relief without effective production and marketing control.

Just as surely as we elevate prices without some sort of control of production, just so surely will the farmers themselves plant more corn and more cotton and more wheat and produce more and bring about the greater production. In other words, any bill which fails to have within it a proper control of production has failure written on its pages.

It will be observed that my bill provides a most excellent referendum and recall. Unless 75 per cent of the acreage of the commodity is under contracts signed by the farmers themselves, the law will not become operative as to the particular commodity. Then, again, the contracts are made for only one year, and if the plan proves unsatisfactory to the farmers they can refuse to renew and thus cause the plan to become inoperative as to the particular commodity.

After the bill is passed the cotton producers may cause it to become operative as to cotton and the producers of other commodities may refuse and vice versa.

My bill is not contrary to any other farm-relief plan, such as the McNary-Haugen plan or the debenture plan, and may be passed along with any other bill or bills and leave the farmers to determine whether they will operate under my plan or under some other.

I have endeavored to make definite the duties of the officials in charge of the farmers' finance corporation so as to eliminate red tape and uncertainties.

I have provided a plan for the selection of the members of the various commodity councils which I believe is constitutional, and which authorizes the governors of the commodity-producing States to make the appointments of the members of the council.

In conclusion let me say that in my humble judgment my bill would put the control of the farmer's great problem in the hands of his friends, not his enemies; would help the farmer directly and not indirectly; would provide a complete solution of the overproduction problem; would enable the farmer, within reasonable bounds, to name the price of his own commodity; and for the first time would put him on a parity with other enterprises and industries.

IMMIGRATION AND THE NATIONAL ORIGIN CLAUSE

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, a group of Members repeatedly send statements to the country, not based upon actual facts, which, when read by one not fully informed, conveys the impression that there are in this Congress many men who, if given an opportunity, would destroy our present immigration law. I have heard many Members discuss the immigration problem both on the floor and in the cloakrooms, but I do not know of one man in this body who is not in favor of our present restricted immigration policy. It is folly to assert or intimate that certain Members seek to lower the bars and flood the country with aliens.

Restriction of immigration is a necessity, is so recognized by every right-thinking person in this country, native and foreign born alike; and to my way of thinking the day will never come when our present policy will be abandoned. It is here to stay. As conditions demand the Congress probably will make changes such as further restricting immigration or requiring stricter supervision along the Mexican and Canadian borders, but it is unthinkable that any group of men now serving in Congress seek to destroy existing laws. Such statements should be ignored and are made solely from the standpoint of political expediency.

We have in this country to-day several million of our citizens out of employment. In some parts of the country the people are suffering, being actually in want. Knowing such a condition to exist, it would be the height of folly to even think of increasing the present quota. If any change is made, it will be in the direction of more stringent restrictions rather than a more liberal policy.

The national-origins provision of the immigration act of 1924 deals solely with allocation of the quota. It does not provide that additional aliens over the present quota number can enter this country. The Secretaries of State, Labor, and Commerce who attempted to figure out the national origins of the people of the United States have made three reports, admit that neither is authentic, but complying with the request of the President submit the figures as the best possible conclusion that could be arrived at. All three reports differ as to figures. The Census Bureau, or rather officials charged with the work of submitting figures in reference to national origins, admitted they juggled the statistics and said they did so because they had no scientific basis and had to do so to satisfy all the national elements.

The main opposition to this clause is based upon arguments that official records are so incomplete that no estimate can be made that can be defended, nor will any Government agency accept the responsibility of stating that the estimate can be taken as being even reasonably correct. For this reason President Coolidge twice asked the Congress to postpone the national-origin provision, and now we are quietly told that the action at the eleventh hour for further postponement is at the request of Mr. Hoover. Both candidates for President at the last election declared in opposition to this clause.

As the report says, the people hold the opinion if any action is taken in reference to immigration it should be toward reduction of quota and that they are not concerned as to allocation. If such be the case why cause great dissatisfaction among our citizens of German and Irish decent by reducing the quotas of those two countries. If this clause is not postponed, Germany will lose 26,319 of its present quota; Irish Free State, 11,140; while Great Britain will gain 21,887, giving it a quota of 65,894, over double the quota of any other foreign country.

The German and Irish immigrants have been powerful factors in the development of this country. They have been as desirable as immigrants from any other nation. There is no reason to doubt but that those who come in the future from Germany and the Irish Free State will be of the same caliber as their countrymen and women who have preceded them.

Our immigration laws should be strictly enforced. Only those of good character, sound physically and mentally, should be allowed to enter. Provisions should be made to extend our border patrol.

In conclusion I desire to express the hope that those who in the past have been inclined to broadcast the opinion that there are Members of Congress who seek to undermine the present immigration laws will find some other method to rehabilitate themselves among their constituents. The people need have no fear that our restricted immigration policy will be disturbed.

HON. F. B. SWANK

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD I can not let the opportunity pass without saying a few words of the character and the service of Hon. F. B. SWANK, of Oklahoma. Since he has been a Member of Congress he has labored diligently and unceasingly to serve his constituents and the general good of the whole country. He has been one of the outstanding members of the Committee on Agriculture of the House of Representatives who has labored through all the years of depression in agriculture to bring forth some laws that would aid and better the conditions of the farming classes. He is not only the friend of the farmers but he is the friend of every legitimate interest in his district, in his State, and in the country. We who are left here regret his going and feel that in his defeat his State and the country have lost a faithful and efficient Representative.

THE CHOPTANK RIVER BRIDGE BETWEEN DORCHESTER AND TALBOT COUNTIES IN THE STATE OF MARYLAND

Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH. Mr. Speaker, I am very glad that H. R. 16349, introduced by me, and providing for the erection of a bridge between Dorchester and Talbot Counties, near Cambridge, Md., has passed both the House and Senate without a dissenting vote, has been signed by the President, and become a law.

This bridge has been greatly needed by the people of these two counties for many years, and will contribute greatly to the convenience, to the prosperity, and to the happiness of both counties.

As will be seen from inspection of the law providing for this bridge, the interests of the people have been safeguarded in every way.

It has been said that bridges are the arteries of business and social communication. I am certain, Mr. Speaker, this bridge will be another evidence of the truth of that saying.

PORTO RICO AND ITS RELATIONS WITH THE UNITED STATES

Mr. DAVILA. Mr. Speaker, Porto Rico and its relations with the United States will be a subject of constant discussion until the status of the island is definitely settled. This uncertainty of our status is cause for dissatisfaction and unrest among the people of Porto Rico, who do not know yet what their future will be after 31 years of American occupation. The peculiarity of our position was graphically described in an editorial of the Washington Post under date of June 23, 1924, in the following words: "What the ultimate status of Porto Rico will be is a matter still lying in the capacious laps of the gods." There is no exaggeration in these words. In spite of our efforts to obtain a satisfactory solution of this problem of paramount importance to us, the definition of our status is a matter still lying in the capacious laps of the gods. No attention has been paid by the people of the United States to our repeated appeals for the clarification of our status. No progress has been made toward this end since 1898, when the American Army took possession of our country. The peculiar position in which we are placed furnishes grounds for different and conflicting views regarding our relations with the mainland.

Now that a revision in the tariff is contemplated, there has been an attempt to discriminate against Porto Rico by some organizations and individuals who seem to be entirely ignorant of the obligations and responsibilities assumed by the United States since the day of taking possession of our island.

No one less than the representative of the American Farm Bureau Federation has appeared before the Ways and Means Committee of the House asking that Porto Rico be treated as a foreign nation on tariff matters. The Legislatures of the States of Wisconsin and Wyoming have adopted resolutions indorsing the American Farm Bureau Federation in its efforts to secure adequate protection for domestic sugar and to limit the free entry of Porto Rican and Philippine sugar into the United States. Even the Delegate from Hawaii, an Asiatic Territory of the United States, has said that Porto Rico is an insular possession and that the term "domestic sugar" in its reference in the law is effective only for the mainland of the United States and the Territory of Hawaii.

I have the highest regard for the people of Hawaii, and it is unfortunate that its Delegate has assumed this position in his attempt to discriminate against Porto Rico for the simple reason that we are called an insular possession and Hawaii is an incorporated Territory. Mr. Speaker, in spite of the singularity of our status, we prefer "the capacious laps of the gods" to the classification of a Territory like Hawaii, facing the uncertainty of ever becoming a State of the Union. We have ideals and aspirations and we will be knocking at the doors of the American Congress until we secure for Porto Rico a position superior to the status of a Territory and not inferior to the status of a State of the Union.

Had the Delegate from Hawaii appeared before the Ways and Means Committee to argue that the sugar from Hawaii is domestic I would have joined him in his efforts to defend the interests of his country. But as he went further than that I am compelled to challenge his statement that our sugar is not domestic.

I am unable to understand how the people of Porto Rico can be American citizens and the products of Porto Rico foreign. I would like to know if this country has more of a legal and moral obligation toward Hawaii because it is a Territory than toward Porto Rico because we are called an insular possession. Both countries are under the same flag and under the jurisdiction of the same Nation.

Mr. Speaker, there are more things in common between the people of Porto Rico and the continent than between the people of Hawaii and the United States. We are American citizens as the Hawaiians, but we have not the amalgamation of races which is present in Hawaii nor the amazing number of aliens residing in that Territory. Our population, according to the last American census, was 72 per cent white against 28 per cent colored. Unlike Hawaii, we are Americans by birth and by nature, as we are an integral part of the American Hemisphere. We are but a few hundred miles from the mainland, while Hawaii is a distant Territory, thousands of miles away from the continent. We occupy a very important position in the Caribbean Sea, and our commercial relations are almost exclusively with this country. It is for this reason that I have stated that we have more things in common with the United States than Hawaii. Our sugar is even more domestic than the sugar of Hawaii.

The Delegate from Hawaii states that there is a tariff of 5 cents a pound on coffee imported into Porto Rico and that is payable into the island treasury. This is not so. A provision to that effect was contained in our first organic act, but was eliminated many years ago.

We do not attempt to draw any distinction between us and the Filipinos just because we are Americans and they are not. Any discrimination against the Filipinos will be unfair and unjust. As American citizens and as Porto Ricans, we want this country to extend the same protection to all the people under the American flag. We approach you on a basis of equality, as your fellow citizens, firm in our aspiration to secure a decent status which will make us happy in our relations with the United States.

We are in perfect accord with the statement made by the ex-Governor of the Philippine Islands and now Secretary of State, Hon. Henry L. Stimson, when he says:

> No words can adequately express the depths of my feeling on that subject (the proposal to restrict tariff-free Philippine sugar), because the attempt to restrict freedom of trade between the islands and the United States represents about the worst possible backward step that could be taken in American policy. It would be going back to those old doctrines of colonial relations of 300 years ago, which held that the colonies of a country existed solely for the benefit of the mother country and could be exploited at will by that country. It would mean going back to a doctrine which caused the withering up throughout the centuries of the flourishing colonies of Portugal and Spain and would have done it for Great Britain if it had not been for the American revolution.
> Now, I can not believe that any such backward step will be taken by America to-day. The American flag stands not only for individual freedom but for freedom of trade for all people under that flag; and so long as we retain these islands under that flag we are in duty bound to give them the advantages of trade with the home country. Not only would it be wrong to do otherwise, but how foolish would it be from the standpoint of American policy.

The statement made by the representative of the American Farm Bureau Federation was received in Porto Rico with marks of disapproval. The farmers' association of the island lost no time in voicing their protest in the following cablegram sent to the said representative:

> United Press cablegram published locally says you submitted memorandum of American Farm Bureau Federation to Ways and Means Committee, asking that Porto Rico be considered as a foreign country, together with Cuba and the Philippines, for tariff purposes.
> The 1,500,000 inhabitants of this island are American citizens who have always demonstrated their loyalty to the Nation, ranking number one in fulfilling their duties as such citizens, specially when most needed, as it happened when America entered the World War. Interests of 50,000 farmers and 1,000,000 rural population of this island are exactly the same as those of American farmery. We import $90,000,000 annually of American goods, the largest part being represented by American farm products. For these we have to pay domestic prices governed by natural protective policy. Our principal agricultural products are sugar, coffee, tobacco, and fruits. For the last five crop years we have had to sell our sugar at great loss, as market prices have ruled below cost of production. Our coffee enjoys no protection at all. Tobacco sells even lower than protective tariff. Fruits have to fight unjust competition of cheap product not grown under American flag. American Farm Bureau Federation, through President Thompson, pledged itself to assist Porto Rico farmers in securing relief legislation. Tarif revision for protection of agriculture is much-needed relief. As we have been encouraged to affiliate our organization to American Farm Bureau Federation, we feel that our farming interests should be considered by you as of the same standing as any other American farming interests. May we ask for rectification of the injustice done to this 1,500,000 of your fellow citizens? Kindly present same to House Ways and Means Committee.

Similar messages and letters were received by me from numerous citizens, organizations, and societies of the island.

Mr. Speaker, it is inconsistent with the American sense of equality and justice to ask that Porto Rico be considered as a foreign nation for tariff purposes and an insular possession of the United States for other purposes. The position taken by the representative of the American Farm Bureau Federation is untenable. We have to be one thing or the other, a part of the United States with all the rights, privileges, and immunities as are enjoyed by American citizens or a foreign nation with the liberty and freedom enjoyed by all the independent countries in the world.

Porto Rico came under the jurisdiction of the United States by virtue of the treaty of peace of 1899 between the United States and Spain. The people of Porto Rico had no hand in the adoption of this treaty. It was imposed upon them. Under the provisions of our present organic act enacted in 1917, the Porto Ricans were made citizens of the United States, and as such we are entitled to the same treatment as is accorded the citizens of the several States of the Union.

Of all the outlying territories and possessions, Porto Rico is the biggest consumer of products of continental United States.

In matters of the tariff, Porto Rico must accept and be governed by the laws of the United States and we have not the right to fix our own tariff rates.

The cost of living in Porto Rico is as high as in the United States and nearly all the necessities are imported from this country.

We contend that Porto Rican products are as American as the products of any State of the Union, and the Congress should protect American industry, American interests, and American citizens with equal justice to all and special privilege to none.

We in Porto Rico have not forgotten the words of General Miles contained in his proclamation after landing in the island when he said that—

> We have come to bring protection, not only to yourselves but to your property, to promote your prosperity and bestow upon you the immunities and blessings of the liberal institutions of our Government.

To leave Porto Rico without protection, when we have no power to fix our own tariff rates, would be unfair, unjust, and would bring ruin to our people, converting them into economic slaves. Would this be consistent with the noble utterance mentioned above?

I feel confident that the American people are not in accord with such views as expressed by the representative of the American Farm Bureau Federation, and I am certain that the sound judgment and common sense of Congress will never heed his advice.

This country can not escape the obligations and responsibilities assumed at the time Porto Rico was transferred from Spanish to American sovereignty, and as long as we remain under the American flag we are entitled to the same rights, privileges, and immunities as are enjoyed by any other community under the flag.

This is the only possible conception of our rights in our relations with the United States. We have, therefore, in the performance of our duty, requested the Committee on Ways and Means that our products be given the same protection as is accorded the products of this country, of which we are a part. We have asked for an increase in the tariff rates on sugar, oranges, grapefruit, pineapples, and coconuts.

Porto Rico should not be denied this tariff protection, as she is buying from the United States merchandise and agricultural products to the amount of over $86,000,000 annually; and she can not buy from any other country on account of the tariff wall. The American producers find in Porto Rico a sale for his product at prices protected by this tariff wall; logically the Porto Rican producer should also be able to sell his product in the United States on the same reciprocable basis.

Porto Rico, an American community, has to-day no other steamship connection with the United States than American bottoms. Porto Rico is under the coastwise shipping law, and therefore obliged to use only American steamers for transporting her products at higher freight rates than she would have to pay foreign steamers. If we take also this into consideration, I do not see why Congress should not give us due protection. Porto Rico, being one of the best commercial clients of the United States, her demand should find echo in Congress; and much more now, after having suffered so much on account of the unfortunate hurricane of September 13, 1928.

We have also asked for a tariff on coffee; and while we have been persistent in this request, we have been unable to persuade the Congress of the necessity and justice of this legislation. Before the American occupation our coffee had free entry and was sold in Spain, where it commanded a high price. As a result of the change of sovereignty, the Spanish market was lost and the Porto Rican coffee growers faced, and are still facing, after 31 years of American occupation, a ruinous state, which has been emphasized by the complete failure of Congress to provide adequate protection to this Porto Rican industry. For the losses we have sustained in this regard we have not received adequate compensation as yet.

In order to realize the justice of our request it is well to bear in mind the lack of reciprocity in the tariff relations between Porto Rico and the mainland. This can be proved beyond any doubt. According to a report of the Chamber of Commerce of the United States, just published, Alaska, in 1927, consumed in the United States $35,604,000; the Philippines, $69,521,000; Hawaii, $79,666,000; and Porto Rico, $86,319,000. These figures show the amount we spend in this country. We pay, therefore, the tariff on the articles we consume, bought in the United States, especially rice and dried fish.

The United States imports annually about 1,500,000,000 pounds of coffee, which is admitted free of duty. A duty of 5 cents a pound on coffee would produce for the United States Treasury an income of $75,000,000 a year and give protection to this industry in Porto Rico and the 300,000 people depending on it. It will enable land in Porto Rico to be profitably cultivated, and which land is essential for the support of our teeming population.

As I have said above, the lot of these people since annexation has been a hard one, and there is no hope of relief, for with the exception of their native fruits and coffee the staple food of these poor people is dried fish and rice, both of which have been increased in price as a result of the increased protection granted them.

Let us consider the lot of these poor people who eke out a mere existence in the highland of Porto Rico with that of the fishermen and farmers of the United States. When the rice industry was pleading for protection from Asiatic competition which threatened to exterminate it, a special plea was made for the preservation of the Porto Rican market. In fact the value of the Porto Rican market was set forth by rice interests in the following terms:

> The price of rice in Porto Rico is one of the most important factors governing its purchase by the natives, who are not connoisseurs of high-grade rice but buy it in large quantities only for its food value, therefore purchasing it at the cheapest possible price. The difference in value of three-quarters of 1 per cent per pound before mentioned as expressing the difference in quality between our rice and the Asiatic products would not be sufficient inducement for the Porto Rican laborer to buy American rice. At the earliest possible moment, after the price difference between the American-cleaned rice delivered and the Asiatic rice delivered in Porto Rico exceeds 1 per cent per pound—the present tariff protection—we will expect keen competition and underselling in Porto Rico. This is a good and dependable market for 10 per cent to 15 per cent of our production, or roughly, 1,200,000 to 1,700,000 packets.

That plea has been answered. The Porto Rican market has been preserved for the American rice farmer, but the Porto Rican coffee farmer is paying an increased tariff of 100 per cent on the rice with which he feeds his family without in turn receiving any compensation from the bill. What that means can readily be understood when it is recalled that rice is the staff of life of the Porto Rican, even as wheat is the staff of life of the continental American. And whereas the consumption of rice on the mainland has until recently been about 5 pounds per capita, in Porto Rico the consumption has been over 110 pounds per capita.

The duty on rice is 2 cents per pound. We imported in the fiscal year ending June 30, 1927, from the United States 174,479,054 pounds of rice, worth $8,149,443.

The 2 cents duty represents a burden on the "poor man's breakfast" of $3,489,581.08. The same applies to wheat, flour, codfish, beans, pork, lard, corn, and other articles of general consumption, and to wearing apparel and building materials.

It does not seem reasonable to make the Porto Rican "poor man's breakfast" pay tribute to growers in the States, especially when the cheap coffee from Brazil is allowed to compete, free of duty, with our superior product in order not to burden the American "poor man's breakfast." The result has been an enormous decrease in the production of coffee, which was once our main crop. And, what is worse, foreign coffee is invading our island, free of duty, to compete with the native berry in the local market as Porto Rican coffee.

The argument that a duty on coffee should not be levied because it is the "poor man's breakfast" is not convincing. Coffee is sold at a high margin of profit above the import price. The removal of a tariff on coffee in 1873 did not reduce the cost of coffee to the consumer. A duty of 5 cents per pound, instead of being paid by the consumer, will be absorbed by the jobber, the roaster, and the middleman. We should not forget the fact that when coffee was placed on the free list in this country in 1873 an export tax on coffee was levied in Brazil. Why should coffee be excluded from the effects of the tariff when practically all other food products that are as necessary receive tariff protection?

A duty of no less than 5 cents per pound on all foreign coffee imported into the United States should be levied, for the following reasons:

First. This duty will probably not affect the consumer, as it will be absorbed by the middleman.

Second. It will stimulate the maintenance of the small farm and create the small, independent farmer.

Third. It will give employment in Porto Rico to more than 300,000 people and will contribute to relieve the hardships caused by overpopulation in an island of 3,435 square miles and inhabited by nearly 1,500,000 souls.

Fourth. Because of the ruinous condition of the industry, which dates from the time of the American occupation, when we lost the Spanish market, and it is only fair that some compensation will be afforded to the coffee producers of the island.

Fifth. Because the high cost of living in Porto Rico is due principally to the high tariff paid by Porto Ricans on the commodities from the United States consumed by them, such as rice and dried fish; and in just reciprocity protection should be given to the only industry chiefly owned by Porto Ricans, and which employs a great number of laborers the year around.

Sixth. It will enable land in Porto Rico to be profitably cultivated, and which land is essential for the support of our teeming population.

Seventh. It would be the most effective way for the permanent rehabilitation of the coffee growers who suffered most severely as a result of the hurricane of last September, which almost totally destroyed their plantations.

Eighth. Because the Porto Rican coffee is one of the best in the world, and the development of this American industry in Porto Rican territory would not only be the salvation of the smaller farmer, but a credit to the United States as well.

Ninth. Because it would produce to the United States Treasury an income of $75,000,000 annually.

I hope I have made myself clear. We are far from criticizing Congress for increasing the duty on rice and dried fish, and thereby preserving the standard of living of the American farmers and fishermen, but we are asking that we be treated with a sense of reciprocity, and that as long as we are bound to pay the high tariff on the commodities we consume, the Porto Rican coffee growers should be granted due protection not merely to change their standard of living but to protect and sustain their very lives.

I have spoken at length on coffee, because this commodity is on the free list, and on account of the distressing condition of the coffee growers, but this does not mean that we are less interested in obtaining an increase on other products. The fruit growers, who are also in a very critical condition, deserve additional protection. The necessity of an increase of the tariff on fruits was amply argued by growers from Porto Rico who appeared before the Committee on Ways and Means.

I wish to state, in closing, that if adequate protection is provided to all these products, Congress will not only impart due justice to our farmers, but will also promote their welfare and future prosperity.

BRIDGES

Mr. ROBSION of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker, the House and Senate have just passed the bill giving to the State Highway Commission of Kentucky the right to construct a toll bridge at Maysville, Ky. Some days ago a like right was given to construct a toll bridge at Carrollton, Ky., and rights were given to the State highway commission to construct or extend the time of constructing 10 bridges over the Cumberland and Tennessee Rivers at various points in Kentucky. I wish to thank the Speaker, the leaders, and other Members of the House for granting these rights.

The cities, counties, States, and the Federal Government are spending each year more than a billion dollars for the construction and maintenance of highways. We are far behind in the construction of highway bridges. At this time it appears that many of the cities, counties, and States are unable to provide the revenues necessary to construct bridges that are now greatly in demand to facilitate travel along the highways that have been built and are being built, and this has created a lively interest in the building of toll bridges.

The slow processes of the ferryboat can no longer serve the needs of travel and commerce. We must have more bridges and have them now. Those interested in the construction of toll bridges have been very active in trying to secure the rights to construct these bridges. The question arises, In what way can the interest of the public be best served? After the States and the Federal Government have spent billions of dollars in constructing free highways, must the traveling public then be confronted with intolerable and excessive tolls at bridges in order to use these free highways?

These toll bridges are being constructed by private interests, mainly to serve the interests of private individuals, companies, and corporations. They are not due any criticism. It is merely a business proposition with them. However, we public officials charged with looking after the public interest must look at the problem from a different angle. If the public interest is to be considered, these toll bridges must be constructed, owned, and operated by the public in the interest of the public. If private interests construct the bridges and if tolls are to be collected by private interests, we may rest assured that it will cost the public more, because the charges of the promoter, the officers, and others interested in the corporation, salaries, and so forth, must be considered, and after it is constructed we may expect it to remain a toll bridge as long as possible; while, on the other hand, if the toll bridges are constructed, owned, and controlled by the public, they will cost less and they will be made free as soon as possible.

Everywhere we are confronted with the oppression of high tolls and excessive cost to the traveling public on account of privately owned toll bridges. Any community that permits a private toll bridge to be built may expect to have no end of trouble over the question of what is the fair and reasonable cost of construction, maintenance, and upkeep, and the fair and reasonable tolls to be charged. It seems to us that there can be no argument against the public keeping these important public-service utilities in their own hands and it ought to need no argument to keep us from turning them over to private individuals and corporations. No one favors our permitting private individuals or corporations to build our highways, fix the matter of cost, tolls, and so forth.

The public issues bonds and levies taxes on gasoline and collects licenses in order to raise the money to build roads. We may not be able to do this in building a bridge, but the next best thing is to let the State, county, or city build a bridge and issue bonds against the tolls of the bridge, and thereby avoid all unnecessary costs, profits, salaries, and keep the control in the hands of the public. I strongly favor this policy not only for the people of Kentucky but for the Nation. We are deeply interested in having fair treatment for the traveling public throughout the country.

In my own State we have one privately owned toll bridge that earns each year many times its initial cost. It was built when we had no through highway and to serve such vehicles as buggies and wagons, but in the last few years the Federal Government and the States have built a great transcontinental highway reaching from Canada to the Gulf, and sometimes more than 2,000 cars are forced to pass over this bridge and pay toll in a single day. We have other bridges earning enormous profits. The States and the Federal Government have made gold mines out of these bridges.

Recently a permit was granted by Congress to a private concern to build a toll bridge at Maysville. At that time I understand the impression was made that the State of Kentucky could not and would not construct the bridge, but when it was made to appear to Congress that the State of Kentucky desired to build this bridge and would build it, the House and Senate promptly granted the State Highway Commission of Kentucky this authority. The governor and State highway commission are strongly opposed to privately owned and controlled toll bridges and urged me to introduce the bills for Maysville and other bridges.

Some days ago in debate the impression was made that my colleague, Hon. FRED VINSON, who represents the Maysville district, had given to the committee that had this bill in charge the information that the State of Kentucky could not and would not construct this bridge. I have investigated this matter carefully, and I am satisfied that Mr. VINSON gave to the committee no such information, and when I approached Congressman VINSON and expressed my purpose to introduce a bill granting the State highway commission the right to build a bridge at Maysville he promptly responded that he thought the State ought to build the bridge if it desires, and would do so; and I wish further to state that Congressman VINSON gave my bill for the Maysville bridge his active and earnest support. Mr. VINSON and the other Members of the House and Senate from Kentucky, I think, have been all along of one mind—that the State of Kentucky should build, own, operate, and control the bridges built, not only within our borders but across the rivers bordering on Kentucky.

I desire to call to the attention of the Congress and the country an illuminating statement made in writing on February 21, 1929, to me by the Hon. Thomas MacDonald, Chief of the Federal Bureau of Roads. Mr. MacDonald is one of the best-informed men on the road and bridge question in this country or in any other country. Of course, he prefers to see free bridges everywhere, but where the cities, counties, and States do not have the revenues available for the construction of these bridges he favors their construction by the cities, counties, or States and revenue bonds issued against the tolls. Mr. MacDonald has no interest to serve except the welfare of the people of the Nation. His statement is as follows:

UNITED STATES DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE, BUREAU OF PUBLIC ROADS,
Washington, D. C., February 21, 1929.

Hon. JOHN M. ROBSION,
House of Representatives.

MY DEAR MR. ROBSION: In response to your request for a statement as to the position of the Bureau of Public Roads upon the matter of toll bridges, I welcome the opportunity to make very clear both the position and the reasons which substantiate it.

We do not oppose public toll bridges. We support strongly the building of toll bridges by the public where funds are not available for the building of free bridges or the construction would be too long deferred. We favor the building of public toll bridges upon the basis of revenue bonds. It is not necessary for the public to issue bonds to be paid from property taxes or to place one cent of property other than the bridge itself and its earnings behind such bonds in order to finance a public toll bridge. This is a development of only the past few years in this country, although the plan has been long and widely used abroad by the public to finance public improvements. The interest and the bonds are retired from the earnings of the bridge or the public utility itself, and not one cent of property tax is obligated; the bonds are not a debt in the sense of the constitutional meaning of indebtedness against the State or municipality which uses this plan.

Some of the best investment bankers prefer to finance the public rather than private companies, and the public can borrow on the basis of revenue bonds at an equal or less rate than can a private individual or a private company. The public does not have promotion charges, is not in the business to make a profit, and therefore can build and operate at a less cost than can a private company, and as soon as the bridge is paid for out of earnings it becomes a free bridge.

We are strongly opposed to private toll bridges on any part of the public highway system. We have become more strongly opposed since through inquiry we have developed the fact that in every way possible the cost to the public has been increased beyond any reasonable amount—through promotion, organization, discount, noncompetitive contracts, and overcapitalization.

We have instances and can give the figures for capitalization in excess of 100 per cent of the original cost of the bridge, and the public is expected not only to put the money into the securities on the basis of the excess capitalization, but it is also expected to pay tolls in order to pay profits on the basis of the excess capitalization.

The authorizations which have been granted by Congress do not provide adequate protection to the public in financing, in the plans and specifications, in supervision of construction, or in the operation of the structures.

The States are moving rapidly to pass laws which will permit them to build toll bridges on the basis of revenue bonds. This plan will not increase the taxes upon property, and will not increase the bonded indebtedness, the bridge service will be rendered at a less toll rate than private companies would demand, and in a relatively short time the property will be owned by the public and can be operated without tolls or at a very nominal cost. The revenues from the automobile registrations and gas taxes are increasing very rapidly, so that in fact the public is now demanding tolls from every user of the highways.

The highway officials of the Federal Government and of the States are opposed to the granting of further authorizations, either Federal or local, for private toll bridges. All we request is a reasonable time to get the necessary State legislation to build any bridge which ought to be built. Many of the franchises which are being asked for by private concerns can not support the investment from the earnings, and the failures will destroy the confidence of investors in this type of securities to the extent that the public will not be able to finance needed structures which have a potential earning capacity sufficient to make them sound projects.

It must be remembered that after the promoter has taken his commissions he is no longer interested in the structure. It is the public which pays and continues to pay.

Very truly yours,

THOS. H. MACDONALD,
Chief of Bureau.

HIGH SPOTS OF FIVE YEARS IN CONGRESS

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker, it has been my custom to make a report to my constituency of my work in Congress, legislative and otherwise. I have desired to acquaint them with my service here. I felt that I was their Representative and was willing to inform them of my position upon the various issues presented.

There may be some who would be critical of such action upon the part of a Representative in Congress. I think that it is a proper thing to do. I have served in Congress five years, during which time I have endeavored to serve the best interests of my district, State, and Nation. I am perfectly willing that my record votes may be broadcast and my nonrecord votes be made known.

In presenting the high spots of my service as a Representative I will deal shortly and succinctly with my committee work and my position on the issues presented. I will refer to some of the matters which I have discussed upon the floor. I intend to treat of other work done, in nature departmental.

COMMITTEE WORK

In the first place, many people have a misconception of the manner in which Congress conducts itself. One might think that legislation was initiated and prepared on the floor. However, the work in the main is done in the committees. The assignments which come to a Member of Congress determine to a great extent the nature of the work in which he becomes a specialist. The seniority rule is applied on the committees and is generally called into play in granting of assignments. That is not altogether the yardstick. The ability and qualifications of the Member enter into the equation. But, in any event, it is a new world. It is a tremendous task to become acquainted with any considerable number of the 435 Members of the House. The Government actually has an investment in a Member. It is rare that striking dividends are declared in the work of a Member until he has served many terms.

In entering Congress on January 31, 1924, to fill out the unexpired term of my predecessor, Hon. W. J. Fields, I was sworn in before the certificate of election had reached me. I was immediately assigned to three committees—Pensions, Public Lands, and Flood Control. I hopped into the work, actively participated in the hearings before the Public Lands Committee involving the Northern Pacific Railroad Co. land grants. In reality this is a lawsuit involving among other things 3,000,000 acres of wonderful timbered lands. All told it is a matter involving fifty to a hundred million dollars. The committee reported out a resolution calling for a complete inquiry into all these transactions. A special committee was appointed and it has progressed well toward its final action.

While on this committee, Public Lands, the matter of public parks in the eastern section of this country was referred to us. The Shenandoah Valley and the Big Smoky projects were the ones under discussion. The first step was to secure the authorization for a survey of these projects. On the day that our committee acted upon this bill the committee in executive session was good enough to accept an amendment offered by me including Mammoth Cave, in Kentucky, in this survey. An increased appropriation was authorized to cover this expense. The committee was very generous with me in that there had been no hearings upon the Mammoth Cave item, and certain bureau heads had reported against its feasibility as a national park. I can truly say that if this authorization had not been secured Mammoth Cave as a national park could never be an existing fact.

On the Pensions Committee we had jurisdiction of Spanish-American War pensions, not only general legislation but special acts relative thereto. I worked assiduously and participated in reporting to the House what is nationally known as the Bursum bill, which carried substantial increases for both the Spanish and Civil War veterans, their widows and children. From the time I entered the Congress I have given of my time and strength unstintingly to further the cause of all veterans.

MILITARY AFFAIRS COMMITTEE

At the beginning of the Sixty-ninth Congress, the Democratic members of the Ways and Means Committee, constituting our committee on committees, were good enough to select me as a member of a major committee. They placed me upon Military Affairs, where I served my first full term in Congress. There is no committee in Congress where there is more work done than in this committee. I informed the chairman and our ranking member that I wanted to work and they placed me upon five subcommittees that engaged my every moment. I was assigned to the subcommittees on aviation, promotion and retirement, relief of World War veterans, relief of Civil War veterans, and national military homes.

The Military Affairs Committee in the Sixty-ninth Congress faced some most important legislation. One of the most far-reaching bills considered by it was that creating a department of national defense, which would have consolidated all defense matters under a single department head. Hearings were held upon this important measure for days and days. Witnesses with every viewpoint appeared before our committee. When the roll call reached me the vote was 10 to 9 against the change. I was the youngest member on the committee in point of service. I voted for the single department of national defense. The chairman then cast his vote against it and the measure failed in committee by a vote of 11 to 10.

At that time there was considerable criticism relative to the air strength of our Army. Apparently it had fallen below par. It was my privilege to participate actively in the preparation of the 5-year Air Corps program, insuring increased air strength both in aircraft and in personnel.

I was made happy in being selected as the fifth member of the subcommittee which, in conjunction with a similar subcommittee from the Naval Affairs Committee, reported and passed modern legislation respecting the procurement of aircraft and designs therefor. In the ordinary course of events, the subcommittees are composed of three Republicans and two Democrats. In this instance FRANK JAMES, of Michigan, than whom there is no squarer shooter, desiring to have me serve on this committee, so designated me despite the fact that it caused our subcommittee to be constituted of three Democrats and two Republicans.

I appreciated his confidence and trust. It goes without saying that there was no politics involved in the action of the subcommittee. It was a most painstaking task, involving real legal attainments, and real results have flowed from our work.

In our committee work we not only developed an aircraft program, but we developed an Army housing program, which has gone forward with tremendous strides. There was an increase in the Army ration resulting from our efforts and considerable impetus given to recognition of aircraft by the creation of the three air secretaryships in the Departments of War, Navy, and Commerce.

APPROPRIATIONS COMMITTEE

In the Seventieth Congress I was signally honored by the Democratic members of the Ways and Means Committee in assigning me to the Committee on Appropriations—one of the Big Four. In the olden days committees had both legislative and appropriative power, but for many years now all general appropriative power is lodged in the Committee on Appropriations. It is the largest committee in Congress and one of the most powerful. I am truly grateful for this recognition and honor, which has been shared only by nine other Kentuckians. I have endeavored to show my appreciation in the effort to do the job assigned to me as my friends would have it done.

Upon becoming a member of this committee I was assigned to the subcommittee appropriating money for the independent offices of the Government. This includes—

Veterans' Bureau, Interstate Commerce Commission, Federal Power Commission, Federal Trade Commission, Federal Tariff Commission, Federal Radio Commission, General Accounting Office, executive offices, Shipping Board, Board of Tax Appeals, Board of Mediation (Labor Board), Bureau of Efficiency, Smithsonian Institution, White House, public buildings and public parks, Battle Monuments Commission, Civil Service Commission, Employees' Compensation Commission, National Advisory Committee for Aeronautics, and some seven other important activities.

The Veterans' Bureau item alone this year carried more than $500,000,000. In it this year was the initial appropriation for the Veterans' Bureau hospital for Kentucky.

In each session of the present Congress I have rendered a somewhat full report of the activities of this committee rendering an accounting of my stewardship to the House.

In all of my committee work I have endeavored to acquaint myself with the subject matter under our jurisdiction and to hold up my end of the singletree in the duties devolving upon us.

I desire to express genuine appreciation for the splendid manner in which I have been treated by those senior to me in ability and service.

SIXTY-EIGHTH CONGRESS

In this Congress I supported certain measures on the floor of the House by speeches, among which are the following:

Tax reduction bill: Speech made about two weeks after entering the service.

Soldiers' bonus bill: I supported this measure—One of three members who gave vocal expressions for a cash bonus.

Restrictive immigration act: The real one. It was during the debate on this bill that I voiced my love for old Kentucky, endeavoring to depict its worth in the face of criticism hurled at it by those who knew it not.

Tax-exempt securities: I spoke in opposition to the constitutional amendment repealing tax-exempt securities. Subsequent events have conclusively demonstrated the correctness of this position.

In addition to the measures upon which I spoke, there were many opportunities for me to express my views as your Representative. In addition to the measures heretofore referred to, I voted for and supported the following legislation:

Additional rural routes and Ford offer to lease Muscle Shoals; increase of Coast Guard for prohibition enforcement; the International Narcotic Drug Conference; Air Service investigation; to abolish Tariff Commission; reduction of parcel-post charge; farm relief bill; Federal aid road bill; Federal cooperative marketing board; blackleg vaccine amendment; Howell-Barkley bill (two days and two nights); soldiers' bonus (over presidential veto); Officers Reserve Corps item; to make Lincoln's Birthday a legal holiday in District of Columbia; and increased-subsistence item in Soldiers' Home.

I opposed and voted against—

Government fixing rents in the District of Columbia; deferring Japanese exclusion; shipping firearms through the mail; the delegation of the power to the Treasury and Post Office Departments to control public buildings; $15,000,000 Arlington Memorial Bridge; and a Federal license for hunters.

SIXTY-NINTH CONGRESS

I supported with speeches the following legislation:

Five-year aircraft program; aircraft procurement board (which I introduced); Army housing program; Army remount service; veterans' hospital in Kentucky; and procurement legislation liberalizing status of designers and laws of aircraft procurement.

I opposed with speech the Italian debt settlement.

I voted for and supported legislation—

Permitting 150 Members to move to discharge committee (Crisp amendment); tax reduction; Federal-aid road bill; increase rural mail routes; deportation of criminal aliens; Mammoth Cave National Park; railway labor bill; increase Spanish-American pensions; farm relief; three air secretaries; metal-clad airship; cooperative marketing bill; and World War veterans' act.

I opposed and voted against the following legislation:

French debt settlement; purchase Cape Cod Canal; diverting water on Great Lakes (Supreme Court upheld our position); medicinal spirits bill; postponing national origins (immigration); and creating a czar of the air.

SEVENTIETH CONGRESS

I supported with speeches the following legislation:

Reconditioning coal boats ($1,000,000 first session, $1,500,000 second session); road and bridge relief ($1,894,000); veterans' hospital in Kentucky ($1,100,000); independent offices appropriation bill (first session); Tom Cats (national champions, Ashland High School basket-ball team); Federal Trade Commission; against lame-duck session of Congress; independent offices appropriation bill (second session); and making Lincoln's birthplace a national shrine.

I voted for and supported the following legislation:

Tax reduction; equitable allocation of radio privileges; farm relief; Federal-aid road bill; fourth-class postmasters bill; disabled emergency officers' bill; Muscle Shoals; Boulder Dam; World War veterans' act; $24,000,000 prohibition enforcement; and Jones bill increasing penalty for prohibition violation.

I opposed postponing the putting into effect of the national-origins plan to restrict further immigration.

GENERAL STATEMENT

In my service here I have never failed to be on the job many days before the gavel sounded, and have always stayed until after the final adjournment of the session. My record will disclose that I never dodged any issue. I never ducked a vote. I have faithfully attended committee meetings and the work on the floor.

In tax-reduction measures I have endeavored to voice the sentiment of my district for an equitable allocation of the burden. I supported the theory that the smaller-tax payer should bear no more heavy burden proportionately than the larger ones. I voted to eliminate the so-called nuisance taxes, among which is the automobile tax.

My record toward all the veterans of our country is an open book. In committee, on the floor, and off the floor no one has had their interests more at heart. It has been a genuine pleasure for me to support legislation looking toward the betterment of conditions in the lives of veterans, their widows and children. With a united delegation, I was active in four sessions fighting to bring a veterans' hospital to Kentucky. This was only accomplished after several years' effort.

Originally a separate bill providing for a veterans' hospital in Kentucky was reported from the committee over the opposition of the committee chairman. No action was permitted to be had upon it on the floor. At the next session a blanket authorization bill was considered in the committee. The amount necessary to construct a hospital in Kentucky was added for that purpose, but in the report of the committee it would have been easy to have misinterpreted the language relative thereto. At this point I addressed the House, setting forth the purpose of the committee and the legislative intent to construct a hospital for mental and nervous diseases in an area not otherwise supplied with hospital facilities, the center of which was Kentucky. This bill passed the House, but failed of passage in the Senate on account of a filibuster.

Undaunted, we kept up the fight. In the next session I again addressed the House calling attention to the conditions which obtained and the necessity for this hospital. Again the committee reported out a bill with stronger language in the report, assuring this beneficent work for our soldiers.

During the hearings the committee was gracious enough to permit me to interrogate General Hines, Director of the Veterans' Bureau, relative to the Kentucky situation. He assured the committee that he was not opposing the construction of the hospital in Kentucky; that his survey did not include a hospital, but that it was a matter for Congress to determine. The fight in the committee upon this item rose to such temperature that the chairman of the subcommittee resigned rather than report the bill including Kentucky to the House. That gracious gentlewoman from Massachusetts [Mrs. ROGERS], to whom the soldiery of America will ever be indebted, reported the bill. It passed the House and the Senate and became law. At the first opportunity this session we carried in our appropriation bill the initial appropriation for the institution of this activity. Unless one is acquainted with the topography of the area of which Kentucky is the center; unless one is acquainted with the people who reside within that circle, he may not be able to appreciate the crying need of this much-needed institution. A united delegation made it possible for this work to have been accomplished. It was secured without the approval of General Hines and without the O. K. of the Budget. Congress responded to the needs of our soldiery. It is a genuine satisfaction, near and dear to my heart, to have been able to play my part in the securing of this institution which, throughout the years, will alleviate the suffering of our soldier boys, my comrades.

COAL BOATS

In the first session of the Seventieth Congress, while our appropriation bill was being considered, an amendment carrying $1,000,000 for the reconditioning of vessels to carry coal in export trade was added to the bill. This was the initial appropriation for this character of service. It was accepted by the chairman of our subcommittee without any hearings upon the item. The appropriation was made available July 1 of this year, but for reasons best known to themselves, the Shipping Board failed to push this activity, and a fair trial of it has not been had.

In our appropriation bill this session an item of $1,500,000 was agreed to in committee, together with a reappropriation of all moneys available for this activity at the end of the present fiscal year. This will permit expenditure of approximately $1,900,000 during the next fiscal year in the reconditioning and operating of coal-carrying vessels to the East Indies, the Mediterranean, and South American ports.

My speech upon this matter, very important to all coal-producing sections, shows the feasibility of the activity and the tremendous benefit that may accrue therefrom. There are many million tons of coal in the trade that we can reach. With return cargoes there will not be considerable loss, much below the average loss for other commodities transported by the Shipping Board vessels. And if the coal-carrying railroads are enabled to grant a preferential rate for export coal a splendid market may be opened to this languishing industry. I might add that the amendment this year also was without the approval of the Shipping Board or the Budget. I was glad to find myself in position to assist in this meritorious effort to benefit the coal industry.

ROAD AND BRIDGE RELIEF

I consider the work which I performed upon this item to be the best effort of my congressional career. The appropriation of $1,894,000 was secured in the first session of the Seventieth Congress. At the time the remarks made by me give the history of this undertaking. A most devastating flood catastrophe occurred in Kentucky in the spring of 1927. Roads and bridges damaged, together with other property damage, mounted into the millions. The counties in eastern Kentucky suffering had constitutional limitations as well as financial inability to replace, repair, and restore the roads and bridges to preflood condition. There was no precedent for Federal relief. Without going into detail, it suffices to say that this money was appropriated, which, matched by a similar amount from the State, should have brought about complete restoration of these roads and bridges ere this. This fight occupied several months, and I can say with pardonable modesty that I was in the forefront of the battle. My heart runs over with the warmth of joy when I anticipate the benefits that will come to those now living in the flood area and to persons yet unborn resulting from this effort.

Many people think that a public official serves merely for the salary. That is far from true. The salary is necessary to those of us who use it for support, but the greatest reward that comes to any faithful public servant is the knowledge that his work is well done; that his efforts will benefit the people; that his labor will make better the land in which we live and perpetuate the institutions of which we are so proud.

In our tenure of office we have handled literally thousands of requests requiring contact with the Veterans' Bureau, Pension Bureau, War Department, Navy Department, Commerce Department, Labor Department, State Department, Interior Department, and all the other departments and activities of the Government. A Member of Congress becomes very versatile in the work before him after he has seen several years of service. In matters of compensation, insurance, and pensions secured in the departments, in the bureaus, and by special acts of Congress the sum total secured by us will exceed more than a half million dollars. We have devoted hours and days in the cause of the disabled veterans of our land. Knowledge of the law is of tremendous help in all departmental matters. Energy is likewise a requisite. We are willing for our district to speak relative to the manner in which we have handled all correspondence and requests which have reached our office.

In addition to the secretarial assistance furnished by the Government, I have spent at least $5,000 of my own money for additional stenographic and clerical hire. With the largest district in the State and the knowledge that I desired to serve, a heavy burden in this respect was heaped upon me. I performed this service with a smile.

MY LAST DAY IN CONGRESS

I spent a most unusual last day in Congress. I can not say that all the work was done on that day, but I will recite what was brought to final culmination on that last day:

A Spanish-American War veteran was secured total disability.

Two Civil War veterans were secured $90 per month.

The father of a World War veteran secured $10,000 insurance. It had been in controversy for three years. It had been before the director three times, with two adverse findings. It was meritorious, and after months of attention a successful conclusion was reached.

In the Post Office Department we secured the suspension of the order for further investigation in which the post-office service at Carlisle, Ky., would have been curtailed. We stated frankly to the department our views relative to the proposed action which had been ordered and they kindly suspended the order which would have inconvenienced the patrons of this office.

A bill granting a right to the State highway commission to construct a bridge at Maysville, Ky., made a successful trip through the Congress.

An additional item for $130,500 for rural sanitation, carried in the second deficiency bill, was retained. Kentucky will receive $47,000, which insures the continuance of the public health unit in the counties of the flooded area for the next fiscal year.

In the afternoon and at night I attended the sessions of the House, adding a word to the debate on the World War veterans' bill, pointing out the fact that the peak of mental and nervous disease cases would not be reached until 1947 and that proper hospital facilities must be afforded all veterans. The last words I uttered on the floor of Congress were in respect to this item and an inquiry relative to the status of the rural sanitation item.

My last vote was against the further postponing of the national origins plan in restricting immigration. It was a vote in favor of restriction.

BRIDGE BILLS

Representing a district along the Big Sandy and the Ohio Rivers, I have been interested in water transportation and its development. To my mind it is one of the real hopes of the future. I collaborated with the author of the recapture clause which is placed in all bridge legislation. The bridge crossing the Big Sandy River at Catlettsburg, Ky., carries the first recapture clause ever inserted in a bill in Congress. It was a far-reaching step, protective of the public.

I piloted two bridge bills for Ashland, Ky., through the House on the same day. I assisted in the passage of two bridge bills at Maysville, Ky., on the same day; in a subsequent Congress both bills again passed the House and passed the Senate. At this session extension bills for these companies were again passed through the House and the Senate and became law. It is the policy of Congress to pass as many bills as there are good-faith permittees.

The Federal Government does not desire to create a monopoly. The right to construct is open to all. I sponsored and secured the passage of a bridge bill for Augusta, Ky., at the last session and an extension for its construction at this session. I introduced the bill under which the bridge at South Portsmouth, Ky., was constructed.

Relative to the bridge situation at Maysville, we have labored faithfully in an endeavor to secure all congressional requisites for the construction of this bridge. Our sole purpose has been to assist in this worthy cause, which would be of tremendous benefit to this entire section.

The extension of the post office at Ashland was advocated by me before the interdepartmental committee of the Treasury and the Post Office Departments. The inclusion of this extension in their report recommending expenditure of $80,000 in this work assures this much-needed improvement.

CONCLUSION

There are hundreds of items concerning which we would be glad to call your attention, as they would demonstrate our efforts here. We believe that the legislative record of a Member, together with all the other services performed, paint a very vivid picture of the man and his purposes. I have labored faithfully in your service. In retiring from office it is not my purpose to relinquish interest in public affairs.

I trust that this short report will meet with your approval. I have given you the best I had in stock. I turn back to you a commission unsullied and unstained.

PROHIBITION

Mr. BEERS. Mr. Speaker, our present prohibition laws were not the result of hasty action, but were the product of more than 100 years of discussion, agitation, and education. Before the eighteenth amendment was enacted 32 of the 48 States had passed prohibition laws of their own. We have heard much discussion in the attempt to create prejudice against the prohibition law by saying the people were never allowed to vote upon it.

Prohibition had been a major issue in every congressional and legislative election for years before its adoption, and the Congressmen who voted to submit it and the legislators who voted to ratify it had, in all cases, been elected with a distinct mandate from their constituents on the prohibition issue. "In this country the will of the people expressed at the ballot box creates the duty of the citizens upon the subject voted upon." You will recall that the eighteenth amendment has in it five provisions referring to the manufacture, sale, importation, exportation, and transportation of intoxicating liquor for beverage purposes. The Jones bill deals with these five items which the eighteenth amendment prohibits. One of the penalties which is quite generally used and which these bills affect is section 29, a portion of which is:

> Any person who manufactures or sells liquor in violation of this title shall for a first offense be fined not more than $1,000 or imprisoned not exceeding six months, and for a second or subsequent offense shall be fined not less than $200 nor more than $2,000, and be imprisoned not less than one month nor more than five years.

According to the Jones bill, the maximum penalty would be increased to $10,000 or imprisonment for five years or both. The object of this legislation is to increase the maximum penalty in order that adequate punishment may be meted out to one who is commercializing the traffic in intoxicating liquors, and does not affect the small offender. Take, for example, the man who is in the business of diverting industrial alcohol from its rightful use and converting it to a beverage—the profit made in such a transaction might run into thousands of dollars. The fine of $1,000 would mean little to him, a second offense of $2,000 little more, but would he not begin to think and reason with the thought of a probable five years' imprisonment and a $10,000 fine?

Every person who sells liquor does it solely and only because some one will pay a price high enough to make a profit sufficient to offset the chance of detection, conviction, and punishment. Therefore it appears to me that since we believe in the enforcement of the laws of the land that we ought to provide penalties commensurate with the offense. The penalty should be sufficient to deter not only the defendant, but others, from committing a similar offense.

Lawlessness did not originate with the eighteenth amendment. There is much less violation of the liquor law to-day than we have had in America for 100 years. Property that was engaged in the manufacture and sale of liquor is now used for other purposes. People who used to be engaged in the selling of liquor are now employed in other trades. We now hear more about one bootlegger with a single bottle of whisky than we ever heard of a hundred wide-open saloons plying their trade day and night. We admit prohibition has not been 100 per cent effective, but let any man walk down the streets of any city or town in America and compare the conditions existing now with the day of the old licensed saloon, and judge for himself if the same amount of drinking is apparent as before prohibition. Drunken men have practically disappeared from the streets of American cities and towns. Recent reports show that from 75 to 80 per cent of our bootleggers are foreigners. Congress recently passed a law which makes it possible to deport all unnaturalized bootleggers. The Jones bill will aid in getting rid of this undesirable class of foreigners. We should aim to pass laws which would give every possible protection to the foreigner who makes an effort to be a hundred per cent American citizen, but we should provide an easy channel to deport all who will not pledge allegiance to the American flag and abide by the laws of our beloved country.

IMMIGRATION AND NATURALIZATION LEGISLATION

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the House, under leave given me to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I desire to submit information relative to progress made by the Seventieth Congress in the perfection of the immigration and naturalization laws.

It will be appreciated that the development of the restrictive policy in immigration legislation has been a slow and tedious process.

EXCLUSION OF UNDESIRABLES BY CLASSES

The first great step toward limitation of immigration was the immigration act of 1907, which provided more thoroughly than ever before for the exclusion of undesirable persons and authorized an investigation by the Dillingham Commission. The Dillingham Commission traveled widely, conducted extensive hearings, and published its findings in 41 volumes in 1910. As a result of its work there developed the Burnett Immigration Act of 1917, which amounted to a revision and a clarification of the act of 1907, providing more accurately and perfectly for the exclusion and expulsion of undesirables. Both of these acts were exclusion statutes. That is to say, they set up no limitation, numerical or other, but named particular classes of persons to be denied the privilege of admission and to be deported if found within the country. The act of 1917 also contained the noted literacy test, adding the illiterate to other classes of excludable persons.

THE TEMPORARY QUOTA ACT OF 1921

The world unrest at the conclusion of the Great War was responsible for a further development of the restrictive policy. All Europe was unsettled and anxious to escape the burden of postwar reconstruction. There was not room or opportunity in the United States for all who desired to come here. In response to the demands of a public aghast at the prospect of an overwhelming mass migration, Congress passed the first numerical restriction act, the quota act of 1921. This was a temporary measure, quite unsatisfactory in many of its aspects, but one which in part accomplished the result for which it was devised. For the first time in the history of the world a definite limit to the total of permissible immigration was set. Likewise, for the first time there began to permeate the American consciousness the sound idea that American standards of living can not be maintained, American institutions can not be expected to continue, if in every generation new millions of foreign-born persons must be tutored in American principles.

PERMANENT NUMERICAL LIMITATION

The immigration act of 1924 was the logical development of the temporary quota act of 1921. I shall not discuss it at this time, except to say that in providing permanent authority for a numerical limitation of immigration it definitely established a new policy in the governance of the United States, wiping out the old theory that America was intended by Providence to be the asylum for the overflow populations of the rest of the world, and setting up the valid and reasonable intention of the Congress and the people that in so far as possible this great country shall be conserved for the posterity of those now here. This does not mean that all immigrants shall be denied admission or that we intend or desire that a Chinese wall shall be erected around the borders of our country. It does mean that we ought—indeed, we must—reduce the incoming stream to a mere brooklet, in order that those recently come and those hereafter to be admitted may in some degree approach an appreciation of American institutions by the slow and tedious process of assimilation.

The first three or four years after the enactment of the immigration act of 1924 was a time of testing. Numerous criticisms were leveled at the statute. Some inequities were discovered. Although its provisions for the most part were and are precise and reasonable, some details appeared worthy of correction.

RELIEF FOR WORLD WAR VETERANS

The only important amendment made during the Sixty-ninth Congress was a temporary relaxation of restrictions for the benefit of aliens who served in the American military or naval forces during the World War, and who found themselves deferred by the numerical limitation. This was the act of May 26, 1926, which was operative for but one year, and which facilitated the admission to the United States of some 6,000 ex-service men, their wives and children. This act also, for a period of two years, reestablished the short form of naturalization for ex-service men, relieving them of certain formalities in the acquisition of American citizenship.

REUNION OF ALIEN FAMILIES

Efforts to perfect the nonquota and preference provisions of the immigration act of 1924, so as to expedite the reunion in the United States of foreign-born families, were carried on throughout the last session of the Sixty-eighth Congress and all of the Sixty-ninth Congress, reaching fruition at the close of the first session of the Seventieth Congress in the enactment of the Copeland-Jenkins law of May 29, 1928. Under this act nonquota status became available to the American-born woman who lost her citizenship by marriage to an alien prior to September 22, 1922, if she has since been widowed; also to the husband of an American woman citizen if married before June 1, 1928; also to the wife and unmarried child under 21 years of age of an American citizen. In addition, this act altered the preference provisions of the law. Beginning July 1, 1928, the first half of each quota became reserved for fathers and mothers of citizens, husbands of citizens—if married after May 31, 1928—and agriculturists—from countries having quotas of more than 300. The second half of each quota, plus any unused portion of the first half, became reserved for the wives and unmarried children under 21 of aliens lawfully admitted to the United States for permanent residence.

In this amendment of the preference provision a double purpose was served. First, the waiting time abroad of persons entitled to preference was shortened. Second, those whose coming would amount to the planting of new seed in this country were deferred, in some cases indefinitely. Brothers, sisters, aunts, uncles, cousins, nieces, nephews, and aliens of no relationship to persons in the United States were set aside in favor of the wives and minor children of those already here.

Experience has proven that this was not only a great relief, silencing the contentions of those who criticized the immigration act of 1924 on account of the division of alien families but also that the measure is a distinctly restrictionist act. The assignment of preference to wives and children of aliens expedites their immigration, and once here as charges upon the quotas they are not afterwards available to acquire nonquota status and thus swell the total or gross influx. Further, the deferment of other relatives means the postponement of the day when additional newcomers will plead for admission of new crops of wives and minor children.

PRESENT CONDITION OF THE QUOTAS

The Copeland-Jenkins Act has worked splendidly thus far. It has relieved innumerable cases of hardship, has proven entirely feasible from an administrative standpoint, has not increased the total immigration, has not violated the numerical limitation principle, but has contributed to the success of the Johnson-Reed Act of 1924 and confirmed the soundness of the restrictive idea. I am pleased to include as part of my remarks a table showing the status of quotas for the first six months of the current fiscal year. It will be noted that in only five countries abroad are there waiting lines of relatives who can not expect to come to the United States in a comparatively brief time. These countries are Greece, Italy, Poland, Syria, and Turkey. The quotas of all other countries are in such a situation that wives and minor children of lawfully admitted aliens may come within a reasonable time, and fathers and mothers of citizens may come even with greater promptness. Wives and minor children of American citizens, it should be observed, are permitted to come outside the quotas. With the naturalization of a quarter of a million aliens per year, it will be seen that pressure of relatives within the quotas will grow less and less as the years pass, thus relieving the situation even in the countries where the pressure of emigration is heaviest. The table above referred to is published, as follows:

INCREASE OF IMMIGRANT INSPECTORS' SALARIES

Another most important enactment of the first session, Seventieth Congress, was the Reed-Jenkins law, which increased the salaries of immigrant inspectors and authorized payment of their travel expense on overseas assignment as technical advisers at American consulates. Before enactment of this measure there was a chaotic and demoralizing salary condition in the immigrant inspection service. There were 15 prevailing rates of pay running an irregular scale from $1,860 to $2,800 per annum, with an average annual salary approximating $2,100, and with no assurance of better salary conditions or even freedom from furloughs without pay upon depletion of immigration appropriations by general administrative expenses. The Reed-Jenkins Act resolved the 15 rates of pay into five salary grades, ranging from $2,100 to $3,000, and gave assurance of annual promotion to worthy and qualified officers. Under the provisions of this law in two or three years the annual average salary of immigrant inspectors will approximate $2,500, still a moderate figure for the character of the work performed. I do not know anything more important to the enforcement of immigration restriction than this.

Immigrant inspectors are the real guardians of our gates. Many of them have to know several foreign languages. They have to be thoroughly acquainted with the laws, fair and courteous in their enforcement, and available for duty at all times and in all conditions of weather. It seems to have been long overlooked in dealing with the immigration question in this country that the determination of the uncertain and hidden qualities of a human being who applies for admission to the United States obviously requires a high order of training and ability in an officer assigned to such duty. Incompetent or careless discharge of duty on the part of an immigrant inspector may permit the entrance into the United States of a criminal, anarchist, or other undesirable, and the unjust application of the immigration laws may cause the deportation or expulsion of, or undue hardship to, a deserving human being. Yet until the passage of this law by the Seventieth Congress we compensated these important public servants with a grudging hand. It is a matter of gratification to me that at last we have given them better salaries, which already have operated to improve the morale of the force and to bring forward a higher grade of applicants for appointment. I am hopeful that the survey of the field services of the Government now being conducted by the Personnel Classification Board under the provisions of the Welch Act of 1928 will develop further information which will enable Congress to provide even more adequately for the entire personnel of the Immigration Service.

CORRECTION OF DEFECTIVE ENTRY RECORDS

A measure which numerous Members of House and Senate committees had parts in preparing may be designated as the Vincent-Copeland-Schneider bill, which was signed by the President Mareh 2, 1929, and is now known as Public Law No. 962, Seventieth Congress. In part, it is a measure to authorize the making of a record nunc pro tunc in the case of an alien on whose account no record of admission to the United States for permanent residence exists, or in the case of an alien on whose account no record of admission for permanent residence can be found, if such alien shall show that he entered the country prior to the date of the enactment of the temporary quota law, June 3, 1921, has resided in the United States continuously since entry, is a person of good moral character and is not subject to deportation.

Such a record is necessary in many cases in order that certain aliens now in the country, if they desire to do so, may—

First. Journey abroad and return to the United States in non-quota status; or Second. Petition for United States citizenship by filing the so-called "second paper" which, under the naturalization law, must be accompanied by a "certificate of arrival" not now available for lack of a record of admission for permanent residence.

While it is impossible to estimate the number of aliens affected by this statute, the total is thought to be several thousand. The principal classes to be benefited are:

First. Natives of Canada or former residents of Canada who entered the United States prior to 1917, or during the years when accurate records of entry were not made;

Second. Alien seamen who before 1921 overstayed the 60-day shore leave permitted them under the La Follette Act, have remained in the country ever since, and by operation of the statute of limitations are not now subject to deportation;

Third. Aliens on whose account the record of entry, although probably made before June 3, 1921, can not be identified; and Fourth. Persons brought to the United States in infancy who can give no information as to the place or date of their entry.

Many patriotic and well-meaning people stood in opposition to this bill when it was under consideration in House and Senate, believing that it amounted to a reward to aliens guilty of violations of the immigration laws. Had the measure been enacted in the form in which it passed the Senate, permitting extension of benefits to certain aliens who entered between June 3, 1921, and July 1, 1924, this criticism might have been justified. However, in the form in which the measure became law, I am quite sure the relief provided was and is entirely reasonable and proper. Every Member of Congress has one or more cases in his files of worthy persons who will be relieved of distress and hardship when this act becomes effective July 1, 1929. I see no reason to believe that the law will break down the immigration act of 1924, or affect detrimentally the people of the United States, or the principle of immigration restriction. It is a mere curing of a defect in our statutes, and a preservation of equities well established and worthy of respect. Every beneficiary under it has been until now "a man without a country," desiring to remain within the United States, yet being unable to acquire American citizenship; fearing to set foot out of the country because of the mistake made or misstep taken so long ago; and willing cheerfully to pay the $20 fee which the law exacts for a clearance or correction of the record.

INCREASE OF NATURALIZATION FEES

Other features of the new law to which I have above devoted explanatory comment are worthy of even more notice. For one thing, the measure provides for a substantial increase in the cost of naturalization. For many years we have collected fees amounting to only $5 for the bestowal of American citizenship. We have permitted American naturalization to be the cheapest thing, in proportion to its real value, in all the world. The new law makes the certificate of arrival to cost $5, the declaration of intention $5, and the certificate of naturalization $10, the total cost of citizenship being $20. In addition, however, and for the first time, the new law requires a citizenship applicant to furnish photographs of himself, both upon the filing of the declaration of intention and upon the filing of the petition for naturalization. This will prove a valuable aid in elimination of fraud by permitting comparisons with photographs appearing on immigration visas.

The act of March 2, 1929, authorizes issuance of special certificates to persons acquiring citizenship through the naturalization of a parent or husband, to persons born abroad of American citizen parents, to persons who desire to obtain recognition of American citizenship in countries of their former allegiance, and to persons who prove loss or destruction of original naturalization certificates.

PROOF OF RESIDENCE IN NATURALIZATION PROCEEDINGS

A further relief provision in the new law is one which permits an alien petitioner for citizenship to prove all residence outside the county in which he resides at the time of filing his petition either by deposition or oral testimony of at least two witnesses for each place of residence. Residence within the county may be proved by the oral testimony of two witnesses for each place of residence within the county. This provision wipes out an inequality which has placed much hardship on petitioners for citizenship.

Still another provision of this law puts an end to the practice of aliens admitted for temporary residence of filing declarations of intention. Hereafter no declaration of intention may be filed unless the alien has been lawfully admitted for permanent residence.

IMPORTANT PENAL PROVISIONS ENACTED

Disposition of deportation legislation in the Seventieth Congress was a disappointment, yet there was enacted by approval of the President March 4, 1929, a measure (Public Law No. 1018, 70th Cong.) containing two most important provisions. For the first time we have provided that when an alien has been arrested and expelled from the country, if he thereafter enters or attempts to enter, he shall be guilty of a felony punishable by imprisonment or fine, or both. For the first time, likewise, we have provided that when an alien enters the United States at any time or place other than as designated by immigration officials, or eludes examination or inspection, or obtains entry by a willfully false or misleading representation, or the willful concealment of a material fact, he shall be guilty of a misdemeanor punishable by imprisonment or fine, or both. These are provisions which have been needed for a long time. Thousands of aliens have violated our laws at the borders because we have had no authority to punish them, except the right to expel them again. The fixing of these penalties ought to go far toward discouraging surreptitious entries.

Another provision of this act is that which authorizes deportation of a criminal alien upon his release from prison. A controversy arose a little over a year ago as to the authority of the Secretary of Labor to deport an alien convicted of crime upon his release from prison on parole. The Governor of the State of New York held that deportation should not be effected until the termination of the sentence, whether or not the sentence was completely served. The new act clarifies this issue, providing specifically that deportation shall be effected at the beginning, rather than the ending, of the parole period.

REPATRIATION OF AMERICAN INSANE

A great assistance in the effort to effect deportation of alien undesirables is the act of March 2, 1929 (Public Law No. 935, 70th Cong.), which was introduced by me, but was not referred to the House Committee on Immigration and Naturalization. This measure authorizes the repatriation of insane Americans now or hereafter confined in Canadian hospitals. They are to be returned to the United States and cared for at St. Elizabeths Hospital, Washington, D. C., until it can be established to what State they legally belong. Enactment of this law was urged by both the State and Labor Departments, it being fully appreciated that the United States can not well request foreign governments to take back their people who are not wanted in this country, so long as the various States of our Union decline to receive American citizens who are found undesirable in other countries. We are deporting aliens at the rate of more than 1,000 a month. We ask the countries whence they came to receive them back again. It is only right that we should readmit our own citizens when other nations want to deport them. The new law will take care of this in respect of the insane.

VALIDATION OF CERTAIN DECLARATIONS OF INTENTION

Correction of a difficulty encountered in the administration of the naturalization laws is provided in the Sabath bill, Public Law No. 1011, Seventieth Congress, approved by the President March 4, 1929. In a number of cases aliens born in countries affected by changes of boundaries and transfers of territory resulting from the World War have stated the wrong sovereign when filing declarations of intention or "first papers." Courts have held declarations invalid for this cause. The Sabath Act not only validates such declarations but restates the law so that the same difficulty will not arise in the future. Under the amended provision the declarant will make no renunciation of his old allegiance until the time comes for him to petition for citizenship or "file second papers." The declaration will be in fact what the law always intended it should be—merely a statement of intention to renounce foreign allegiance.

An amendment made to the Sabath Act in the Senate and accepted by the House again renews for two years the short form of naturalization for aliens who served in American military or naval forces during the World War. Due to mistake or misunderstanding, illness in hospital, or other like difficulty, there remain a few ex-service men, foreign born, who desire to acquire American citizenship. During the World War and also during the period from 1926 to 1928 a short form of naturalization, making unnecessary the filing of a declaration of intention, was available to them. By this provision the naturalization of these aliens is facilitated.

PREFERENCE FOR CERTAIN SKILLED WORKMEN

A bill which passed the House but did not pass the Senate was one introduced by Representative FREE, H. R. 16926, which would amend the preference provisions of the immigration act of 1924, as amended, so as to facilitate the admission as quota immigrants of certain highly skilled workmen needed by American industries for the performance of specialized work or for the development of improved methods or processes when labor of like qualificatfons can not be found unemployed in the United States. The desirability of this improvement in the law has been recognized ever since the inception of the policy of restricting immigration by numerical limitation. The contract-labor provisions of the Burnett Immigration Act of 1917 made specific exemptions to facilitate admission of specially qualified workmen, but these exemptions became of little value when the Johnson-Reed Act of 1924 required that all aliens coming for permanent residence must obtain quota immigration visas. To partially take care of the difficulties of the matter, a few skilled workmen have been admitted as visitors outside the quotas in recent years. This has been an unsatisfactory arrangement in many respects, for, although it has permitted the temporary entry of a limited number of persons much needed in particular industries, it has included no provision for their permanent stay or for the entry of their dependents or for their acquisition of American citizenship. The Free bill, it is believed, will cure this situation. I am hopeful that it can be taken up again and passed by both branches of Congress in the Seventy-first Congress.

DEFINITION OF "VISITORS FOR BUSINESS"

Another measure passed by the House which failed of consideration in the Senate was the Box bill, H. R. 16927, which would amend the nonimmigrant provisions (sec. 3) of the immigration act of 1924 by more accurately defining conditions under which a visitor for business may be admitted. This legislation is an outgrowth of attempts to evade the numerical restriction by European-born persons residing in Canada who desire to fulfill contracts of employment in the United States or who knock at our gates for the purpose of looking for work.

It never was the intention of Congress that the term "visitor for business" should include a person entering employment or seeking to enter employment in this country. Yet a strained construction of the immigration act of 1924 read unjustifiably in conjunction with the Jay treaty of 1794 has led certain courts to hold a contrary view, as a result of which some 2,000 aliens have been admitted. The matter is now under consideration in the Supreme Court of the United States. If the court should hold a view opposite to that held by myself and other members of the House Committee on Immigration and Naturalization, I hope the Box bill will be taken up immediately on the convening of the Seventy-first Congress in order that this threatened breakdown of the law may be prevented.

"NATIONAL-ORIGIN" PROVISION

During the first session of the Seventieth Congress both House and Senate voted with practical unanimity to postpone for one year the effective date of the operation of the so-called "national-origin" provision of the immigration act of 1924. The Sixty-ninth Congress had previously done likewise, so that the new system of calculating immigration quotas, originally scheduled to become operative July 1, 1927, can not now go into effect before July 1, 1929.

The "national-origin" proposition is one of those legislative developments naturally to be expected in connection with a large and important national problem when there is confusion of counsel regarding the best or most appropriate means by which to accomplish the same or a similar end. Not dissimilar has been the variety of suggestions proposing solution of the American agricultural problem. Just as everybody agrees that farm relief in some form should be provided, so everybody agrees that numerical limitation of immigration must continue.

The quota calculation basis provided when the immigration act of 1924 passed the House of Representatives—that is, 2 per cent of the foreign born in the United States as of 1890—is a simple, direct, understandable proposition. The "national-origin" scheme adopted by the Senate and accepted in conference to become operative at a future date, while apparently fair and theortically sound, has been sharply criticized by many restrictionists because of its imperfections from a practical standpoint, its complication, and its vagueness.

I am quite agreeable to a further sharp reduction of immigration permissible within the quotas. In fact, I am convinced that additional limitations, both within and without the quotas, will be demanded by the American people within comparatively few years. Therefore I have been loath to accept the view that it is necessary for us to make effective a new and different quota calculation formula at this time. Whatever changes we make ought to be along the line of reduction, and not redistribution, of the quotas.

In the closing days of the Seventieth Congress the insistence of those who look upon the "national-origin" scheme as the sine qua non of immigration restriction prevented adoption of the Chindblom resolution to postpone the proposed new quotas for another year, which passed the House of Representatives but failed to receive consideration in the Senate. If the President, after inquiry, finds that it is mandatory upon him to issue a proclamation on the subject, there will be a new distribution of quotas effective July 1, 1929. In this event, I am of the opinion that strong efforts will be made in the Seventy-first Congress to bring about further radical changes in the allocation of quotas, and it is difficult to predict what the effect will be when various groups of Americans born abroad again undertake, as they did in 1924, to bring political pressure upon their Representatives. I am hopeful that the confusion certain to be brought about by this situation can be allayed, and that whatever further quota changes are enacted will be along the line of additional limitations rather than along the line of favors to powerful nationalistic groups within our country.

CODIFICATION OF STATUTES NEEDED

As a part of my remarks, I append a list of acts of the Seventieth Congress, both first and second sessions, affecting enforcement or administration of the immigration and naturalization laws, which I believe constitute as fine a record as has been made on any similar important legislative subject in any Congress. It must always be borne in mind that our immigration and naturalization statutes are highly technical, involved, and to the lay mind confusing. Unfortunately in some degree they resemble a patchwork, because they have been developed slowly over a long period of years by careful and conscientious public servants holding no desire unjustifiably to disturb accomplishments of the past. Because they are not easily understood, even by lawyers and students, I am hopeful that their restatement and codification can be undertaken in the near future. Meantime, the following enactments may be noted as the accomplishments of the Seventieth Congress:

Act of March 31, 1928 (Public Resolution No. 20, 70th Cong.), "Joint resolution to amend subdivisions (b) and (e) of section 11 of the immigration act of 1924, as amended." (This joint resolution postponed for one year, or until July 1, 1929, the effective date of operation of the "national origin" provision of the immigration act of 1924.)

Act of April 2, 1928 (Public Law No. 234, 70th Cong.), "An act to exempt American Indians born in Canada from the operation of the immigration act of 1924." (This act established admissibility of Canadian-born Indians, clarifying the exclusion provision of the immigration act of 1924.)

Act of May 29, 1928 (Public Resolution No. 61, 70th Cong.), "Joint resolution relating to the immigration of certain relatives of United States citizens and of aliens lawfully admitted to the United States." (This joint resolution readjusted preference provisions of the immigration act of 1924, with a view toward reunion of families in the United States.)

Act of May 29, 1928 (Public Law No. 574, 70th Cong.), "An act to amend section 24 of the immigration act of 1917." (This act increased salaries of immigrant inspectors, provided for their classification, and authorized payment of certain travel expense.)

Act of March 2, 1929 (Public Law No. 962, 70th Cong.), "An act to supplement the naturalization laws, and for other purposes." (This act provides for issuance of nunc pro tunc certificates of arrival; forbids the making of declarations of intention by aliens temporarily admitted; corrects various inequalities in the naturalization laws; increases naturalization fees, and so forth.)

Act of March 4, 1929 (Public, No. 1011, 70th Cong.), "An act relating to declarations of intention in naturalization proceedings." (This act validates certain declarations of intention heretofore rendered invalid by mistake, and extends certain naturalization benefits to alien veterans of the World War.)

Act of March 4, 1929 (Public, No. 1018, 70th Cong.), "An act making it a felony with penalty for certain aliens to enter the United States of America under certain conditions in violation of law." (This act penalizes an alien arrested and deported who enters or attempts to enter after expulsion; also penalizes an alien who enters by means of certain violations of law.)

PARTIAL REPORT OF PRESIDENT COOLIDGE'S ADVISORY COMMITTEE ON VETERANS' PREFERENCE

Mr. FISH. Mr. Speaker, at the request of several of the larger veteran organizations, I am taking advantage of the opportunity at the present time to insert in the RECORD a partial report of the Advisory Committee on Veterans' Preference, appointed by President Coolidge on June 9, 1928. The report is incomplete, as it has been hurriedly drawn up for the purpose of presenting the essential facts to be published in the last available CONGRESSIONAL RECORD dealing with the Congress and administration that terminated on March 4. As soon as practicable, after the convening of the new Congress in special session on April 15, I will avail myself of the first opportunity to explain the report and the work of the President's Advisory Committee on Veterans' Preference to the House of Representatives.

At the present time requests from individual veterans throughout the country are pouring in asking for information regarding the Executive order issued by President Coolidge on March 2, 1929, extending and liberalizing the civil-service regulations in behalf of disabled veterans of all our wars. This Executive order is as follows, and is practically identical with the unanimous recommendations of the President's Advisory Committee, composed of Hon. William T. Deming, president of the United States Civil Service Commission; Gen. Frank T. Hines, Director of the United States Veterans' Bureau; Col. John Thomas Taylor, national legislative representative of the American Legion; and Representative Hamilton Fish, jr., chairman:

EXECUTIVE ORDER

The civil-service rules are hereby amended as indicated below:

1. Examination papers shall be rated on a scale of 100, and the subjects therein shall be given such relative weights as the commission may prescribe. Honorably discharged soldiers, sailors, and marines shall have 5 points added to their earned ratings in examinations for entrance to the classified service. Applicants for entrance examination who, because of disability, are entitled either to a pension by authorization of the Bureau of Pensions or to compensation or training by the Veterans' Bureau, and widows of honorably discharged soldiers, sailors, and marines, and wives of injured soldiers, sailors, and marines who themselves are not qualified but whose wives are qualified for appointment, shall have 10 points added to their earned ratings. In examinations where experience is an element of qualifications, time spent in the military or naval service of the United States during the World War or the war with Spain, shall be credited in an applicant's ratings where the applicant's actual employment in a similar vocation to that for which he applies was temporarily interrupted by such military or naval service but was resumed after his discharge. Competitors shall be duly notified of their ratings.

Rule VI, paragraph 2, is amended to read as follows by adding the words in italics:

2. All competitors rated at 70 or more shall be eligible for appointment, and their names shall be placed on the proper register, according to their ratings; but the names of disabled veterans, their wives, and the widows of honorably discharged soldiers, sailors, and marines shall be placed above all others.

Rule XII, paragraph 5, is amended, by addition of the words in italics, to read as follows:

5. In harmony with statutory provisions, when reductions are being made in the force, in any part of the classified service, no employee entitled to military preference in appointment shall be discharged or dropped or reduced in rank or salary if his record is good, or if his efficiency rating is equal to that of any employee in competition with him who is retained in the service.

CALVIN COOLIDGE.

THE WHITE HOUSE, March 2, 1929.

The United States Civil Service Commission released the following statement describing clearly and accurately the benefits of the Executive order to disabled veterans and to their widows and wives:

UNITED STATES CIVIL SERVICE COMMISSION,
WASHINGTON, D. C.

EXTENSION OF VETERAN PREFERENCE—PRESIDENT COOLIDGE SIGNED ORDER LIBERALIZING PREFERENCE RULES

WASHINGTON, D. C., March 5, 1929.—One of the last acts of President Coolidge before leaving the White House was the signing of an Executive order Saturday night amending the civil-service rules so as to make more liberal the preference allowed in appointments to the civil service under the law which provides for preference for veterans, their widows, and under certain conditions their wives.

The effects of the Executive order are as follows:

(1) The addition of 10 points to the earned rating of a disabled veteran is continued, but under the new order the names of disabled veteran eligibles are placed at the top of the list and are certified ahead of veterans not disabled and nonveterans, regardless of their ratings.

(2) Widows of veterans and wives of veterans who themselves are physically disqualified for Government employment are allowed 10 points added to their earned ratings, instead of the 5 points formerly allowed. Wives and widows of veterans who are allowed the additional 10 points will also be certified ahead of veterans not disabled and nonveterans.

(3) A Government employee entitled to preference under the law and rules is given more liberal preference in retention in the service when reduction of force becomes necessary.

This action of President Coolidge is the result of long deliberation of an advisory committee appointed by the President on June 9, 1928, for the purpose of studying veteran preference laws and rules with a view to liberalizing the prefereuces allowed, the chief purpose of the study being to make more Government positions available to disabled veterans. The advisory committee consisted of Representative Hamilton Fish, jr., chairman; Brig. Gen. Frank T. Hines, Director of the Veterans' Bureau; William C. Deming, President of the Civil Service Commission; and Col. John Thomas Taylor, representing the American Legion.

The following is the unanimous recommendation of the President's Advisory Committee on Veterans' Preference:

NOVEMBER 19, 1928.

MY DEAR MR. PRESIDENT: By Executive order dated June 9, 1928, you appointed the undersigned committee to "Study, analyze, and report on civil-service rules relating to veterans' preference," indicating that the main purpose of the committee would be to ascertain ways and means for making Government positions available for disabled veterans. The committee was also authorized to recommend to you what modifications, if any, should be made to the present Executive order relating to veterans' preference.

The committee has given careful consideration to the existing laws, civil-service rules, and the policies of the several Government departments and bureaus dealing with the question of veterans' preference. A number of public hearings have been held, in order that the committee might obtain from service organizations and other agencies interested in the matter, their views. Much information has been collected and is in the hands of the committee. After a careful study of the entire matter, the committee desires to recommend for your consideration the following, and will, of course, submit such detailed information as you may desire showing the basis for these recommendations:

1. Continue the present addition of 10 points to the rating of disabled veterans and in addition place their names at the head of eligible registers in the order of their ratings.

2. Accord similar preference to the wives of disabled veterans and the widows of veterans coming within the provisions of the preference statute of July 11, 1919.

3. That the question of preference to be accorded able-bodied veterans be given further consideration by your advisory committee.

4. Change the sentence preceding the last sentence in clause (b) of paragraph 1 of civil-service Rule VII, to read as follows:

"An appointing officer who passes over a veteran eligible and selects a nonveteran with the same or lower rating shall file with the Civil Service Commission his reasons, specifically stated, for so doing, which reasons shall be made available to the veteran upon request."

5. That in making promotions, reassignments of personnel within the departments and bureaus, that all veterans will be given consideration in accordance with their efficiency in competition with other employees; that in making separations from Government departments and bureaus, no veteran will be declared surplus, or separated from the position, or if his efficiency rating is equal to that of any other employee in competition with him and under consideration for separation at the time; strengthen the present provisions relating to efficiency ratings and demotions or separations from the service by authorizing the creation within each department or independent establishment of a board of appeals which would be empowered to review any appeal, giving impartial consideration to the facts presented, arrange for an impartial hearing if the employee so desired, and make report with recommendation to the head of the department or independent establishment. Such a board, if desired, could also hear the appeals of nonveteran employees. If this recommendation is approved, the Executive order would need to be carefully drafted in order not to trespass upon the authority granted by law to the Personnel Classification Board with respect to passing upon efficiency ratings and dismissals from the service because of such ratings.

The foregoing recommendations may be accomplished without legislation and are, therefore, within what the committee conceives to be the limitations of your order of June 9, 1928.

The committee, however, has also given consideration to a matter which is closely related to the purpose outlined in the Executive order appointing the committee; that is, the employment of veterans outside of the Federal service. The existing law contemplates that the Department of Labor, with the cooperation of the United States Veterans' Bureau, will be charged with this responsibility. The committee is of the opinion, due principally to the fact that the United States Veterans' Bureau is in closer touch with the veterans generally, that the responsibility for the employment and retention in employment of veterans outside of the Federal service, should be placed in that bureau; and if it meets with your approval, legislation will be asked authorizing such policy and directing that the necessary appropriations are obtained to carry on such duties.

We have the honor to be very respectfully,

W. C. DEMING.

A PARTIAL REPORT OF THE HEARINGS BEFORE THE PRESIDENT'S ADVISORY COMMITTEE ON VETERAN PREFERENCE

The following-named members of the committee were present at the meetings:

Hon. Hamilton Fish, jr., chairman; Gen. Frank T. Hines; G. H. Sweet, alternate for General Hines; Hon. W. C. Deming; W. C. Vipond, alternate; Col. John Thomas Taylor.

The meeting was called to order at 10 a. m., June 20, 1928, by the chairman, pursuant to the Executive order of June 9, 1928, which reads as follows:

"There is hereby created an advisory committee whose duty will be to study, analyze, and report upon the civil-service rules relating to the veterans' preference. Its main purpose will be to ascertain ways and means for making Government positions available for the disabled veterans.

"The committee is empowered to make a survey of the positions available in the executive branch of the Federal Government and to draft recommendations to be submitted to the President not later than December 1, 1928. The report of the committee should include advice as to what modifications, if any, should be made in the present Executive order relating to such veterans' preference.

"I hereby appoint as such advisory committee Hon. Hamilton Fish, jr., Member of the House of Representatives, chairman; Hon. William T. Deming, president Civil Service Commission; Brig. Gen. Frank T. Hines, Director Veterans' Bureau; Col. William J. Donovan, Assistant Attorney General; and Lieut. Col. John Thomas Taylor.

"The respective members of the committee are empowered to designate alternates to act for them whenever necessary.

"CALVIN COOLIDGE.

"THE WHITE HOUSE, June 9, 1928."

The chairman spoke as follows:

"The committee will come to order pursuant to the Executive order which has just been read. It seems to me that this Executive order affords a tremendous opportunity for constructive work in behalf of the disabled soldiers. We all know that the Government has been liberal to the disabled soldiers; we have provided compensation, hospitalization, rehabilitation, and General Hines has done splendid work in behalf of our disabled; but I think we all have to admit that we have been somewhat derelict in providing positions in the Government service for our disabled veterans, which is even more important than compensation. It is no one's fault; it has been more or less overlooked. We are all liable to blame—Congress, the Civil Service Commission, the Veterans' Bureau—and now, 10 years after the armistice, we have an opportunity, through this Executive order, to make an extensive survey and to report to the President ways and means whereby the disabled soldiers can be brought into the Government service. I have traveled a great deal abroad and am familiar with the museums there, and found that nearly all of the guards and watchmen are disabled soldiers. Here I was informed by the personnel clerk in the National Museum that only one or two disabled soldiers of the World War out of more than 300 employees, 80 per cent of whom are watchmen, are employed, and obviously something is wrong. So I think if we go at this and give it the study and the hard work that is necessary, that we can develop a constructive program to enable disabled veterans to qualify for Government positions.

"I want to be sure of the cooperation of the committee, and would like to hear from the members individually.

"General HINES. It seems to me that it would be advisable, as a matter of procedure, that we first analyze exactly what preference is given to the disabled under the existing law and under the policies of the various departments. I have had prepared for me some data along that line, not only the effects of the Executive orders which are being carried out, but the policies of the several Government departments in that regard; and it might be helpful to the members of the committee if I had additional copies prepared and turned over to you. The bureau feels probably more than any other Government agency, possibly with the exception of the Civil Service Commission, that we have a very humane interest in this matter. We have been rather careful in trying to develop a policy within the bureau and getting the cooperation of other departments, and also private corporations. When a man is down and out his only recourse is to come to the bureau for more relief. I feel that any expenditure along that line would be more than justified. A study of the Executive orders and other data indicates that the service man has quite a preference. There are two groups of ex-service men, the disabled man, such as you have just mentioned. He can not carry on because the amount of compensation, even if he is rated permanently total, is not sufficient to maintain a man and his family. That man should be placed first on the list, and a suitable place of employment should be obtained for him so he can carry on. The able-bodied service man who feels, if he is the right type of citizen, that he should carry on just the same as the other citizen, that he is entitled to some consideration as he stood the test of having served his country, but you will find in that group the desire to be left alone. In that group, however, there is a certain small set that gets out of employment from time to time. They are becoming a problem in every community where they are. There should be not only a preference on the part of the Government but on the part of the general employer, and it makes for better citizenship if they are kept employed.

"Now, when we have taken care of those two classes we are sure we are on solid ground. There is one element that should not be lost sight of, and that is the feeling that because of this preference a service man can be inefficient. We must not permit to be worked into any policy of the Government the feeling that because he has been given preference he must not make good. The man not only jeopardizes the status of his honest coworker but he breaks down the morale of the whole establishment. I have listened to the various committees and to what all of them demand in the way of preference. Well, there's a reason for limited preference, but preference does not mean preference when it comes between a test for efficiency and inefficiency. I had a test case only recently in the bureau where the man felt simply because he was ex-service, regardless of length of service and efficiency, he should have preference. That was brought about because of a misunderstanding of the intent of the Executive order. We will find there is an opportunity for constructive work, and one of the very large elements is to make known what preference means.

"So far as cooperating, I will offer, not only my personal services but anything required so far as the bureau is concerned, to bring about the proper solution of this problem. I know the President is anxious that there should be a logical, sensible policy in dealing with the employment of service men. I have an idea, however, that he feels that we must not let preference lead them to believe that efficiency can be forgotten, and there is somewhat a tendency in that direction now, and I know the committee can correct it.

"I have copies of the Executive orders and the policy of the bureau, and I had the personnel division ask other departments informally what their policies were. They differ; there is some difference. The Bureau of Engraving and Printing seems to approach nearer the policy of the Veterans' Bureau than any of the others. At the outset they follow strictly the laws. Well, of course, to do full justice to the service men you probably have to follow the laws strictly, and yet you have to go beyond that, but you are not accomplishing the full intent. I believe you will find that the other departments, while they follow the Executive orders, lack something that we should instill, and that the real interest in these fellows is keeping them employed. That is my view of the situation.

"Mr. DEMING. As president of the Civil Service Commission, and speaking for the commission and staff, we are in sympathy with the general objects of the Executive order. We wish to participate actively in the consideration of the questions involved. It seems to me that first we should analyze the Executive order and simply determine just what is expected of us; second, to determine, so far as possible, what should be done; and, next, what can be done to meet the situation. I am impressed by General Hines's suggestion that it might be worth while to endeavor to interest private employers. It is quite probable that large employers would do more for the veteran in civil life if they gave more thought to it. Here is this great body of millions of men who went to war, a large number possibly needing jobs, some in this immediate community. Why should not the private business do its share as well as the Government? In connection with another committee, this thought has occurred to me: That the primary object of the Government does not provide a job for any individual; it is to transact the Government's business in the most efficient way. Incident to that we have apportionment. I know that our body is willing to go as far as the law and regulations allow in extending assistance to the veteran. In my work it is largely administrative, but I have not attempted to be the authority of the veterans' preference. We have many technicalities, and I have thought it worth while to select Mr. Kenneth Vipond, who is assistant chief examiner, and who has been with the commission a great many years, and, I think, is the best informed on the questions of veterans' preference. I brought Mr. Vipond with me to-day in order that he may be thoroughly in touch with the situation.

"Mr. TAYLOR. I do not think there is any question at all about the desire of the veterans' organizations to have efficiency the prime object so far as jobs is concerned. That has always been our attitude. We want that; but, as a matter of fact, we have had great difficulty with the various Government heads not only in getting the men jobs but in keeping them there, in preventing any reduction in salary. As a specific instance—and this is the thing I wish we could solve—there was a boy in the Treasury Department who had been working there before the war as an expert accountant. Along came the war, and he went away and was gone two years. He came back to the Treasury. I do not think the same job, but some job that suited him. Very small salary. He was married, two children, and was starting to buy himself a house on Fifteenth Street and Florida Avenue. When he came to see me he was getting $3,100 a year; he was buying a house and supporting two children. His wife also worked when they were first married. His rating right along was between 85 and 90 per cent. Suddenly he received notice from a man over there, not a service man, that he was to be transferred to New York City at an increase in salary of $100 a year. He could not move to New York City. He went to see the head of the department and explained to him how we was buying a house, etc.; that he could not possibly live in New York and have his family here, and he would practically lose everything he put into his house, and he just did not know what to do, and his chief gave him the choice of quitting. That was the only alternative. He came to me and I went to see the chief, and it was perfectly obvious that he did not have much sympathy with the service men. In the same department were men working and their wives working, others whose husbands worked in other departments of the Government. It seems to me it would be a very simple matter to transfer one of those married women. His record was between 85 and 90 per cent. This particular month it was cut down to 78 per cent. I do not know how it is done. He claims that after 10 years' service he is better qualified, and here his rating was reduced to such a point that he had the choice of taking a transfer or getting out. He had to take the transfer. It was delayed a month, but he had to go. We are not empowered to go into a matter of that kind, but I have cases like that every week. What's the good of talking of getting a man a job if it means almost suicide for him—as that boy was on the verge of suicide—and his boss said to me, 'We are raising his salary.' That raise amounted to $100 a year, $8 a month, to live in New York. I wish we could help that kind of a problem."

The committee agreed to draw up a letter to be sent different departments of the Government asking for the number of employees, number of veterans, number of married women, etc.

(The committee adjourned at 11 o'clock to meet the following morning at 10 o'clock.)

The meeting was called to order at 10 o'clock by the chairman. The proposed letter to department heads was read by the chairman, and General Hines suggested that a copy of the Executive order be transmitted with it. Mr. Taylor made the motion that this letter be sent to all departments; seconded by Mr. Deming. The letter reads as follows:

"Pursuant to an Executive order issued recently by President Coolidge appointing an advisory committee to analyze and report upon the civil-service rules relating to veterans' preference, and to make a survey of the positions available in the executive branch of the Federal Government for the disabled veterans, I am writing to ask you to kindly furnish me with the following information:

"Total number of men employees in your department; total number of women employees; total number of veterans; total number of veterans of the Spanish War; total number of veterans of the World War; total number of disabled veterans; total number of disabled veterans of the Spanish War; total number of disabled veterans of the World War; number of wives and husbands in your department, including other members of the family, such as mothers, fathers, sons, and daughters; number of married women who have husbands in other executive branches of the Government; total number of employees under civil-service regulations; and total number of employees not under civil service.

"Thanking you in advance for this information, I am,

"Respectfully yours,

"HAMILTON FISH, Jr.,
"Chairman President's Advisory Committee on Veterans' Preference,
"Washington, D. C.

"Attached inclosed copy of Executive order."

Mr. Paul J. McGahan, national executive committeeman of the American Legion of the District of Columbia, appeared before the committee and read the three resolutions adopted by the special convention of the District of Columbia Department of the American Legion, held at Washington, D. C., April 11 and 12, 1928, as follows:

"Whereas on July 11, 1919, the Congress of the United States passed an act (41 Stat. 37) which provides:

"'That hereafter in making appointments to clerical and other positions in the executive branch of the Government in the District of Columbia or elsewhere preference shall be given to honorably discharged soldiers, sailors, and marines, and widows of such, and to wives of injured soldiers, sailors, and marines, who themselves are not qualified but whose wives are qualified to hold such positions'; and

"Whereas the Attorney General of the United States, on April 13, 1920 (32 Op. A. G. 174), at the instance and request of the United States Civil Service Commission and the President, construed said act and holding it mandatory upon the appointing officers of the Government to appoint to civil-service positions those preferred by said act, using, among other, the following language:

"'The preference given by that provision is a preference over all other persons who may be eligible to appointment. No exceptions are expressed and none can be read into this act. Its provisions are mandatory and must be strictly complied with. Your question must, therefore, be answered in the negative.'

"Whereas the Civil Service Commission under existing law has no power, either directory or mandatory, to supervise appointments of employees in the civil service of the United States; and

"Whereas the preference granted by the aforesaid act of Congress is rendered ineffective by Executive Order No. 3801 issued March 3, 1923, wherein the appointing officer is permitted to pass over the name of a veteran and appoint a nonveteran by placing his reasons in his own department for so doing: Now, therefore, be it

"Resolved, That the American Legion, Department of the District of Columbia, petition the President of the United States to issue an Executive order repealing Executive Order No. 3801, with instructions to the Civil Service Commission and executive departments and independent establishments of the Government situated in the District of Columbia and elsewhere to administer the act of Congress of July 11, 1919, in accordance with its intent as construed by the Attorney General as aforesaid; be it further

"Resolved, That copies of this resolution be forwarded to the national executive committee of the American Legion, the President of the United States, the Civil Service Commission, and to every ex-service man in the Congress of the United States; and be it further

"Resolved, That the national executive committeeman be, and he is hereby, instructed to present this resolution for consideration of the national executive committee of the American Legion and that he do his utmost to secure favorable action by the national executive committee and the national legislative committee of the American Legion."

The method used in making efficiency ratings was discussed by Mr. McGahan and General Hines.

Mr. Harlan Wood, chairman of the veterans' preference legislation committee of the American Legion, discussed the manner of selecting appointees from the civil service registers. Acts of Congress and opinions of the Attorney General on this point were read. Contended that the act of July 11, 1919, is still in existence, and the Executive Order No. 3801 nullifies this and substitutes therefor preference of 5 and 10 points without sufficient authority, and that at the present time veterans who have passed with a passing mark should be exhausted on the register before nonservice men are selected for appointment.

(Here Mr. Vipond, assisting Mr. Deming, furnished figures to the effect that for the last fiscal year there were 48,000 preference applicants and 197,000 nonpreference applicants; 9,947 preference applicants appointed and 28,000 nonpreference; one-fourth of the appointments were preference.)

Mr. J. F. Beattie, chairman of the veterans' preference committee of the Veterans of Foreign Wars of the District of Columbia, took the stand and discussed in detail the method of making efficiency ratings. He stated the only solution of this problem was the placing of the United States Bureau of Efficiency, United States Personnel Classification Board, and the United States Workmen's Compensation Commission under the Civil Service Commission, as these three agencies have to do with personnel functions.

(Meeting adjourned at 12 o'clock.)

The meeting was called to order at 10 o'clock by the chairman, Mr. FISH.

Mr. Rowan B. Tuley, of the Post Office Department, appeared before the committee and discussed the matter of appointments in his department, stressing the physical requirements necessary. The following figures were given covering appointments in the largest cities of the United States:

SUBCLERICAL

San Francisco, out of 100 appointees, 42 had preference.

Philadelphia (large industrial city), out of 100 appointees, 14 had preference.

Chicago, out of 100 appointees, 16 had preference.

St. Louis, out of 100 appointees, 23 had preference.

New York (largest clerical force maintained here), out of 100, only 2 had military preference.

General Hines asked the reason for the low percentage of veteran appointments in New York City. Mr. Tuley was unable to give the reason; stated there may have been a considerable number who failed to qualify, but the possibilities were that the veterans in that locality either have failed in the mental test or else they were more profitably employed.

Out of 40 subclerical substitutes in the post office in Washington, 30 had military preference, the largest percentage of any city in America.

Mr. Tuley gave the following outline of the positions in the Post Office Department for the period ending May 31 of this year:

Assistant postmasters	2,700
Clerks	69,851
City letter carriers	51,278
Village letter carriers	895
Watchmen, messengers, and laborers	4,539
Substitute clerks	11,500
Substitute letter carriers	10,900
Special delivery messengers (these are personal employees of the postmaster and are not civil service; paid on fee basis)	3,500
Motor-vehicle men	3,776
Substitutes	731

There are 15,200 clerks appointed locally by postmasters and paid the sum they choose to pay them within the limits allowed by the appropriation; sometimes they pay in excess from their own means. A majority of women are employed because they can be secured for less pay.

Mr. Tuley, in response to the chairman's question, stated that as of May 31, the employees of the Post Office Department, civil service and noncivil service, numbered 229,447, not including 40,000 rural carriers.

The chairman requested Mr. Tuley to furnish, in writing, the number of subclerical appointments made in New York from the last few eligible lists, in order that a comparison might be made.

General Pershing appeared before the committee, and spoke as follows:

"I am, of course, in entire sympathy with the idea of giving preference to the veterans of our wars. I need hardly express myself, it may be taken for granted, that I would hold such a view as that, not only because of the fact that they are veterans and have served in wars, but because, as a rule, in my opinion, they are better equipped, all other things being equal, to perform such duties than would be the average man without the experience of actual military service. I am under the decided impression, however, that, although the law provides that preference should be given these men, it has not been done. There seems to be no agency or authority which could compel the heads of bureaus or departments to make selections from such a list of men, and while I have no statistics on the subject, I know there are a great many veterans who say it is difficult to get employment, and I have myself interceded in a number of cases."

"Mr. FISH. At the present time there is a preference law which has been nullified by Executive order, and it is ignored. The only preference that is given to the disabled and other soldiers is the 5 and 10 points. As a result, the disabled soldiers are not getting positions in the Government. Their physical requirements are against them. We want to get your views with reference to a disabled man, over 50 per cent disabled, who can not live on $50 a month, whether he should be taken care of in positions in the Government service. We would like to get your views as to preference to men who are badly disabled."

"General PERSHING. I think if they are otherwise qualified under the provisions of the law to perform the duties of the position, that naturally the man with the greatest degree of disability should be given preference. The point I am trying to bring out is that there is an impression among us that while in the examinations preference is given of 5 or 10 points, in the actual selection of men there is probably no direct or guiding authority to say that such and such a man should be employed. It is left to the discretion of the bureau chiefs, and they do not comply with the law, and it seems to me there is the weakness. If, perhaps, the Civil Service Commission could be given authority to say you must take this man and that man, some one then would be placed in authority. It would do the justice to the disabled soldier that we would like to see done."

"Mr. DEMING. In your visits to foreign countries, have you had occasion to note how they treat the disabled soldier?"

"General PERSHING. I know something of what is being done in France. They have given preference there, and while we know how many disabled men there are in France, you rarely see one around on the street in want, and I know, without being able to give you the percentage, they are given a very great preference wherever it is possible. More so than with us."

"General HINES. I talked with the Governor of Pensions on that point and he told me that 80 per cent of the employees in his bureau were ex-service and veterans, and that is exceedingly high. I think the Veterans' Bureau would run pretty close to 70 per cent. I would like to ask you, General, this one question. This problem is divided into three steps, first, placing the veteran on the eligible list; second, the selection for appointment and then the preference to be given when he is in the department, or in the Government service, for promotion and that sort of thing. I wonder if you had formed any ideas as to how this preference could be given."

"General PERSHING. I had not given the matter any particular thought, but I think the minute the man is on the list, he should have first preference."

"General HINES. Would it be your idea that he head the list, and that all veterans be taken care of before nonveterans are appointed. They are rated from 100 to 60. It has been suggested that all the veterans be put at the top of the list, even the man who gets the lowest mark in any examination, and I imagine those positions change as you give new examinations; that appointments be made following the list from top to bottom, but in no case take a nonveteran until the list of veterans has been exhausted?"

"General PERSHING. I hardly know how to answer that. Of course, we would all like to see the veteran given preference; but there might be some positions which would require a very high technical knowledge for which you might not find a veteran qualified. It might not be entirely fair to put them all at the top of the list."

"Mr. TAYLOR. If he was not qualified, he would not have passed the examination."

"General PERSHING. Suppose I would want a very efficient person for this job, and I would prefer to have a man with 100 per cent than a man with 60 per cent. I should think there would be some way of equalizing that without being radical in one direction or other, and to distribute that in a list by some rule which would be fair to all."

"General HINES. I think you will find from experience that the man with the rating of 100 per cent is not the best qualified."

"General PERSHING. As I understand it, you have a probationary period anyhow, and it might be entirely safe with that understanding to place a veteran regardless of their relative rating; and if they do not make good, it could be determined at the expiration of the probationary period."

"Mr. TAYLOR. In 1919 Congress inaugurated a law for that very thing, but subsequently an Executive order was issued which in effect nullified that. The Executive order grants 5 and 10 points."

"Mr. FISH. As a matter of fact, it has been developed here that prior to the war, all veterans were given absolute preference when they qualified. To-day that is not the case at all."

"General PERSHING. You can see that this law might work to the disadvantage of the veteran and he might not have a show. The man with the mark of 100 is not always the most efficient person. I would like to say another word. I am only speaking as it comes to me, as I have not had occasion to give the matter any thought; but with your probationary provision, I should think it would be entirely safe to put all veterans at the top of the list, particularly disabled veterans."

"Mr. FISH. The Government has been fairly liberal to the able-bodied veteran and it has been developed here that 25 per cent of appointments are veterans, but there is great difficulty regarding the disabled. Can you make out any suggestion as to how we can find out how foreign governments are taking care of their disabled?"

"General PERSHING. The War Department could get it rather than the State Department."

"General HINES. We probably could get it from our agencies, but, of course, we deal mostly through the State Department. The War Department may have something on file."

"General PERSHING. It being essentially closely related to the military, it would appear that they could readily get the data, as they are interested."

"Mr. FISH. It is really a part of the military."

"Mr. TAYLOR. Our War Department has never interested itself in it, in the civilian soldier after his return, has it? That is, as far as his employment is concerned."

"General PERSHING. As far as authority is given, preference is given to the old soldier. That has been the practice in the past."

"Mr. TAYLOR. You mean retired?"

"General PERSHING. Retired or disabled. They are given consideration by officers if they have anything to say about it. I am not posted in the matter, but in closing would like to emphasize what I have said—that I am very strong in the belief and in the hope that something more may be done for the disabled veteran than has been done so far."

"Mr. FISH. You have been to the Louvre in Paris and seen the guards there. Down here at the Smithsonian and National Museum 80 per cent are guards, and out of more than 300 employees only 1 or 2 are disabled veterans."

"General PERSHING. That emphasizes the point that rather appeals to me—that there should be some central agency with interest in the matter with authority to say to bureau chiefs you must take this man."

"General HINES. You use the term 'bureau chiefs'; you mean 'bureau heads'?"

"General PERSHING. Yes. We all know that regardless of the civil-service rules and all that sort of thing, Senators and Representatives say they would like to have so-and-so appointed."

"Mr. DEMING. His name must be on a list of three."

"General PERSHING. May not be in theory."

Admiral Hughes, Chief, Bureau of Yards and Docks, Navy Department, took the stand and stated that in the Navy Department the veteran is given so much preference that sometimes it lowers the efficiency of the office.

Mr. Curtis, chief clerk, Navy Department, stated it is the intention of the Navy Department that the veteran have preference, that efficiency being equal the preference is most decided. The Navy Department has a high degree of efficiency.

Lieut. Col. U. S. Grant, 3d, in charge of public buildings and parks, took the stand, and in response to the chairman's request for information regarding the employment of retired noncommissioned officers of the Regular Army as guards, watchmen, etc., spoke as follows:

"We are maintaining and operating the Federal buildings over considerable increase in salary paid and increase in fuel for less per square foot than before the war. That could not be done unless we had a very efficient organization, unless we had built up and also reduced the number of employees to the minimum. The guards are one of the lowest-paid people and yet we get many of them. Quite a number are on the retired list of the Army. General Pershing made the suggestion that one way of accomplishing this purpose would be to make the disabled veteran certified by the Veterans' Bureau and whose record has been established by the Civil Service Commission—that is, not just anyone who comes in and says he is disabled—but if the person who was certified by the Veterans' Bureau and the commission as coming under the head of a disabled veteran could be appointed to a position regardless of his place on the list, perhaps not required that he should be appointed, as he may not be particularly fitted for the special position, if he could be appointed I am sure the situation would change. As it is now we can not appoint him unless he is one of three certified by the commission, unless his examination mark, plus his 10 or 15 points of preference, puts him ahead of the other people."

"Mr. DEMING. You would not distribute the certificate?"

"Colonel GRANT. My idea was that the commission would certify to us three men who are at the top of the list of eligibles, and then three men who are on the list of preference, then let the administrative officer be required to pick out the preference man unless there was some reason for not doing so."

"General HINES. You limit that to the disabled man?"

"Colonel GRANT. Yes. It is not my understanding that the present system is working unsatisfactorily to the able-bodied man. I do not know the law as it stands would apply to that, but it seems to me the Government's obligation is greater to the man who is disabled. The moral obligation of the Government is quite different."

"Mr. DEMING. You think we should find some system where some special consideration could be given the disabled?"

"Colonel GRANT. Yes."

"Mr. FISH. The Civil Service Commission has informed me that at least 25 per cent of all appointments are veteran, and we can not ask much more than that."

"Colonel GRANT. I believe that preference for the disabled veteran could be given in the same manner as the Executive order which gives preference to our guard force of retired men."

"Mr. FISH. How many of these are veterans of the World War?"

"Colonel GRANT. I do not quite know, as I was not sure what the substance of this hearing was going to be."

"Mr. FISH. Do you know how many disabled soldiers?"

"Colonel GRANT. I can give you that: 353 guards to date; 263 have some sort of military preference and 87 no preference; 15 of this 87 come from the retired men of the police and fire departments who have no military preference. The guards have been getting $85 a month when they start, and there is an increase of $5 in three steps, but it is very gradual. A small percentage get that increase, about half. Under the Executive order of March 9, 1925, 143 are now on the force. My impression is they get about $50 a month retirement pay."

"Mr. FISH. What is the character of the veterans who have military service?"

"Colonel GRANT. Most satisfactory. They are particularly fitted for filling the position of guard. I feel that if you are going to put the disabled man at the head of the list, it should not be without any alternative to the appointing officer; that he should still be allowed to select the man more suitable to the job. Retired men are fitted for the position of guard, but, on the other hand, it is not suited to a disabled man. One of the main features in that reduction has been the changing of the character of the duties of the guard. Formerly we had at every main entrance of the building two guards. Some of the least important entrances had one guard. One of these guards was supposed part of the time to patrol the building, but some one had to be at each door all the time. That had its use during the war, but we have found since that that could be done away with, and now we have one man at the main entrance and then have a certain number of men patrolling the building. I think that that has increased the efficiency and the protection against fire, which in our temporary buildings is the main danger. The man who has been seriously injured can not carry on a 2-hour constant patrol. The question arises whether that can be overlooked. There are practically no positions on our guard force in which a man is not required to do a lot of walking up and down stairs. In case of fire the guard has to handle the hose and fire extinguisher, 40 or 50 pounds, and they are quite heavy; you can see a disabled man could not handle that. The physical condition of the man is quite important."

"Mr. FISH. The man who has lost one arm is apt to be in good physical condition."

"Mr. DEMING. You would not recommend a modification of the Executive order that would eliminate these retired veterans?"

"Colonel GRANT. No, sir; I think they are most valuable, and as a result we get very good service at a minimum cost to the Government. The order could be amended to make the veteran who has had over a certain amount of service come in under which the veteran with a certain disability could be appointed."

Mr. Curtis agreed with Colonel Grant's suggestion that disabled veterans head the eligible list.

(Meeting adjourned until 10 o'clock, June 27, 1928.)

The meeting was called to order by the chairman at 10 o'clock; proposed letter to the Secretary of State requesting that a special circular letter be addressed to each ambassador and minister for information relative to the action taken by foreign governments in taking care of veterans was read by the chairman. The letter reads as follows:

The honorable the SECRETARY OF STATE,
Washington, D. C.

SIR: I have the honor to invite your attention to an Executive order, copy inclosed, issued under date of June 9, 1928, by the President of the United States, creating an advisory committee whose duties will be to study, analyze, and report upon the civil-service rules relating to veterans' preference. Its main purpose will be to ascertain ways and means for making Government positions available for the disabled veterans.

It has been deemed advisable by the committee to enlist the good offices of your department with the view of ascertaining what methods are now in use by Great Britain, France, Italy, Germany, Canada, and Belgium relating to veterans' preference.

May I, therefore, on behalf of the committee, request that you will cause to be issued a special circular letter addressed to each ambassador and minister of this Government resident abroad, with specific instructions to make immediate contact, through proper channels, with such governments to secure all available information as to what steps are being taken looking to the furnishing of positions for unemployed World War veterans through civil-service preference, and particularly what preferences are given the disabled veterans to enable them to obtain employment in government service and if any special positions, such as guards in public buildings or museums, are made available for veterans or disabled veterans? The number of veterans appointed since the signing of the armistice is also desired.

Respectfully yours,

HAMILTON FISH, Jr.,
Chairman President's Advisory Committee on Veterans' Preference,
Washington, D. C.

Maj. Gen. John A. Lejeune, commandant United States Marine Corps, appeared before the committee and stated, in his opinion, Congress has been very liberal in enacting legislation for the benefit of ex-service men, but that it was the duty of the Government to find employment for men disabled in the service. General Lejeune stated that while there are several beneficial laws and regulations and civil-service rules granting preference, it does not care for a large class. He stated he had no concrete proposition to offer except that the methods of employing disabled men in the Government service should be liberalized. Agreed with the chairman's suggestion that additional preference should be given to the badly disabled soldier—i. e., those about 40 per cent; stated the Government owes a moral obligation to the badly disabled soldier; and that it would be better, in his opinion, to give him a job rather than compensation, as it increases his self-respect. Every disabled soldier should be placed in the Government service when he can do the work efficiently; of course, General Lejeune stated, we can not afford to ignore efficiency.

The Secretary of Labor, John J. Davis, appeared before the committee and made the following statement:

"We have directed, Mr. Chairman, the Director General of Employment to make every effort to secure positions, not only in the Government but with private concerns, for these disabled men, and also the chairman of the Federal Board for Vocational Training for the rehabilitation of the men in industry to try to get them positions. I have very strong convictions on it myself, and I have prepared something I would like to read to you. I want to urge the appointment of disabled men to positions in the Government service wherever they may be qualified. There are thousands of positions in the Government service which the disabled soldiers are well qualified to fill. Our people have given innumerable pledges to the effect that nothing was too good for them. In the foreign countries disabled veterans are found in government buildings in large numbers. I find them also in the private corporations; in the first-class hotels the disabled men are the ones that are operating the hotels. These disabled veterans are very good to be about, as they are reliable and trustworthy and are safe to have about the business.

"As I traveled around inspecting factories—and I did it from the Russian frontier to the north of Scotland—I found the pride of the management of that particular factory was when he pointed out and said we are caring for these men after the war with a great deal of pleasure, as we recognize the service and our promise to them before they entered the service. I urge that additional preference be granted by the civil service to badly disabled—for example, 50 per cent or above—and that every legitimate effort be made to give them positions. We should not use the "sob-sister" plan of giving them work. We should give them to understand when they take these positions they are assuming responsibilities, and emphasize to them that they must carry on the work and do it well. If we go and extend too much sympathy they think that is just what they are there for, and if we could get in the minds of the large employers that they can do the work they would be very glad to give them positions. I am very strong for the disabled man; I am for the soldier now in peace as I was in war, and we should keep all of the promises that we made."

Mr. Fish stated he would ask the committee to get up a letter calling the attention of the big employers of labor and ask them to give further consideration to the disabled men looking for work.

Mr. Davis continued:

"You should get sufficient appropriations from Congress to get one man who would specialize in this work. The President recommended an additional appropriation of $20,000 for the Employment Service, and it was agreed to in the Senate but failed in the House, and I am sure if we do that and put some real man on there that did not do anything but specialize—and not only in the Government but in private industries—we could get the disabled men jobs."

In response to the question of Mr. Edward McE. Lewis (alternate for Colonel Taylor), Secretary Davis stated he did not think the foreign countries give more benefits to their former soldiers than the industries in this country; further stated the foreign manufacturer is no different from our own; in fact, ours are friendlier; the employers of labor in this country are giving preference and some are taking back their former employees; the only difference between Europe and the United States looking after their disabled soldiers is that they are organized on the other side and we are not; Secretary Davis stated you will find a ready response from the manufacturers and the employers of this country if we get organized.

Efficiency is always kept in mind; Secretary Davis does not think the veteran himself wants a job just to get sympathy, but he wants to render service, and we must give him to understand that he must render service.

Mr. Taylor, representing the Smithsonian Institution and the National Museum, appeared before the committee and was asked how appointments were made in these institutions; was advised it was the understanding of the committee that there are 368 employees, 80 per cent of whom are guards, watchmen, etc., and that only two or three are disabled veterans of the war.

Mr. Taylor stated the committee had been misinformed; that out of 368 employees, 75 are veterans, and 80 per cent of these veterans are watchmen and laborers. Stated they follow the prescribed rules of the civil service in making appointments; that they have exhibits, collections, and things that are worth untold millions of dollars, and it is necessary to have the right kind of men to guard them; they always help the veteran if he can comply with regulations, but it is necessary to have able-bodied men. Three disabled men are employed; rendering efficient service, as far as it can be ascertained; 14 or 15 served in the Spanish war, 50 in the World War, 7 served in both.

Mr. Taylor was requested by the chairman to submit in writing just what positions could be made available for disabled soldiers.

Mr. Edwin S. Bettelheim, jr., chairman national legislative committee, Veterans of Foreign Wars, read a carefully prepared and comprehensive statement to the committee.

Mr. Harry Crews, representative of the Veterans' Association of Federal Employees, Brooklyn Navy Yard, Brooklyn, N. Y., appeared before the committee and discussed the method of efficiency ratings with particular reference to the "juggling" of ratings and cited specific instances in which employees were done an injustice. Suggested that in cases where a man's rating is slashed his superior officer be consulted with first, so he could have a chance to defend the man. Was advised by the chairman that the committee would endeavor to work something constructive along these lines, so that when a veteran is reduced he can go to some one and have his case reviewed, as is done in the Veterans' Bureau, where General Hines has established advisory boards.

Mr. Joseph F. Beattle, past former commander of the Veterans of Foreign Wars, appeared before the board and stated he was in absolute accord with the recommendations of Mr. Harlan Wood, and that he would submit his recommendations in writing; stated he was interested in the preference in rating and that, in his opinion, the one disadvantage in the rating of personnel is the 82.5 basis.

Mr. Harlan Wood again took the stand and discussed retention preference and the method of effecting efficiency ratings; stated such ratings are produced to a point to conform to the general average clause in the appropriation act rather than to mark as a matter of fact what the relative rating is; urged the abolishment of the United States Bureau of Efficiency, United States Personnel Classification Board, and the United States Employees' Compensation Commission and the transfer of these functions to the Civil Service Commission. Stated the elimination of the Bureau of Efficiency will cure all ills and save the American people thousands of dollars; set forth the primary and fundamental functions of these agencies, all of which are performing a personnel function; discussed the action of the Public Printer in releasing ex-service employees without notice in March, 1925; stated rating clerks in the Government departments in some instances do not understand veteran preference, one having told an ex-service employee he was entitled to five points preference in his efficiency rating.

The meeting was called to order by the chairman at 10 o'clock.

Mr. James G. Yaden, commander of the Spanish-American War Veterans of the District of Columbia, appeared before the committee and urged that the same preference that is granted to veterans for admission to examination be granted to veterans in connection with promotions and transfer where an examination is required. Under the rules as they now exist, Mr. Yaden stated, the commissioners hold they are without authority to grant the 5 and 10 points in an examination involving a promotion or transfer. Mr. Vipond stated the civil-service rules provide for 5 and 10 points for entrance positions. The chairman stated the Civil Service Commission has complied with the regulations, but whether they could go further, he did not know; it was the duty of the committee to advise on questions of this kind. Mr. Yaden also urged that the same preference that is granted on entrance into service be taken into consideration, and this should be mandatory in any reduction in force or any dismissal whatever.

Mr. C. D. Bray, chief clerk, Alien Property Custodian, appeared before the committee and stated that 55 of their employees are under civil service and paying into the retirement fund; 130 noncivil service. Was requested to make an estimate as to the number of positions that could be filled by disabled soldiers.

Capt. W. L. Mattocks, representing the national legislative committee of the Spanish-American War Veterans, appeared before the committee and stated that he had many complaints regarding efficiency ratings, and recommended the creation of a board of appeals beyond the hiring and discharging authority of the department, an independent body, where the employee would have a chance to state his case whenever he felt he was not being treated fairly. Stated all Spanish War veterans have reached an age beyond 50, and when these men who have been with the Government over 20 years are let out in a reduction in force they may as well jump in the river so far as finding jobs is concerned; stated that in a reduction in force consideration should be given to those who have been in the service a long time.

Miss Mary McNally, secretary National Federation of Federal Employees, appeared before the committee and stated the greatest need in the Government service is the establishment of a fact-finding commission, which would have all information regarding each employee, their service in various wars, salaries, promotions, etc. This would be of value to the committee now and it would not be necessary to write out for it. It should be kept for all commissions who wish to investigate the Government service from any point of view.

Miss McNally further stated the federation always has complaints about the reduction in efficiency ratings, and stated there should be some place where an employee could go as soon as his rating drops to find out the reason for it. Stated the department should have the first chance to correct any inequality; while the present system is good, the administration is not so good; suggested an efficiency rating board within the department, and that employees be rated only in competition with others in their immediate unit, and that final review be made outside the department.

Miss McNally said the committee should find places for veterans and should investigate the tendency to place enlisted men in civilian positions and that this condition is growing; has found very little feeling between the nonpreference civil-service employee and the war veteran, but there is a great deal for those who worked at a desk during the war just as the civil-service employee without preference; also a feeling against the retired veteran drawing his pension coming back into civilian position.

Regarding the employment of whole families in the Government service, Miss McNally stated she thinks it is very unwise; has frequently found that they are not in the same family within the meaning of the law; many criticisms received, particularly during a reduction in force, developed that while they belong in the same family, they were not living under the same roof; thinks the regulation as it is now is ample; that is, not more than two in a family and a family is defined as those living under the same roof and contributing to household expenses.

The chairman requested the committee to authorize him to hold hearings in New York in regard to the Emergency Fleet Corporation, which does not come under civil service; also to hold hearings at West Point to find out the conditions there. Motion made by Mr. Lewis; seconded by Mr. Deming.

Mr. L. C. O'Brien, assistant secretary, Farm Loan Board, appeared before the committee, and stated they have approximately 80 men in the field and approximately 30 in Washington. Of the Washington force, the balance are women and most of those are stenographers and typists; only four clerical positions in Washington, and these are in the file room and are exclusively female at this time; six messengers, who have been with the board for years; some are veterans; some are wounded, but it is not known if they are drawing pensions; one disabled, not known whether he gets a pension; most of positions filled by specialists. Personnel of Farm Loan Board is exempt specifically from the operation of the civil service act by the Federal farm act. Preference is always given to ex-service men and all recent appointments have been ex-service. Force has increased from 61 to 106, but it may be possible to release some when the work falls down.

Mr. J. E. Harper, chief, division of appointments, Treasury Department, stated the Treasury Department is one of the largest departments, having between 14,000 and 15,000 employees in Washington and more than 30,000 in the field throughout the United States. In Washington, with a force of that size, Mr. Harper stated, there must be a great many positions that could be filled by disabled men; that is, a man without a leg, such as bookkeepers, general clerical work, auditors, etc. Has been policy of the chief clerk to select for the guard force men with military experience. It is necessary for the guards to be active men. They have very few places where a man could sit all day long. Deputy collectors of internal revenue are the only positions that are excepted from civil service, outside of Farm Loan Bureau, the Secretary, Assistant Secretary, and their secretaries.

The chairman suggested that an order be issued to the prohibition administrators throughout the country that in dropping employees in a reduction of force, in releasing men who have not qualified under civil service, they retain those veterans whose marks are 55 or above, to give them a chance in case something develops.

Mr. Harper stated that while the Treasury Department has had large reductions in force, he did not recall that any person with military preference has lost his job as a result of the reduction.

The chairman cited a case of a man who would shortly appear before the committee, William R. Clements; has qualified under civil service and has been consistently refused appointment because he has arrested tuberculosis; Mr. Harper was asked if that would be held against him in the Treasury Department; stated it would not personally, but he could not say whether the man at the head of the activity would take that into consideration; further stated that in connection with all appointments, reinstatements, etc., a person must go to the public health dispensary and get a medical certificate by examination and such examination is never questioned; does not believe the Treasury Department would hold arrested tuberculosis against a person.

Mr. E. J. Skidmore, personnel officer of the Shipping Board and Fleet Corporation, appeared before the board and stated he believed his report to the committee would show a good percentage of veterans, a number disabled. When he was first appointed the force numbered 15,000 and at the present time there are only 3,800. In the reduction of force, some veterans had to be released, but they are given preference. There are 835 employees on the pay roll of the Emergency Fleet Corporation, some being men trained by the Veterans' Bureau after the war.

Mr. William R. Clements appeared before the committee and told of his inability to secure a position on account of the fact that he has arrested tuberculosis; was rehabilitated by the Veterans' Bureau as typewriter repairman, and passed the civil-service examination for this position; has only held temporary position of three months with Quartermaster Department; also employed by Office of Public Buildings and Parks in several capacities; but work was too strenuous; chairman suggested that he see Mr. Sweet and Mr. Vipond to get his case straightened out; chairman wanted the committee to know the man was turned down on account of arrested tuberculosis; Mr. Deming suggested the Government should have a coordinating employment agency to hear such cases.

The chairman asked the committee to empower him to investigate the post-office department in New York with regard to veterans' preference in New York City; motion made by Mr. Lewis; seconded by Mr. Deming.

Proposed letter to large employers of labor in the United States was read, as follows:

"GENTLEMEN: I desire to call your personal attention, and the attention of your corporation, to a matter of importance—the employment of the ex-soldiers of the World War, who were in some way handicapped by their military service so that they could not "carry on" in their pre-war occupation, and for whom there has been no armistice.

"The United States Veterans' Bureau has trained approximately 100,000 of these veterans. When the Veterans' Bureau 'rehabilitated' them, it pronounced them capable of 'carrying on' the duties of the employment objective for which they were trained.

"The Government, after rehabilitating these men, both vocationally and physically, calls upon industry to take them into employment and to do the part of good citizenship in helping the country as a whole to do its full share in standing back of the men who 'offered their all' for the cause of right and their country's welfare.

"Most of the European countries have seen fit to impose upon industry definite obligations in regard to the employment of their ex-service men, and especially the disabled ones. This obligation has generally taken the form of urging that every business establishment shall show a certain percentage of ex-soldier help.

"The United States Government, through veterans' preference, is trying to find positions for which disabled veterans are qualified in the Government service. I am writing to ask if it will not be possible for your corporation, in its large turnover of personnel each year, to utilize a certain number of these men, and in that way aid the Government to assist them to again stand on their own feet.

"The advisory committee appointed by President Coolidge has no desire to ask any corporation to place men who are not efficient and able to perform good work. I am sure you appreciate the importance of obtaining the cooperation and assistance of the large industrial companies in the United States in placing our war veterans, and more particularly our disabled veterans.

"Will you please write me your views on this matter and any suggestions you might care to submit?

"Yours very truly,

"HAMILTON FISH, Jr.,
"Chairman President's Advisory Committee on "Veterans' Preference."

Motion made by Mr. Lewis that letter be sent out; seconded by Mr. FISH.

The chairman thanked the members of the committee for their attention, attendance, and earnest cooperation.

(Meeting adjourned until a date to be announced later.)

The committee resumed its hearings on November 13, 1928. Meeting called to order at 10 o'clock by the chairman.

The committee discussed the subjects presented to them for study, namely, veterans' preference, by General Hines, including the question of an appeal board both within and without the department, question of rating and retention (General Hines's report to chairman is attached); Mr. Deming, question of disability preference; and Mr. Taylor, question of consolidation of different bureaus under Civil Service Commission, promotion, transfer, and the question of advisability of a special officer to handle employment.

The committee discussed the chart indicating the number and percentage of men and women employees in all departments and bureaus in Washington, number and percentage of veterans, number of veterans of Spanish and World War, number and percentage of disabled veterans, number of disabled veterans of Spanish and World War, number and percentage of wives, husbands, and other members of family in Government service, number and percentage of married women with husbands in Government service, total number of civil-service employees.

Mr. William L. Thomas, commander of Equality Walter Reed Post of the Veterans of Foreign Wars, stated conditions in the bureau were generally good; concurred in the view that most ills are due to the 82.5 average in efficiency ratings; discussed the method of computing same; stated the law regarding the selection of ex-service men before non-service is not generally adhered to; stated there should be some sort of a set-up to see if problem cases could not be taken care of.

Mr. Young, an ex-captain of the Army, who has been in the Government service for more than 30 years, now employed with the Personnel Classification Board, appeared before the committee and urged a clearing house so that service men could find employment. Cited his own case, and several other instances where service men walked the streets for many weeks seeking employment.

Capt. Thomas Kirby, of the Disabled American Veterans, appeared before the committee and stated the recommendations submitted by him in writing were based on the experience that all of the legislation affecting veterans is necessarily progressing, and he would not want the statements to be considered as the limit of what they would do. The recommendations affect the examination, appointment, promotion, and retention, and each one is important in itself. Captain Kirby stated he felt the committee's attitude is not only to go into the examination, but appointment, promotion, and retention in service.

Regarding the establishment of an employment agency, Captain Kirby stated he thought it should be a combination of the Department of Labor on the theory that they have more expert help to staff it, and the officers should be in the regional offices of the Veterans' Bureau on the theory that the natural contact of the veterans is with the Veterans' Bureau. He stated he thought the responsibility should be vested with the Veterans' Bureau. Regarding the division of responsibility, Captain Kirby was perfectly willing to leave that to the judgment of the director as he is more familiar with the administrative proposition. He thought of bringing Labor into it, as they are better staffed, but the great danger would be split authority. Responsibility should be with the director on the theory that this is a continuation of the rehabilitation program.

The director, General Hines, referred to that section of the World War act pertaining to the placement of rehabilitated persons in suitable and gainful occupations with the approval of the Department of Labor. General Hines stated he felt it should be suggested to Congress that that be changed to read something like this: In the placement of veterans in suitable and gainful occupations, the Secretary of Labor is authorized and directed to cooperate with the Director of the United States Veterans' Bureau.

Captain Kirby stated this would probably bring the response from Congress regarding an appropriation, but General Hines replied that we have not asked for it. The responsibility for the job should be definitely put into the Veterans' Bureau, as men naturally come here and not to the Department of Labor; and the just argument to Congress is the argument that a man out of employment seeks the bureau for hospitalization. If you keep him employed, you will have less effort in that direction, General Hines stated, particularly in getting in the hospitals where they are not so sick as to have hospital care. Captain Kirby stated that $100,000 would be more than repaid by the point brought out by the director.

Regarding the right of appeal of a man who is one of three on the register and is not selected for appointment, Captain Kirby stated he should be given a written reason and time in which to make reply; he further stated that when the civil-service registers are exhausted and the department is authorized to hold an examination within its own force for promotion, the man should be allowed the 5 and 10 point preference. Mr. Vipond advised that this preference is granted in original appointment only.

Double teaming in the departments was discussed. Captain Kirby advocated a maximum salary to be received by husband and wife; General Hines read General Order, No. 265 J, issued in his department, which has reference to the employment of members of the same family; Captain Kirby stated that employees should be dropped in instances where married women are masquerading as single, as they are falsifying public records.

Col. Rice W. Means, representing the United Spanish War Veterans, appeared before the committee and stated the fixing of an age limit by the industries of the country and by the Government is affecting the employment of Spanish War veterans, the majority of whom are over 50 years of age; recommended the issuance of an Executive order calling the attention of department heads to the fact that veterans are refused employment and discharged because of an arbitrary age limit, and that the practice should cease; further recommended that Congress express itself on this question, as it will eventually reach the World War veteran.

Table showing the percentage of veterans appointed to positions in the competitive classified service for the fiscal years indicated:

Veterans appointed

Fiscal year—	Per cent
1920	14
1921	14
1922	30
1923	34
1924	25. 9
1925	23. 3
1926	21. 6
1927	25. 65
1928	24. 3

Veterans entitled to preference constitute probably not exceeding 6 per cent of the population of the United States. They are furnishing 19 to 21 per cent of the number of applicants for civil-service examinations and are receiving the percentage of appointments shown above.

The chairman thanked the members of the committee for their loyal support and stated he was more than pleased with the results of their work.

The committee agreed to submit the report to the President for consideration and arrange for a meeting with him at a later date.

(Report submitted to the President on November 19 and meeting arranged for 11.30 a. m. Monday, November 26, 1928.)

SUPPLEMENTARY REPORT

NOVEMBER 27, 1928.

MY DEAR MR. PRESIDENT: The advisory committee appointed under Executive order of June 9, 1928, to study, analyze, and report on civil-service rules relating to veteran preference has the honor to supplement the report on November 19, 1928.

As stated in that report, the committee, in giving careful consideration to the existing laws, civil-service rules, and the policy of the several Government departments and bureaus dealing with the question of veteran preference, held a number of public hearings. At these hearings the question of the retention of certain prohibition agents, inspectors, and investigators in the Prohibition Unit of the Treasury Department until such time as the result of the civil-service examination for these positions is known was brought to the attention of the committee.

After giving the matter serious consideration, the committee recommends that an Executive order be issued as follows:

"Until the ratings have been completed of the civil-service examination closing November 20, 1928, for positions of prohibition agent, the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized, in his discretion, to continue under temporary appointment those prohibition agents, inspectors, and investigators (1) who have applied for such examination, (2) who have been employed with clear records for at least two years in the prohibition service, and (3) who are entitled to military preference.

"Reinstatement may be made, in the discretion of the Secretary of the Treasury, of any preference employee herein described who was dropped from the prohibition service, without charges, subsequent to August 16, 1928."

We have the honor to be, very respectfully,

HAMILTON FISH, Jr., Chairman.
FRANK T. HINES.
JOHN THOMAS TAYLOR.

Hon. CALVIN COOLIDGE,
The White House, Washington, D. C.

OUR RELATIONS WITH THE REPUBLIC OF CHINA

Mr. PORTER. Mr. Speaker, it has at times been charged that the United States has not a defined and sustained foreign policy. This charge, to my mind, is without foundation. Certainly it is not true as regards dealings during recent years with the great Republic of China. Since the time, three-quarters of a century ago, when the western nations began formal international relations with China, the United States has sought to render, and has been successful in rendering, justice to China. Our country has indeed participated in the enjoyment of special rights wrested from China by other powers. Not to have done this would have been to place Americans and American trade at a great disadvantage in China without at all benefiting China. But never has the United States taken the lead in exacting concessions from that militarily helpless country. Upon the contrary, when opportunity has offered, the United States has sought to moderate the predatory demands of the other powers. Especially has this been so since the time of John Hay, when the United States became the chief agent in securing the adoption of the principle of the "open door" in China, and the prevention of the so-called "spheres of interest" from ripening into spheres of control, which might have meant the break-up of China, and, for all practical purposes, the partitioning of much of her territory among Japan and certain of the European powers.

At the time of the Boxer troubles the United States sought to moderate the excessive financial demands made by the aggrieved powers upon China. At the time of the making, in 1915, of the "twenty-one demands" by Japan upon China, the United States did what it could to aid China by sending a strong note to Japan, and never has it recognized that there was justification for the Sino-Japanese treaties which resulted from the ultimatum issued by Japan to China as a sequel to those demands.

But particularly during the last eight years has the United States demonstrated its good will toward China. By successive affirmative acts it has given its aid to that country in its efforts to obtain release from the treaty limitations that have unjustly restrained its freedom of sovereign action. And I am proud to say that in the promotion of this enlightened policy by the United States your Committee on Foreign Affairs has given all the assistance that has been within its power.

The results of the Washington conference of 1921–22, so far as China is concerned, are so well known to you that I scarcely need to review them—the termination of the Anglo-Japanese alliance, the surrender by the powers of all claims to spheres of interest in China, the clearer definition and formal treaty acceptance by the powers of the principle of the "open door" in China, the solemn pledges by the powers contained in the Root resolutions embodied in the 9-power treaty as to the manner in which in the future the powers were to deal with China, the return by Japan to China of the control of the great Province of Shantung, the birthplace of Confucius, the permission to China to increase her duties on foreign imports, and other agreements with regard to the stationing of foreign troops in China, and to wireless and cable communications with China.

Since the Washington conference the United States has continued to show its good will toward China. In 1923 I had the honor to introduce a resolution in the Congress for the remission of the balance of the Boxer indemnity, a resolution which on May 21, 1924, became a law.

The funds remitted by this resolution and the prior one of 1907 were allocated by China to the education of Chinese students in American colleges. Many of the officials of the Republic of China to-day are graduates of American institutions of learning. These graduates have an intimate knowledge of American institutions and ideals, which leads to that close understanding by each nation of the problems of the other, so necessary to the maintenance of the traditional friendship that exists between the Republic of the east and the Republic of the west.

In 1924–25 the United States was represented at the opium conference at Geneva, and in that conference the American delegation, whose head I had the honor to be, made every effort, as the records will show, to obtain an agreement upon the part of the powers which would pledge those powers, or certain of them, to cease selling opium under government auspices to Chinese and other orientals living within their several colonial possessions in the Far East, as well as to take effective steps to prevent the entrance into China of the habit-forming narcotic drugs manufactured in their own countries.

In 1927 I introduced in this House a resolution which, after various recitals by way of a preamble, read:

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That the President of the United States be, and he hereby is, respectfully requested to enter into negotiations with duly accredited agents of the Republic of China authorized to speak for the people of China with a view to the negotiation and the drafting of a treaty or of treaties between the United States of America and the Republic of China which shall take the place of the treaties now in force between the two countries, which provide for the exercise in China of American extraterritorial or jurisdictional rights or limit her full autonomy with reference to the levying of customs dues or other taxes, or of such other treaty provisions as may be found to be unequal or nonreciprocal in character, to the end that henceforth the treaty relations between the two countries shall be upon an equitable and reciprocal basis and will be such as will in no way offend the sovereign dignity of either of the parties or place obstacles in the way of realization by either of them of their several national aspirations or the maintenance by them of their several legitimate domestic policies.

This resolution, which was favorably reported to the House by your Committee on Foreign Affairs and adopted by the House by a vote of 262 to 43, I feel justified in believing was not without its influence in leading our Government to act independently of the other powers in its effort to place upon a completely satisfactory basis the relations of our country with China.

On July 25, 1928, the United States took the lead in recognizing the de jure character of the Nationalist Government of China with its headquarters at Nanking, and on February 11, 1929, ratified a treaty with China whereby the United States released China, so far as the United States was concerned, from all limitations upon its power to levy export or import duties. The effect of American action was, as it was intended to be, to compel the other powers to take similar action, with the result that at the present time all the other powers, except Japan, which had treaties giving to them the right to restrain China's tariff autonomy, have surrendered this right, and it appears reasonably certain that Japan will soon do likewise, so that at last China will have that tariff freedom to which as a sovereign nation she is, and long has been, justly entitled.

It will thus be seen that, largely through the efforts of the United States, China has rapidly been recovering those rights which had been "tortured from her fears," so that it is clear that the time is now near when she will stand forth a nation completely sovereign in fact as well as in name—when all her relations with other powers will be upon a wholly equal and reciprocal basis.

The most important limitation still resting upon China's freedom of sovereign action is as to the extraterritorial rights still possessed by citizens of several of the powers, including the United States, residing in China. But it is certain that these extraterritorial rights are soon to be relinquished. That the United States expects to relinquish them within the very near future, so far as her own citizens in China are concerned, is significantly shown by the fact that in the plans which are being drawn for the handsome building to be erected in Shanghai, which is to house the American consulate and the other offices of our Government, no provision is made for a court room or other offices for the United States Court for China. The court and its officials will be housed in temporary quarters until the matter is adjusted.

I have spoken of the consistent and successful manner in which the United States has pushed forward its policy of restoring to China its freedom of action with regard to the exercise of its legitimate sovereign rights. It is but proper that I should say that this success could not have been achieved without the cordial cooperative action of China, and that this cordial and cooperative action was in no small degree rendered possible by the fortunate fact that during the last eight years China has been represented at Washington by her most distinguished diplomat, His Excellency Sao-Ke Alfred Sze. Doctor Sze is a statesman and a gentleman who would be a great credit to the foreign service of any country. By his intelligent appreciation of all the factors of every situation which has been presented; by his tact and gentle courtesy under all circumstances, aided, I may say, by a most charming wife; by his ability to distinguish between essentials and nonessentials, firmly insisting upon the former, while yielding when necessary to the latter, he has kept relations between his own country and this country ever upon a cordial and friendly basis, and thus he has brought to a successful conclusion negotiations which, in less skillful hands, might have led to no result or even to international friction. As chief of the Chinese delegation to the Washington conference of 1921–22, and in control of the Shantung "conversations" which were held in connection with that conference, he was a tower of strength for his country. This, as one of the advisers to the American delegation to that conference, I can personally testify to. It is, therefore, with genuine regret, in private as well as official circles, that his approaching departure from Washington will be viewed. His country is, however, to be congratulated that his services are to be still available to it as minister to Great Britain, in which post all will wish for him every possible good fortune and success.

Our Republic has followed the Golden Rule in her attitude toward China as advocated by the late Senator Quay, of Pennsylvania, one of the great statesmen of his time, in a speech delivered May 14, 1901, on our foreign policy. He said:

> In China we have but to apply the Golden Rule, treat China as we would have China treat us—recognize that * * * the Empress Dowager is the greatest woman born in Asia since the birth of Semiramis and Tuan, the representatives of patriotic Chinese thought, and all can be made well there. That nation of four hundred millions of people is present on earth for an Almighty purpose, and while the great European powers may pencil lines of partition for Chinese territory, they will never divide the Chinese people.
> Compare with China the Mesopotamian peoples, once inhabiting the land of the Garden of Eden, where Adam and Eve were created. First there were the mysterious Sumarians. Who they were and how they lived and when they died no one knoweth. They gave to men the alphabet, and passed away, leaving no more trace upon the earth than the shadow of a cloud fitting over its surface. Then came the Chaldeans and Babylonians, and Babylon fell. Assyria arose, and Assyrians built Ninevah, and both these great cities are only to-day commencing to tell their stories to American explorers. Four hundred years after the fall of Ninevah, thousands of years ago, so complete was its obliteration from the face of the earth and the memory of man, that Xenophon marched his Greeks over the grave of that city and knew it not.
> Then came the Chaldeans again, and the Persians—shone a brief period, and were extinguished. A Chaldean family fortified the rock of Jerusalem and grew into a nation which was the chosen of God. The visible presence of the Almighty illuminated its temples, and glinted upon the spear point and shield of the Jewish soldier as he marched to battle. That race gave to men their greatest soldier, their greatest poet, their greatest lawgiver, and their Messiah. Where is the Hebrew nation now?
> During all these ages China grew, developing a self-sustaining civilization, and a resistance to decay such as marked no other nation. When our forefathers were clad in the skins of beasts, earning their sustenance in the European forests by the chase, armed with flint-headed weapons, China had Confucius and astrolabes, and was calculating eclipses. We should respect China for what she has been, and sympathize with her in her trials, and look forward with hope to her future and the fulfillment of her mission.

ARMY AIR CORPS PROMOTION

Mr. FURLOW. Mr. Speaker, in 1920 the national defense act eliminated all promotion by branch in the Army except for the Medical Corps, chaplains, and professors. The Air Corps was formed as a separate branch of the Army by that act and placed on the single promotion list with other branches. The peculiar conditions affecting service in the Air Corps were not apparent at that time, but during the several years following it became evident that, in general, it was inadvisable to try to utilize the services of older men who had not learned to fly when they were young; that the hazard of military flying was great and produced a much higher attrition in the Air Corps than in the other branches of the Army; that the wear and tear of flying merited consideration in earlier retirement; and that, to keep the Air Corps an active flying branch balanced in its grades, consideration must be given to accelerated promotion during a part of the officer's career.

These general conclusions have been reached as a result of many investigations in the War Department and by Congress, very extensive hearings in the Military Affairs Committees of Congress, and by personal observation and visits by Members of Congress to Air Corps posts.

When the Air Corps act, approved July 2, 1926, was under consideration this special situation in the Air Corps was recognized and there was included in that act the following:

> SEC. 4. Correction of promotion list: That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, directed to investigate and study the alleged injustices which exist in the promotion list of the Army and to submit to Congress on the second Monday in December, 1926, this study, together with his recommendations for changes, if any, in the present promotion list.

This direction of Congress had distinctly in mind the solution of the Air Corps promotion problem. Many conflicting ideas had been presented and the Congress was not ready to formulate a policy until a final, thorough investigation could be made and a definite recommendation be received from the Secretary of War. Unfortunately, there came little from that investigation which would result in proper corrective measures for the Air Corps.

The Congress had been thoroughly impressed with the gravity of the situation. The Secretary of War had personally appeared before committees and called attention to the injustices existing in the Air Corps and stated he would like to see them corrected. As early as 1922 a board appointed in the War Department found with regard to the position of the air officers on the single promotion list—> that this situation will affect adversely the efficiency of the Air Service. * * * The Air Service is the only branch or arm of the service which is adversely affected as a corps by the promotion situation.

In 1924 we find another War Department board recognized this adverse position of the air officers, and recommended certain constructive service which, if placed in effect, would have revised the single list so far as the positions of these air officers were concerned. And the select committee of inquiry into operations of the United States Air Services recommended in 1925—> that Congress provide remedies for the inequalities and injustices suffered by the aviation officers of the Army and Navy.

Many investigations, no action, a recognition of the existence of the injustices, an adverse effect on the morale of the Air Corps, many resignations of excellent air officers, the condition in the Air Corps steadily growing worse—these were the only results.

A bill was, therefore, introduced into the House of Representatives and, after extensive hearings, was reported by the House committee unanimously. It was passed by the House unanimously on May 7, 1928. This bill was as follows:

An act to increase the efficiency of the Air Corps

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of War shall cause to be prepared an Air Corps promotion list on which shall be placed the names of all officers of the Air Corps of the Regular Army below the grade of colonel. The names on this list shall be arranged in the same relative order that they now have on the Army promotion list and shall be removed from the Army promotion list, and no officer whose name appears on the original Air Corps promotion list shall be considered as having less commissioned service than any officer whose name is below his on this list. All officers commissioned in the Air Corps after the formation of the original Air Corps promotion list shall be placed thereon in accord with length of commissioned service. Any officer whose position on the Air Corps promotion list is changed by sentence of a general court-martial or by law shall be deemed to have the same commissioned service as the officer next below whom he may be placed by such change.

SEC. 2. Except as herein provided, Air Corps flying officers shall be promoted to the grade of first lieutenant when credited with 3 years' commissioned service; to the grade of captain when credited with 7 years' commissioned service; to the grade of major when credited with 12 years' commissioned service; to the grade of lieutenant colonel when credited with 20 years' commissioned service; to the grade of colonel when credited with 26 years' commissioned service. All flying officers of the Air Corps below the grade of colonel shall be promoted in the order of their standing on the Air Corps promotion list: Provided, That the number of Air Corps officers in the grade of colonel shall not be less than 4 per cent nor more than 6 per cent and the number in the grade of lieutenant colonel shall not be less than 5 per cent nor more than 8 per cent of the total number of officers on the Air Corps promotion list, and the aggregate number of Air Corps officers in the grades of colonel, lieutenant colonel, and major shall not be less than 26 per cent nor more than 40 per cent of the total number of officers on the Air Corps promotion list, and in so far as necessary to maintain said minimum percentage, Air Corps flying officers of less than the required years of commissioned service shall be promoted to the grades of colonel, lieutenant colonel, and major, and only in so far as their promotion will not cause said maximum percentages to be exceeded shall officers who have completed the prescribed years of commissioned service be promoted to the grades of colonel, lieutenant colonel, and major. Nonflying officers of the Air Corps shall be promoted as provided for other branches of the Army.

SEC. 3. When an officer of the Air Corps has served 30 years, either as an officer or soldier, he shall, if he makes application therefor to the President, be retired from active service and placed on the retired list: Provided, That except in time of war, in computing the length of service for retirement credit shall be given for one and one-half the time heretofore or hereafter actually detailed to duty involving flying and credit shall also be given for all other time now counted toward retirement in the Army: Provided further, That the number of such voluntary retirements annually shall not exceed 6 per cent of the authorized strength of the Air Corps. When a flying officer of the Air Corps reaches the age of 54 years he shall, if he makes application therefor to the President, be retired from active service and placed on the retired list. Officers of the Air Corps who become physically disqualified for the performance of their duties as flying officers shall be eligible for retirement for physical disability.

SEC. 4. An officer of the Air Corps may, upon his own request, be transferred to another branch of the service, and when so transferred shall take rank and grade therein in accordance with his length of commissioned service as computed under existing laws governing the branch to which transferred.

SEC. 5. All laws or parts of laws in so far as they may be inconsistent herewith or in conflict with the provisions of this act are repealed.

It will be noted that this measure provides a basic system of promotion to each grade after years of service, flying officers alone are eligible for this promotion, nonflying officers are promoted as determined by the system proposed in another bill for other branches, accelerated promotion occurs to the grades of captain and major during the period of the officer's greatest efficiency as a combat pilot, recognition is given to special retirement features. It is a "flying officer" bill and deals only with promotion and retirement features peculiar to the Air Corps.

The following appears in the last annual report of Assistant Secretary Davison, whose office was created primarily for looking after air matters:

The Furlow bill, as it passed the House, is unquestionably the most satisfactory promotion measure ever introduced from the Air Corps standpoint. It is earnestly to be desired that that measure, or one containing its provisions in substance, be enacted into law.

While Congress has recognized the necessity for certain changes to be made in the system of promotion in the Army as a whole, it has nevertheless been apparent that the Air Corps needed this promotion more than any other branch. Other measures were reported by both the Senate and House Military Committees to take care of promotion in the Army as a whole.

The whole problem finally came to a head during the closing days of Congress when all measures were thrown into conference with a view to reaching a solution prior to adjournment. It was a conference on promotion for the whole Army, the special features for the Air Corps being incorporated in only one section of a lengthy bill. Though an agreement was not reached on some of the features of the general promotion bill, I am glad to report that both bodies recognized the necessity for special consideration for the flying officers of the Air Corps and the urgency of corrective legislation.

A great deal of progress has been made in reaching the solution of the promotion problem for the Air Corps. It is hoped that the constructive work already done may not be lost but that the next Congress may accept the principles and many of the details that have already been agreed upon by the Congress as a basis for legislation. Among these principles we find:

(a) The necessity for special treatment of flying officers of the Air Corps for promotion purposes;

(b) A reasonable assurance of promotion based upon years of service with such accelerated promotion as may be required to meet the conditions peculiar to service in the Air Corps and maintain a balanced force in the various grades;

(c) Special provisions for retirement in recognition of the hazardous nature of the service and in order to provide an outlet for flying officers who have passed the peak of their combat efficiency, thus maintaining the flying efficiency of the corps as a whole.

THE TARIFF ON SUGAR

Mr. HOUSTON of Hawaii. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include a brief prepared by myself, which refers to Schedule 5 and paragraph 501 of the present tariff law on sugar, and which was presented to the Committee on Ways and Means of the House in hearings on that subject before said committee.

And also my letter dated March 11, 1929, to the Director of the Bureau of Foreign and Domestic Commerce, Department of Commerce, Washington, D. C., relative to Commerce Reports.

The brief and letter is as follows:

BRIEF OF V. S. K. HOUSTON, DELEGATE TO CONGRESS FROM THE TERRITORY OF HAWAII—REFERS TO SCHEDULE 5 AND PARAGRAPH 501 OF THE PRESENT TARIFF LAW

SCHEDULE 5, PARAGRAPH 501

First. Items and paragraphs in which interested; changes in duties recommended; reasons for such change.

This is a farm product.

The Territory of Hawaii, being one of the domestic producers of sugar, is interested in the tariff on sugar, molasses, and manufactures of sugar. The Hawaiian growers are organized for their mutual protection into the Hawaiian Sugar Planters Association, and the Hawaiian Sugar Planters Association is a member of the Domestic Sugar Producers Association. It is understood that specific changes in duties recommended will be made by a spokesman for the Domestic Sugar Producers Association.

Understanding that such spokesman will present a request for an increase in the existing tariff schedule, the undersigned being the elected Delegate in Congress from the Territory of Hawaii, makes a plea for the adoption of such increased schedules as the Domestic Sugar Producers Association will request. In general terms, we ask for an increase on 90° sugar full duty, from 2.206 cents to 3 cents, and on 100° or refined sugar to 3.62 cents full duty.

Sugar is an item that is and may well be grown in the United States, and under proper protective-tariff schedules may return a fair profit to the farmer or grower. Our present domestic sources of production—and in the domestic sources I include only areas which form an integral part of the United States, such being the mainland and the incorporated Territories, namely, Alaska and Hawaii—are insufficient to provide for the domestic demand or consumption, and the domestic supply is augmented by sugars grown in the possessions, Porto Rico and the Philippine Islands, and by foreign-grown sugars.

The great bulk of the importation of foreign-grown sugars which are dutiable are grown in the island of Cuba, and amounted in the fiscal year 1927 to the considerable sum of 3,968,880 short tons. (Statement of Commissioner E. W. Camp before committee on Treasury Department appropriation bill as reported December 5.)

Of the domestic production, the largest single supply comes from the beet-sugar fields of the mainland (965,000 long tons in 1927–28, United States Daily, December 31, 1928). The cultivation of sugar beets has been held out to the farmer as a method of diversifying their crops; it is a crop which if extended will, by balancing the production, help to reduce the present surplus in other agricultural products through utilization of areas now producing such surplus. According to the article by Millard M. Rice in the Farm Journal, September 29, 1928, 4,000,000 tons of imported sugar throw out of production 16,000,000 acres of domestic farm land.

For us to depend in such a large measure on foreign production, with its unrestricted competition and dumping practices, is to pave the way for the eventual extinction of the domestic source of supply and consequent foreign control of the price. The Cuban importation at present fixes the price of raw sugar. That the present price level is one representing an unhealthy condition is evident from the fact that raw sugar has been selling, New York basis, at as low as 3.77 cents, duty paid, per pound (daily news quotations). Such a price is far below the cost of production in all the domestic areas. The industry has found it more and more necessary to reduce its expenses for labor to the minimum, and any increase in tariff is bound to be reflected in a better return to labor and to make for greater contentment in the case of citizen labor.

"We know by experience what centralized price control of rubber prices can do to us. It would be the height of folly not to profit by sharp lessons we have received in recent years or to suppose that temporary price recessions make it impossible for foreign growers to put the screws on us at some future time just as they have in the past. The hardships which grew out of this system of artificial price fixing will prove to have been blessings in disguise if they have aroused us to the imperative necessity of controlling the source of a substantial proportion of the rubber required by our industries," says an editorial in the Saturday Evening Post of January 5, 1929. The same may well be said of our sugar industry, and it is absolutely necessary that that industry be maintained in a healthy state of organization. That such large foreign tonnage should be admitted does not indicate the production "of a substantial proportion" of the sugar required for local consumption. A greater proportion of domestic-sugar production, according to the Washington Post of January 8, 1929, is necessary to "enable the United States ultimately to become independent of the foreign sugar monopoly which now determines, to a great extent, the price."

Second. Importance of industry as it applies to Hawaii only.

Capital invested, about $165,293,000.

Crop produced in 1928, 904,040 short tons.

Value of 1928 crop, about $77,000,000.

Acreage 1927 crop, 127,417 acres.

The total acreage available for growing cane in the Territory of Hawaii is not in excess of 249,000 acres. About 18 to 26 months are required for the growing of one crop, so that it will be seen that half of the total acreage available is all that can be expected for one year's crop. There is no further acreage available in the Territory for expansion. All that is productive has been put into cultivation; the water supply is another of the limiting factors.

There is no way in which the tonnage may be increased except through a development of agricultural methods, the development of better cane varieties, and of more scientific fertilizer application, thus bringing about greater yields per acre.

In Hawaii such methods have brought about an increase of tonnage in 20 years amounting to 83 per cent. In Cuba the crop grown, which may be extended in its acreage, has expanded in the same period of time over 315 per cent.

Hawaii employs over 50,000 persons in the industry, and provision is made for housing more than 101,000 people in approximately 20,000 homes owned by the various operating companies.

Third. The Territory has followed with interest the proceedings of the United States Tariff Commission, and the undersigned feels that in the report on sugar of that commission to the President of the United States, published in 1926, the most representative picture is found in the studies of Commissioners Marvin and Burgess. The statement by the President, together with his conclusions and decision, shows a grasp of the situation that was based upon the needs of this particular farm industry. What we want is that this farm product should, with respect to tariff principles, be placed upon an equal footing with that of the produce of the factories of the country—economic equality. The cost of production appears to be increasing, yet the market price is falling. Sugar is the lowest cost staple food product now in use in the country. Its present cost is below that of the average for the five pre-war years (President's statement, United States Tariff Commission report on sugar, 1926).

What appears to us as an element of unfair competition with the domestic supply is that due to the unrestricted Philippine importation. Such sugar is grown under labor conditions not comparable with those within the domestic field, is not chargeable with corporation nor income taxes payable to the United States, and in addition is not bound in its transportation by the coastwise shipping laws operative as between Hawaii and the mainland.

The raising of this particular tariff will not cure the phase of the problem, but it is felt that were a tariff to be placed upon other products grown to some extent in the United States, which are also grown in the possessions, that there would be opportunity for diversification of crops. A tariff on coffee is suggested, as coffee is grown in Hawaii, and together with Porto Rico and the Philippine Islands can grow probably a very substantial part of the coffee required. Such action, together with the application of the coastwise shipping laws to Philippine Islands products when in excess of certain figures, might obviate the necessity for restricting the sugar importation which otherwise is a matter for the industry as a whole to consider, and I would bow to their decision in the matter.

MARCH 11, 1929.

Mr. JULIUS KLEIN,

Director Bureau of Foreign and Domestic Commerce,

Department of Commerce, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. KLEIN: I am in receipt this date of a letter from the manager of the Chamber of Commerce in Honolulu inclosing copy of a letter from Miss Sylvia Bryant detailing her experience at Magellanes, Chile, with respect to the listing of Honolulu at the local office of the Commercial Pacific Cable Co.

I would appreciate such action as your department may be able to take internationally with respect to the proper listing of Honolulu as included within the United States.

More and more I am led to believe that the Department of Commerce must change its classification of Hawaii as indicated in the publication of Commerce Reports, and I refer more particularly to No. 51, of December 17, 1928, where, on page 736, Hawaii is classed first as under foreign trade, because of the fact that the reports are a weekly service of foreign trade, and therein is bracketed as under the Far East along with India, the Philippines, and New Zealand. This bracketing, of course, is wholly erroneous; Hawaii is not even in eastern longitude, being some 22° eastward of the one hundred and eightieth meridian.

Again, in No. 4, of January 28, 1929, I find Hawaii classified under monthly cable and radio reviews from the Far East along with British Malaya, Burma, Ceylon, China, India, Indo-China, etc.

Of course, I can recognize the desirability of some commerce report having to do with the noncontiguous Territories of the United States in these Commerce Reports. However, I do not appear to find any reference therein to reports regarding Alaska, yet the situation with respect to Alaska is exactly the same as that of Hawaii. If it is not necessary to have Alaska reported, then I doubt the larger usefulness of including Hawaii in such publication. If, however, they are to be continued I believe that accuracy alone would require that the heading of the magazine should show that it is "a weekly service of foreign trade and of trade with the noncontiguous Territories of the United States." Thereafter in its contents I feel that Hawaii should be classed not under the Far East but that it should be classed before or after all foreign countries and under a heading of, say, noncontiguous Territories of the United States, in which could be listed Alaska and Hawaii, and none others, for there are no other incorporated Territories of the United States.

Very sincerely yours,

V. S. K. HOUSTON,

Delegate in Congress from Hawaii.

THE RECORD OF CONGRESS

Mr. TILSON. Mr. Speaker, the House has shown commendable self-restraint during the past three months in limiting the legislative program to measures which have seemed to be of immediate and pressing importance. The list of bills of major importance that have been written into law since Congress met last December is not a long one, but this is not because there has been any unwillingness on the part of either Congress or President Coolidge to face problems as they present themselves. Doubtless the fact that a new Chief Executive who must bear the responsibility of executing during the next four years the laws enacted has had a restraining influence.

The Constitution wisely joined the Congress and the President in making the laws which the latter must execute. It is well, therefore, where delay is not dangerous that the Executive who is to administer the law should be the one to take part in its enactment; though to the credit of the retiring President it must be said that he never evaded an issue or shirked a responsibility.

Although the number of bills of major importance enacted into law during the short session has not been very great, this fact may well be considered not in derogation but as high praise when all the bills introduced proposing legislation—good, bad, and indifferent—are taken into account. In view of the well-recognized fact that there are already far too many laws, it should be accounted unto us for righteousness that we have successfully withstood the pressure for the passage of numerous bills that may be properly classed under the general heading of unnecessary and expensive legislation. Of the bills failing to become laws during the session there are, of course, exceptions to the classification just indicated, and to one of these I shall now refer.

REAPPORTIONMENT

It is a matter for sincere regret that a reapportionment bill did not pass at the short session of Congress. I have so often expressed myself on this subject on the floor of the House and elsewhere that I shall not dwell upon it here except to reiterate that the failure of Congress to act on this matter is in violation of our duty under the Constitution and strikes to the very root of representative government. It is a matter for congratulation on this side of the Capitol that we have done our part by passing a bill which has been allowed to die in the Senate. I hope that this bill may have an early resurrection in the extra session and become one of the noteworthy achievements of the new Congress.

TARIFF AND FARM RELIEF

As a direct outcome of the general elections two major problems, somewhat closely related, are to be presented for early consideration in the new administration, namely, farm relief and tariff revision. In preparation for the latter the Committee on Ways and Means, having jurisdiction of the subject matter, began hearings early in January covering the entire tariff act and lasting throughout the short session of Congress. Subcommittees designated for the purpose will make a thorough study of the vast amount of information brought out at the hearings and will prepare a bill for consideration at the extra session.

The preparation of a bill for farm relief was also provided for in one of the deficiency appropriation bills just passed authorizing the members of the Committee on Agriculture to hold hearings and submit their recommendations to the extra session. It is hoped that the preliminary preparations made by the retiring Congress will enable the new Congress to perform promptly and well the very important task assigned to it in connection with these two all-absorbing subjects.

APPROPRIATION BILLS

The most important work of every regular session of Congress is the consideration and passage of the great supply bills upon which depends the proper functioning of all the various activities of the Government. It involves a thorough study of the annual Budget and a searching inquiry into the purpose and manner of expenditure of the enormous sums carried in the annual appropriation bills. Under the constitutional arrangement of the power of the two branches of Congress it was doubtless intended that the House of Representatives should not only be responsible for originating money bills, but as a corollary to this that it should give most thorough consideration to bills appropriating money. More and more each year as the other branch is increasingly devoting itself to other duties the House is performing its proper function of giving the utmost thoroughness to its consideration of the great supply bills. The work of the Appropriations Committee during the short session has been of the highest order of thoroughness and efficiency deserving the grateful recognition of the House, the entire Congress, and the country.

The carrying out of the public-building program, the Mississippi flood control project, and the resumption of rivers and harbors improvement work, coupled with the increases of salaries granted to Government workers by the so-called Welch Act, are reflected by a moderate increase in the appropriations made at the present session of Congress. Some of these increases were also felt in the fiscal year which ended June 30, 1928, and in the current fiscal year, but until the appropriation laws enacted at this session have been analyzed it will be impossible to indicate exactly how much the increases for each year have been.

The actual expenditures for the fiscal year 1928 (ending June 30, 1928) were $3,643,519,875.13 as of December 3, 1928, exclusive of postal expenses paid out of postal revenues, and the total regular appropriations made by the present Congress for 1930 were $3,821,649,122.39, which sum includes, however, deficiency appropriations, chargeable to the current or prior fiscal years, amounting to $212,001,444.32.

The total appropriations for the current year, exclusive of the deficiency acts of the present session, amounted to $3,547,763,880.06, and if we add the total of the two deficiency acts to this, although this is not strictly proper, for a small portion of the sums carried in the deficiency acts may be chargeable to prior years, we get the sum of $3,759,765,324.38, which exceeds the actual expenditures of 1928 by about $116,000,000.

With farm relief coming in the next session, the new naval building program, and with the continuance of appropriations for Mississippi flood control, rivers and harbors improvement work, and the building program, it is safe to expect the expenditures to continue moderately to increase for some years rather than to diminish.

On the other hand, it should be remembered that, even with a reduced tax rate, the Government revenue, according to conservative estimates, will be amply sufficient to carry these large but necessary expenditures for public improvements, and at the same time not interfere with the debt-reduction program.

The appropriations made this session exceeded the Budget recommendations by $6,459,869.26, but this excess was due entirely to the appropriation for reconditioning two capital ships for the Navy, an expenditure authorized by Congress but not approved by the Budget Bureau. Additions to the War Department appropriation bill placed on that measure in the Senate also contributed to the excess over the Budget estimates, but would not have been sufficient to offset reductions made on other items of the Budget if it had not been for the difference between Congress and the Budget Bureau on the naval appropriation referred to.

BOULDER DAM

One of the important bills passed by the House at the first session of the Seventieth Congress, but not acted upon by the Senate, was the Boulder Dam bill, and this was one of the early bills to become a law at the short session. It provides for the erection of a high dam at Black or Boulder Canyon in the Colorado River for the protection of the Imperial Valley in California from floods, for potential additional irrigation in the future when needed, and for a possibly necessary increased water supply for Los Angeles and other southern California cities. The incidental hydroelectric power to be produced proved to be the chief bone of contention during the long drawn out consideration of this measure.

FOREIGN-DEBT FUNDING

Early in the session the task of funding the debts owed to us as a result of the World War was practically completed by the approval of an agreement reached with Greece, and an amendment of the agreement formerly reached with Austria in order to permit the latter country to improve its financial condition. The larger debts have already been funded except that the agreement proposed with France has not been ratified.

The total Greek debt amounts to $18,000,000, and the agreement approved by Congress provides that it shall be repaid to us over a period of 62 years.

The change in the agreement with Austria permits that country to raise a loan for reconstruction purposes, amounting to 725,000,000 Austrian schillings, which shall be a prior obligation to that of the United States and all other countries claiming under after-war settlements.

PRISON LABOR

After many years of controversy labor organizations throughout the country were finally successful in this session in obtaining enactment into law of a bill which will limit interstate dealing in prison-made goods. The new law will permit States to forbid the sale of prison-made goods even when shipped into the State from another State in the regular course of interstate commerce. The law does not go into effect, however, until January 19, 1934, so that there will be ample time for prison officials to adjust themselves to the new conditions.

AID FOR HOWARD UNIVERSITY

Another controversy of many years' standing which was brought to a conclusion in the present session was that concerning the granting of Federal appropriations to Howard University, which has existed for many years in Washington for the benefit of negro citizens. It has been the practice during many years for the Federal Government to appropriate for a considerable part of the expense of this institution, but the practice has been bitterly opposed each session on the ground that there was no law authorizing such appropriations. The enactment into law of House bill 279 settles this matter definitely, however, by amending the Howard University charter so that annual appropriations from the Government are authorized.

AGRICULTURAL EDUCATION

Stimulus to education along agricultural lines will probably be given by the enactment of a law at this session which authorizes additional annual appropriations of $2,500,000 for aid to the States in the teaching of agricultural subjects and home economics. This law was enacted with the support of the great agricultural States of the country, and is another step in the long series of legislative enactments during the past several years in the interest of farmers.

NATURALIZATION OF ALIENS

By the passage of House bill 349 justice is granted to a deserving group of alien residents of the United States who up to the present time have been barred from becoming citizens by a technicality. The naturalization laws have previously required that before becoming a citizen an alien must show from the records of the Immigration Service that he was legally admitted to the United States. There are many thousands of aliens in the United States who entered the country many years ago, when immigration restrictions were few, for whom no record of admission can be found, although they may have lived and worked here in many cases for as long as a score of years. The amendment of the naturalization law made by House bill 349 will permit making such aliens citizens where they have been in the country since prior to June 3, 1921, are persons of good moral character and not subject to deportation.

LOANS TO VETERANS

The enactment into law of H. R. 16395, which was passed with the support of the American Legion, reduces the rate of interest on loans made to veterans on security of their bonus certificates, and also provides for the reissue of bonus certificates which have been lost or destroyed, in both instances correcting injustices not intended by previous legislation.

PROHIBITION

During the closing weeks of the session a strenuous effort was made to inject prohibition as an issue into pending legislation by the passage of the Jones bill and an attempt to pass the Harris amendment to the first deficiency appropriation bill. By the fate of these two measures certain of both the "wets" and the "drys" profess to find some solace and comfort, on the one side by the passage of the Jones bill, increasing the penalties for violation of the Volstead Act, and on the other side by the defeat of the Harris amendment, which would have increased the appropriations for prohibition enforcement by $24,000,000, although neither recommended by the Treasury Department nor approved by the Budget.

The Harris amendment was defeated in the House, not by the enemies of prohibition, but by those who felt that it would be harmful to the cause of law enforcement to make an empty gesture of this character without a concrete proposal indicating how the enormous sum proposed could be efficiently used to accomplish the purpose desired.

The Jones bill, increasing prohibition law penalties, was admittedly faulty in its construction and met great opposition on the ground that it was too drastic, but it received the support of the majority in both Houses of Congress apparently upon the theory that drastic enforcement of the Volstead Act will ultimately result in its acceptance by the people.

RADIO AND SHIPPING

Other important legislation enacted by the present Congress provided for the continuance for another year of the United States Radio Commission and for load lines on merchant vessels.

It was felt necessary to continue the Radio Commission in order to permit it to finish the task it has started of reallocating wave lengths to radio stations throughout the country and setting up a definite plan to regulate radio broadcasting.

The legislation in reference to load lines is in the interest of public safety, both for passengers and crews. This legislation provides that lines shall be placed upon merchant vessels which will indicate the maximum loads that can be carried with safety.

CONGRESS MAKES A RECORD

While I have already claimed credit for the small number of important measures acted upon at the present session, the total number of bills actually enacted into law is, I am told, a record for a short session of Congress. Both the House and Senate were able to dispose of a large number of private claim bills, bridge bills, and other measures of comparatively minor importance if considered from a public viewpoint, but most of them of very serious importance to the individuals or communities immediately concerned. By having the appropriation bills ready for action when Congress convened the three months' time available for the closing session of Congress proved to be ample for all the business to be transacted, and it can be truly said that no meritorious measure failed of passage solely for lack of time, for there was time and time to spare in both branches of Congress.

The entire number of new public laws made by the Seventieth Congress was 1,037, of which only three were passed over the veto of President Coolidge. The number of private laws was 568, and with public resolutions numbering 108 and private resolutions numbering 9, make a total of new laws, public and private, of 1,722.

The number of bills and resolutions introduced in the House was 18,180, and to this number of bills and resolutions which came before the House or its committees should be added 941 Senate bills and 79 Senate joint resolutions which were passed by that body and sent to the House for action.

HOSPITALIZATION BILL

Mrs. ROGERS. Mr. Speaker, I stated on the floor of the House that I would insert in the RECORD the names of service-connected cases that could not be hospitalized by the Veterans' Bureau because of lack of beds. Instead of doing that I am inserting the claim numbers, believing that the men may prefer not to have their names given. I also know of other service-connected cases awaiting hospitalization in addition to those whose numbers are printed below.

The following letter has been received by me from the Boston regional office of the Veterans' Bureau:

MARCH 2, 1929.

MY DEAR MRS. ROGERS: Following my telegram of to-day, relative to compensable veterans in community awaiting hospitalization at either Bedford or Northampton, a list of these veterans is attached.

By direction:

RICHARD T. LEADER, M. D.,
Regional Medical Officer.

Claim numbers on attached list: C-286217, C-313550, C-1408163, C-601677, C-183329, C-191941, C-489092, C-564410, C-1012694, C-366438, C-1405318, C-408368, C-1009984, Massachusetts; C-1004124, unknown.

Other claim numbers submitted to me of veterans whose disabilities are service-connected and who are in need of hospitalization in a Government hospital are:

C-1313345, C-347000, C-506110, C-1310458, C-229967, C-1310609, Louisiana.

FREE HIDES AND SKINS

Mr. WIGGLESWORTH. Mr. Speaker, in connection with the limited tariff revision now under consideration, I desire at this time to record myself and those for whom I speak as in favor of the retention of cattle hides and calfskins on the list of articles entitled to enter the country free of duty. To do so is merely to advocate the policy embodied in every tariff act, with one exception, enacted by Congress since the Civil War—the policy which prevails to-day in every nation in the world which is an important producer of finished leather.

The proposal to place a duty upon hides entering this country is not a new one. It has been frequently advanced and carefully considered in connection with previous tariff revisions. I understand, however, that a duty of this character has never been included in a tariff act as reported by the Ways and Means Committee of the House nor as passed in the first instance by the House itself. I am advised that such distinguished leaders in this field of legislation as Blaine, Dingley, McKinley, Payne, and Fordney have all been opposed to such a duty and that the President of the United States in 1909 made it plain that he would not sign a tariff act revising the Dingley Tariff Act of 1897 should it include a duty of this kind.

At this time, when the subject of appropriate farm relief is uppermost in the minds of all, the imposition of a duty on hides is again urged with a view to helping the farmers. In this connection it is of interest to note, with particular reference to the last tariff revision in 1922, that the Farm Bureau Federation itself, which had been urging the duty, determined as the result of an investigation by its own economists that the duty would be of little or no benefit to the farmers. Its demand for the duty was accordingly withdrawn. In his brief filed with the Ways and Means Committee in December of 1921, Mr. Grey Silver, of Washington, D. C., representing the federation, stated in part as follows:

Cattle hides are a by-product of the production of animals for meat or dairy purposes in the United States. Animals are not produced for their hides alone, and the variation in the price of the hide has little influence on the rate of cattle production.

Most of the hides produced in the United States are sold by the producers on the animal and not as hides but as a part of an animal, the price being largely determined by the value of the meat of the animal. * * *

A tariff would tend to direct the raw hides to other markets which are free. The result would be a decline in our leather industries or higher costs of leather products to consumers, or both. * * *

Since two-thirds of the domestic hides are taken off by packers, and they also control about one-third of the tanning industry, they are in a position to be the dominant factor in the hide and leather market. At any given time they have a large part of the stock of hides under their control and are in a position to sell or withhold them from the market as they choose. * * *

The producers of two-thirds of the domestic hides would get this increase only when included by the packer buyer in the price paid for live cattle. The producers of country hides would receive only such part of the increase as might be reflected in the current hide market. * * *

Whether the increased price of hides would be partially or wholly reflected in the price of live cattle by the packer buyers is open to question. The common practice of buying cattle on the basis of meat value alone would lead to the conclusion that the packer might or might not add the increased value of the hide to the price of the animal as he chose. * * *

Cattle production needs stimulation, but the increased return from 15 per cent on 6½ per cent of the weight of the animal is so small as to be of no importance as a means of increasing cattle production. The cost to consumers of leather products would more than offset the increased return to hide producers, even if all the increased price was passed on to the producers, of which there is no assurance. Therefore we believe that hides, leather, and leather products should remain on the free list.

A similar opinion was expressed by Mr. Harvey J. Sconce, a prominent Illinois farmer, who had been sent to Europe as a representative of the Department of Agriculture, with a view to ascertaining what action by our Government would result in the greatest benefit to the farmers of the country, in an address before the members of the United States Chamber of Commerce in Atlantic City in April of 1921, in the course of which he said:

While many agricultural products should have adequate protection, yet we do not desire that a low general tariff be placed on practically all articles. * * *

The production of hides is not an industry in itself to the extent that the production of wool is an industry, * * * hides and skins could be better admitted free, as they play so unimportant a part in the production of the animal or the ultimate returns to the producer.

To the same effect were the views of Mr. Skinner, president of the National Dairy Association, who, in June of 1921, wrote as follows:

It is possibly not known to you that my association for 25 years was with the class of farmers and stockmen who do business through the stockyards of the country, and as a result I have for many years enjoyed a very large acquaintance with this class of people and number many of them among my friends of to-day. * * *

The average man who ships stock to the market is passive on a matter of this kind. He recognizes that what the packer gets for the hide makes no difference to what he pays for the bullock on foot, yet their resistance is not very great, since it might be construed as opposing the powers that they have to sell to.

Those favoring a duty at this time appear to proceed on the assumption that the duty if imposed would result in an increase in the price of domestic hides which would be realized by the farmers to an extent in excess of any resulting increase in the cost of living. If this would in reality be the case, the fact should be demonstrated and arguments leading to a different conclusion should be answered. Mere assertion is not sufficient. It would obviously be absurd to impose a duty with a view to benefiting the farmers if in fact the duty would work to their disadvantage.

In the light of available information I am of the opinion that the suggested duty if imposed would increase the cost of living for every individual in the country. I am also of the opinion that it would carry with it serious consequences for the leather and boot and shoe industries of the country. And I am further of the opinion that the resulting increase in the price of domestic hides would be realized for the most part by the packers; that very little, if any, of this increase would be passed along to the farmers, and that such increase as the latter might realize would be more than offset by the increased cost of boots, shoes, and other leather commodities which they would be called upon to pay. I am therefore opposed to its imposition.

That the duty would result in a general increase in the cost of living is obvious. In order to produce the leather commodities required in this country it is essential to import between 30 and 40 per cent of our hides and calfskins. It is impossible for us to supply our own needs, and our domestic beef cattle have decreased during the past five years to the extent of about 23 per cent. Under these conditions any import duty on hides must result in an increase in the cost of boots and shoes and other leather goods generally. It is estimated that a duty of 15 per cent ad valorem, such as that under the Dingley Tariff Act of 1897, would mean an additional burden for the people of this country for boots and shoes alone of from ninety to one hundred millions of dollars (343,000,000 pairs at 30 cents additional per pair). To this figure is added about $30,000,000 for other articles of leather, making a total of about $120,000,000 annually.

Such a duty would be seriously felt by the boot and shoe industry in respect to export trade. This trade is in a serious condition at this time, having decreased about 41 per cent in number of pairs and about 38 per cent in value from 1923 to 1928. A decrease in our foreign market ordinarily means a decrease in American production with fewer wage earners or shorter hours. Experts assert that the duty would also be seriously felt by the independent tanners; that competition with the packer-tanners might prove to be impossible and that a monopoly of the leather and boot and shoe industries of the country in the hands of the packer-tanners might result. I am advised that a duty on hides with compensatory duties on leather and boots and shoes in addition to such protective duties as may be appropriate in view of European competition would require serious changes in methods and prices throughout the entire boot and shoe industry.

The maximum total increase from such a duty in the price of cattle hides and calfskins produced in this country annually, based on slaughterings for 1927, is estimated at approximately $25,000,000 ($1.50 per hide and 42 cents per skin). Who would realize this increase?

I understand that about 40 per cent of the hides produced in this country come from dairy cattle, of which, according to the last census, there were about 19,000,000, distributed among some 6,000,000 farmers, or an average of 3 per farmer. The remaining 60 per cent of the hides come from beef cattle sold for the most part on the hoof directly or indirectly to the packers, about three-quarters of the number finding their way to five large packing concerns. The cattle, as a rule, are bought for beef, and the price paid is dependent on the current price for beef on the gross weight per hundred pounds. The hide is a by-product which, if sold, must be sold at a later date on the hide market, a market which is subject to wide variations, having little or no relation to variations in the price of beef. Cattle and hides frequently pass through several hands on the way to the packers. Under these conditions it is difficult not to believe that the "lion's share" in the increase in the price of hides and skins would pass to the packers in the sale of hides as such, and that very little, if any, of the increase would be reflected in the prices received by the farmers for cattle.

I am advised in this connection that under the Dingley Tariff Act of 1897 cattle sold and exported alive on the hoof brought to the farmers exactly the same return as those sold to the packers for slaughter, despite the greater price for domestic hides. I am also advised that cattle to-day are frequently bought in lots, the same price being paid for all, despite great variations in the value of the hides of individual animals. In testifying before the Ways and Means Committee in December of 1921, a representative of one of the largest packers said in this connection:

I agree with you that the proposed duty on hides would have very little effect on livestock value; it would have some effect, but when spread over the weight of a live animal, the difference per pound of animal would not amount to much.

Even if we assume, however, that a part of the increase in the price of hides and skins would in fact be reflected in the prices received for cattle by the farmers, it seems clear that the amount received would be more than offset by the increased cost of living which would be imposed upon the farmers. Surely the farmers could not hope to receive more than one-half of the increase in the price of hides and skins. A 15 per cent ad valorem duty would mean on this basis a total at most of about twelve and one-half million dollars, as compared with the share in the increased cost of boots, shoes, and other leather articles to be shouldered by the farmers, amounting to some $24,000,000 (20 per cent of $120,000,000) and the balance of $96,000,000 to be assumed by the rest of the country as a whole, to which the farmers must look for the purchase of their wares.

I regret that all Members of the House did not have the opportunity to hear Mr. J. F. McElwain, who recently appeared before the Ways and Means Committee, representing the National Boot and Shoe Manufacturers Association. Copies of the report of the hearing at which he testified appear to be unavailable at this time. I am accordingly inserting his brief at this point in the hope that it will receive the careful consideration of all concerned. I would direct particular attention to his Exhibit E, entitled "Annual Cost of 15 Per Cent Duty and Gain Therefrom to Sections of the Country." If a larger figure than 15 per cent were employed the losses shown for each and every State with one exception would be proportionately increased.

BRIEF OF THE NATIONAL BOOT & SHOE MANUFACTURERS ASSOCIATION

PARAGRAPH 1589. HIDES AND SKINS

The shoe-manufacturing industry of the United States, exclusive of the manufacture of rubbers and of cut stock and findings so far as they are not made in shoe factories, comprised in 1925, 1,460 establishments and 206,992 wage earners, being 2.46 per cent of the total average number of wage earners in the manufactures of the country. (Statistical Abstract, 1928, pp. 763, 749.) It paid in that year wages amounting to over $225,000,000 and the value of its products was in excess of $925,000,000. It produced, in 1927, 343,606,000 pairs of shoes.

This association presents the following facts to assist in arriving at a correct conclusion regarding the proposed duty on hides and skins.

(1) Such a duty will be a serious handicap to the shoe industry.

(2) It will increase the cost of living to every person in the United States.

(3) It will result in no material gain or advantage to the farmers of the United States whom it is intended to benefit.

We will consider these points in order:

(1) An import duty upon hides and calfskins will constitute a serious handicap to the shoe-manufacturing industry for the following reasons:

(A) Imported hides and calfskins are and will continue to be necessary for our American manufacturers. The situation with respect to such raw materials as hides and calfskins is radically different from that with regard to almost any manufactured article upon which a duty is levied. In the case of most, if not all, of such manufactured articles the present or potential capacity of factories in the United States is sufficient to meet our domestic requirements. To put it in another way, we can produce all we consume.

This is not the case with cattle hides or with calfskins.

A schedule is attached hereto (Exhibit A) of the imports and exports of cattle hides during the last few years. It will be seen that imports are now about eleven times exports in quantity and about twelve times in value, even excluding buffalo hides from the imports. It is estimated that at least 30 per cent of our requirement of cattle hides is imported.

A schedule is also attached hereto (Exhibit B) of the imports and exports of raw calfskins during the same period. From this it will appear that imports are about three times exports in quantity and in value. It is estimated that about 40 per cent of our requirement of raw calfskins is imported. In addition, it is well known that calfskins of the best quality come to us only from western and central Europe. (Arnold, Hides and Skins, p. 324.)

It is also evident from statistics (Exhibit C, attached hereto) that the number of beef cattle in the United States is decreasing, not only in absolute numbers (23 per cent in the last five years) but particularly in relation to our population. It has fallen from 0.58 per person in 1901 to 0.28 per person in 1928, a decline of 50 per cent. This is inevitable as the country becomes more thickly settled. Increasingly cattle and hides will come from less thickly populated countries like the Argentine Republic, Canada, Brazil, Colombia, Venezuela, etc.

The decline in the number of cattle has been in spite of import duties of 1½ to 2 cents per pound upon cattle and 3 cents per pound upon beef (paragraph 701). It will be shown later in this brief that we can not expect the decline will be checked by an import duty upon hides.

(B) Therefore any import duty upon hides will result in an increase in the cost of leather and of shoes. It is hardly necessary to argue that if 30 per cent or 40 per cent of the domestic requirements of cattle hides and calfskins are imported and if upon them is imposed a duty, say of 15 per cent, the 15 per cent will be added not only to the cost of the imported hides but also to the selling price of domestic hides with which they now compete. Of course, the very claim that the farmer will benefit by this increase in the value given to his hides is the argument for the duty.

It has been estimated that a 15 per cent duty on hides and skins will result in an increase of from 10 to 12 per cent in the cost of production of finished leather, both sole and upper leather, and that this means an increase of from 15 to 25 cents per pair in the cost of production of men's and women's leather shoes. Adding the wholesalers' and retailers' increased costs and overhead, the price to the wearer of leather shoes can hardly fail to average 30 cents per pair higher on account of the duty on hides and skins. Of course, this increase will vary with the type, grade, and style of shoe. (Exhibit F.)

An increase in the cost of a basic raw material such as hides, due to a tariff or other cause, is necessarily pyramided in the products manufactured from such material. For one thing, additional capital or borrowings are called for, upon which the manufacturer must pay interest. That duty costs the consumer least which is imposed on an article not entering largely into the manufacture of another product—upon butter, milk, beef, for example.

(C) This increased cost will be most seriously felt by the American shoe manufacturer with respect to his export trade.

Our export trade in leather boots and shoes is in a precarious condition. It has been constantly declining, falling 41 per cent in number of pairs and 38 per cent in value from 1923 to 1928 (see Schedule D hereto annexed). Between 1910 and 1914 we exported on the average 9,043,000 pairs annually. In 1928 we exported only 4,320,000 pairs.

Such export trade as we have had has been almost entirely to Cuba, where the United States has the benefit of a preferential tariff, and to Canada and Central and South American countries and neighboring islands, where it has the advantage of geographical proximity. Cuba, heretofore the principal foreign customer for our shoes, has increased its import duty upon them in order to build up its own industry. In other Central and South American countries foreign competition threatens increasingly. An increase of 30 cents per pair in the cost of manufacture of shoes in this country may make all the difference between an ability to compete in these foreign countries and an inability to do so.

This is particularly the case because in no foreign country which is a considerable exporter of shoes is there a duty upon hides and skins, unless Switzerland is excepted. The foreign manufacturer from whom competition must be expected obtains free of duty the hides from which his leather is made.

Naturally a decrease in our foreign market means a decrease in American production, a smaller number of wage earners employed, or the same number employed at shorter hours.

The assertion may be made that this danger to our foreign trade will be avoided by a system of drawbacks. It appears at once how difficult it will be for any shoe manufacturer purchasing his hides in the open market to determine what portion of the shoes that he exports is represented by leather manufactured in this country from foreign hides. In other words, to trace imported hides through the tanneries to the shoe manufacturer and into each exported shoe will involve complications, controversies, and expenses that even with the best intentions on the part of the customs officials will prove an immense handicap to the American manufacturer. And there will be no drawback for exported shoes made from domestic hides, the higher price of which is due to the import duty. To the extent of the drawback he receives the manufacturer using foreign hides will be at some advantage over the manufacturer using domestic hides.

(2) An import duty on hides and skins will increase the cost of living to all our people. If the cost of leather is increased by reason of an import duty on hides and if the cost of shoes to the consumer is consequently increased on the average to the extent of 30 cents per pair, the people of the United States are going to pay each year for their shoes $90,000,000 to $100,000,000 in excess of what they have been paying under free hides. In addition, the duty will be reflected in the cost of every other article made of leather.

The following is probably a very conservative estimate of the cost of a duty on hides to the people of the United States:

EFFECT OF A 15 PER CENT DUTY ON HIDES

Shoes: The people of the United States will pay at least 30 cents per pair additional for about 300,000,000 pairs of shoes purchased each year, or, say, $90,000,000.

Other articles of leather: The people will pay, say, 15 per cent at the lowest estimate additional for saddlery and harness leather, $30,000,000; trunks, suit cases, and bags, $60,000,000; leather gloves and mittens, $30,000,000; pocketbooks, purses, etc., $40,000,000; and other leather products, $40,000,000; total 15 per cent of $200,000,000, $30,000,000. Total, $120,000,000.

The Government will get, on basis of 15 per cent duty upon hides imported in 1928 to value of $63,694,386, $9,554,157.

It may be, of course, that an increase in the cost of leather will result in an increased use of substitutes. Already the production of artificial leather has grown to a surprising figure—from $6,097,000 in 1914 to $40,932,000 in 1925. (Statistical Abstract, 1928, p. 759.) The manufacture of rubber and composition soles in the 12 months ended with September, 1928, was nearly double that for the 12 months immediately preceding. Some authorities believe that the decline in the price of hides in 1928 was due in part at least to the increasing use of such substitutes.

A further increase in the manufacture and use of substitutes can hardly benefit either the public who wear or use the substitute article or the farmer who has hides to sell.

Ordinarily the danger of increased cost is to some extent modified by the impetus which an import duty gives to domestic manufacture or production. This can not be expected in the case of hides or calfskins. A hide is estimated to constitute in value about one-fifteenth the value of the entire animal. It is not conceivable that cattle will be raised to any greater extent on account of a 15 per cent increase in the value of one-fifteenth of a steer.

It has been said by an authority on the tariff:

"On any but the most extreme protectionist principles, there is no excuse for a duty on hides. There can be nothing in the nature of protection to young industries—no prospect of ultimate cheapening through a stimulus to improved domestic production. Even the true principle of equalized cost of production could not be applied to a by-product of a flourishing export industry." (Taussig Tariff History of the United States, 7th Rev. Ed., p. 378, 9.)

(3) An import duty on hides and skins will be of no benefit to the farmer, but, on the contrary, will add to his cost of living.

It must be borne in mind that the farmer is one of the largest, if not the largest, purchaser of articles made of leather. He and his family probably wear out more shoes and shoes of heavier, stronger leather than any other large class of the population. Furthermore, he uses to a greater extent such articles as harness, gloves, etc. Therefore, any duty which increases the cost of leather and of articles made of leather will correspondingly increase the cost of living to the farmer.

In 1920, census figures indicate, about one-quarter of the persons engaged in gainful occupations in the United States were in agriculture, including in that term forestry and animal husbandry. Undoubtedly, therefore, it is safe to say that of the cost of a duty on hides to the people of the United States (estimated conservatively to be $120,000,000 annually) the farmer will pay 20 per cent or $24,000,000. The question is, whether he will gain sufficiently from such a duty to offset this increased living cost.

First, we should determine the total extent to which cattle hides and calfskins may be increased in value by reason of a duty.

The Department of Agriculture estimates that in 1927, 14,000,000 cattle were slaughtered in the United States. The average cattle hide weighs about 50 pounds, and 20 cents may be taken as an average price per pound, which gives us an average value of each hide of $10. If 15 per cent is added to the value of all domestic hides by an import duty of 15 per cent, the additional value per hide is about $1.50, and the additional value for 14,000,000 hides is $21,000,000.

The Department of Agriculture also estimates that there were slaughtered in 1927 about 9,000,000 calves. The average calfskin, including kips, weighs about 12 pounds, and 23 cents may be taken as an average price per pound, which gives us a total value of about $2.76 for each calfskin. If a duty of 15 per cent increases to that extent the value of a calfskin, the increase will be about 42 cents, and the increase in value of 9,000,000 calfskins produced in the United States each year will be less than $4,000,000.

Therefore it is apparent that the total increase in the value of cattle hides and calfskins produced annually in the United States, which may result from a duty of 15 per cent, will be in the neighborhood of $25,000,000, as compared with about $24,000,000 which the farmer will pay as the result of such a duty by way of an increase in his living costs.

But not all or nearly all of this $25,000,000 will accrue to the farmer.

By far the greater quantity of hides produced in the United States are from cattle raised on large ranches of the West and Middle West for beef. Beef cattle probably constitute 50 to 60 per cent of the number in the United States at the present time. They are sold, as a rule, to meat packers, and to a very large extent to four, or at the most five, such packers.

The Federal Trade Commission estimated that more than 75 per cent of all the cattle and 65 per cent of the calves killed by wholesale slaughterers in the United States were killed by five large meat packers. (Report on Leather and Shoe Industries, 1919, p. 2).

The packer buys the animal for the beef and the price he pays is dependent on the current price of beef and is on gross weight per 100 pounds. All besides the beef is a by-product which the packer must either sell to himself for manufacture into a finished article or more generally sell to another manufacturer at a later date on a variable market.

In 1928 beef steers of from 950 to 1,100 pounds in weight and of choice quality brought on the average at Chicago $16.04 per 100 pounds. This would mean for a steer weighing 1,000 pounds a price of $160.40. If, as we have estimated above, the average hide of such an animal is worth $10, it will be apparent that the value of the hide is slightly over 6 per cent of the value of the animal. An increase of 15 per cent in the value of the hide, or $1.50, means an increase of less than 1 per cent in the value of the entire animal, or, in the usual case, a little over one-sixth of 1 cent per pound.

The packer buys the animal regardless of the condition of its hide and with the fact in mind that he must either tan the hide himself, in the case of the few packers who do this, and sell the leather considerably later on the market, or sell the hide itself to a tanner at some later date. It does not seem possible that under these conditions the slight possible increase in the value of the hide will affect to any material extent the price that the packer will pay for the animal.

Incidentally, it may be said that cattle on the hoof are to-day, without a duty, probably bringing the highest price in peace-time history, and this in spite of the fact that the price of hides has been declining.

The dairy farmer, on the other hand, has an inferior hide to sell. It is not intrinsically of as high quality as the hide of a western steer. Neither as a rule is it taken off with sufficient skill and ability. In marketing his hides, also, the dairy farmer is at a disadvantage. He generally sells not to the packer but to the local butcher, who seldom has to face any keen competition or, in the case of a hide the farmer has himself removed, to a peddler or buyer who controls the situation in his vicinity, or to one of a number of small dealers. Sales are of one hide or of a few hides at a time. As long ago as 1919 the Federal Trade Commission pointed out the disadvantages of the methods of marketing such hides.

The commission said (Report on Leather and Shoe Industries, 1919, p. 11):

"It is thus seen that before a country hide reaches the tanner it may pass through three or four hands. The original owner of the hide may sell to a local merchant, the local merchant sells to a small dealer, the small dealer sells to a larger dealer, who in turn sells to the tanner. If, under the circumstances, this were as economical a system of marketing as could be devised it necessarily follows that if each purchaser realizes even a small margin of profit, there must be quite a wide difference between the price paid to the farmer or small butcher and the price paid by the tanner."

Therefore, in the case of a country hide, whatever increase in value accrues on account of a 15 per cent duty is divided among the several people through whose hands the hide passes.

If the situation has not changed since 1919, presumably about 75 per cent of 60 per cent or 37½ to 45 per cent of the cattle slaughtered in the United States are slaughtered by the great packers and the rest either by smaller packers, butchers, or farmers.

It seems certain that at the most the farmer could not expect to receive more than one-half of the gain in value of hides due to a 15 per cent duty. This might mean $12,500,000 as compared with nearly twice that amount he will pay for articles of leather which he is obliged to use, and $120,000,000 that will be paid by the country at large as an increase in the cost of living.

Of course the farmer is affected, not only by the increase in his own costs but by the fact that by the addition of nearly $100,000,000 to the amount paid by the rest of the population for articles made of leather the ability of the rest of the country to purchase other products of the farmer may be to that extent curtailed.

Only a relatively small number of farmers in a relatively small number of States raise cattle to a sufficient extent to benefit by a duty on hides even to the slight extent that packers or hide buyers will pass along the increased value. Figures are not available for the number of persons engaged in raising cattle for beef, but they are relatively few. Aside from such persons, the farmer who owns cattle owns them for dairy purposes. It is estimated that in 1920, when the latest census was taken, there were slightly over 6,000,000 dairy farmers, farmers, and stock raisers. (Statistical Abstract, 1928, p. 50.) In that same year the number of dairy cows was 19,675,000 (p. 611), which means that there were only slightly over three dairy cows to each farmer. Of these it is unlikely that more than one at the most would be killed in a year, indicating the slight benefit that would accrue to dairy farmers throughout the country.

Even in States where cattle raising is a prominent industry the population as a whole will pay notably more in the increase of the cost of products made of leather than it will receive from the increase in the value of hides. (See Schedule E, attached hereto.)

CONCLUSION

In only one tariff act since the Civil War (the Dingley Act of 1897) has there been a duty on hides and in none has there been a duty on calfskins. Hides have been free since 1909. The National Boot & Shoe Manufacturers' Association believes that there will be no advantage to the country in general or to the farmer in particular in departing in the tariff act to be drawn this year from the general policy of free trade in hides and skins.

ANNUAL COST OF 15 PER CENT DUTY AND GAIN THEREFROM TO SECTIONS OF THE COUNTRY

[Number of cattle from Statistical Abstract of United States, 1928, p. 612]

Number slaughtered annually estimated at one-third. Total in United States in 1927 were 56,872,000. (Abstract, p. 811.) Number slaughtered in 1927 estimated by Department of Agriculture at 14,000,000 cattle, 9,030,000 calves; total, 23,030,000.

Gain from duty figured on basis that of cattle slaughtered one-third were calves and that gain to farmer is two-thirds of $1.50, or $1, per hide, or two-thirds of 42 cents, or 28 cents, per calfskin.

Cost of duty in increased cost of living estimated at $1 per person per year.

SOLE LEATHER COST

Figuring raw hides costing 20 cents per pound, increase due to a 15 per cent duty would be 3 cents per pound, costing with duty 23 cents.

One pound of hides produces 0.65 pound of sole leather, which means the leather, including bends, bellies, shoulders, and heads, would cost $0.046 per pound more because of the duty.

Bends, representing the best part of the hide, from which outer soles are cut, would cost with hides at 20 cents per pound, without duty $0.534 per pound; with duty $0.599 per pound; or an increase of $0.064 per pound because of the duty.

The average increase in cost of soles cut from bends, because of the duty, men's $0.06 per pair, women's $0.049 per pair.

Bellies, representing the poorer part of the leather, from which inner soles are cut, would figure $0.269 per pound without duty, $0.293 per pound with duty, or $0.024 per pound extra.

Average increase in cost of inner soles because of the duty, men's $0.011 per pair; women's $0.009 per pair.

COST OF UPPER LEATHER

Calf: Figuring raw calfskins on a basis of 23 cents per pound, adding a duty of 15 per cent, increased cost would be $0.0375 per pound.

There is about 1 foot of leather to 1 pound of raw calfskins.

Adding selling and overhead increase because of 15 per cent duty would be $0.041 per foot.

Figuring the average cutting allowance, high shoes, low shoes, and fancy shoes, on the basis of men's 2.25 feet per pair and women's 2 feet per pair, increased cost per pair in men's would be 9 cents; women's, 8.1 cents.

Side, kip, and patent leather: Figuring on a basis of 20 cents for kips, 18 cents for extremes, and 16 cents for buffs, and on a yield of 90 per cent for kips, 85 per cent for extremes, and 80 per cent for buffs, the increased cost would be approximately 3½ cents per foot.

INCREASED COST PER PAIR TO ULTIMATE CONSUMER

Figuring on a basis of 15 per cent for wholesaling costs and 50 per cent on the cost price or 33⅓ per cent on the selling price for retailer, increased cost to ultimate consumer is as follows:

A DUTY ON BOOTS AND SHOES

I desire also at this time to record myself and those for whom I speak as in favor of such duty on leather boots and shoes as may be appropriate to cover the difference between the cost of labor in this country and the cost of labor abroad in the same industry. To do so is merely to advocate the policy embodied in every tariff act enacted by Congress from 1789 to 1913, a period of 124 years—the policy which prevails to-day in every nation in the world, which is an important manufacturer of boots and shoes with the exception of England.

I can see no inconsistency in urging on the one hand that a raw material, the domestic supply of which is insufficient to meet our needs and which is controlled in large measure by a few large concerns remaining on the free list; and on the other hand that a finished commodity in which labor represents from 25 to 30 per cent of the value, the domestic supply of which is more than sufficient to meet our needs and which is manufactured by over 1,400 concerns on a national basis under highly competitive conditions be given such protection as may be appropriate to offset lower wages for similar work in other countries with which we must compete in the domestic market.

The basis for appropriate protection of boots and shoes is easily stated.

In recent years imports have increased with great rapidity, from about 400,000 pairs in 1923, if I am correctly informed, to over 2,600,000 pairs in 1928, or 655 per cent. The increase during this period for men's and boys' shoes amounted to about 91 per cent, for children's shoes to about 162 per cent, and for women's shoes to over 1,650 per cent reflecting in large measure competition from Czechoslovakia. The effects of the Underwood Tariff Act of 1913 placing boots and shoes on the free list would presumably have been more promptly felt but for the war. Imports have been facilitated by the adoption in Europe of American principles of manufacture by comparatively inexpensive materials and by wages estimated as averaging not more than 34 per cent of those paid in this country. Exports have been steadily decreasing, to the extent of about 41 per cent during the period referred to, in the face of tariff walls existing in other shoe-producing countries.

It is true that total imports still represent but a small percentage of annual domestic production. In view of the rapidity of increase, however, it does not seem unreasonable to urge that boots and shoes be accorded due protection as in the past, subject to the provisions of an appropriate flexible clause in the new tariff act.

Such protection would not increase the domestic price to the consumer in view of the fact that there is an exportable surplus of boots and shoes produced in this country under competitive conditions. The duty should be contrasted in this respect with the proposed duty on hides where the domestic supply is insufficient to meet our needs.

For reasons already stated I also insert at this point Mr. McElwain's brief submitted to the Ways and Means Committee in this connection.

BRIEF OF THE NATIONAL BOOT & SHOE MANUFACTURERS' ASSOCIATION

PARAGRAPH 1607. SHOES

(1) The shoe industry: The shoe-manufacturing industry in the United States is among the largest of our industries. In 1925, the year for which the latest figures are available, there were 1,460 establishments (exclusive of the manufacture of rubbers, and of cut stock and findings so far as they are not made in shoe factories), employing 206,992 wage earners, being about 2.46 per cent of the total average number of wage earners in the manufactures of the United States. (Statistical Abstract of the United States, pp. 763 and 749.) The industry paid in that year wages amounting to over $225,000,000, and the value of its product was in excess of $925,000,000. It produced in 1927, 343,976,000 pairs of shoes.

The industry is national in its extent and is particularly important in the States of Massachusetts, New York, Missouri, Illinois, Wisconsin, New Hampshire, Pennsylvania, Ohio, and Maine.

There are no trusts or combinations in the industry and no one manufacturer produces more than a very small per cent of the total production of the country.

Without doubt the shoe factories of the United States are operating to not more than 50 per cent of their potential capacity. This means of necessity that competition is keen and that excessive profits are impossible.

(2) The duty recommended: The shoe-manufacturing industry asks for a duty of 25 per cent on leather boots and shoes and other leather footwear. This rate of duty is estimated merely to cover the difference between the cost of labor in this country and the cost of labor abroad in this particular industry.

If a duty is to be imposed upon hides and skins and/or upon leather, naturally the shoe industry should receive additional protection to an extent sufficient to cover the resulting increase in the cost of raw materials to the domestic manufacturer. Otherwise the foreign manufacturer who enjoys free hides and leather will be given a large advantage.

(3) Argument: The duty of 25 per cent is needed for the following reasons:

(A) The importation of leather boots and shoes has increased during the past 10 years to a very alarming extent, as is shown by the table (Exhibit A) hereto annexed.

From this table it will be apparent that from 1923 to 1928 importations of leather boots and shoes increased from 398,929 pairs to 2,616,884 pairs, or 655 per cent. During the same period the value of these importations increased from $1,246,178 to $8,254,224, or 562 per cent.

The principal increase has been in women's shoes. From 1923 to 1928, while importations of shoes for men and boys increased 91 per cent, and of children's shoes 162 per cent, importations of women's shoes increased from 115,119 pairs to 2,018,269 pairs, or 1,653 per cent. The number of women's shoes imported, therefore, increased more than sixteen times. In value such imports grew from $527,384 to $5,829,406, or over 1,000 per cent.

This rate of increase is in itself sufficiently alarming but in all probability it has only begun. From 1926 to 1927 the importation of leather shoes for women increased 102 per cent, and from 1927 to 1928 105 per cent.

Imports of leather slippers increased from 400,073 pairs, of the value of $407,407, in 1927, to 633,998 pairs, of the value of $1,019,405, in 1928, an increase of over 37 per cent in volume and over 100 per cent in value.

Imports of dutiable footwear, uppers of wool, cotton, ramie, hair, fiber, silk or substitutes therefor, duty 35 per cent, do not materially increase and are of a low per-pair value. The 1,170,983 pairs imported in 1928 were valued at only $316,193.

(B) The larger part of the increase in the importation of shoes for women is due to Czechoslovakia. That country has during the past few years grown to be the principal exporter of shoes in the entire world. It exported in 1928, according to the estimate of our Department of Commerce, nearly, if not quite, 14,000,000 pairs of shoes or nearly three times the total number exported by the United States.

Of the women's shoes that entered the United States in 1928, 70 per cent in number of pairs and 57 per cent in value came from Czechoslovakia, and so large a part of our total imports are represented by women's shoes that of the total number of leather shoes for men, boys, women, and children that entered this country 57 per cent in number of pairs were from Czechoslovakia.

(C) The fact that so large a quantity of shoes, particularly for women, are being imported is of itself sufficient evidence that they are underselling the domestic shoe in the American market.

The reasons for this are easily determined.

The foreign manufacturer to-day can procure American shoe machinery or machinery manufactured abroad along American lines. In this respect, therefore, he is on an equality with the American manufacturer.

As far as can be determined, managerial efficiency and operating ability, particularly in Czechoslovakia, are equal to those in American factories. It is well known that by far the larger part of the shoes coming to this country from Czechoslovakia are the product of one very able manufacturer now producing 65,000 pairs of shoes daily. That manufacturer, with certain of his manager-assistants, came to this country, worked in various factories here, and acquired an intimate knowledge of American methods and processes. These methods and processes he has put into effect in his factories at home, so that in all probability the production per employee in his modern Czechoslovakian factories is equivalent to the production per employee in this country.

On an equality with the American manufacturer in other regards, the manufacturer in Czechoslovakia possesses one outstanding advantage. His wages are estimated to be not more than one-third of the wages in this country.

It has been ascertained that the average wages paid in the factory of this Czechoslovakian manufacturer are as follows:

Skilled adult men (43 per cent of employees), $13.50 to $14.40 per week.

Adult male helpers, $10.80 per week.

Skilled adult women (31 per cent of employees), $7.20 to $7.40 per week.

Boys from 18 to 21, $6.30 per week.

Boys under 18, $2.70 per week.

Girls from 14 to 18 (12 per cent of employees), $4.50 per week.

Factory average, about $9.50 per week.

These figures are unofficial, but undoubtedly accurate.

The Ministry of Labor Gazette for October, 1928, states that in England the minimum weekly wage for the principal classes of skilled workmen in the shoe industry at the end of September was $13.61, and that the minimum for women of 20 years or over in certain operations in the closing and heel building departments and stock and shoe rooms was $8.26. These minima are probably not far from the average.

Average wages in the shoe industry in this country are as follows: Adult males, $30.63 per week; adult females, $19.53 per week; factory average, about $26.02 per week. (Monthly Labor Review of the Bureau of Labor Statistics, December, 1928, p. 188.)

Since it is difficult to obtain official figures for labor costs in the shoe industry abroad, statistics for related industries are of interest. In a report by the Tariff Commission to the Department of Commerce, which is comprised in Senate Document No. 198 of the Sixty-eighth Congress, second session, and is dated 1925, there is the following table showing the per cent that the average wage among male workers in the calfskin industry in the specified country forms of the wage of the same workers in the United States:

	Per cent
Austria	30.13
Belgium	24.60
Czechoslovakia	25.40
England	55.38
France	27.77
Germany	33.79
Luxemburg	33.53
Scotland	67.83

It is pretty certain that not far from the same relation exists with regard to wages in shoe manufacturing. According to this table the wage in Czechoslovakia is only about one-quarter of that in the United States.

Since it is generally understood that 25 to 30 per cent of the manufacturing cost of a pair of shoes in the United States represents labor, even excluding the labor cost entering into the manufacture of the leather and supplies, and if the labor cost is from one-third to one-fourth that in the United States, an import duty of 25 per cent will no more than compensate for the labor differential.

(D) The American shoe manufacturer must look increasingly to the home market for his outlet. Exports of leather boots and shoes have been slowly but steadily declining, as is indicated by Exhibit C. Between 1923 and 1928 they declined 41 per cent and between 1927 and 1928 alone they fell off 21 per cent.

In fact, the export of leather boots and shoes has been confined almost entirely to Central American and South American countries and to adjacent islands in which this country has had a geographical or other advantage. Even in these countries, however, the American product is losing ground, owing, in Cuba, to an increase in the import duty intended to encourage the manufacture of shoes in that country, and in other countries, no doubt, to growing competition from Europe. (See Exhibit D.)

To no country of Europe does the United States export any appreciable number of shoes.

(E) An import duty will not increase the price of domestic shoes to the consumer. Undoubtedly the product of Czechoslovakian factories can undersell the American manufacturer. However, whether or not such competition existed, the consumer in this country would be assured that he would pay for the domestic product the lowest competitive figure. This is the logical and inevitable result of the fact that the competition among shoe manufacturers of the United States is as keen as that in any department of industry, and that the capacity of our domestic factories so considerably exceeds the requirements of the market.

(F) Every foreign country which manufactures shoes in any considerable quantity, including Czechoslovakia, France, Germany, Canada, and Italy, and excepting only Great Britain, protects its industry by a duty. Because of the divers methods of estimating the duty in some countries, upon weight, for example, or varying in amount for various classes of shoes, it is difficult to draw any table which will be of value for purposes of comparison. It may be said, however, that the duty in Canada is 30 per cent. An American manufacturer states that the duty he pays in France figures 20 per cent plus a luxury tax. In South Africa, Canada, New Zealand, and Australia there is a preferential tariff favoring Great Britain.

(G) The continued encroachment of foreign shoes upon the domestic market must result in decreased domestic production and diminished employment, or else in lower wages necessary for competition with the foreign product.

It is plain that every foreign shoe sold in the domestic market means one less shoe manufactured in an American factory and that the employment of American workmen is correspondingly diminished. At present this effect is chiefly felt in the manufacture of women's shoes. There seems no limit, however, to the extent to which the foreign manufacturer can go if a duty is not imposed in this country. There is every chance that the importation of men's shoes will continue to increase and that the manufacturer in Czechoslovakia will turn to men's shoes at any moment and be as successful in that direction as in the manufacture of shoes for women. Though the figures are relatively small, the importation of leather shoes for men and boys from Czechoslovakia into the United States increased from 10,329 pairs in 1927 to 52,245 pairs in 1928, or more than 500 per cent, and of children's shoes from 15,722 pairs to 40,098 pairs, or nearly 300 per cent.

(4) Conclusion: Testimony has been given before this committee by a representative of the farming interests to the effect that an analysis of six industrial tariff schedules shows an average protection of 40½ per cent, as against 22 per cent for agriculture. The manufacture of leather boots and shoes has no protection. We respectfully submit that no manufacturing industry in this country in which labor forms so large an element in cost is to-day without the benefit of a protective tariff. The duty upon leather boots and shoes under earlier tariff acts has been as follows:

Act of—	Per cent
1883	30
1890	25
1894	20
1897	25
1900	10–15
1913	Free.
1922	Free.

The effect of removing the duty in 1913 would have been felt more promptly but for the war, which temporarily stopped importations from Europe.

The shoe industry hopes that Congress will recognize the growing danger to its prosperity and will restore to it the benefit of a duty before additional harm is done which can not easily be remedied.

WORK OF COMMITTEE ON INDIAN AFFAIRS

Mr. LEAVITT. Mr. Speaker, in further continuance of a custom of several years, I am placing in the RECORD a summary of the work of the House Committee on Indian Affairs during the Seventieth Congress. This completes the progress report printed at the end of the first session.

During the Seventieth Congress there were referred to this committee 208 House bills, 8 House joint resolutions, and 46 bills and 1 resolution which had already passed the Senate. Of this total of 263 measures laid before the committee, 128 were reported favorably and 2 unfavorably to the House. An even 100 of these measures became law, which is interesting because they constitute nearly 6 per cent of the entire 1,722 laws enacted by the Seventieth Congress. In addition to this 100 there were 3 included in deficiency bills. Eight House and 2 Senate bills, several of which were reported shortly before adjournment, 2 with adverse reports, remained on the House Calendars at the close of the Congress, and 11 which had passed the House were pending in the Senate.

It is deeply regretted by the committee that two bills to allow the Cowlitz and other tribes of the State of Washington to take claims of long standing into the Court of Claims for determination received presidential disapproval, and that one so authorizing three other tribes in Utah and Colorado, having passed both Houses, was not acted upon by the President at adjournment.

It is true that five new laws were approved during the Seventieth Congress to allow various other tribes to submit their cases against the Government to the Court of Claims and that several such acts which had previously passed were beneficially amended. It is likewise true that the basis of claim is less clearly established in the disapproved measures than in the others. Still the fact remains that the final and complete adjudication of such tribal claims, long held to exist, is a first essential to the constructive solution of the problems affecting many tribes of Indians.

The closing up of these old tribal matters is essential because the great expectations of the various tribes that sums are due from the Government must either be realized or definitely removed by final court action, following fair and complete trial, before many Indians will settle down to fit themselves fully into the environment of white civilization. It is also necessary to remove at once the feeling that injustice must ever confront them. And there is no way by which these old claims can be adjudicated and ended except by acts of Congress admitting for trial in the Court of Claims these matters in dispute.

In spite of the sharp differences of opinion with regard to most other matters, every commission or organization interested in Indian affairs and recently reporting has agreed on the vital value and necessity of thus fairly and finally ending these matters as a prerequisite to ultimate success along other lines of Indian progress. Brief quotation from the report of the Institute for Government Research on the Problem of Indian Administration is characteristic. The institute says, on page 19 of the summary of its report:

> Until these claims are out of the way not much can be expected of Indians who are placing their faith in them.

It is my purpose as chairman of this committee to advance legislation to meet this situation more fully in the next Congress.

At the close of this statement there are listed the bills reported by the House committee with notation of titles and final disposition. It is to be remembered that practically all of the appropriations for work among the Indians are made under authorization of already existing general law and that they come through the Committee on Appropriations and not through the legislative Committee on Indian Affairs. Still the wide range of legislation having to do with the Indians as a whole, with various tribes and with individuals, is revealed by a study of that list. That 100 bills having to do with Indian matters became law, in addition to the numerous items in appropriation bills, brings home the close attention required of the Congress in Indian matters, and it settles any question relative to the earnest endeavor of the Congress to deal adequately and justly in redeeming its responsibility.

For several years the appropriations for health, educational, and industrial work among the Indians have been steadily increased, and to one with the perspective which can exist only with personal knowledge to compare conditions now with those of several years ago, the progress is known to be marked. The leadership of Commissioner Charles H. Burke along these lines has been constructive and devoted. Upon the foundation laid the advance of the next few years should be even more rapid and permanent, because of the clearer vision which has been brought about and the fuller grasp of the fundamentals which has been acquired.

I think the universal verdict of all boards, societies, and commissions reporting has been that Indian progress must be advanced by even greater appropriations. I agree. Especially in education, including school, industry, and agriculture, and in health work of every kind. The Indian Bureau has taken the same position, and the records will show that their estimates of adequate funds were reduced approximately $12,000,000 by the Budget for the two fiscal years. Congress did go somewhat above the Budget estimates of these fiscal years of 1929 and 1930, but there is even a greater distance to go. It is encouraging that the movement is forward, and that it has been. In proof of this let me again set forth some comparative figures. I begin with the Sixty-eighth Congress because my personal knowledge began then. My chairmanship of the Committee on Indian Affairs began with the Sixty-ninth Congress.

The Sixty-eighth Congress appropriated over $29,250,000 for Indian administration; the Sixty-ninth approximately $30,250,000; and the Seventieth Congress, just ended, still further increased this to $46,788,745. The amounts from tribal funds remained at about $2,400,000, thus continuing the fact that the Public Treasury is carrying the increases.

I also wish again to compare the specific items for health and educational work. I will start with the Sixty-seventh Congress. That Congress appropriated for education of the Indians $10,362,408.36; the Sixty-eighth increased the sum to $11,815,991.51; the Sixty-ninth to $12,895,415; and the Seventieth increased this still further to $17,433,500.

The greater emphasis being placed on health work is shown even more strikingly. The Sixty-seventh Congress appropriated $901,260; the Sixty-eighth, $1,597,375; the Sixty-ninth, $2,119,920; and the two sessions of the Seventieth Congress appropriated $4,994,100.

A more detailed statement of the appropriations for the Seventieth Congress will emphasize the rapidly increasing ratio of advance year by year as well as by Congresses of two years each.

The following information is furnished regarding appropriations for the Indian Service for the fiscal year 1930:

	Fiscal year 1930	Fiscal year 1929	Increase
Health appropriations:
From Treasury funds	$2,711,600.00	$1,484,500.00	$1,227,100.00
From tribal funds	160,000.00	118,000.00	42,000.00
Authorized to be used from other available funds	275,000.00	250,000.00	25,000.00
Total for health	3,146,600.00	1,847,500.00	1,662,100.00
Educational purposes:
From Treasury funds	7,968,500.00	7,317,000.00	651,500.00
From tribal funds	1,149,000.00	999,000.00	150,000.00
Total for education	9,117,500.00	8,316,000.00	801,500.00
Regular annual appropriation bill:
Treasury funds	16,546,603.02	13,834,509.00	2,712,094.02
Tribal funds	4,738,443.17	3,566,500.00	1,171,943.17
Total annual appropriation	21,285,046.19	17,401,009.00	3,884,037.19

The foregoing tabulation covers only appropriations contained in the regular Interior Department appropriation bills. During the first and second sessions of the Seventieth Congress additional appropriations for the Indian Service were contained in the deficiency acts passed at those sessions of Congress. The following is a summary of the appropriations contained in the deficiency acts:

	First session	Second session
First deficiency:
Treasury	$4,865,144.62	$142,000.00
Tribal	85,031.70
Total	4,950,176.32	142,000.00
Second deficiency:
Treasury	594,898.53	1,703,096.73
Tribal	293,500.00	419,018.24
Total	888,398.53	2,122,114.97

Summary of appropriations for the Indian Service during the Seventieth Congress

First session:
Interior Department appropriation act	$17,401,009.00
First deficiency	4,950,176.00
Second deficiency	888,398.53
	23,239,583.85
Second session:
Interior Department appropriation act	21,285,046.19
First deficiency	142,000.00
Second deficiency	2,122,114.97
	23,549,161.16

Attention is invited to the total appropriations made in the first session of the Seventieth Congress, $23,239,583.85. Of this sum, $3,450,000 was contained in the first deficiency of that session for the construction of the Coolidge Dam in Arizona. In addition to that amount, $463,732.49 was carried to pay a claim of the Shawnee Indians of Oklahoma, these two items totaling $3,913,732.49. The second deficiency of the first session also carried $350,000 for the installation of a power plant at the Coolidge Dam, and in the second deficiency of the second session $325,500 is carried for the completion of these two projects. Permitting these last two items to balance against each other the sum of $3,913,732.49 has been absorbed by the bill for 1930. For comparison purposes attention is invited to the following:

Appropriations, second session	$23,549,161.16
Appropriations, first session	23,239,583.85
Increase	309,577.31
Plus two items mentioned in preceding paragraph and absorbed in 1930 totals	3,913,732.49
Actual increase of funds, 1930	4,223,309.80

It will be noted that we have been successful in procuring for the fiscal year 1930 the largest appropriations ever allowed by Congress for the Indian Service, the net total increase, as explained above, being $4,223,309.80

In connection with this advance it is the province of this committee to consider and initiate any further legislation required.

A few days ago Hon. Edgar B. Meritt, for 35 years in the Government service and at this time Assistant Commissioner of Indian Affairs, was asked to state his views regarding needed constructive improvements in the Indian Service and to set forth a practical program. I present here his reply, a program entitled to consideration. He said:

My first thought is to impress the committee with the bigness of the Indian problem, its many complications involving 350,000 Indians, 225,000 of whom are restricted, consisting of about 200 tribes speaking 58 different languages, living on 190 reservations, scattered over 26 different States, with quite varied problems for each reservation, administered under about 2,500 different laws and 300 treaties, involving Indian property, individual and tribal, valued at about $1,600,000,000, and the Indian country covering an area as large as all the New England States and the State of New York combined.

Speaking from an experience of over 35 years in the Government service, I say with confidence that there is no other bureau in the Government service so difficult to administer, which needs such a broad knowledge of so many different complicated and difficult subjects, which requires so much patience, human understanding, and sympathy. It is also well to understand and fully appreciate that Congress has a responsibility and a duty equal to that of Indian Service officials and employees in the handling of the Indian problem. Indian Service officials are too frequently criticized for doing things they are required to do because of legislation enacted by Congress or failing to do things they should do because Congress has not passed laws that should be enacted or furnished funds that should be provided to relieve the condition of the Indians and improve Indian administration generally. Also the Indian Service is frequently criticized for not asking for appropriations when, as a matter of fact, the Indian Bureau has submitted the needed estimates, but under the Budget system those estimates have not been transmitted to Congress. Senator THOMAS has recently had printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD (see pp. 4368 to 4371, both inclusive, CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of February 26, 1929) information showing that during the past two years the Indian Bureau has prepared estimates totaling more than $12,000,000 that have not been transmitted to Congress, and under the Budget system we are not permitted to ask for one dollar of those $12,000,000 before a committee of Congress. The foregoing is not intended as a criticism of Congress or the Bureau of the Budget or the Budget system, but as a plain statement of fact that must be known and appreciated if there is to be a fair and just understanding of the difficulties of the Government's Indian problem.

With this preliminary statement, I wish to submit the following concrete suggestions:

1. Take the Indian Service entirely out of politics. It is a human problem, requiring long years of study and experience, and faithful employees should not be harassed with the threats of grafters and cheap politicians with the change of each administration. The average life of Commissioners of Indian Affairs has been three years, and no man can get even a smattering superficial knowledge of the vast Indian subject in three years. These frequent political changes bring about untried and often impractical policies resulting in harm to the Indians and which are destructive of good administration by keeping the office and field force marking time waiting for new developments following each change of administration. Adopt the Canadian Indian plan of having tried, experienced, and permanent Indian Service leaders and policies.

2. Allow appropriations of approximately $25,000,000 a year instead of an average of about $15,000,000, so that the Indian work can be carried on effectively and efficiently, with satisfaction to the Indians, Indian Service employees, the Congress, and the country at large.

3. Give us at least $350 per capita in our appropriation for Indian schools instead of $250 per capita, so that we can run our Indian schools on a more efficient basis, feed the children with a larger variety of food, equip our school dormitories with adequate furniture and other necessities, provide sufficient equipment for industrial instruction, increase the grades of our day schools to the sixth grade, and provide more day schools, so that young children can be educated up to the sixth grade near their homes, so that reservation boarding schools can have the grades increased to the ninth, and so that we can provide more twelfth-grade high schools. Also, so that we can have the instructors and equipment to teach more fully and efficiently practical industrial courses.

4. Provide reimbursable appropriations so as to advance money to worthy and ambitious Indian boys and girls who have completed their courses in our Indian schools so that they may take college courses to equip them for their chosen life work.

5. Provide an adequate appropriation, to be immediately available, to put in proper repair all of our Indian school and agency buildings, including adequate water supply, sewerage, and toilet and lighting systems.

6. Provide an adequate appropriation, to be immediately available, to properly furnish and equip our schoolrooms, dormitories, and shops. Our schools are sadly in need of these improvements.

7. The Indian Service very much needs at least 25 more hospitals, 5 of them to be located in Oklahoma among the Five Civilized Tribes, and 10 additional tuberculosis sanatoria, and these hospitals and sanatoria should be supplied without further delay. There is also needed money to replace a large number of old and inadequately constructed and equipped hospitals with modern adequate hospital buildings and equipment.

8. We need now at least 200 additional field and hospital nurses, the field nurses to be provided with automobiles and other necessary equipment and supplies along medical lines.

9. We need at once a much larger trained force of medical experts on trachoma, also tuberculosis experts. Our service is woefully lacking in these experts on trachoma and tuberculosis, who should be furnished with cars and proper and adequate medical equipment. Trachoma and tuberculosis are so prevalent among Indians as to require the immediate attention of Congress.

10. We need at least 50 more good doctors provided with automobiles and adequate medical equipment to supply the medical requirements of the Indians.

11. We need several sanatorium schools so as to provide for the tubercular Indian children now out of school and who are living in the inadequate homes of their parents, without proper food, clothing, or medical attention and who are transmitting the disease to other members of the family. This is an urgent need that should be immediately provided for by Congress.

12. Provide employment for Indian girl graduates of our nurse-training schools on Indian reservations under the guidance of trained public-health nurses.

13. We need at once an appropriation to purchase dairy cows, provide adequate dairy barns and feed so that we can furnish at least 1 quart of milk per day for all our Indian school children.

14. We need at once a large reimbursable appropriation, to be made immediately available, to provide for the construction of new homes for Indians or to improve old homes by providing wooden floors, additional windows, and some necessary furniture and household equipment. The bad home and living conditions of Indians has much to do with the sickness and high death rate of Indians. A real campaign for better homes for Indians requires money to make it successful and effective.

15. We need a much larger reimbursable appropriation for industrial assistance to Indians who want to begin or enlarge their industrial activities but are handicapped because of lack of funds.

16. We need an appropriation, to be immediately available, to provide for an Indian employment force to find jobs for Indians. We have too many idle Indians on reservations who could become self-supporting and independent if they were properly placed in suitable jobs away from the reservation.

17. Much of the reimbursable appropriations now charged to Indians for roads, bridges, and irrigation work should be charged off. It has been for about 15 years the policy of Congress to make the appropriations in reimbursable form when it was known that there was little chance of these appropriations being reimbursed. For example, the Fort Peck and Blackfeet and other Indians of Montana should be relieved of much of the reimbursable charges for irrigation, all the irrigation appropriations made reimbursable by the retroactive act of 1914 should be wiped off the books, the California irrigation charges should be greatly reduced, the Pima, Pueblo, Navajo, and other bridge reimbursable items should be charged off, also much of the reimbursable appropriations charged against the Pueblo and Navajo Indians should be reduced or charged off entirely. These reimbursable appropriation items are the cause of much dissatisfaction among the Indians and the basis of unjust criticism of the Indian Service. There are many millions of dollars of reimbursable appropriations that might well be entirely eliminated and the Indians relieved of this indebtedness that they can never repay.

18. Legislation is needed to wind up the tribal affairs of the Five Civilized Tribes and dispose of the tribal property of these Indians. Also there is need for changes in the probate and other laws affecting the property of the Indians of the Five Civilized Tribes.

19. Legislation is needed to more adequately regulate law and order on Indian reservations. The present laws are wholly inadequate and are resulting in harm to the Indians. This legislation is an urgent necessity.

20. We need more and better equipped and paid educational leaders to supervise and conduct our Indian schools and bring them up to a higher and more modern standard of efficiency.

21. We need more and better equipped and paid industrial leaders so as to provide more efficient industrial leadership for our Indians. There is a great opportunity for the industrial awakening of the Indians. There should be definite well-planned industrial programs worked out for each reservation suitable to the needs and conditions of that particular reservation, which should be adhered to without regard to changes in superintendents and other employees. The Indians are now ready for this industrial awakening, but the right industrial inspirational leaders are required and there should be provided adequate reimbursable appropriations for the farming and stock-raising activities of the Indians.

22. There should be the closest cooperation with local, county, and State agencies and with other branches of the Federal Government with the view of receiving all of the technical and helpful assistance possible in handling the Indian problem, but it is my judgment that Congress at least for several years to come should recognize the fact that the Indian problem is a Federal obligation and should make its appropriations and enact laws affecting the Indians with that end in view.

23. The numerous Indian laws should be codified, brought up to date, obsolete laws eliminated, and the laws and simplified and reduced regulations of the Indian Service made available to all persons handling the Indian problem.

24. Indian councils or business committees should be organized on each reservation and these selected representatives of the Indians should be recognized by the superintendent and consulted freely, and the views and wishes of the Indians should be more fully considered and the plans of the Indian Service carefully explained, so that much cause for complaint because of lack of knowledge of plans and intentions would be removed and closer cooperation brought about through mutual understanding and unity of purpose.

25. Every Indian tribe having a prima facie claim against the Government should have an opportunity to submit their claims to the Court of Claims with the right of either side to appeal to the Supreme Court under a properly worded jurisdictional act. The sooner these claims are adjudicated the nearer we will be to the final settlement of the Indian problem.

26. Continue to prohibit the use of jails at Indian schools and not permit any severe punishment for infraction of rules, but emphasize the practice of withholding privileges as a deterrent so as to insure good conduct of Indian school children.

27. A careful study should be made of the status of the New York Indians and their jurisdiction should be definitely settled. These Indians are wards of the Government, yet the Federal Government at this time exercises but little jurisdiction and they are now largely under the jurisdiction of the State of New York. This conflicting and indefinite jurisdiction has brought about inevitable dissatisfaction and these Indians are entitled to the consideration and relief of Congress.

28. Specific reimbursable appropriations should be obtained to enable the Pima Indians to put in cultivation within the next three or four years the 40,000 acres of additional irrigable lands made available by reason of the construction of the Coolidge Dam on the San Carlos Reservation. We have worked out a definite program for this purpose and if we can obtain the required appropriations from Congress this 40,000 acres of land will be actually under cultivation within a few years.

29. Make it clear to all Indians that the Government does not intend to interfere with their customs, traditions, or religion; also their ceremonial dances so long as they keep within the bounds of reason and do not transgress moral laws.

30. Encourage Indians to have local Indian organizations for self-improvement. An example of constructive improvements and benefits to the Indians may be cited in the holding annually of the Pueblo and Navajo Councils. No doubt councils could be held with profit among other Indians similar to the Navajo and Pueblo Councils.

31. There is an urgent need in the Indian Office at Washington for about 15 additional stenographers and clerks so as to keep the work of the office current.

32. Establish community bathhouses and laundries in thickly populated Indian communities with spare room for reading and community meeting purposes with the idea of developing social-service work and the community spirit.

33. Trained social-service workers are needed on each Indian reservation as home demonstration agents to improve home and community conditions. These home demonstration agents, if properly trained in social-service work, could materially improve the home and living conditions of the Indians.

34. We need more trained and expert advisors to the Commissioner of Indian Affairs along educational, agricultural, stockraising, medical, and social-service lines so as to make surveys, reports, and recommendations to the Commissioner of Indian Affairs and to assist in bringing about closer cooperation with local, State, and other Federal agencies in handling the Indian problem.

35. Change the existing allotment laws and do not make further allotments on Indian reservations under the present laws for the reason that under these laws Indians are gradually losing possession of their lands. Personally, I am strongly opposed to the allotment of the Menominee, Red Lake, Pueblo, Navajo, and other unallotted Indians in the Southwest at this time and under existing laws.

36. We need a large gratuity appropriation each year to build and maintain roads on Indian reservations and at the same time furnish employment to Indians.

37. Enact legislation for relief of Indians who are wards of the Government but who do not reside on Indian reservations. Under the comptroller's decision we are unable to extend relief to these Indians who often are in need of assistance and are worthy of the help of the Federal Government.

38. Eliminate as much paper work as possible, reduce wherever practicable correspondence, and place more responsibility upon the local superintendents. We are endeavoring at this time to work out a feasible plan along this line.

39. Increase the capacity of the Sequoyah Orphan Training School from 300 to 500 so as to provide for 200 additional Indian orphan children in Oklahoma. After a personal visit to this school I worked out the details for this increased capacity and we will be glad to furnish this information to your committee.

40. Be conservative in the issuance of patents in fee and certificates of competency, but allow young educated able-bodied Indians with small degree of Indian blood an opportunity to handle their property free from Government supervision. Also allow other Indians full opportunity, consistent with their best interest, to handle their property and develop business experience while their lands are held in trust.

The foregoing by no means includes all of the constructive requirements of the Indian Service. These suggestions are necessarily general in form, and if it is the wish of the committee we will be glad to draft necessary legislation with justifications therefor to carry the foregoing constructive suggestions into effect. It will require an appropriation, preferably in lump-sum form, amounting to approximately $15,000,000 to supplement existing appropriations for the Indian Service to carry out the suggestions herein made, which would very greatly increase the efficiency of the Indian Service and would be a good investment for the Federal Government. Hereafter, in my judgment, there should be an annual appropriation of approximately $25,000,000 if we are to run the Indian Service on the efficient basis that will meet the approval of the Congress, Indian Service officials, and friends of the Indians.

If it is the wish of your committee, I will submit in more detail the constructive needs of every Indian school and reservation. This necessarily will require some time and considerable work. Better still, I will take pleasure in going with the committee to the various schools and reservations and pointing out to the committee on the ground the constructive needs of our Indian schools and reservations. I wish each member of the committee to feel free to request any information they desire and we will endeavor to cooperate in every way possible to see that full information is furnished in regard to our Indian activities.

While the foregoing suggestions indicate considerable need for additional funds for the Indian Service, in closing I wish to emphasize that the funds now appropriated by Congress are being economically, judiciously, and efficiently administered; and it is my judgment that more has been accomplished for the Indians of this country and there has been greater progress among the Indians during the past eight years than ever before in a similar period of time during the more than 100 years of Federal jurisdiction in handling the Indian problem in this country, and what is more important, we have laid the foundation for a still greater progress during the immediate years to come. With the help of your committee and the Congress, this progress can be intensified and made permanent and outstanding. We bespeak your earnest assistance and cooperation in this great constructive work in behalf of the American Indian.

THE GOLD-STAR MOTHERS AND THEIR PILGRIMAGE TO FRANCE

Mr. O'CONNELL. Mr. Speaker, it is a great pleasure to congratulate the Congress on the passage of the bill that will permit the mothers and unmarried widows of our heroic dead buried abroad to visit the cemeteries in which their beloved dead lie entombed.

The enactment of this legislation, too long delayed, brings to consummation an opportunity that has been very close to the hearts not only of the women who will be permitted to make the great pilgrimage but to the American people as well. During all the years through which the effort was being made to press the bill our people have watched and hoped with ever-increasing solicitude for that final hour that would see the measure receive the signature of the Chief Executive. And now it is a law to the infinite credit of each and every one of us in Congress and out that brought about the final and happy result. Each and everyone of us who took an interest in seeing the bill through its many stages on the way to final fruition can take a measurable share of congratulation for having aided in a cause that will have the acclaim of all patriotic people at home and abroad. In the early movement the bill was aided materially by Congressmen DICKSTEIN and LAGUARDIA, of New York, to both of whom much credit is due for the inspiration which prompted this highly commendable idea.

The real advance toward success was made when some of us were successful in enlisting the sympathy and active cooperation of that grand old man of Pennsylvania, Congressman Butler, chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs, who successfully piloted the first bill through the House, aided in a large measure by Congressman BOYLAN, of New York, a member of the Military Affairs Committee. To them must really be given the credit of eventuating the first step on the road to final success. It is unfortunate that the lovable former chairman, who put his great heart behind the cause of these gold-star mothers, was not spared to see the bill become a law. As one of those who have unceasingly followed the legislation through its many vicissitudes, I would be remiss if I did not pay my tribute to Senator BINGHAM, Senator MCMASTER, and Senator WAGNER, of New York, the Senate Subcommittee on Military Affairs, which patiently and courteously sat and heard us through two long and exhaustive hearings in the effort to effect a bill that would meet the exacting requirements of the Senate and the House, as also the President.

Among the conspicuous proponents of the bill, whose never-failing energy in the face of many disappointments won the hearts and the admiration of us all, was Mrs. Mathilda Burling, of Richmond Hill, N. Y., president of the Gold-Star Mothers' Association of her city, and who does me the honor to reside in my district.

Through her many visits to Washington, many times at great expense and personal discomfort, due to ill health, she has, in season and out, held her place on the legislative battle line, fighting the good fight that finally brought success. I rejoice, Mr. Speaker, with my colleagues that this good woman will be privileged to kneel beside that cross in far-away France to say a prayer over the remains of her only son and only child who gave his life for the honor and the glory of his flag and his country. Such women, sir, have made America great. I am proud to know the movement is accomplished. I shall ever look back in the years that an all-seeing Providence may spare me with satisfaction to the little part I was permitted to play in giving the boon to the gold-star mothers of our land.

OPPOSING POLITICAL VIEWS ON PRESENT TARIFF AND COMMERCIAL POLICY

Mr. HULL of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, the pending tariff revision presents the following points of fundamental difference between dominant Republicans and, I think, most Democrats:

First. The Republican administration would continue to build our tariff and commercial policy around the sole idea of safeguarding the home market in the face of our actual or potential annual overproduction capacity of $20,000,000,000 to $25,000,000,000. The opposing view recognizes the patent fact that such surplus producing capacity has become so great as to constitute an additional and dominant factor in determining our tariff and commercial policy.

Second. The Republican administration would adopt as a permanent policy virtually embargo tariffs designed to eliminate not only direct foreign competition but that which is indirect or remote as well, despite the fact that we are exporting $2,000,000,000 of finished manufactures, compared with like dutiable imports of $560,000,000. The opposing view recognizes that the tariff is a tax and can only bestow full benefits on some, less on others, and none at all on still others, besides seriously obstructing surplus exports. This country, therefore, in lieu of the Republican policy of superprotection, should gradually embrace a policy of moderate tariffs, reasonably competitive, with liberal trade policies designed to increase healthy production, maintain wages, and find world markets for our ever-increasing surpluses.

Third. Under its policy of concededly excessive or prohibitive tariffs, the Republican administration would make the trend of tariff revision always upward as to the measure of benefits bestowed, although our abnormal tariff level is now the highest in the world save that of Spain and Russia. Two-thirds of the present rates and classifications are prohibitive of direct competition. Yet it is seriously proposed that, as this country increases its superiority in productive efficiency and output, tariffs shall be correspondingly raised rather than lowered. The opposing view, deeming this issue most vital, would work in the direction of a tariff and commercial policy calculated to avoid retaliation, promote a sounder domestic structure, augment our exports, now hopelessly falling behind those of Europe, and secure more equitable taxation. To this end there should at once be substituted a policy by which the trend of tariff revision would be downward to a level of moderate or competitive rates—which would guard against domestic monopoly on the one hand and abnormal imports against an efficient industry on the other. Naturally, as domestic industries become self-sustaining, tariffs should be correspondingly reduced, with the view to their ultimate removal, especially when there arises substantial exports and no material competitive imports. In the meantime, many will insist with some reason that rates on commodities not on a parity with the general tariff structure may be made so if the facts so warrant.

Fourth. The Republican administration, as in the past, for the purpose of tariff making would flout and shunt aside all formulas and fact-finding agencies or commissions, with the result that the old and worst type of logrolling and political pressure of conflicting interests will be continued, under which tariff rates, generally dictated by the beneficiaries, will again be piled high and indiscriminately upon the futile theory that domestic competition will hold down prices to a reasonable level. President Taft in 1910, summing up our experience under the Dingley law, officially branded this theory as utterly false and unreliable in practice. The opposing view would favor tariff revision and readjustment by Congress itself in a careful, gradual, and scientific manner. Such revision would be based on all the facts and factors measuring the difference between our competitive strength and that of our rivals. These facts would be carefully assembled and laid before Congress by the ablest and most impartial fact-finding commission that could be installed.

Fifth. The Republican administration would not only retain section 315, the flexible tariff provision, but would considerably enlarge and expand it for purposes of broader tariff legislation by the Executive department. The President would thereby be enabled to change the whole objects and purposes of the tariff law enacted by Congress. The opposing view insists that, as administered thus far, the flexible provision has been utterly disappointing and failed of its professed purposes. It has only been used unfairly to revise tariffs upward in most all instances. Its operation has been productive of national scandal. It is clearly unsound, unwise, impracticable, subversive of the plain functions of Congress, and should be speedily repealed.

Sixth. The Republican administration falsely pretends that in addition to the tariff benefits already secured by agriculture there yet remains still other possible tariff benefits substantial enough to afford a major basis for present farm relief. The vague implication is that their enactment would place agriculture on an economic equality with industry. This barefaced and discredited suggestion ignores the fact that crops planted to near 90 per cent of all tillable lands derive, and can derive, either no appreciable tariff benefits, or none at all.

The opposing view, in a spirit of honest candor, recognizes that tariff protection necessarily implies two classes, one to be protected and one to protect it, so that the notion of equalizing tariff benefits is absurd, and that the tariff is the most inequitable of all taxes. American agriculture, therefore, would again be solemnly warned that as a whole it suffers far greater injuries than it derives benefits from general high tariffs, because effective tariff aid to minor specialties, which, under the existing policy, is highly desirable to the extent feasible, as many view it, is too limited to affect favorably the entire agricultural structure. The farmer would again be reminded that the demonstrated failure of the farm tariffs of both 1921 and 1922 to bestow benefits upon agriculture at all proportionate to those enjoyed by industry, is now beyond the pale of controversy. This lengthy test of actual tariff experience consigns any new and third farm tariff proposal to an entirely minor place in any sound and comprehensive program for farm relief. Will Congress, in consideration of a few scattering increases of tariff benefits to certain minor phases of agriculture, vote permanently to fasten on American agriculture the present embargo system of industrial tariffs, under the operation of which agriculture as a whole experiences far greater injuries than benefits? This question can not be evaded.

COMMENT ON HON. VICTOR L. BERGER

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Mr. Speaker, Hon. VICTOR L. BERGER, of Milwaukee, the only Socialist Member of the House of Representatives, retires from Congress to-day. As he has no associates of his own party, it seems permissible that a member of a different political faith should make some comment on Mr. BERGER'S service in the House.

Mr. BERGER is said to be the best-educated Member of the House. Whether this is true or not I do not know. It is a fact that he has a highly trained mind, well stored with information upon almost all conceivable subjects. In my opinion there is no Member with a more solid and well-informed intellect than his.

Mr. BERGER'S information on international affairs has been of great value to the House. His speeches on our foreign relations have always been sound and enlightening. All of us have derived much benefit from his discussion of the causes of war and kindred subjects.

After all, to me the best thing about Mr. BERGER has been his deep and unfailing sympathy and understanding of the masses and his interest in the problems of average men and women. Always their welfare has been his chief concern, and all of his policies have turned upon his interest in the problems of the common people. This trait is inherent in the man and could not have been acquired by education or study.

Of course, from my point of view Mr. BERGER has been handicapped by his adherence to socialism as a fundamental. I say this in no critical spirit nor yet as a mere jest. In all other respects he is a real democrat. I mean "democrat" with a lower-case "d," and, though he has sat on the Republican side, I fancy that he is more of a Democrat, with an upper-case "D," than he has himself realized. At any rate, he retires with the respect of Members of all parties, and carries with him into private life our sincere wishes for his happiness and long-continued usefulness.

MY RECORD IN CONGRESS

Mr. CHAPMAN. Mr. Speaker, more than five years have elapsed since the noble spirit of James Campbell Cantrill passed from its earthly habitation into the realm of eternal life. Creditably and honorably Joseph W. Morris served through the unexpired portion of Mr. Cantrill's term. Four years ago last November the people of the seventh congressional district of Kentucky elected me, without opposition, to represent the district that had been ably served by Henry Clay, John J. Crittenden, James Clark, Thomas F. Marshall, John C. Breckinridge, William E. Simms, Brutus J. Clay, James B. Beck, Jo C. S. Blackburn, William C. P. Breckinridge, and at a later date by Evan Settle, June Gayle, South Trimble, William Preston Kimball, Campbell Cantrill, and Jo Morris. In conferring such honor upon me, in reposing such confidence in me, the voters of that historic district placed upon my soul a debt of infinite and undying gratitude which I could repay only by rendering faithful, fearless, devoted, diligent service, and to that service I dedicated myself. Two years later (in 1926) I was, without opposition in either primary or general election, again elected. In relinquishing this seat in Congress at the conclusion of four years' service, it is proper that I should render an account of my stewardship, in order that the people whose Representative I have been may properly appraise the character of my service.

DEPARTMENTAL WORK FOR DISTRICT

In an earlier period of our country's history the duties of a Member of Congress were almost entirely legislative. A man could divide his time between official duties and personal business. More recently the number of Federal bureaus and commissions has multiplied to an astounding degree. We have come to have a far more energetic Federal Government than the fathers of the Constitution ever dreamed of. There has been a constantly growing tendency to centralize governmental power at Washington and to convert our representative form of government into a paternalistic bureaucracy. Consequently nearly every citizen must of necessity transact business with one or more administrative offices at Washington. A Member of Congress, therefore, finds it a part of his work not only to serve as a legislator—studying constantly questions of constitutional law and public policy—but also to serve as a liaison officer between his individual constituents and various branches of their Government; to act as their attorney, so to speak, in thousands of matters of a legal and a quasi legal nature before governmental bureaus, commissions, and departments.

The nature of the work is so exacting that I have devoted my entire time to the service of the district and have not undertaken to engage in business or professional work of a personal character. My office at Washington has been open throughout my four years' incumbency, even when Congress was not in session. In that way I have been able to promote the interests of thousands of my constituents in official matters of importance to them. I have answered their letters and telegrams promptly and have transacted their departmental business with dispatch. Some things they asked could not be accomplished, but I have earnestly tried to comply with every proper request. Through my efforts tens of thousands of useful public documents have been supplied to the citizens of the seventh district; the issuance of passports to them has been expedited; their claims before various departments of the Government have been advocated to the best of my ability. Frequently I have been able to untangle complicated legal questions involving their rights and happiness. Pension cases for veterans of the Civil War and the Spanish-American War have been urged by me before the Pension Bureau. Claimants for compensation as veterans of the great World War have also found in me a stanch advocate and indefatigable worker. In numerous instances I have been instrumental in having thousands of dollars paid to surviving dependents of World War veterans. In securing the enactment of private pension bills and other types of just private bills for citizens of the seventh district my efforts have been successful almost without exception. How faithfully and effectively I have served the thousands of constituents who have called upon me they themselves can bear witness. In performing such services I have treated all alike, recognizing no partisanship, no race, no nationality, no color, no caste, no creed.

MY FIRST SESSION

The first day of the first session of the first Congress of which I was a Member the distinguished minority leader, Hon. FINIS J. GARRETT, selected me as one of the two Democratic tellers to count the votes in the Speakership contest between him and the Republican candidate, Mr. LONGWORTH. The Democratic members of the Committee on Ways and Means, constituting the Committee on Committees for the Democratic side of the House, assigned me to membership on the following committees: Census, Mines and Mining, and Elections No. 1. I attended committee meetings regularly and participated in the deliberations on numerous important public questions.

IN SEVENTIETH CONGRESS

At the beginning of the Seventieth Congress the Committee on Committees accorded me an honor that seldom goes to a minority Member at the beginning of his second term by placing me on a major, or exclusive, committee, viz., the Committee on Military Affairs, one of the most important and one of the hardest working committees in the House. One thousand four hundred seventy-nine bills and resolutions were on its calendar in the Seventieth Congress. The chairman and the ranking minority member assigned me to four important subcommittees. One of my subcommittees has charge of all questions relating to military aviation, and all questions relating to the general subjects of appointments, promotion, and retirement of individuals in the military service; one has charge of all questions relating to soldiers' homes and national cemeteries, and all private bills relating to veterans of the World War; one has charge of all questions relating to the general subjects of the National Guard and the Organized Reserves, and private bills for relief for the widows or families of Civil War veterans; the other has charge of all questions relating to War Department property and equipment, including its procurement, use, and disposition, and all problems of transportation, including mileage allowances for the Army, and private bills for relief for veterans of the Civil War. In December, 1928, the committee chairman, Hon. JOHN M. MORIN, honored me again by appointing me as a member of the Board of Visitors for the United States Military Academy, and in that capacity I made a tour of inspection at West Point.

In my service on the Military Affairs Committee and those subcommittees I have participated in the consideration and discussion of many important bills affecting the national defense, including all bills pertaining to the War Department and to every branch of our country's military service, and also hundreds of private bills for the relief of soldiers of the War Between the States, the Spanish-American War, and the World War. Thus have I been afforded the opportunity of rendering an important and patriotic service to our common country.

ADEQUATE NATIONAL DEFENSE

While devoutly hoping for the realization of the poet's dream of the day—

When the war drum throbs no longer
And the battle flags are furled—

I have by vote and voice proven myself to be a firm believer in the sage counsel of George Washington, who declared that "to be prepared for war is one of the most effectual means of preserving peace." I have been and am a staunch advocate of adequate preparedness on land and sea and in the air. I have been unswerving in urging recognition of the heroism and intrepidity of the pioneers of military aviation and in advocating measures to promote the efficiency of the Air Corps, which I believe will be our first line of defense in the future. On one of the most memorable occasions in the annals of aviation, when the United States Government and the International Aeronautical Association commemorated the first airplane flight in history at Kitty Hawk, N. C., the scene of the Wright brothers' successful exploit of 25 years ago, and the surviving brother, Mr. Orville Wright, was the guest of honor, acclaimed by representatives of every civilized nation in the world, my interest in the development of aviation was recognized in my appointment by Speaker LONGWORTH as one of six Members of the House to represent the American Congress at those historic ceremonies.

WORK ON MILITARY AFFAIRS COMMITTEE

I assisted in reporting from the Committee on Military Affairs the following bills: To authorize the President to present the congressional medal of honor to Charles A. Lindbergh; to authorize Charles A. Lindbergh to accept decorations and gifts from foreign governments; to enable gold-star war mothers to visit the cemeteries in France, where repose the sacred dust of their heroic sons; to provide for inspection of the battle field of Kings Mountain, S. C., where the dauntless pioneers, wearing coon-skin caps and carrying Deckard rifles, led by Shelby, Sevier, and Campbell, crushed the British forces and turned the tide of the American Revolution in the South; to make adequate provision for maintenance of a national shrine at the birthplace of Abraham Lincoln in Larue County, Ky.; to grant a congressional medal of honor to Edward V. Rickenbacker; to make women veterans eligible for admission to the National Home for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers; to recognize commissioned service in the Philippine constabulary in determining rights of officers in the Regular Army; to authorize the erection of a new flagstaff at Fort Sumter, Charleston, S. C.; to authorize the President to present the distinguished flying cross to Orville Wright; to empower the Secretary of War to lend War Department equipment for use at the eleventh national convention of the American Legion at Louisville, Ky.; to recognize the great, noble, and self-sacrificing public service of Maj. Walter Reed and his immortal associates in the discovery of the cause and means of transmission of yellow fever. Finally, two generations after the War Between the States, we reported and secured enactment of a bill for the erection by the United States Government of headstones to mark the graves of the soldiers and sailors of the South—those knightly heroes who wore the faded gray and fought under the starry cross of Dixie until that old conquered banner went down in a pall of gloom at Appomattox, the Calvary of the glory that was the old South.

MUSCLE SHOALS

Aside from strictly military measures, as a member of the Committee on Military Affairs, I had a part in reporting a bill for the development of the great Government plant at Muscle Shoals, authorizing such operation as would provide nitrates not only for the manufacture of munitions in time of war but also for fertilizer in time of peace at half of what it costs the American farmer to import nitrates from Chile. The President used the "pocket veto" to prevent that beneficent legislation from going into effect, and its chance of becoming effective depends upon the decision of a case pending in the Supreme Court.

SOME IMPORTANT VOTES

A few of my votes on questions of general interest may be mentioned without impropriety. I voted to permit 150 Members to move the discharge of a committee from consideration of a bill; to reduce Federal taxes; to increase rural mail service; for the cooperative marketing bill; to print a new edition of two books of great value to the citizens of my district, viz., Diseases of the Horse and Diseases of Cattle; to provide more effectively for the national defense by increasing the efficiency of the Air Corps; to amend by liberalizing for the benefit of veterans and their dependents, the World War adjusted compensation act; to increase the rates of employees' compensation; for farm relief; for protection of watersheds; to graduate corporation income taxes below $15,000 (more equitable taxation of small corporate incomes); to require separate returns from affiliated corporations; to repeal the automobile excise tax (nuisance tax); for appropriations, in both sessions of the Seventieth Congress, to recondition coal carriers; for increase of appropriation for the Officers' Reserve Corps; for national rifle matches; to confine expenditures for maintenance of the United States Army to territory under the jurisdiction of the United States; for flood control at Federal expense without requiring the States to acquire flowage rights; for passing, over the President's veto, an increase of pay for night work of postal employees; for passing, over the President's veto, increase of allowance for fourth-class postmasters; for passing, over the President's veto, the disabled emergency officers' retirement bill; for the Boulder Dam; for $24,000,000 for more effective enforcement of the eighteenth amendment and laws pursuant thereto; for the Jones bill to more effectually enforce the provisions of the Constitution and laws bearing on prohibition; for further reduction of immigration by opposing in both the Sixty-ninth and Seventieth Congresses postponement of the date for putting into operation the national-origins clause of the immigration act of 1924; for establishing migratory wildfowl sanctuaries, with the promise of one for Kentucky; to promote Lieut. Commander Richard E. Byrd and Floyd Bennett, superb aeronauts, polar explorers, and gallant American heroes, and to award each of them a congressional medal of honor.

While opposing Federal aid in matters that I regard as violative of the Constitution, I have consistently supported Federal aid for roads as a proper and constitutional exercise of Federal power.

I voted against the Italian debt settlement; against the French debt settlement; against bathing beaches for the District of Columbia, at the expense of the taxpayers of the United States; against delegating to the Secretary of the Treasury and the Postmaster General the power to locate, and allocate funds for, the construction of public buildings, as an unwarranted abdication by the legislative branch of the Government to the executive branch of a prerogative that properly belongs to the legislative branch; against the purchase of Cape Cod Canal at public expense for the benefit of private interests; against the creation of a gigantic whisky monopoly for the control of the medicinal spirits industry.

FOR KENTUCKY

When many Kentucky counties were suffering from indescribable disaster resulting from an unprecedented flood I united my efforts with those of my untiring and diligent Kentucky colleagues in urging the Congress to grant relief to those counties. Appearing before the Committee on Flood Control and the Committee on Roads, I attempted to depict the horrible plight of the brave people of eastern Kentucky and advocated with all the fervor of my soul what I regarded as a constitutional remedy, in the form of a bill for the restoration of post roads. Estill and Lee Counties, in the seventh congressional district, were among the beneficiaries of the legislation that was enacted.

DEVELOPMENT OF COAL TRADE

In the fights in both sessions of the Seventieth Congress for the reconditioning of coal-carrying vessels to expand our foreign trade in coal I took an enthusiastic and, I believe, an effective part.

INTEREST OF TOBACCO GROWERS

For nearly four years I worked hand-in-hand with my colleagues from tobacco-growing districts in advocacy of the bill, which has now become a law, requiring tobacco manufacturers to report by grade and type the amount of tobacco in stock, for the benefit of the tobacco growers of Kentucky and other States.

BRIDGE BILLS

Authorizations for bridges over Kentucky streams, designed to bind our State in closer unity with its neighbors, have received my active support.

LABOR

My votes have been uniformly in favor of a square deal for those who earn their bread in the sweat of their faces.

ARMY REMOUNT SERVICE

On February 8, 1928, I advocated a continuance of the Army remount service as a vital factor in national defense and in referring to the seventh district of Kentucky as "the capital of the horse kingdom," I used the following language:

The exquisitely beautiful Bluegrass Region of Kentucky, the heart of which is in the historic congressional district which has honored me with a commission as its Representative in this House, is unquestionably the greatest nursery of the American thoroughbred, the American standard-bred trotter, and the American saddle horse in the world. Its leadership as the birthplace and home of those types of horses is undisputed and unquestioned. Senator Ingalls, of Kansas, surely must have returned from a visit to that marvelously beautiful section, that undulating bluegrass pasture land, with its carpet of perennial verdure, when he said that grass—

"bears no blazonry or bloom to charm the senses with fragrance or splendor, but its homely hue is more enchanting than the lily or the rose."

The limestone formation underlying the Bluegrass Region of Kentucky transmits to its soil an unsurpassed fertility and imparts to the bluegrass itself substance that incites physical development in horses that feed upon its luxuriance and gives to them bone and muscle and heart, speed, weight-carrying ability, endurance, stamina, and courage, qualities that have brought to Kentucky's equine kings and queens the crown of supremacy in the tan-bark ring and to her fleet-footed thoroughbreds the floral wreath of conquerors on the turf.

The blood of the Kentucky trotter in the remount service will carry on in artillery and transport horses. Gen. Basil W. Duke and Gen. John B. Castleman, both knightly Kentucky gentlemen who rode with the intrepid John Hunt Morgan in the sixties, have left beautiful tributes to the superior qualities of the saddle-bred horse for cavalry service, eloquently depicting his powers of endurance, his smooth action and easy gaits, his cheerful response to kind and careful treatment.

Both the standard-bred trotter and the saddle-bred horse have a strong infusion of the patrician blood of the thoroughbred. General Harbord said:

"This blood, above all others, carries with it the qualities of courage, stamina, and speed which are so essential to the saddle horse for military purposes. It will be a sad day for our country if it is permitted to disappear."

* * * * * * *

The seventh congressional district of Kentucky, of which Lexington is the center and metropolis, is the home of the blooded horse, the capital of the horse kingdom, and the mecca of horse lovers throughout the world. There was organized the body of Confederate Cavalry, under the command of the dashing, daring Morgan, that revolutionized the tactics, methods, and uses of cavalry in warfare. Young men, the flower of the Anglo-Saxon race, the hope and expectancy of Kentucky, accomplished horsemen, expert marksmen, the annals of war contain no record of a braver, knightlier, more intrepid soldiery. The name of their gallant leader, John Hunt Morgan, whose equestrian statue adorns the historic Courthouse Square at Lexington, is carved in the pantheon of immortality beside the names of those other great cavalry leaders, Jeb Stuart, Joe Wheeler, and "the Marshal Ney of the Confederacy," Nathan Bedford Forrest.

The land that produced such cavalrymen as rode with Morgan and Breckinridge, Duke, and Stoner will always be the home of the horse and the home of horsemen whose devotion to that noble animal, the companion of brave men in every age, will be a constant reminder that our word "chivalry" is from the French word "cheval," a horse.

REAPPORTIONMENT BILL

In the face of an effort to pass a congressional reapportionment bill which, if not in the juridical sense unconstitutional, was unquestionably anticonstitutional, I said in the House:

This is a measure both of abdication and usurpation. It is proposed that the Congress supinely surrender to the executive branch of the Government a legislative prerogative and at the same time usurp a power and assume a responsibility which under the Constitution belong to a Congress not yet elected by the American people.

I am in favor of a fair and proper reapportionment, not by the executive branch of the Government, not by any Federal bureau or commission, but by the Congress following the next decennial census. I believe in compliance with that provision as with every other provision of the Constitution, in letter and in spirit. But two wrongs never made a right. If Congress was recreant of its duty following the last census, as has been charged, that wrong would not be righted now in the complacent surrender by Congress of its rights and powers and the shameless abandonment of the duties and obligations vested in Congress by the Constitution.

The fathers of the Constitution determined upon the complete separation of the three branches of the Government as essential to the perpetuity of constitutional government and vital to the security of the liberties of he people. All legislative powers were vested in Congress, and the powers of the executive branch were hedged about by definite constitutional limitations.

Ever since 1865, when the gray legions of the South were overwhelmed and overpowered by the illimitable numbers and inexhaustible resources of the North, there has been a continuous and radical change in the relations between those two branches of the Government as ordained by the Constitution. Not only has there been a constantly increasing tendency to concentrate power in the Federal Government at the expense of the local governments, but the executive department has continued to encroach upon numerous prerogatives of the legislative department. Even worse than the arrogation of power by the executive department is the abdication by Congress of its rights and the abandonment of its obligations.

* * * * * * *

Now comes this proposal to enact a permanent law that would constitute the surrender of another legislative function. We ought to refuse further to dishonor ourselves by this base surrender of legislative power to an executive bureau. Every time we break down a constitutional barrier, every time we permit an invasion by one branch of the Government of the rights of another branch, every time we violate the spirit of the Constitution, every time we sacrifice the fundamentals of constitutional government on the altar of partisan advantage or political expediency, we find it more difficult than ever before to retrace our steps.

HENRY CLAY

When the General Assembly of Kentucky in 1926 memorialized the Congress to provide for the erection of a statue of Henry Clay in Caracas as a gift from the people of the United States to the people of Venezuela, and I was asked by the sponsors of the resolution to introduce a bill carrying into effect its provisions, I succeeded in having the bill I introduced enacted into law and an appropriation made for the purpose of commemorating in heroic bronze the contributions of the great Kentuckian to the cause of Pan Americanism. His statue will adorn the Plaza Henry Clay, one of the principal squares of the native city of Simon Bolivar, the great South American liberator, who had Henry Clay's speeches in favor of South American freedom translated into Spanish and read at the head of his embattled armies.

When the time came for the unveiling in Statuary Hall of the statues of Henry Clay and Ephraim McDowell, the two men selected by Kentucky as her representatives in the Hall of Fame dedicated by act of Congress to the American States, my colleagues appointed me to make the address upon the life and contributions to history of the "sage of Ashland," Kentucky's most renowned statesman.

SAVED WEATHER BUREAU

During my first term the Chief of the Weather Bureau recommended curtailment of the activities of the Lexington office of that bureau, which, under the management of Mr. George B. Wurtz, has been of inestimable benefit to the people of central and eastern Kentucky, saving shippers many thousands of dollars annually, and the appropriation bill was reported in such form as amounted to virtual abolition of the weather bureau at Lexington. It was my privilege to succeed in having the full appropriation restored, and the Lexington weather bureau is to-day one of the most prized activities of the Federal Government in Kentucky.

WAR VETERANS AND HOSPITALIZATION

Every measure for the aid and comfort of veterans of all American wars, their widows and children, has received my cordial and energetic support. I was present, alert, and active at the first hearing on the proposal to establish a veterans' hospital in Kentucky and at practically all subsequent hearings until the vision of such an institution for the treatment of World War veterans and the amelioration of their suffering became a reality. I had a considerable part in securing the first favorable committee report of a bill providing for such a hospital. After that the inclusion of a Kentucky hospital in the omnibus hospital bill was inevitable, notwithstanding the determined opposition of influential Federal officials, including the chairman of the subcommittee on hospitalization.

The matter of primary importance to me was to provide for the alleviation of the suffering of those dauntless men who wore our country's uniform in the time "that tried men's souls," as brave defenders of the flag as ever stood on freedom's soil. The location was of secondary importance, but after it was decided that such a hospital should be erected in Kentucky I devoted my efforts to the advocacy of the seventh district for its location. Many admirable and worthy sites in the seventh district were offered. I maintained an attitude of strict neutrality among them all in fairness to them all, but availed myself of every opportunity to advocate the location of the hospital in the section of Kentucky comprising the counties of the seventh congressional district. I knew that no more suitable location could be found for such an institution, and finally, after looking over all parts of the State, the hospitalization board of the Veterans' Bureau decided that a 350-bed general hospital costing more than a million dollars should be erected in Fayette County, the hub of the "Ashland district," the center of the garden spot of the world.

LEXINGTON FEDERAL BUILDING

Recognizing before the beginning of my service that the logical place for the headquarters court of the eastern district of Kentucky is Lexington, and that a new Federal building for that purpose ought to be provided, I began my efforts to secure the erection of a suitable building even before assuming my seat in Congress. For four years I kept that project constantly before me, resorting to every expedient that I could think of. Finally I was successful in securing the allocation of $415,000 to erect a new public building at Lexington and in having it declared an emergency project with $60,000 made available for immediate use in acquiring a suitable site and beginning construction. It seems not inappropriate here to quote from an editorial in the Lexington Herald, of which Hon. Desha Breckinridge is owner and editor and Mr. Thomas R. Underwood is managing editor, commenting upon my activities in winning the fight for the new Federal building, for the completion of which subsequent appropriations will follow as matter of course. The excerpt from the Lexington Herald editorial of February 13, 1928, follows:

Congressman VIRGIL M. CHAPMAN, who as the seventh district representative in Washington, led the entire fight for a Federal building for Lexington and vigorously urged that Lexington should be included in immediate measures rather than delayed and passed over until later, has won a great triumph. When the question seemed to be hanging fire, his aggressive action led to an investigation which he demanded and demonstrated the need for such a building by Lexington and the Federal court district.

His victory for Lexington crowns a service as Congressman without a bobble. Whenever the interests of his constituents have been at stake he has gone to the front energetically and manfully and done the job, effectively, thoroughly. He also has ended forever the fiction that an effective Congressman must wear the political collar of the administration in power.

* * * * * * *

Lexington indeed has good cause to celebrate the accomplishment of a goal and a hope of years, and the sincere thanks of the community, the bar associations, the board of commerce, and other organizations active in the matter are due to Congressman CHAPMAN for his efficient service and splendid victory.

NO ELIGIBLE CITY IN SEVENTH DISTRICT WITHOUT FEDERAL BUILDING

Every town or city in the seventh district that, under the laws and regulations governing the location and construction of public buildings, is eligible for a Federal building already has one.

CONCLUSION

I am among those who believe that a Member of Congress owes it to himself, to his constituents, to his country, and to his God to assume full responsibility for his acts and, under his oath, to consider the constitutionality of every legislative proposal before voting or speaking upon it. It is a dangerous, vicious, and cowardly doctrine that passes to the judicial branch of the Government the sole responsibility of determining whether or not an act of Congress is constitutional. When I believed a bill unconstitutional I voted against it. I have tried to chart my course by the principles enunciated in the immortal first inaugural address of the author of the Declaration of Independence, Thomas Jefferson. I have dedicated my life to the fundamental principles of constitutional government, to the preservation of this Republic as an "indissoluble union of indestructible states," a "government of laws and not of men," in which the separation of powers under a dual form of government shall be forever maintained. The greatest reward that can be enjoyed by any public servant is mine—the consciousness of service rendered and duty performed. I believe my record will be accorded by those whose commission I bear the welcome plaudit, "Well done, thou good and faithful servant."

RECESS FROM SUNDAY UNTIL MONDAY

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, by custom universal in every part of the United States, and by the statutes of all the States, the Sabbath Day has been set apart as a day for rest and worship. Only under conditions of emergency or of imperative necessity does the Christian spirit of this Nation prompt or justify the action of its citizens when they engage in toil on that day. The Senate of the United States, as one of the branches of the legislative department of the National Government, should respect the custom and the law of this Nation. In my judgment, it is an unwholesome practice for the Congress of the United States to engage in the transaction of business on the Sabbath day except under such conditions as make it imperative to do so.

Incidents in the Senate last night, after we had been in continuous session for almost 12 hours, disclosed the fact that a sharp controversy had been brought into the Senate during the closing hours of this session, which would result in a prolonged and probably fruitless contest in this body on the Lord's Day. Making no pretense to the possession of a sanctimonious disposition, but respectfully conforming to the traditions, the sentiments, and feelings which are deep grounded in the hearts and consciences of the men and women of this Republic, I enter a solemn protest in all sincerity against the proposal that is now imminent to compel the Members of this body to violate their conscientious convictions, desecrate and dishonor the Sabbath, and engage in what is likely to become an unseemly filibuster.

Mr. BRUCE. Mr. President, may I interrupt the Senator from Arkansas for a moment?

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. BRUCE. It may be a bad precedent, but I ask the Senator whether it is not a fact that the Senate did meet on Sunday in the year 1923?

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Yes; and they have done so several other times, but I am sure my friend the Senator from Maryland is too good a lawyer and has a conviction of moral principles too comprehensive to justify another desecration of the Sabbath, an unnecessary desecration of the Sabbath, by what has occurred in the past.

Mr. BRUCE. Mr. President, if I may ask the Senator one more question I will not interrupt him further. I should like to ask him whether he heard anyone last night base his opposition to a session of the Senate to-day on Sabbatarian scruples?

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Yes; 20 Senators. They did not object in debate on the floor because the motions were not debatable, but I could name 20 Senators about the Chamber who did so.

Mr. BLACK rose.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I see one now who has just risen, the Senator from Alabama [Mr. BLACK]. I myself base my opposition largely on that ground.

Mr. BRUCE. Of course, the Senator has heard of the old saying, "the better the day the better the deed."

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Yes; and if that argument appeals to the Senator from Maryland, it is quite a surprise to me knowing his thorough comprehension of the immorality that underlies such an axiom.

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Arkansas yield to the Senator from Connecticut?

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I yield to the Senator from Connecticut.

Mr. BINGHAM. I agree entirely with what the Senator has said, and I join with him in wishing that the Senate might not do what it is forced to do by the action of the House of Representatives; but I asked the Senator whether he would yield for the purpose of allowing me to submit a proposed unanimous-consent agreement that the Senate shall now recess until to-morrow, and that upon the convening of the session to-morrow the Senate shall proceed to vote upon a measure with regard to the national-origins clause which the House of Representatives is about to pass and will send over to us.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. No, Mr. President; I will not violate the principle that I am asserting by transacting business voluntarily and thus make my own argument absurd. My position is that the Senate ought not to transact business on Sunday, except in a case of emergency, and I believe that proposition will appeal to all Senators who have respect for the moral law which governs throughout this Republic. I therefore move, Mr. President, that the Senate take a recess until 11 o'clock to-morrow morning.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Arkansas that the Senate take a recess until 11 o'clock a. m. to-morrow.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas and Mr. SHEPPARD demanded the yeas and nays, and they were ordered.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. As an amendment to the motion I move that the Senate take a recess until 11 o'clock to-morrow morning and that immediately after convening it shall, without debate, vote upon the now pending question, being House bill 13929, the so-called plaza bill, and then shall vote on the so-called Nye joint resolution, being Senate Joint Resolution 218, to postpone the taking effect of the national-origins provisions of the immigration act of 1924, as amended.

The VICE PRESIDENT. An amendment of that kind to the motion of the Senator from Arkansas is not in order.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Why is it not in order?

The VICE PRESIDENT. An amendment to the motion of the Senator from Arkansas to fix the time of meeting after the recess earlier or later would be in order, but not a motion adding extraneous matter to the motion such as the Senator from Massachusetts has suggested. The clerk will call the roll.

Mr. BROOKHART. Mr. President, what is the question.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Arkansas that the Senate take a recess until 11 o'clock a. m. to-morrow.

Mr. BROOKHART. There has been no amendment to the motion?

The VICE PRESIDENT. No. The clerk will call the roll.

The Chief Clerk called the roll.

Mr. OVERMAN (after having voted in the affirmative). I observe that the senior Senator from Wyoming [Mr. WARREN] has not voted. I have a pair with that Senator. I transfer my pair with him to the senior Senator from West Virginia [Mr. NEELY], and will let my vote stand.

Mr. SCHALL. I wish to announce that my colleague [Mr. SHIPSTEAD] is ill and confined to his home.

Mr. NYE. The senior Senator from California [Mr. JOHNSON] is unavoidably absent for an hour. Were he present, he would vote "nay." I understand that there has been success in securing for him a pair with the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. HARRISON].

Mr. BLAINE. I desire to announce that my colleague [Mr. LA FOLLETTE] is unavoidably absent. If he were present, he would vote "nay."

Mr. NORRIS. My colleague the junior Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HOWELL] is absent from the Chamber on account of illness.

Mr. EDGE. My colleague the junior Senator from New Jersey [Mr. EDWARDS] is necessarily absent.

Mr. NYE. Mr. President, how am I recorded?

The VICE PRESIDENT. As voting in the negative.

Mr. NYE. I desire to change my vote to the affirmative.

The roll call resulted—yeas 39, nays 36, as follows:

IMMIGRATION AND NATURALIZATION

Mr. SCHNEIDER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD on H. R. 349, a bill to amend the naturalization laws.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Wisconsin?

There was no objection.

Mr. SCHNEIDER. Mr. Speaker, seldom are we called upon to deal with a measure which affects the assimilation of our alien peoples as directly and as positively as the provisions of the bill we are now considering. This measure, H. R. 349, concerns principally that very large group of persons in the United States who unfortunately have constituted a permanently alien group—who have been compelled by the operation of the naturalization laws to remain alien—not by reason of any desire on their part or because of circumstances within their power to change but simply because of the inflexibility of the naturalization laws.

The naturalization act of 1906 established the system of recording the name of every individual who entered the United States at the port at which he entered. In 1911 the requirement that a certificate of arrival be filed with every petition for naturalization was added. This certificate is to be based upon the records made by immigration officials at the alien's port of entry. It is at this point that thousands of persons experienced difficulty. No official record of their entry could be found. In many cases there had been no record made; many were children when they entered and could not remember the name of the vessel or the port by which they entered. Some, of course, entered improperly; but the fact remains that, regardless of how they entered, they are here and can not be deported. The fact that no official record of their entry could be found prevented the issuance of a certificate of entry to them, and they were consequently barred from final naturalization process.

During the years 1906 to 1911 no record was made of those persons who entered across the Canadian border. A great many people came in that way. These as well as those who have come in since, and, for some reason or other, were not registered at the time they entered, find themselves in the predicament of being barred from citizenship. To remedy that situation I introduced the measure, H. R. 13793. The provisions of my bill enable these people to legalize their status in the United States, and to obtain certificates of entry so as to comply with the naturalization requirements. The measure which we are now considering, however—H. R. 349—passed the House last winter, and in the Senate Committee on Immigration and Naturalization was amended so as to include the substance of my bill H. R. 13793. H. R. 349, as amended, then passed the Senate and has now been returned to the House for concurrence in the amendment. The bill was then placed in the hands of conferees. I was designated as one of the Members of the House to serve on this committee, and it is the report of the managers of the conferees that we are now considering.

The process involved in bringing about the situation I have outlined above requires the alien to show that he entered the United States before June 3, 1921; that he has lived in the United States continuously since such entry; that he is a person of good moral character, and that he is not subject to deportation. The certificate which is then issued upon such showing is known as a nunc pro tunc certificate. Its operation is such as to give the person who receives it the status of an immigrant who is legally here. It enables him to fulfill the provisions of the naturalization laws requiring that a certificate of entry be filed with the petition for naturalization.

The alien who applies for such registration of his entry must pay a fee of $20 therefor. The conduct of hearings to determine the eligibility of an alien for registration of his entry entail expense to the Bureau of Immigration; furthermore, many of these aliens obtained admittance to the United States without the payment of head tax. The fee of $20 is therefore considered fair.

GENERAL ASPECTS OF IMMIGRATION AND NATURALIZATION LEGISLATION

The problem of dealing with this large group of persons who were barred from citizenship has existed for a long time, and is an example of just one of the numerous distressing phases of immigration and naturalization legislation with which Congress must deal from time to time. New aspects of this problem keep coming to the surface continually and each time seem to be larger and more difficult to cope with.

The fact that these laws operate very harshly in many instances can be testified to from the personal experience of a great many of our more recent arrivals. Ellis Island with its attendant horrors is not easily forgotten, but lingers in the minds of most of those who arrived before July, 1924, as a very unpleasant experience. Even before Ellis Island entered into their experience some contact was had with these laws in arranging for passage upon the vessels plying between the homelands and this great land of opportunity.

The process of immigrating to the United States and becoming a citizen is to the minds of most people so complicated and interwoven with detail that few have any very comprehensive idea of the steps which an alien must take to get here, and after he is here, the steps he must take to become a citizen. At this point it is also well to warn persons who have entered the United States as aliens to be certain before leaving the United States to have the proper papers with which to reenter. Should they fail to have proper documents it may be necessary for them to return to the country of their origin and go through a process of years of waiting before they can be readmitted.

ORDINARY PROCEDURE OF IMMIGRATION

Because the process of immigrating and becoming naturalized is so little understood I am going to state in as brief and clear a way as possible just what steps must be taken by one wishing to come to the United States and join us in citizenship.

In the past—that is, before 1924—the alien went to the steamship company and applied for passage. Before 1921 he had little difficulty in getting it, and making the trip to the United States. Only the limitations in size and number of steamships restrained him. After 1921 the steamship companies were permitted to bring only a certain number of any nationality to our shores, and in the event they brought more they were obliged to return those in excess at their own expense. Until the immigration act of 1924 went into effect the steamship companies were the only agents who exercised any restraining influence upon immigrants abroad. However, in this discussion it will be best to consider only what is at present the case and not attempt to outline any history of this subject. Suffice it to say, that the present process, which has been in operation since 1924, is very much different from that which was in force before that time and with which most recent arrivals are familiar.

The immigration act of 1924 limits the total number of persons who may come to the United States in a single year to about 164,000 persons, and it establishes a particular number who may come from each individual country. Thus, Germany may send to the United States 51,227 persons each year, Great Britain 34,007, Ireland 28,567, Norway 6,453, and Sweden 9,561. For each of the countries of Europe such a numerical quota was established. That number was arrived at by assigning a quota equal to 2 per cent of the number of foreign-born persons of a particular nationality in the United States at the time of the census of 1890.

To-day the immigrant who does not have a husband, wife, or parent in the United States must, first of all, appear before the American consular officer nearest his home town. From him he receives information as to when he may be able to leave for the United States. There are immense waiting lists in all of the European countries. The lists are so long in certain countries that it will take 30 years before persons who are applying at the present time can be admitted.

The American consul gives each person who applies a place on this list in the order of his application. Within a reasonable time before the turn of a particular person arrives he is notified that his turn has been reached. He must then apply for a visa. Before granting the visa the consul makes a thorough investigation of the applicant's record and orders a physical examination. If the applicant is found physically and mentally qualified and his character appears to be desirable the consul issues a visa to him. From this it will be seen that the consular officer has very large discretionary powers as to whether or not he will admit an individual. Such is the case, and while there have been complaints, it appears on the whole to be working out very well.

The charge for this visa is $10, which must be paid to the American consul. This visa is the only document which the alien requires for admittance to the United States, though the laws of the country from which he comes frequently refuse to permit his departure without a passport. That passport may cost another $10. The charges are not similar for all countries, and as said before not all require them.

After the applicant for admission to the United States has obtained his visa from the American consul there is very little more for him to worry about. He must then obtain transportation, which is readily obtained when he shows his visa to the steamship agents. Armed with the visa given him by the consul he arrives in New York or some other port of arrival, pays his head tax of $8, and proceeds to his destination in the United States uninterrupted by a long wait at Ellis Island, as was the case in years passed.

That, in a very rough way, indeed, outlines the steps one must take in his home country before he can gain admission to the United States. There are numerous other phases which present themselves in many cases, but they are too numerous even to attempt to outline. One of these which I will go into is the distinction between the quota and nonquota visa. All of the discussion above refers exclusively to the quota visa.

NONQUOTA PROCEDURE

A man or woman who has entered the United States and has become an American citizen may, by petitioning the Bureau of Immigration, Department of Labor, Washington, D. C., bring his wife or husband and unmarried children under 21 years of age into the United States without obliging them to wait their turn on the long lists in Europe. After filing his petition with the Bureau of Immigration, if it is approved, that office directs the Department of State to inform the appropriate American consular officer that nonquota status has been allowed to the persons named. However, even in these cases, the consuls are vested with authority to reject such individuals. If they are physically or mentally deficient or have criminal records the consul may refuse to issue visas to them notwithstanding the fact that he is authorized to give them nonquota status.

THE PATH TO CITIZENSHIP

An individual who has undergone these trying experiences in connection with his admission now faces the question of becoming a citizen. To begin the process of naturalization he must first of all be 18 years of age. His first step is to appear before the clerk of any court of record near his established place of residence and declare upon oath his bona fide intention to become a citizen of the United States and to renounce forever all allegiance and fidelity to any foreign country, and particularly to the country of which he is at the time a citizen or subject. He files with the clerk at this time the papers usually referred to as first papers. He must then wait until he has resided in the United States for a period of five years from the time of his arrival and at least two years after he has declared his intention to become a citizen and filed his first papers, after which time he shall make and file in duplicate a petition for naturalization. He must not, however, permit a greater period than seven years to elapse between the declaration of intention and filing of the petition. He must have lived in the vicinity of the court in which he brings his petition for at least six months prior to the time of filing his petition. After filing his petition with the clerk of the court that officer sets a date for hearing the petition.

The fee of $5 must be paid to the clerk of the court at the time of filing the declaration of intention. At the time of filing his petition for naturalization he must pay a fee of $10, in addition to a further fee of $5, for the issuance of a certificate of arrival. Thus the entire cost of procuring naturalization in the regular manner is now $20.

As to those persons who must depend upon the provisions of the bill I have introduced, the costs of naturalization will be greater. They are required to pay the $20 fee for registration of their entry in order to establish their legal status in the United States.

That outlines in a very general way the procedure of obtaining citizenship.

POSSIBILITIES OF EXPATRIATION

Those who have gone over the tedious road to citizenship should be well informed as to the dangers of losing their privileges by returning to the country of their origin or to other foreign countries. Present laws provide that any naturalized citizen who shall reside for two years in the foreign state from which he came, or for five years in any other foreign state, shall be presumed to have ceased to be an American citizen.

TEMPORARY ABSENCES AND PROVISIONS FOR REENTRY

Another point concerning the operation of our immigration laws is that citizens born here or naturalized must have proper documents when traveling to foreign countries. They should always, upon leaving the United States, carry with them a birth certificate or their certificate of naturalization. An alien who wishes to leave the country temporarily to travel abroad or even to cross the border into Canada or Mexico must be especially cautious about having proper documents for his reentry. An alien who is lawfully domiciled in the United States should apply to the Commissioner of Immigration, Department of Labor, Washington, D. C., for a reentry permit. This will be issued to him upon proof of his legal status in the United States and the payment of a fee of $3.

PASSPORTS AND VISAS

Practically the first thing of importance to be considered when contemplating a trip abroad is sufficient and proper identification. No American citizen, natural born or naturalized, should attempt to leave the United States for countries other than Canada, Mexico, or Cuba without a passport. If he wishes to visit England, France, or Poland, and a number of other European and South American countries, he must submit his passport to diplomatic or consular officers of these countries stationed in the United States for visas. The charge for such visas is $10 each. Much objection has been raised to the payment of such visa fees, but these countries hold that while the United States charges a $10 fee to all immigrants who seek admission to the United States, they will reciprocate by charging such a fee to American tourists. The United States has entered reciprocal arrangements with a number of countries for a waiver of visa fees as to tourist traffic.

One might go into much detail in enlarging upon each phase of the above discussion, but I have only attempted to outline in a rough yet dependable manner the steps which must be followed in immigrating and obtaining citizenship, and also to give some warning to those who wish to travel, that they be armed with proper identification for travel purposes as well as to facilitate their readmission to this country. Should anyone at any time wish information in greater detail on any phase of the above, I will be very glad to assist him in procuring such information.

NATIONAL ORIGINS

An attempt to enter into any discussion of the subject of immigration and naturalization at this time would not be complete without some reference to the question of "national origins." The term has come to the attention of most everyone in the country, I presume, yet I dare say only a very few have any accurate idea of what it implies. When one considers the uncertainties and indefiniteness involved, it is surprising that anyone is able to explain its application or agree with it.

The "national-origins" clause was placed in the immigration act of 1924, section 11, in an attempt to provide a system more equitable than that which was made the immediate basis of computing the quotas in 1924. The crying need for limiting the inflow of immigrants who beseiged our ports of entry immediately after the war made necessary that some system be established whereby the number of persons to be admitted from any particular country could be determined. The system placed in effect in 1924 was based upon the census of 1890. It permits the annual admission of aliens of a particular nationality for permanent residence in an amount equal to 2 per cent of the number of foreign-born persons of that nationality in the United States in 1890. The statistics collected in that year showed the number of persons in the United States of all nationalities who had been born abroad. This system of limitation permits the arrival here of 164,667 persons each year.

The legislative history of the "national-origins" provision is very interesting inasmuch as it has been very stormy. From the outset it met a great deal of opposition. The provision was presented to the House by Representative ROGERS, of Massachusetts, as an amendment to the immigration measures being considered in 1924. The House rejected this amendment. The same provision, in slightly different language, however, was presented to the Senate by Senator REED of Pennsylvania, and was adopted by the Senate. Having been accepted by the Senate and rejected by the House it became a subject for consideration by conferees of the two Houses. The Senate refused to yield and the House, in order to get some restrictive legislation, finally agreed to the Senate amendments, with the provision that the "national-origins" clause should not become effective until July 1, 1927.

I have opposed this provision from the outset, and during the first session of the Seventieth Congress presented a resolution for delay of its operation. The measure was reported by committee and placed upon the calendar, but before it was reached a similar measure passed the Senate and was concurred in by the House.

Under the terms of the national-origins provision the total number of persons of foreign birth who might be admitted as quota immigrants would be approximately 150,000 each year. This number would then be allocated to the various nationalities upon the basis of the proportionate numerical strength of each nationality in the United States in 1920. In other words, the law provides that if one-half of all persons in the United States in 1920 are of English extraction the quota allotted to Great Britain would be one-half of 150,000, or 75,000 persons. However, the question then arises as to how the percentage of any particular nationality in the United States in 1920 can be determined. There are no statistics indicating the origin of the people of the country. The law provides that the Secretaries of State, Commerce, and Labor, with the help of experts from the Bureau of the Census, should arrive at this determination. Now, anyone who will reflect for just a moment can appreciate what an impossible job it is to determine with any degree of accuracy the numbers of any particular nationality in the United States in 1920. Names themselves are no accurate index, and intermarriage of these nationalities has made for such homogeneity as to defy placing a great mass of the American populace in any distinct category. An attempt has been made by those representing this committee to ascertain the national origins of all people in the country by a so-called scientific mathematical method. This clearly has proven to be a failure, for the reason that each succeeding time this method is applied different figures are arrived at. The following table is the best proof of that. The three varying reports of this commission indicate that there is no way of determining with any degree of accuracy the number that should be allocated to the respective nations. It is clear that the national-origins quota system would directly favor England and southern European countries, while it would take from the quota of Ireland and northern European countries. It is frequently charged, and I believe justly, that national origins is the creation of pro-English propagandists.

The commission itself in presenting the result of its efforts in 1927 stated:

In our opinion the statistical and historical information available raises grave doubts as to the whole value of these computations as a basis for the purposes intended. We, therefore, can not assume responsibility for such conclusions under these circumstances.

President Hoover, who was at that time a member of the commission as Secretary of Commerce, stated in his speech accepting the presidential nomination of the Republican Party in 1928:

No man will say that any immigration or tariff law is perfect. We welcome our new immigrant citizens and their great contribution to our Nation; we seek only to protect them equally with those already here. We shall amend the immigration laws to relieve unnecessary hardships upon families. As a member of the commission whose duty it is to determine the quota basis under the national origins law, I have found it impossible to do so accurately and without hardship. The basis now in effect carries out the essential principle of the law, and I favor repeal of that part of the act calling for a new basis of quotas.

Better authority as to the impracticability of national origins can not be found.

I am strongly opposed to the national-origins arrangement and shall continue my efforts to effect its repeal. The special session of Congress should deal effectively with this problem in order to prevent this legislative monstrosity from becoming operative.

ADDRESS OF HON. EDWARD MARTIN, OF PENNSYLVANIA

Mr. LEECH. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by including an address delivered by Hon. Edward Martin, the auditor general of Pennsylvania, on the history of Pennsylvania before the Pennsylvania Society on Friday, March 1, 1929.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks by printing an address delivered by the auditor general of the State of Pennsylvania on the history of Pennsylvania. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. LEECH. Mr. Speaker, under the leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD I include the following address delivered by Hon. Edward Martin, the auditor general of Pennsylvania, on the History of Pennsylvania before the Pennsylvania Society on Friday, March 1, 1929:

PENNSYLVANIA

Mr. Toastmaster and fellow Pennsylvanians, a great honor came to me in the invitation to address the Pennsylvania Society. Your distinguished president has suggested that I speak upon Pennsylvania. In complying with that request, however, I appreciate my inability to do full justice to the subject.

Pennsylvania is an empire within a nation. With almost 10,000,000 people, it is exceeded in population by only 20 nations and provinces of the entire world, one of which is a State in our own Federal Union.

Its population is greater than that of all Canada and its commerce exceeds that of many of the great world powers. Its location among the colonies caused it to be designated the "Keystone State." It merits that proud distinction, however, more from its illustrious history than from its geographical position. Its noblest heritage is a great and tolerant people. In the beginning we were taught to respect the rights of others. Two and a half centuries of advancement have done nothing to change that view. Its institutions, its laws, its customs, and its people have received frequent criticism but we have been undisturbed. Many of Pennsylvania's sons and daughters know little of its traditions, power, wealth, and contributions to mankind. Pride should cause every one of them to learn these things.

In this brief address no reference will be made to the romantic story of the State, although it is rich in lore and tradition. Our forefathers linked the coming of the white man to the age of the Indians by retaining Indian names. Counties, villages, streams, and mountains recall the days when the red man was supreme.

William Penn arrived at Uplands, now Chester, October 27, 1682. He was a man of peace and practiced justice. The doors of his great domain were flung open to all people. They accepted his invitation. Scattered over the rich expanse of Pennsylvania may be found the descendants of every nationality.

EARLY SETTLERS

Pennsylvania was settled by groups having conflicting ideas of religion and forms of government. The molding of these different ideas into a united and powerful people was our first great achievement. None of the other colonies had a population of such diversified forms of religion, industry, and government, nor one whose ideals were so divergent. Every creed and nationality was not only tolerated in Pennsylvania but welcomed. The leading men who have directed our destinies since the beginning of the State have demanded that every act of governmental bodies be consistent with that early ideal. William Penn, the founder, believed in religious tolerance for people of his own belief and exacted the same for those of other beliefs. He believed in keeping contracts, and no treaty with his State was broken in three-quarters of a century. That plan has continued. Compacts and agreements in Pennsylvania mean something.

Three distinct groups formed the early history of the colony.

The pious Quaker, under the noble Penn, occupied the territory surrounding Philadelphia, now composed of Chester, Montgomery, Bucks, Delaware, and adjacent counties, and developed the ideas of peace and frugality. He was conservative, yet gave himself to the vigorous pursuits of commerce.

Farther west, in the fertile counties of Berks, Lancaster, Cumberland, York, and others, the patient German introduced and practiced a civilization whose striking characteristic was simplicity in living. This, combined with industry, added remarkably to the strength of the Commonwealth. He devoted his time to the tilling of the soil and developed agriculture to such a high standard of efficiency that his beautiful farms are recognized as unexcelled. He has made his land the garden spot of the world.

Beyond in the mountain valleys the sturdy Scotch-Irish pushed civilization into the wilderness and contributed to the colony a combative and aggressive spirit. These naturally robust pioneers had the spirit of restlessness and courage developed by this rugged country and the constant repelling of the Indian attacks. The red man was driven back, schools and churches established, and a form of government instituted. Thus to those people more than any other race is due the credit of developing the western part of the Commonwealth and the States beyond our border.

With such distinct and different ideals prevailing it was natural that controversy should arise. There was constant strife between the conservative Quakers, contented with the natural increase of their commerce, and the irrepressible Scotch-Irish, not satisfied without rapid and constant growth. The Germans, occupying the central portion of the State, held the balance of political power, which was at first given to the Quakers, but during the Revolution was shifted to the Scotch-Irish, and this combination formulated the government for the State during that important period.

The development of transportation facilities, the operation of mines and quarries, the increased agricultural pursuits, the construction of furnaces, forges, foundries, machine shops and factories, the felling of the forests, and the general expansion of all commerce and industries brought about a natural increase of population, not only from other States but also from the nations of Europe. The molding of these peoples of different languages, traditions, and religions into a unified race without coercion required the most careful enactment of laws and their strictly impartial enforcement.

History shows that the descendants of those early groups have served the State in every capacity. Our fathers' plan of harmonizing opposing interests has been utilized in all our history. Our people have been happy, contented, and prosperous. They have been united in their demands for orderly government and have seldom been leaders in new and untried movements. Early these people in combating common dangers learned the necessity of compromise. This was their first school in democracy. In no other way may men reach a common ground. Thus they became proper subjects for a republican or democratic form of government.

RESOURCES

In addition to a great and powerful people, the State has been blessed with resources of untold wealth and an area of unsurpassed natural beauty. Pennsylvania abounds in mountains and valleys, farms and cities, beautiful rivers and woodlands, and through utilization of its natural resources, wonderful industrial developments and a network of railroads, trolleys, and public highways; mines and quarries; wires of communication and pipe lines; and everything that an all-provident Creator could give to make a happy and contented people.

THINGS IN WHICH WE LEAD

Pennsylvania at the present time leads all of the States in the Union in the production of steam railroad cars, clay products, coke, cement products, glass, ice cream, cotton, lace, iron, steel, knit goods, leather goods, earthenwares, plumbers' supplies, wrought iron, anthracite coal, and wool yarn; in the smelting and refining of zinc; in structural and ornamental ironwork; in the manufacture of silk and charcoal; and in the use of natural gas.

Our State contains the world's largest plants for the production of aluminum cooking utensils, brick, bridges, buttons, carpets, cement, chains, coke, confectionery, cork products, hats, horseshoes, hosiery, ice-making machinery, lace, linoleum, locomotives, matches, paper, pipe, pipe organs, plate glass, safes, saws, ships, silks, tank cars, teeth, turbine wheels, umbrellas, wrought iron, and zinc.

We generate daily almost 5,400,000 horsepower, which is 2,000,000 more than our nearest competitor, our sister State, New York.

AGRICULTURE

We are not known as a great agricultural State, and possess only 1.2 per cent of the area of the Nation for farming purposes, yet our products amount to 3.2 per cent. This shows the progressiveness of our farmers and the productiveness of our soil.

The total value of our crops in 1927 was estimated at about $250,000,000, or more than the combined total of all New England and New Jersey. Pennsylvania is now fourteenth among the States of the Union in the value of its agricultural products, and is steadily increasing each year. In 1925 we ranked fourth among the States in the value of dairy products.

MANUFACTURING

The steel and iron industry alone would make Pennsylvania great commercially. We have 33⅓ per cent of the pig-iron tonnage of the entire Nation. Our steel mills produce classified products amounting to 37½ per cent of the steel tonnage of America. The finished steel products of the Pittsburgh district were found on every allied front during the World War and contributed inestimably to the victory of our armies.

We are not considered a large manufacturer of textiles, yet we produced in 1926, 15 per cent of the entire amount manufactured in the country, with a monetary value of more than $1,000,000,000.

It is interesting to know that in 1927 Pennsylvania refined over 800,000,000 gallons of gasoline.

Pennsylvania in 1925 had 17,298 industrial establishments and practically 1,000,000 wage earners. The wages paid totaled over $1,300,000,000, the cost of the raw materials was almost $4,000,000,000, and the value of the finished products almost $7,000,000,000.

NATURAL RESOURCES

Statistics show us that 25 per cent of the mines and quarries in the United States are found in Pennsylvania.

Clay mining is also another great Pennsylvania industry. In addition, we quarry 60 per cent of the slate of the Nation.

All of the hard coal is produced in this State, and in 1927 over one-fourth of the bituminous. We furnished during the same period nearly 80 per cent of the coke from beehive ovens and 25 per cent of the coke from by-products ovens.

In 1926 Pennsylvania produced 151,000,000 tons of bituminous coal and West Virginia 147,000,000. In 1927 West Virginia forged ahead. We have lost the prestige of being first in the production of bituminous coal through discriminatory rates and unsatisfactory labor conditions. This industry, however, is regaining some of its lost prestige through Pennsylvania pluck and perseverance.

During the year 1926 we ranked sixth among the States in the production of natural gas. Pennsylvania is the largest consumer of natural gas in the Union. A large part of the production in the neighboring States of West Virginia and Ohio is piped to our mills and workshops.

While Pennsylvania sands no longer yield a great volume of crude oil, yet in 1927 they produced 9,533,000 barrels. When we consider that it commands the highest price of any oil in the world, Pennsylvania's oil industry is still of great value to America. We have 76,800 producing wells, which is 26 per cent of the number in the entire country.

A map of the pipe lines transporting oil, natural gas, and by-products is most interesting and in Pennsylvania represents an outlay of millions of dollars, but assures the commercial supremacy of our State for years to come in the manufacture of clay products, glass, steel, tin, and iron.

We are the first in the production of Portland cement. In 1925 we produced 42,346,830 barrels, which is one-fourth of the entire amount produced by the Nation.

TRANSPORTATION

During the period mentioned the steam railroads of Pennsylvania had 31 per cent of the total number of locomotives in use, 30 per cent of the passenger cars, and 33 per cent of the freight cars. These are necessary to move the products of our factories, our mines, our farms, and our various other industries. One-fifth of the shipping of the United States originates in Pennsylvania.

Credit for the invention of the steamboat, whether it belongs to John Fitch or Robert Fulton, goes to Pennsylvania. Oliver Evans, of Philadelphia, built the first high-pressure steam engine, but Henry Matthias Baldwin built the first practical locomotive in America, and the great locomotive works so long identified with Philadelphia still bear his name. Sunbury was the first town in the entire world to be lighted by electricity. Edison perfected his first lighting plant there July 4, 1883.

The first macadam road in America was constructed between Lancaster and Philadelphia in 1792. It was a part of the great westward highway, taking a position similar to that of the old National Road. It to-day forms an important part of the Lincoln Highway.

The first canal in America was built connecting the Schuylkill and the Susquehanna, from Middletown to Reading, and was opened November 22, 1797.

OTHER RESOURCES

Many additional figures could be given to show the position of Pennsylvania products and industries, such as tobacco, fruit, wool, shipbuilding, explosives, etc., but that seems unnecessary, as the ones given show the remarkable supremacy of the State. Most States, and even many nations, depend upon a single industry. We in Pennsylvania are most fortunate, as our natural resources and industries are diversified. For half a century our resources have been so great, and the demand for our products so universal, that we frequently forget the necessity for the frugality exercised by our fathers. In passing let us remember that industrial and political progress of any community depends upon the individuals who compose it. There is no golden rule by which these objectives may be reached. It can only be done by effort, conservation, and frugality. Our fathers showed the way. We must not drift too far from the approved moorings.

CENTERS OF POPULATION

The official census of 1920 shows that Pennsylvania has 165 cities and boroughs and 79 first-class townships of a population of 5,000 or more. The present population would probably show several others coming under this head. This gives Pennsylvania more large centers of population than any other State in the Union and is a result of our diversified industries. It shows the wisdom of our financiers in placing industries in small communities where a more satisfactory labor market is found.

EDUCATION

Pennsylvania does not devote its entire attention to commerce. Art, science, and literature have had their proper place in the consideration of our people. Our educational system has been criticized, but from the days of the founders great attention has been given to that subject and enormous sums of money have been contributed for that purpose. In the school year of 1926–27 Pennsylvania had 53 accredited colleges and universities, with a total enrollment of 72,727 students. This does not include a large number of schools and academies of long and honorable servative Quaker, contented with the natural increase of their comspondence schools, and normal institutions. The 53 accredited colleges represent the various religious views of the people of the State, and to a large extent are maintained by public subscription and endowment funds which have been created by benevolent men of the Commonwealth. Our townships, boroughs, and cities, by large tax levies which have been paid without complaint for three-fourths of a century, have maintained a public-school system. From year to year the State has also contributed to this worthy purpose. The free-school system of Pennsylvania was started in 1834. In 1928 the cities, boroughs, and townships raised $135,924,854, and the Commonwealth added to this more than $26,000,000. This does not include almost $10,000,000 expended by the State for vocational training, universities, etc.

The State maintains 14 normal schools, many of which are the finest in the Nation. Our State college has kept apace with the times, but the Commonwealth has not contributed sufficiently for its needs. This has been an error and is now being corrected. It has more than 5,000 students, and in addition maintains a summer school which is performing a fine service. The extension courses throughout the various counties of the State are encouraging agricultural interests and are doing much to increase the value of our products. The commanding position taken by Pennsylvania in law, literature, science, and commerce completely refutes criticism of our educational system.

The average attendance in the public schools of Pennsylvania is greater than that of any other State. The State also leads all other Commonwealths in the number of church structures and church attendance.

The first public school in America was opened in Philadelphia February 12, 1698. The first normal school established in America was organized in Pennsylvania.

Early Pennsylvanians took a prominent part in science and other things advancing our people individually. Franklin was the great scientist of the early times. Thomas Godfrey invented the quadrant. David Rittenhouse was the great astronomer and first accurately measured the distance to the sun; he surveyed our first canal and he built the first observatory in this country. In later days the late John D. Brashear, of the Monongahela Valley, carried forward this great work. John Bartram, of Philadelphia, was the first great American botanist.

MEN PRODUCED FOR NATION AND OTHER STATES

Hon. Frederic A. Godcharles, our enthusiastic and efficient State librarian, is authority for the statement that Pennsylvania has produced for the United States and other States 2 Presidents prior to the Constitution and 1 since the Constitution; 1 Vice President; 5 Secretaries of the Treasury; 7 Secretaries of War; 3 Secretaries of the Navy; 2 Secretaries of the Interior; 2 Secretaries of Labor; 4 Postmasters General; 10 Attorneys General; 5 Associate Justices of the Supreme Court of the United States; 3 Presidents pro tempore of the Senate; 6 Speakers of the House; 7 ambassadors to France, 6 to Great Britain, 12 to Russia, 3 to Germany, 3 to Turkey, 1 to Austria, 2 to Mexico, 3 to Japan; and 74 governors of 34 of the States. Many others, leaders in science, art, and literature, might be mentioned to show the results of our educational system, but time forbids.

PROGRESSIVE LAWS

The laws governing the Commonwealth have always been most progressive. Those relating to health, labor, morals, care of the unfortunate, sanitation, and kindred subjects, have been far in advance of our sister States and have frequently been copied by them. The law governing our public service commission, the commission's rulings, regulations governing workmen's compensation, child labor laws, and similar laws and regulations are cited by other States. Almost daily requests for information concerning our governmental plans are received by the State officials. Wise banking laws have encouraged thrift and economy. One-tenth of the savings of the Nation are held by Pennsylvania banks.

PENNSYLVANIA PROPERTY

The property owned by the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania shows the great diversity of our activities. We have—

Over 8,000 miles of hard-surfaced roads, costing $324,000,000.

The most beautiful capitol group in the world, conservatively valued at $25,000,000.

One million three hundred thousand acres of forest reserves, valued at $14,500,000.

One-fourth of the Delaware River Bridge, costing us $10,000,000.

Armories in 60 towns, the State arsenal, and the reservation at Mount Gretna, having a total value of $7,000,000.

Mental hospitals valued at $11,000,000.

Homes and schools for feeble-minded valued at $5,000,000.

Medical and surgical hospitals valued at $3,000,000.

Penal and corrective institutions valued at $8,000,000.

Sanitariums having a total valuation of $1,000,000.

Normal schools with a total value of $5,000,000.

Training schools valued at $1,000,000.

Soldiers and sailors' home valued at $700,000.

There are many smaller activities but this shows the great extent of Pennsylvania's work. By adhering closely to the "pay-as-you-go" plan, Pennsylvania has amassed in less than 25 years property of a value of more than $422,000,000 above its liabilities.

COST OF GOVERNMENT

There has been much talk in recent years about the increased cost of State and local government. This applies to Pennsylvania as well as to its sister Commonwealths. It has been brought about by the continued expansion of governmental activities.

The government of the State in 1800 cost $250,000. In 1900 this had increased to $15,000,000, and in 1925, to $157,000,000. Education cost the State in 1900, $6,800,000, which in 25 years had increased fivefold. Health activities in 1900 cost the State less than $50,000, while in 1925 their cost had increased to $2,400,000. Welfare in 1900 was $2,500,000 and was increased four times that amount 25 years later. All commissions in Pennsylvania in 1900 cost less than $50,000, but in 25 years they had increased to $4,000,000. Departments like forests and waters, the State police, the public-service commission, and the highway department were unknown in 1900, but in 25 years were costing more than $50,000,000 a year.

County and all local expenditures have also greatly expanded. In 1910 the total taxes collected for county purposes was a little more than $30,000,000. In 15 years it was multiplied by three. Boroughs in 1910 collected a little more than $10,000,000, which had increased to more than $20,000,000 in 1925. Cities in 1910 collected $36,000,000, which had increased to more than $84,000,000 in 1925. Townships in 1910 collected less than $6,000,000, which had increased threefold in 15 years. School districts in 1910 collected less than $30,000,000, and in 15 years the amount had increased to almost $130,000,000.

While for the entire year of 1800 the cost of our State government was $250,000 it now costs more than $350,000 for each working day.

In addition to the enormous amount of taxes collected bond issues have greatly increased. Pennsylvania had outstanding December 31, 1928, $93,221,000, and on January 1, 1927, cities, boroughs, townships, school districts, and poor districts had outstanding $838,437,500, which had since 1913 increased from $245,979,000.

We can not expect to lower taxes as long as the demand for more service continues. The plea for larger expenditures is highly organized. Few take a stand in opposition to greater expenditures for public welfare, schools, roads, etc. Many of these things are urged by organizations having a highly paid salary list. The practical politician does not seem to have the courage to oppose them. The average citizen seems to be willing to go along. High taxes are already damaging industry in several States. Pennsylvania must avoid this peril. Long-term bond issues are of the most dangerous obligations. The people of the State at large showed their sound judgment in the last general election by their disapproval of the several proposals.

USE OF TAXES

What is done with the money?

A study of the expenditures for the last few years shows that 80 per cent of our revenue was used for roads, education, and public welfare. From the remaining 20 per cent is deducted the sums devoted for agriculture, commissions, forests, banking, insurance, military, and other departments of general service. This leaves a very small amount for the administration of the government. The expenditures of governmental departments will compare very favorably with the cost of management of a corporation involving activities of equal magnitude and organized for profit. In 1856 the State's expenditures for schools and charities was less than 5 per cent of the taxes collected. Forty per cent of the taxes was used for the payment of interest and liquidation of indebtedness. The total State indebtedness at that time was $39,906,577.97, and this was not completely liquidated until 1909.

PENNSYLVANIA'S FEDERAL TAX

Pennsylvania has contributed largely in assisting the Federal Government. The Statistical Abstract of the United States published by the United States Department of Commerce shows that for 1925 we paid in Federal taxes $246,592,155.56. We received in Federal aid from the Government $4,631,318.82, or we received 1.88 per cent of the amount paid in by us. Five States of the Union received more from the Government than they paid in taxes. Pennsylvania paid as much as 29 other States combined.

POLITICAL

In the consideration of Pennsylvania or any other political subdivision of the United States the subject of politics should be mentioned. I do not mean wholly in a partisan sense, although all good and loyal citizens should be proud of their political effort. In our own Nation good or bad government depends upon politics. With few exceptions great strides forward have been made through the vehicle of political parties. In the future, by reason of the increase of population and power of the various States, this will be more apparent. Militant political organizations must, therefore, be encouraged. The importance of Pennsylvania should cause its citizens to continue their interest in the selection of their officials. Pennsylvania has 29 counties with a population greater than the State of Nevada. Philadelphia County is greater in population than any one of 27 States, Allegheny than 17, Luzerne than 6, Lackawanna and Westmoreland than 3, Schuylkill than 2, and on down the line.

When the Constitution was adopted each State was given two Senators, and representation in the lower House in accordance with population. This was a compromise. It has worked to the great disadvatage of Pennsylvania and other large industrial Commonwealths. Our Representatives must be men and women imbued with Pennsylvania ideals and adhering firmly to those time-honored policies which have brought honor to the Commonwealth. This is not a political statement. However, I believe it expresses the position which Pennsylvania must assume if our State is to maintain its high prestige.

Since the founding of the Republican Party in 1856 all Governors of Pennsylvania except two have been affiliated with that party. During that long period, of almost three-quarters of a century, nearly every department of Government has been in the control of the Republicans. With the exception of 1856, when the vote of the State went to our own son, President Buchanan, and in 1912, when it went to Roosevelt, it has always been in the Republican column. It is a glorious record. We believe in party government. We have attained splendid results by this plan.

PENNSYLVANIA IN NATIONAL FINANCE

Men of Pennsylvania have taken a most active part in the wars in which our Nation has been engaged. These stirring events have been properly recorded in history. In addition to our men who have rallied to the colors, Pennsylvania's men of finance have taken a more prominent part in the affairs of the Nation than those of any other Commonwealth. Little has been written of this important work. From the dark days of the Revolution, when Morris gave of his private means and went from house to house soliciting funds for Washington's Army, American wars have been financed by Pennsylvanians. Albert Gallatin, Secretary of the Treasury from Pennsylvania, laid before the people the plan of financing wars by future generations. This was the beginning of bond issues in America. Stephen Girard was largely responsible for raising funds for the War of 1812. The banking firm of E. W. Clark & Co. furnished the money for the Mexican War. Jay Cooke, of Philadelphia, was the single individual who stood out most prominently in selling bonds for financing the Civil War. While no individual may be pointed out as the financier of the World War, yet Pennsylvanians may consider with wonderful pride the work of the great captains of industry who so efficiently organized our various activities and placed in the hands of our soldiers the means by which victory was attained. After the war had closed, however, and our finances were in a muddled condition, and Victory bonds were begging a market at many points below par, with little hope of improvement, all faces turned to that quiet little Pennsylvanian to lead us out of our financial difficulties. The manner in which Hon. A. W. Mellon has solved these great problems is a new Pennsylvania glory.

With such a long line of distinguished men who have aided our Government in its fiscal affairs and who have given similar service to our State, the marvelous financial condition of our Commonwealth is to be expected. If we are to maintain this high standard in governmental efficiency these men must be encouraged to continue in public life.

PENNSYLVANIA IN WAR

Pennsylvania's contribution to the military history of our country constitutes a large place in the martial story of America. The people have been haters of conflict, yet they have tasted most bitterly of the results of war. The State was founded to perpetuate the principles of peace, yet it has been the great battle front of the wars waged that liberty and civilization might survive. The spirit of patriotism which dominated the sturdy people of a great Commonwealth from the beginning and which has been transmitted to us as their children, prepared the material which our State has contributed to the Nation in every national calamity.

Our contribution in war started with the struggle for independence. Wayne was the illustrious Pennsylvanian taking part. Independence Hall, Valley Forge, Brandywine, and Germantown are Pennsylvania names sacred to the Nation. Philadelphia, by reason of its shrines and traditions, is the mecca of patriotic American people. Each year come pilgrimages from every State of the Union to the City of Brotherly Love. Valley Forge is sacred soil, as here was developed the great-heartedness of the man who was destined to formulate the early ideals of the Nation. Washington, with religious fervor of heart, was never too big to acknowledge the necessity of supreme guidance, and the manner in which his officers and men bore suffering and hardship during that period will always be an inspiration to the American Army.

The first troops to reach Washington's headquarters near Boston were Pennsylvania German farmers from York County, and these were soon followed by other Pennsylvania troops from the southern tier of counties, although Boston was further removed from that section then than Europe is from America now.

The number of soldiers taking part in the Revolutionary War from Pennsylvania is unknown. It is estimated, however, that there were 50,000 in the Pennsylvania Militia and 6,000 Pennsylvanians in the Continental line. From this estimate the Quaker colony contributed more than one-fifth of the man power of the whole American Army.

Neither do we exactly know the number taking part in the War of 1812. That war has its unpleasant memories, but, as in the Revolution, the people of Pennsylvania contributed largely in means and also gave more soldiers than any other State of the Union. On Lake Erie was fought a battle, the result of which added great luster to the American Navy.

In the Mexican War we contributed nine regiments, two of which saw the hardest of campaigns, and were at the front when the colors were carried to the walls of the capital city of our neighboring Republic.

Beginning with Governor Curtin and continuing with such illustrious leaders as Meade, Hancock, and Reynolds, followed by legions of trained men whose devotion to duty and bravery under fire have never been excelled, Pennsylvania's part in the war for the Union completely crowned it the Keystone State. At Gettysburg, under Meade, a worthy son, Pennsylvania rallied around the standards and while the fertile valleys trembled under the shocks of war, and countless thousands breathlessly awaited the issue, they fought it to a glorious finish. The cluster of trees near the Pennsylvania monument and Meade's headquarters on Cemetery Ridge at Gettysburg mark the high-water mark of the rebellion. It is sacred American soil. Pennsylvania troops made it such.

In the war for the preservation of the Union Pennsylvania produced 48 general officers, and of these 14 commanded armies and corps.

The Spanish-American War came and it showed Pennsylvania taking a gallant part. Many of its units were sent to enemy foreign lands, where American troops were crossing swords with the enemy. Seventeen thousand four hundred and forty-eight Pennsylvanians took part in this war.

The World War, the most gigantic task ever attempted by any nation, saw this Commonwealth contribute almost 400,000 men. Three divisions were organized from men of Pennsylvania, and many other units of special troops were entirely recruited from our State. It will be years before the exact work of this enormous struggle is fully appreciated, but all three of the Pennsylvania combat divisions were on the front lines in France, and each was commended at least once in orders. Every tenth man in the service of the Nation was from the Keystone State. The row upon row of white crosses in France silently attest the valor of those decendants of fathers of peace. The records of the War Department disclose hundreds of Pennsylvania sons performing service beyond duty, and a grateful Republic rewards them with its decorations for gallantry.

Certain organizations of Pennsylvania have stood out preeminently among the outfits of the Nation. The First City Troop of Philadelphia was formed preceding the Revolution and has taken a part in every conflict in which the Nation has been engaged. The One hundred and seventy-sixth Field Artillery, formerly the Duquesne Grays, has been in existence for almost 100 years, and, starting with the Mexican War, has taken a gallant part in every national calamity. The One hundred and third Engineers has seen more than a century of honored existence and has taken part in all of the wars during this eventful period. The One hundred and eighth Field Artillery is another organization of long and honorable standing. The One hundred and tenth Infantry, with service in both the Philippines and France, has the distinction of having traveled, to defend the colors of its Nation, farther than any other volunteer organization in the word. Many other distinguished military organizations could be mentioned which are indelibly stamped upon the life of their various communities.

No one can doubt the patriotism of Pennsylvania, whether it be in time of war or time of peace. Our past is glorious. The present is the pride of chivalrous men and beautiful women. The future is what we make it. The past has given us the Declaration of Independence; the Articles of Confederation; the Constitution; sacred battle fields; magnificent shrines; men and women leaders in science, letters, politics, and war; the first flag; and, most of all, brave and patriotic fathers and devoted and loving mothers. In the name of these great men and women of the past, who through thrift, economy, and perseverance, made us a State renowned, let us like good soldiers face the front and see that our column moves grandly forward. In the past there was the rumbling of great marshaling forces. The discipline instilled in us by the example of powerful forefathers makes it possible for us to move forward in perfect unison with less acclaim. To-night, as we meet in the most wonderful capital city of the world, we pray that our Nation, through the aid of the omnipotent God, may solve all the great problems in accordance with the right; but, "right or wrong, always our country." May the hearts of Pennsylvanians beat true to the purposes of Old Glory, the red in the flag meaning industry and power, each citizen deeming it a privilege by effort to strengthen the Nation; the blue, truth and loyalty, to apply to those with whom we serve, as well as to the Government; and the white, peace and purity, meaning that contentment of service necessary in a democracy; and the stars the light that shall guide us in our relations to mankind.

ADDRESS OF HON. TOM C. YONT, OF FLORIDA

Mr. GREEN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by printing an able and eloquent address recently delivered in the city of Washington by my colleague from Florida [Mr. YON] before the J. E. B. Stuart Chapter, United Daughters of the Confederacy.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Florida?

There was no objection.

Mr. GREEN. Mr. Speaker, under the leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD I include the following address of Representative TOM YON, of the third Florida district, before J. E. B. Stuart Chapter, United Daughters of Confederacy, at Confederate Memorial Home in the city of Washington, February 16, on the occasion of anniversary month of birth of General Stuart:

GEN. J. E. B. STUART

President and daughters and guests of Jeb Stuart Chapter, United Daughters of the Confederacy, I esteem it a privilege and also a high honor that I should be invited to address you for a few minutes this evening on the occasion of your anniversary meeting in memory of the birth of the daring soldier and Christian leader, Gen. J. E. B. Stuart, in whose honor I understand that this chapter is named.

It is of peculiar significance, too, that this chapter should bear his name, for it was around this, the Capital of now a reunited Nation, that the wonderful traits of his character and daring feats of leadership were most largely displayed. In addressing you, if I were an orator, I would not be at a loss for something to say, either in paying a personal tribute to General Stuart and enumerating to you an account of his deeds of valor, but still, on the other hand, I can not express to you in words a tribute to the men and women of the Southland that would be sufficiently strong, so as to impress on you my estimate of their devotion to what they religiously thought their right and duty. For four long years of a terrible conflict the women of the South joined with their husbands, brothers, sons, and sweethearts to live or die, enduring privations and displaying deeds of heroism.

We people of to-day can not visualize the bitter sectional feeling existing between the people of the North and of the South leading up to the booming of Fort Sumter's cannon and the terrible conflict that ensued from the firing of that fateful shot down to the surrender of General Lee at Appomattox.

There never has been in the annals of warfare more military skill shown than was shown in the handling of the poorly paid, half-fed, and raggedly equipped armies of Lee, Jackson, Stuart, and other illustrious leaders of the Confederate armies; and when the enlisted strength of the southern armies was so much inferior to those of the North, as to enlistment totals, for they show that of about 600,000 for the South as against about 2,600,000 for the North. So it was with wonder, and how could it have been, that the armies of the Confederacy could fight a war on an offensive and defensive scale for four long years with the markets of the world closed to them, on account of an impassable blockade, and as it was then no land of manufacture, only a land of plantations and of happy and cultured home life, when at the coming of the evening tide the curling of the smoke from the thousand and more chimneys gave evidence of a happy, contented servant class, who were singing the old familiar southern melodies in their own familiar dialect, such as Massa's in the Cold, Cold Groun', Swing Low, Sweet Chariot, and others alike familiar, sung by the darkies, as evidence of their happiness.

With these conditions, what or by what reason could such a prolonged conflict have taken place? Only by the consecrated and daring leadership of the Confederate officers, as it inspired confidence in their men and the righteousness of their cause.

Our hero, General Stuart, the "plumed knight-errant," "the eyes and ears of General Lee," he of such daring skill, unequaled initiative, loyalty to his men and superior officers, cheerful disposition, and infinite faith in his Maker, all qualities for leadership; he the man whose memory you honor on this occasion in this the ninety-sixth year of his birth, for on February 6, 1933, you can celebrate the hundredth anniversary of his coming into the world.

He who at the early age of 31 years had achieved a world-wide reputation as a cavalry leader, and at that age was mortally wounded in the defense of the capital city of the country he loved on the 11th day of May, 1864, died the next day. In the years of his young life he had served the Union as loyally as he was serving the Confederate States when he died. His exploits in going around the army of McClellan in the penisular campaign in three days, in reading an account of this, is like reading fiction. His exploits in Maryland and late in conjunction with Lee's invasion of Pennsylvania that precipitated the Battle of Gettysburg and the guarding of the retreat of Lee back to Virginia after this, the greatest battle of the war, all display his qualities as a leader of men and the genius of his leadership.

We, the children, sons and daughters of the "Old South," are none the less loyal to our common country's flag, but we would not be true to the traditions of those that have gone on before, and those that gave their lives and their all in defense of their honest convictions, if we did neglect these anniversaries, and failed to pause and pay tribute to the brave departed heroes of our Southland, and as each succeeding generation takes the place of these departed ones, may these fires be kept aflame on the altar, in loving memory for the deeds of valor of our departed heroes, and in doing this it will make no less a devoted patriot to a great united Nation than if we did not these things.

And as the years come and go, as they have since the dark days of the sixties, we have marveled at the development in the South, as great cities have sprung from the ashes of war. The hum of industry, and the honest toil of descendants of a brave people, that till the soil and have made the waste places blossom like the rose, and the Southern people are providing their quota of consecration to "American" ideals, as to be willing at all times to rush to the defense of the flag of a united Nation, one flag, one people, inseparable, and as such we go forward, to provide greater opportunities for a free and liberty-loving people of the United States of America.

NAVAL STORES AND PINE TIMBER INDUSTRIES

Mr. LANKFORD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD on an item in the agricultural appropriation bill and to include therein three extracts from letters in support of the item.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Georgia asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD on the agricultural appropriation bill and to include therein portions of three letters. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. LANKFORD. Mr. Speaker, during the consideration of the agricultural appropriation bill I received several splendid letters from constituents of mine who were very anxious that certain items be retained in the bill. I feel that extracts from at least three of these letters should become a part of the permanent record of this Congress. The items referred to were retained in the bill, and these letters show the necessity for this appropriation and the vital importance of the naval stores and pine timber industries.

From a letter written me by Hon. H. Langdale, a prominent naval-stores operator and attorney of Valdosta, Ga., I quote as follows:

I notice from the papers that Senator W. J. HARRIS has introduced a bill for the appropriation of $10,000, to be used to promote the making of light-colored strong paper from southern pine.

This, in my opinion, is very important to the turpentine operators and landowners in south Georgia, and more especially in the eleventh congressional district, and I trust that you will cooperate with him in every way you can to get this bill passed. There is now much money being spent by turpentine operators and other landowners to protect the forests and in the growing of timber. According to the best information available, the southern parts of Georgia not only is the best reproducing timber section in the United States but in most parts produces a superior grade of timber, especially for naval stores. In the growing of timber it has long been a problem with landowners as to what disposition could be made of the trees that had been worked for turpentine and trees no longer suitable for turpentine purposes, being too small, as a general rule, to be manufactured into lumber. If these trees could be utilized in the making of paper, a great problem would be solved for the landowners.

From a letter written me by Dr. E. P. Rose, a prominent physician, naval-stores operator, and banker of Valdosta, I quote the following:

We also are in need of additional appropriations to defray the expense of chemists in extending the uses of gum spirits of turpentine and rosin. This is very important to the State of Georgia, for the reason that the State of Georgia now is by far the largest producer of turpentine and rosin of any other section of the United States or elsewhere.

For your information, the turpentine season ending March 31, 1928, showed that for the previous year the States of Alabama, Louisiana, Texas, Mississippi, North Carolina, and South Carolina produced, in round numbers 6,000,000 gallons of turpentine. The State of Florida produced ten million and the State of Georgia produced fifteen million, the above States being the only States that produce any turpentine. You can see that Georgia is now producing approximately 50 per cent of the turpentine and rosin that is being manufactured in the United States, and I have no statistics available, but it is my opinion that your district, the eleventh congressional district, is producing approximately 50 per cent of the turpentine and rosin that is being produced in the State of Georgia. Much money and effort is being put forth in this district to grow timber. There is probably being more money spent in that direction in your district than any other section of the country.

From a letter written me by Mrs. Ruby Wilson Berrie, assistant secretary of the Brunswick Board of Trade, and in behalf of that trade body, I quote as follows:

The Agricultural appropriation bill which has passed the Senate and which we understand is now before the House committee for study and consideration carries an increase for Dr. F. P. Veitch's work and appropriation of $10,000 for an investigation of production of pulp from slash pine and increases for the Forest Service, which is to be used for naval-stores studies.

We are greatly interested in having these items included in the Agricultural appropriation bill, as the naval-stores industry is probably the most important industry in this entire section, and our people are realizing more and more each year the importance of reforestation and forest conservation.

In connection with the proposed appropriation of $10,000 for the investigation of paper and pulp manufacture from slash pine we wish to say that there are practically unlimited quantities of this and other pines in southeast Georgia, and paper and pulp mills are already looking toward this section for this reason. We feel, therefore, that a study of the possibilities of slash pine for paper making would be of great value not only to this section but to the manufacturers in other sections of the country, who on account of the depletion of raw materials in their present territory are seeking new fields for their business. The utilization of these vast resources, which have so long been idle, will mean employment for thousands of people and will be of great benefit in many other ways.

We thank you for your careful consideration of these matters and trust that the House committee will find it possible to recommend that these appropriations be included in the Agricultural appropriation bill.

THE ROCKY MOUNTAIN NATIONAL PARK

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD and to insert therewith a certified copy of the law of the Colorado Legislature ceding to the Federal Government jurisdiction over the Rocky Mountain National Park and also the act we passed the other day accepting the cession of the park.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Colorado?

There was no objection.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Mr. Speaker, under the express leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include a certified copy of the act of the General Assembly of the State of Colorado, "To cede to the United States of America exclusive jurisdiction over the Rocky Mountain National Park in the State of Colorado," which was duly passed and approved by Governor Adams, of my State, on February 19, 1929, and is now a State law, as follows:

STATE OF COLORADO,
OFFICE OF THE SECRETARY OF STATE.

UNITED STATES OF AMERICA,
State of Colorado, ss:

I, Chas. M. Armstrong, secretary of state of the State of Colorado, do hereby certify that the annexed is a full, true, and complete copy of house bill 44, which was filed in this office on the 20th day of February, A. D. 1929, at 2 o'clock p. m.

By A. G. SNEDEKER, Deputy.

House bill 44 (by Representatives Burchfield, Johnson (Moffat), and Beggs) to cede to the United States of America exclusive jurisdiction over the Rocky Mountain National Park in the State of Colorado

Be it enacted by the General Assembly of the State of Colorado:

SECTION 1. Exclusive jurisdiction shall be, and the same is hereby, ceded to the United States of America over and within all of the territory which is now included in that tract of land in the State of Colorado set aside and dedicated for park purposes by the United States, known as the Rocky Mountain National Park, saving, however, to the State of Colorado the right to serve civil or criminal process within the limits of the aforesaid park in suits or prosecutions for or on account of rights acquired, obligations incurred, or crimes committed outside of said park, and saving further to the said State the right to tax persons and corporations, their franchises, and property on the lands included in said tracts, and saving also to the persons residing in said park now or hereafter the right to vote at all elections held within the county or counties in which said tracts are situated; and saving to all persons residing within said park upon lands now privately owned within said park access to and from such lands, and all rights and privileges as citizens of the United States, and saving to the people of Colorado all vested, appropriated, and existing water rights and rights of way connected therewith, including all existing irrigation conduits and ditches: Provided, however, That jurisdiction shall not vest in the United States now or hereafter over any lands included within said park until the United States, through its proper officers, notifies the State of Colorado through its governor that the United States assumes police jurisdiction over the respective tracts involved.

ROYAL W. CALKINS,
Speaker of the House of Representatives.
GEORGE M. CORLETT,
President of the Senate.

Approved February 19, 1929, 2.30 p. m.

WM. H. ADAMS,
Governor of the State of Colorado.

I also include herewith a copy of H. R. 17101, which I prepared with the approval of the Interior Department, and introduced on behalf of the State of Colorado. It is practically the same as the act accepting the Mesa Verde National Park. It was duly passed in this form and approved by the President on yesterday, March 2, 1929, and is Public Law No. 1009, as follows:

An act to accept the cession by the State of Colorado of exclusive jurisdiction over the lands embraced within the Rocky Mountain National Park, and for other purposes

Be it enacted, etc., That the provisions of the act of the Legislature of the State of Colorado, approved February 19, 1929, ceding to the United States exclusive jurisdiction over the territory embraced and included within the Rocky Mountain National Park, are hereby accepted, and sole and exclusive jurisdiction is hereby assumed by the United States over such territory, saving, however, to the State of Colorado the right to serve civil or criminal process within the limits of the aforesaid park in suits or prosecutions for or on account of rights acquired, obligations incurred, or crimes committed outside of said park; and saving further to the said State the right to tax persons and corporations, their franchises and property on the lands included in said tract; and saving also to the persons residing in said park now or hereafter the right to vote at all elections held within the county or counties in which said tracts are situated; and saving to all persons residing within said park upon lands now privately owned within said park access to and from such lands, and all rights and privileges as citizens of the State of Colorado; and saving to the people of Colorado all vested, appropriated, and existing water rights and rights of way connected therewith, including all existing irrigation conduits and ditches. All the laws applicable to places under the sole and exclusive jurisdiction of the United States shall have force and effect in said park. All fugitives from justice taking refuge in said park shall be subject to the same laws as refugees from justice found in the State of Colorado.

SEC. 2. That said park shall constitute a part of the United States judicial district for the State of Colorado, and the district court of the United States in and for said district shall have jurisdiction of all offenses committed within said boundaries.

SEC. 3. That if any offense shall be committeed in the Rocky Mountain National Park, which offense is not prohibited or the punishment for which is not specifically provided for by any law of the United States, the offender shall be subject to the same punishment as the laws of the State of Colorado in force at the time of the commission of the offense may provide for a like offense in said State; and no subsequent repeal of any such law of the State of Colorado shall affect any prosecution for said offense committed within said park.

SEC. 4. That all hunting or the killing, wounding, or capturing at any time of any wild bird or animal, except dangerous animals when it is necessary to prevent them from destroying human lives or inflicting personal injury, is prohibited within the limits of said park; nor shall any fish be taken out of the waters of the park in any other way than by hook and line, and then only at such seasons and in such times and manner as may be directed by the Secretary of the Interior. That the Secretary of the Interior shall make and publish such general rules and regulations as he may deem necessary and proper for the management and care of the park and for the protection of the property therein, especially for the preservation from injury or spoliation of all timber, natural curiosities, or wonderful objects within said park, and for the protection of the animals and birds in the park from capture or destruction, and to prevent their being frightened or driven from the park; and he shall make rules and regulations governing the taking of fish from the streams or lakes in the park. Possession within said park of the dead bodies, or any part thereof, of any wild bird or animal shall be prima facie evidence that the person or persons having the same are guilty of violating this act. Any person or persons, or stage or express company, or railway company, who knows or has reason to believe that they were taken or killed contrary to the provisions of this act and who receives for transportation any of said animals, birds, or fish so killed, caught, or taken, or who shall violate any of the provisions of this act or any rule or regulation that may be promulgated by the Secretary of the Interior with reference to the management and care of the park or for the protection of the property therein, for the preservation from injury or spoliation of timber, natural curiosities, or wonderful objects within said park, or for the protection of the animals, birds, or fish in the park, or who shall within said park commit any damage, injury, or spoliation to or upon any building, fence, hedge, gate, guidepost, tree, wood, underwood, timber, garden, crops, vegetables, plants, land, springs, natural curiosities, or other matter or thing growing or being thereon or situated therein, shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor and shall be subject to a fine of not more than $500 or imprisonment not exceeding six months, or both, and be adjudged to pay all costs of the proceedings.

SEC. 5. That all guns, traps, teams, horses, or means of transportation of every nature or description used by any person or persons within said park limits when engaged in killing, trapping, ensnaring, or capturing such wild beasts, birds, or animals shall be forfeited to the United States and may be seized by the officers in said park and held pending the prosecution of any person or persons arrested under charge of violating the provisions of this act, and upon conviction under this act of such person or persons using said guns, traps, teams, horses, or other means of transportation, such forfeiture shall be adjudicated as a penalty in addition to the other punishment provided in this act. Such forfeited property shall be disposed of and accounted for by and under the authority of the Secretary of the Interior.

SEC. 6. That the United States District Court for the State of Colorado shall appoint a commissioner who shall reside in the park and who shall have jurisdiction to hear and act upon all complaints made of any violations of law or of the rules and regulations made by the Secretary of the Interior for the government of the park and for the protection of the animals, birds, and fish, and objects of interest therein, and for other purposes authorized by this act.

Such commissioner shall have power, upon sworn information, to issue process in the name of the United States for the arrest of any person charged with the commission of any misdemeanor, or charged with a violation of the rules and regulations, or with a violation of any of the provisions of this act prescribed for the government of said park and for the protection of the animals, birds, and fish in said park, and to try the person so charged, and, if found guilty, to impose punishment and to adjudge the forfeiture prescribed.

In all cases of conviction an appeal shall lie from the judgment of said commissioner to the United States District Court for the State of Colorado, and the United States district court in said district shall prescribe the rules of procedure and practice for said commissioner in the trial of cases and for appeal to said United States district court.

SEC. 7. That such commissioner shall also have power to issue process as hereinbefore provided for the arrest of any person charged with the commission within said boundaries of any criminal offense not covered by the provisions of section 4 of this act to hear the evidence introduced, and if he is of opinion that probable cause is shown for holding the person so charged for trial shall cause such person to be safely conveyed to a secure place of confinement within the jurisdiction of the United States District Court for the State of Colorado, and certify a transcript of the record of his proceedings and the testimony in the case to said court, which court shall have jurisdiction of the case: Provided, That the said commissioner shall grant bail in all cases bailable under the laws of the United States or of said State.

SEC. 8. That all process issued by the commissioner shall be directed to the marshal of the United States for the district of Colorado, but nothing herein contained shall be so construed as to prevent the arrest by any officer or employee of the Government or any person employed by the United States in the policing of said reservation within said boundaries without process of any person taken in the act of violating the law or this act or the regulations prescribed by the said Secretary as aforesaid.

SEC. 9. That the commissioner provided for in this act shall be paid an annual salary as appropriated for by Congress, payable quarterly: Provided, That the said commissioner shall reside within the exterior boundaries of said Rocky Mountain National Park, at a place to be designated by the court making such appointment: And provided further, That all fees, costs, and expenses collected by the commissioner shall be disposed of as provided in section 11 of this act.

SEC. 10. That all fees, costs, and expenses arising in cases under this act and properly chargeable to the United States shall be certified, approved, and paid as are like fees, costs, and expenses in the courts of the United States.

SEC. 11. That all fines and costs imposed and collected shall be deposited by said commissioner of the United States, or the marshal of the United States collecting the same, with the clerk of the United States District Court for the State of Colorado.

SEC. 12. That the Secretary of the Interior shall notify, in writing, the Governor of the State of Colorado, of the passage and approval of this act.

Approved, March 2, 1929.

That act of the Colorado Legislature and this act of Congress terminates, I trust, a misunderstanding that has existed between some of the people of the State and the officials of the Interior Department for the past 14 years. And as I have been an active advocate of the creation and supporter of this park for nearly 20 years, I hope it may not be inappropriate to also include as a part of the early background of this matter, a brief statement to show that Colorado has now fully complied with her obligations to the Federal Government, as follows:

A STATEMENT ABOUT ROCKY MOUNTAIN NATIONAL PARK

By Congressman EDWARD T. TAYLOR, as prepared by him for the Middle Park Times, Hot Sulphur Springs, Colo.

In January, 1915, I reported out of the Public Lands Committee and passed through the House of Representatives the bill creating that park. Both the committee and the House were at that time very strongly opposed to the creation of any more national parks. The only way I could induce that committee, of which I was a member, to permit me to favorably report the bill was by presenting a most overwhelming demand from Colorado for it. Governors Ammons and Carlson, Senators Thomas and Shafroth, Enos Mills, and many others appeared before the committee and urged the passage of the bill, and we all very positively promised and guaranteed that the State of Colorado would convey to the Federal Government the same jurisdiction that the other States conveyed to the national parks within their borders.

Practically all the newspapers of the State vigorously supported the bill.

No Colorado bill before Congress has ever had a more unanimous and hearty approval of the entire State than that duplicate bill of Senator Thomas and myself establishing that park.

The committee would not have considered the bill for a minute if there had been the slightest question about that matter.

I also presented resolutions from business men's organizations all over Colorado and a memorial from the Colorado Legislature, all appealing to Congress to pass that bill and faithfully promising to promptly comply with all the requirements of Congress and the Federal Government.

All these hearings and appeals were printed and make a pamphlet of some 50 pages.

There was no equivocation about it. Our pledges to the Federal Government were plain and emphatic. We had the authority to do so and we officially spoke for the State of Colorado and all her citizens, and we did so, and the committee and Congress relied upon that written and official promise and guaranty.

When I called the bill up on the floor of the House a great many Members attacked it and we had a running-fire debate for some two or three hours, and under the rules of the House I had to obtain the unanimous consent of the House to pass the bill at all. So I was absolutely compelled to not only renew all the pledges we had all made to the Public Lands Committee, but had to further agree that Colorado and the counties would build the Fall River Road and that we would never ask for more than $10,000 a year for the park unless Congress thereafter permitted us to do so. The bill would have been killed in a minute many different times if I had not promptly agreed to and guaranteed that Colorado would comply with every one of these promises, and I did so and passed the bill upon those definite and positive assurances.

The whole State was delighted when the bill passed. Practically everybody knew the conditions upon which I secured the passage, and for 10 years thereafter no one disputed my authority to pledge the State of Colorado to comply with those conditions.

Now, it is nearly 14 years since those definite official pledges were made. Colorado can not afford to be held out to the world as repudiating her own agreements.

Colorado should either comply with the express conditions upon which she obtained that park, or she should at once memorialize Congress by our legislature to repeal that law and revert that land back to the forest reserve from which it was taken.

* * * * * * *

This Coolidge administration and the Interior Department and the Bureau of the Budget and Congress and the Appropriations Committees of both House and Senate have all emphatically determined that not a dollar more money will be spent on any road in any national park unless and until the Federal Government has jurisdiction over it. * * *

* * * * * * *

When President Wilson on January 26, 1915, signed that bill officially creating that park and presented me the pen he used, I said to him:

"Mr. President, that park is situated on top of the great Continental Divide of the Western Hemisphere, and when it becomes properly improved and the great traveling public can stand upon the very crest of this great Republic and look as far as human vision can see toward both the Atlantic and Pacific Oceans it will become one of the most scenic and popular parks in the world."

President Wilson said: "I hope, Mr. TAYLOR, your prophecy will come true." And I have ever since hoped that every loyal son and daughter of this Centennial State would help bring about the realization of that prophecy. CONDITION OF INDIAN SCHOOLS

Mr. COLTON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by printing a brief statement on the condition of the Indian schools in my home county.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. COLTON. Mr. Speaker, under the leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following statement on the condition of Indian schools in my home country:

VERNAL, UTAH, February 11, 1929.

Congressman DON B. COLTON,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: We, the undersigned, have this day made an inspection of the various departments of the Indian school at Whiterocks, Utah, and beg to report as follows:

The schoolrooms were well lighted, ventilated, heated, and equipped for carrying on good school work. The large lecture room and the gymnasium provide ample opportunity for wholesome recreation and physical development.

The health charts of the Indian children were examined while school was in session, thereby giving an opportunity to observe each child while the charts were being studied, and we are pleased to report that the children were making very satisfactory progress. Not only did the charts prove that the children were making satisfactory gains, but the children themselves appeared bright, robust, and healthy.

The dining rooms were very sanitary and convenient. The large kitchen and bakery adjoining gave evidence that an abundance of clean, wholesome food was being supplied.

Each child was well dressed in clean, well-fitting, comfortable clothing, and a visit to the clothing rooms gave evidence that they were amply supplied with everything that a child could expect in the way of clothing.

A visit to the commissaries showed that good judgment has been used in purchasing supplies both as to quality and quantity. It was clean, well housed, and protected.

The laundry and sewing rooms showed that proper consideration was being given the children's clothing, as they were being washed and mended, and best of all, the children themselves were helping with this work.

We found the dormitories clean, well ventilated, and provided with plenty of beds and bedding for the comfort of the children.

We found the workshop for the boys decidedly lacking in modern conveniences and equipment, and it is our opinion that this phase of the Indians' education should receive next consideration.

While the superintendent's office and the employees' buildings showed no signs of luxury, they were comfortable and well kept.

It was a delightful sight to see the Indian children during the time they were out of class work. Some of the girls were busy in the kitchen, others in the dining room, sewing room, or bakery, while others were lounging about reading magazines, listening to music, or playing games. The boys, likewise, were helping with the milking, feeding pigs, chopping wood, getting coal, or doing some other worthwhile work, while others were enjoying peaceful recreation, knowing full well that their turn at the chores would soon come, for we were advised that each child was detailed periodically to some one of the tasks about the school.

In general, we found conditions at the Whiterocks Indian Boarding School very good.

Very respectfully,

ROBERT L. PIXTON,
Principal of Uintah High School.
W. B. WALLACE,
Manager of Vernal Express.
BEATRICE BAILEY,
Primary Supervisor of Uintah Schools.
ALICE E. PEDERSEN,
District Home Demonstration Agent.
E. PETERSON,
County Agricultural Agent.

REPEAL OF THE EIGHTEENTH AMENDMENT

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks on a memorial passed by the Massachusetts Legislature and also to incorporate therein a copy of the memorial.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Massachusetts?

There was no objection.

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Speaker, under the laws of the Commonwealth of Massachusetts are provisions permitting questions of public concern to be submitted, upon petition of a certain number of registered voters, to the voters of a representative or senatorial district for an expression of public opinion thereon. The purposes of this law are twofold:

First. To secure an expression of public opinion.

Second. To instruct their members of the State legislature, whether of the lower or upper branch, as the case may be, as to the views of the people of his district on this question.

The objects of such a wise law is apparent; in addition to informing their legislators of the prevailing opinion, it tends to keep government close to the people, which is one of the fundamental principles of the Democratic Party and of democratic government. The frequent use by the voters of Massachusetts of this so-called public opinion law has clearly evidenced its usefulness and effectiveness.

The provisions of this law not only require, as a condition precedent, the securing of a certain number of signatures of registered voters, but it also provides for the submission of the proposed question to the attorney general of the Commonwealth, an elective official, for determination as to whether or not it is a proper subject to be submitted as provided in said law, if it is in such form as to be clearly understood by the average voter, and also if in every other respect it conforms with the general provisions of the public opinion act. The duty is strictly a legal one. Thereafter the question to be submitted is placed upon the ballot in the districts in which the necessary names are secured, or in the districts that it is desired to have the question presented to the voters for their expression.

In accordance with the provisions of the public opinion law, which I have briefly referred to, there was submitted at the last general election held in Massachusetts in November, 1928, to the voters of 36 out of the 40 senatorial districts the following question, viz:

Shall the senator from this district be instructed to vote for a resolution requesting Congress to take action for the repeal of the eighteenth amendment to the Constitution of the United States, known as the prohibition amendment?

Upon this question 1,130,007 voters in the 36 districts voted thereon, the results being as follows, namely:

Affirmative vote	707,352
Negative vote	422,655
Majority in favor of senators voting for resolution memorializing Congress in favor of repeal of eighteenth amendment	284,697

The above vote clearly shows the decisive manner in which the voters of Massachusetts expressed themselves on this important national issue. The issue was plain, clearly understood, expressed in a manner incapable of misunderstanding, and the voters went to the polls after an intensive campaign, particularly on the part of those who espoused the cause of prohibition. The people of Massachusetts believe in our dual system of government; they realize the dangers of a highly centralized federalized government. They also realize the other conditions that have naturally resulted from the eighteenth amendment and the passage of the national prohibition act and which are not conducive to the best interests of American society and institutions. It is not my intention to discuss this aspect in detail at this time; simply to make brief reference to it.

Following the decisive and unmistakable action of the voters there was introduced in the Massachusetts Legislature a resolution to carry out the instructions of the voters. The Massachusetts Senate comprises a membership of 40, among which are included 31 Republicans and 9 Democrats. On February 6, 1928, by a standing vote of 26 to 6, of which membership voting in the affirmative 19 were Republicans, the following resolution was adopted, namely:

THE COMMONWEALTH OF MASSACHUSETTS,
SENATE CHAMBER, STATE HOUSE,
Boston, Mass., February 8, 1929.

Hon. JOHN W. McCORMACK,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

SIR: I have the honor to transmit herewith a copy of resolutions adopted by the Massachusetts Senate on Wednesday, February 6, 1929.

Yours very sincerely,

WILLIAM H. SANGER, Clerk.

Senate No. 256

THE COMMONWEALTH OF MASSACHUSETTS,
In the year 1929.

Resolutions requesting Congress to take action for the repeal of the eighteenth amendment to the Federal Constitution, known as the prohibition amendment

Whereas there was placed on the official ballot used in 36 of the 40 senatorial districts of the Commonwealth at the State election in November, 1928, under the provisions of sections 19 to 22, inclusive, of chapter 53 of the general laws, the following question:

"Shall the senator from this district be instructed to vote for a resolution requesting Congress to take action for the repeal of the eighteenth amendment to the Constitution of the United States, known as the prohibition amendment?"; and

Whereas a plurality of the votes cast in 34 of said 36 districts was in favor of such instruction; and

Whereas the total affirmative vote on said question in said 36 districts was 707,352, the total negative vote on said question in said districts was 422,655, and the total number of persons voting at said election in said districts who did not vote on said question was 310,244: Accordingly be it

Resolved, That the Senate of the Commonwealth of Massachusetts, in view of the vote taken as aforesaid under the statutes of the Commonwealth and the results of said vote, respectfully requests Congress to take action for the repeal of the eighteenth amendment to the Constitution of the United States, known as the prohibition amendment; and be it further

Resolved, That the clerk of the senate be directed to transmit to the presiding officers of both branches of the Congress of the United States and to the Massachusetts Members thereof duly certified copies of these resolutions.

A true copy. Attest:

WILLIAM H. SANGER, Clerk.

The above resolution, without further comment at this time, speaks for itself.

WILL R. WOOD,
LOUIS C. CRAMTON,
JOSEPH W. BYRNS,
Managers on the part of the House.

Mr. WOOD. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. BYRNS].

Mr. BYRNS. Mr. Speaker, I signed this conference report as one of the conferees of the House, and also the conference report on the second deficiency bill, which was passed by the House on yesterday.

There are a number of amendments in this bill and also in the preceding bill which I personally did not wholly favor, but a conference carries with it the idea of compromise between the two Houses, and it was extremely important, of course, that these bills should be passed, since they carry certain appropriations that are vital to the running of the Government; and it would have been not necessarily a disaster, but rather unfortunate if some of them were not made before the Congress adjourns.

I have asked for this time simply to explain my position with reference to one particular matter which appears in this bill and in the other bill.

This bill carries the sum of $1,719,000 in round numbers for the enforcement of prohibition. This bill, together with the second deficiency bill, carries the sum, in round numbers, of $3,227,000 as an additional sum for various law agencies in the the enforcement of the prohibition and narcotic laws.

As gentlemen of the House know, I very vigorously and earnestly supported an amendment providing for $24,000,000 in addition, and I have not abandoned my views as to the advisability of appropriating that amount; but the House by a very large majority voted otherwise, and as your conferee, of course, it was my duty to cheerfully accept the instructions of the House, and I did so. But I am gratified that the fight that has been made for additional appropriations has brought to the attention of the Congress and the country the fact that something additional is needed in order to enable the Government to make an earnest and honest effort to enforce the prohibition laws and that the administration and Treasury Department were forced by public sentiment to submit additional estimates for appropriations, which it is admitted have been needed but which heretofore have not been asked for. I am hopeful that the sum which has been appropriated will aid greatly in that effort, and I hope that the incoming President, when he takes his place as President of the United States and has an opportunity to make the survey which is provided in one of these bills, will come before the Congress and tell the Congress exactly what is needed, both as to additional funds and additional legislation, if the result of his survey and his study causes him to believe that either or both is needed.

There are other amendments in this bill and in the preceding bill that I would like to refer to, but this Congress is about to adjourn, there is much business on the Speaker's table, and I shall refrain from doing so and content myself with this explanation of my position in signing this conference report in view of the previous action taken by me as an individual Member of the House. [Applause.]

Mr. WOOD. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CRAMTON].

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Speaker, Congress exercises no more important function than the appropriation of money. The way it exercises that function determines the extent of Federal taxation.

The House has just won a notable victory for the cause of good government. Through the action of the House, it has been reaffirmed that when we are treating of the people's money and the Treasury of the United States, we are going to act in a businesslike way rather than to be carried away by ill-considered enthusiasm or hysteria. The controversy that has just been referred to by my friend from Tennessee [Mr. BYRNS] with reference to the Senate to appropriate $24,000,000 for prohibition enforcement without department request or program has attracted the attention of the country. The position of the House has been clearly expressed, that whatever money the administration requires and requests from Congress for the enforcement of national prohibition or any other function of the Government will be granted, but we must have before us evidence of their desire for the money and evidence of how they propose to use it. [Applause.]

The conference reports that have been brought in and have been accepted by the other body, appropriate every penny of increase for any arm of prohibition enforcement that is asked for by any branch of the Government and not one penny more. The appropriations made are on a business basis and not on the basis of personal enthusiasm, and I am saying this not in any partisan way; and this is to the credit of the House of Representatives. This body always has been and is now the conservative, sane legislative body that protects the Treasury of the United States and is at the call of the cause of good government at any time. [Applause.]

Mr. WOOD. Mr. Speaker, I yield three minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. LAGUARDIA].

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Speaker, I can not permit the gentleman from Michigan to close this controversy without at least having my say. The gentleman from Michigan works up to a climax and talks about economy and protecting the Treasury. Protecting the Treasury and prohibition are inconsistent. You can not have both. The minute you have law enforcement and prohibition—and we must all necessarily be for law enforcement as long as it is on the statute books—you must abandon all hope for protecting the Treasury.

Gentlemen, as I have said so many times before, this is a national law and you can not commence to enforce it in 48 States of the Union among 120,000,000 people with a paltry $19,000,000. It seems that all the dry leaders care about is enforcement in New York City. Why, it will cost that much to stop the gap at the great port of entry, the fair city of Detroit, in the State which the gentleman represents.

Let us be perfectly frank about it. It behooves the drys of the House to stand up courageously and demand the hundreds of millions of dollars it will require to enforce prohibition, and as they fail to do it, demonstrating the impossibility of enforcement, it is our right to seek through proper, constitutional, and legislative channels a change in the law.

Mr. CRAMTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. I yield.

Mr. CRAMTON. I hope the time will come when the State of New York and the city of New York will share their proper responsibility in that matter.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Let enforcement and prohibition, like charity, begin at home.

Mr. DENISON. When the gentleman gets to be mayor of New York, is he going to take the same position? [Laughter.]

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Speaker, I yield back the balance of my time. [Laughter.]

Mr. WOOD. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the conference report.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the conference report.

The conference report was agreed to.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, I send to the Clerk's desk Senate Joint Resolution 9, and ask for its immediate consideration.

The Clerk read the Senate joint resolution, as follows:

Senate joint resolution (S. J. Res. 9) to establish a joint commission on insular reorganization

Resolved, etc., That there is hereby established a joint congressional commission to be known as the joint commission on insular reorganization and to be composed of five Senators appointed by the President of the Senate, and five Members elect of the House of Representatives for the Seventy-first Congress, appointed by the Speaker of the House of Representatives. The commission is authorized and directed to make a careful study and examination of the various executive agencies of the Government engaged in the administration, supervision, and direction of matters pertaining to the insular possessions of the United States with a view to determining (1) the advisability of placing all such matters under the administration, supervision, and direction of one bureau or department of the Government, (2) the necessary and advisable transfers of executive functions to such bureau or department, and (3) a plan of organization for such bureau or department. The heads of the several executive departments and independent establishments shall, upon the request of the commission, detail representatives from their respective departments and establishments to assist the commission in such study and examination. The commission shall make a report in writing to the Congress, on or before December 16, 1929, which shall contain a complete statement of the results of such study and examination and recommendations for appropriate legislative or other action.

SEC. 2. The commission shall cease to exist upon the submission of its report to the Congress in accordance with the provisions of this resolution.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, this resolution provides for a commission of Members of the Senate and House to study the conditions that exist in our insular possessions. At the present time they are under three different departments—the Army, the Navy, and the Interior Department. For that reason there is considerable confusion, duplication, and unnecessary expense. It is hoped as a result of the study by this commission they may make some recommendations to the House and Senate that will be of advantage and that we will have greater economy and efficiency in running the insular possessions.

Mr. DENISON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SNELL. Yes.

Mr. DENISON. What is included in the term "insular possessions"?

Mr. SNELL. I suppose all of our island possessions.

Mr. DENISON. That does not include the Canal Zone?

Mr. SNELL. I would not think it did; I do not understand so.

Mr. DENISON. Does it take in Alaska?

Mr. SNELL. The Territories are not included.

Mr. RANKIN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SNELL. I yield.

Mr. RANKIN. I could not hear the question asked by the gentleman from Illinois: Does this resolution take in the Territories?

Mr. SNELL. It does not.

Mr. RANKIN. I wanted to know if it took in the Territories of Hawaii and Alaska?

Mr. SNELL. It does not take in the Canal Zone nor does it take in Hawaii or Alaska.

Mr. HOUSTON of Hawaii. Hawaii and Alaska are not possessions, they are Territories.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Hawaii is right. Hawaii and Alaska are not possessions, they are Territories.

Mr. RANKIN. Alaska and Hawaii are classed as Territories and not as insular possessions.

Mr. SNELL. I have just been informed by the Member who is the sponsor of the resolution that it does not include Territories.

Mr. RANKIN. That is the point I want to get at. The same conditions seem to prevail to a large extent in Alaska and in Hawaii as do in the Philippines and in Porto Rico with reference to the matters covered by this resolution, and while going into this proposition, if we are going to attempt to correct evils, why not correct those evils also in the Territories?

Mr. SNELL. I have no objection to that, but this is the resolution that has been passed by the Senate, and that has been passed by the House one or two other times. I have no objection to the Territories being included at some other time, but they are not included in this resolution.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SNELL. Yes.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. I do not think Territories ought to be included.

Mr. SNELL. They are not included.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. I understood the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. RANKIN] to suggest that the Territories might properly be included.

Mr. RANKIN. Yes.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. I think upon reflection the gentleman will believe the Territories ought not to be included. There is no bureau here now that has anything to do with Territories; that is, not in the way that the Bureau of Insular Affairs, for instance, deals with Porto Rico and with the Philippine Islands, and the way the Navy Department deals with the Virgin Islands, and so on. The gentleman would not want to bring the Territories under any sort of an administration, or control or bureau in the way that those possessions are now under the control of the bureau.

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, let me say to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GARRETT] in that connection, that we have various departments in control of certain activities in Alaska, and we have a situation there that is not satisfactory in that regard. I say that advisedly, because I have been on the Committee on Territories ever since I have been here.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Quite likely that is correct, but that ought to be remedied in some other way than by bringing the Territories under the control of the bureau such as the Bureau of Insular Affairs.

Mr. TILSON. Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman will yield, there are many matters that would apply in the case of Territories that would not apply at all in connection with the insular possessions. If the gentleman desires a study made of Territorial conditions, he should have a separate resolution. It should not be combined with the study of the insular possessions, because they do not relate to the same sort of things.

Mr. RANKIN. I understand that this is merely a commission to study the proposition. We have had more trouble with various bureaus and their activities in Alaska than we have had in the insular possessions.

Mr. TILSON. That may be an argument for a study of the situation in the Territories, but not to combine the two in one resolution.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, this resolution has the unanimous approval of the House Committee on Insular Affairs. I move the previous question.

Mr. HOUSTON of Hawaii. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, I can not yield any more. I move the previous question.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the third reading of the joint resolution.

The joint resolution was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

COMPACTS OR AGREEMENTS BETWEEN COLORADO AND UTAH RESPECTING THE WATERS OF THE COLORADO AND OTHER RIVERS

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the bill H. R. 7028, granting the consent of Congress to compacts or agreements between the States of Colorado and Utah with respect to the division and apportionment of the waters of the Colorado, Green, Bear and Yampa, the White, San Juan, and Dolores Rivers and all other streams in which such States are jointly interested, with Senate amendments thereto, and disagree to the Senate amendments.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Colorado asks unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the bill H. R. 7028, with Senate amendments thereto, and disagree to the Senate amendments.

The Clerk will report the title of the bill and the Senate amendments.

The Clerk reported the title of the bill and the Senate amendment.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The question is on disagreeing to the Senate amendments.

The Senate amendments were disagreed to.

REPORTS BY CITIZENS' COMMITTEES ON INDIAN AFFAIRS

Mr. LEAVITT. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to include in my remarks on Indian Affairs various communications that I have received from various reservations.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. LEAVITT. Mr. Speaker, under leave granted I submit for the RECORD the reports of various committees of citizens of Montana regarding the conditions, particularly in schools where Indian children of that State are being educated. These reports cover matters on the Blackfeet, Fort Peck, Fort Belknap, Tongue River, Rocky Boy, and Crow Reservations in the second congressional district of Montana, and they are submitted by men of high standing with whom I am acquainted and for whose integrity I vouch.

The report for the Crow Reservation is submitted by A. H. Roush, Dr. S. H. Labbitt, and Carl Rankin, of Hardin, Mont. It is as follows:

HARDIN, MONT., March 5, 1929.

Supt. C. H. ASBURY,
Crow Agency, Mont.

DEAR SIR: Pursuant to your letter of February 23, with which you inclosed a copy of Circular No. 2551 from the Indian Bureau, we respectfully submit the following report based upon rather long familiarity with the Crow Reservation and upon investigation and inquiry that we have just made. You will realize that it has been impossible for this committee to visit various parts of the reservation owing to the impassable condition of the roads.

SCHOOLS

There are no boarding schools on the Crow Indian Reservation. The Indian children attend the public schools together with the white children. They have the same teachers, are in the same classes, are subject to the same discipline, enjoying the same privileges, are transported to and from school in the same busses, and are in all ways subject to the same care and attention as the white children are. Except three small parochial day schools conducted by Jesuit priests and taught by their teachers, they are all required to attend public school regularly. They are examined periodically by the school physician or nurse, and conditions regarding trachoma, tuberculosis, contagious diseases, tonsillar affections, defects in hearing and eyesight are noted and reported to the proper authorities for treatment and correction.

The superintendent, Mr. Asbury, is, and has been for the past nine years, a member of the board of trustees for the school district 17–H, which comprises a considerable portion of the reservation. A member of your committee is also serving on the same board of trustees and he can truthfully say that the school interests of the Crow children in this district are very well cared for.

FINANCES

In 1921 there was set aside from the tribal moneys a sum of $50,000 as a revolving reimbursable fund, which is loaned to the individual Indian for the purchase of livestock, implements, seed grain, and for farm improvements such as fences, barns, and other items necessary to carry on their farming projects. The individual Indian gets the use of this fund at an initial cost of 5 per cent, which is the only charge. It can be drawn upon with the recommendation of the district farmer and the approval of the superintendent. It is reimbursed from the income from the sale of crops and the rentals accruing to the Indian who borrowed from it. The high points in the operation of this fund occurred in 1921, during which year there was $40,883.78 expended and $11.50 collected, and in 1924 when there was $6,140.40 expended and $26,306.34 collected. This fund is deposited in the Treasury at Washington and drawn upon by United States Treasury checks.

The moneys belonging to the individual Indians are deposited in local banks where time deposits bear interest at the rate of 3½ per cent and checking accounts 3 per cent. Any Indian can obtain knowledge of the amount of money deposited to his credit upon application to the agency office and draw on his account at the request of the district farmer in his district with the approval of the superintendent. The aged, decrepit, or crippled Indians are cared for from their individual funds, from which they receive a stated sum paid each month, usually $25.

FARMING

The Crow Reservation is divided into six farm districts, each one of which is supervised by a district farmer who has passed a civil-service examination. His duties are to supervise the farming operations of the Indians in his district; to advise in the selection and purchase of livestock, implements, and seed; to assist in leasing the farm lands and to see that the lessees comply with the terms of their contracts; to assist and supervise in the division of crops where farms are leased for crop shares. The Indians who are adjudged competent attend to the management of their own allotments, also the lands of their minor children. The records show a steady increase in the acreage farmed, improvement in methods, and ability to manage their farming operations. The members of your committee are personally acquainted with the district farmers and believe them to be competent and intelligent men who attend to their business and are interested in the progress of the Indians in their line of work.

HOMES

There are three field matrons employed whose duties are to advise and assist in the management of homes; to teach canning, cooking, sewing, and the care of infants. The Indian women are appreciative and responsive to this instruction and have made great improvement in the management of their homes. Their exhibits of canned vegetables, preserved fruits, jellies, and sewing at the county fairs are worthy of note.

There have been many 2 to 4 room cottages built on the Indian farms in the past few years, probably aggregating around 100; and good drilled wells have been provided at many of these homes and there has been an increased interest in the proper furnishing of the homes.

The management of the reservation has contributed part of the salary of the county club agent of Big Horn County, who has organized 4–H Clubs among the Indian boys and sewing clubs among the girls. The girls are especially appreciative and have shown great aptitude in this work.

HEALTH

Three physicians and one field nurse are employed who are at all times available when their services are required. There is a 30-bed hospital located at Crow Agency. The management pays for X ray and surgical work required when the physicians who are regularly employed can not take care of the cases. The Indians very much appreciate this service and gladly avail themselves of it. They use the hospital freely for maternity and surgical cases, and the death rate compares very favorably with other institutions of this size.

Recently a survey of this reservation has been made for trachoma and all cases have been encouraged to come in for operation, which operations have been approved and recommended by the United States Public Health Service for trachoma and its complications. A great many have availed themselves of this opportunity. An Indian is superstitious as to death and formerly would desert his house and abandon the premises where one of their number had died; whereas now their frequent use of the hospital is eloquent testimony of their treatment and good results.

LEASES

All leasing operation on this reservation is on a competitive basis, with the right of the original lessee to meet the high bid if he so desires and is competent and desirable. Individual Indians who have leased their lands may obtain their rent money as soon as the same is paid, and the district farmer then distributes the checks to the various Indians immediately. The revenue from the tribal-land lease is distributed annually to all members of the tribe. The committee upon further investigation finds the interest of the Indian owner very carefully and fully protected to derive the most revenue possible.

CONCLUSION

The time given your committee to make this survey would be inadequate were it not that each member has been living on the reservation for years and has had opportunity to observe conditions and note changes. One member has lived on or near the reservation since 1891; has served as county assessor for eight years, as county commissioner for two years, worked in a bank at Lodge Grass, and managed a bank at St. Xavier.

One member has been a resident physician and surgeon in Hardin for nine years and consulting surgeon on this reservation and United States employees' designated physician for United States Compensation Commission.

One member has served as county clerk for 10 years and resided on the reservation at Crow Agency for 6 years prior to this time.

In conclusion, your committee finds that the management of the Crow Reservation is economically managed in the interest of the Indian at all times, with very small cost to the Indians as a tribe. Educational advantages are the same as for the white people. The finances of the tribe as a whole and of the individual Indian are safeguarded and protected carefully with the view to educate them as fast as possible to assume financial responsibility. Actual farming by the Indians shows a great improvement over a period of years. Home life and living conditions show the most marked improvement due to the interest taken by them in the educational plans in operation on the reservation, which for years past have been followed by the white population and copied by a large percentage of the tribe. Their health is carefully protected and supervised, being on a par with the white people. The managing authorities of the reservation have been in full cooperation with the county authorities in all matters pertaining to public improvements, with the full consent and approval of the Indians.

Your committee desires to acknowledge the courtesy of employees and the help of clerks in the office in connection with this investigation.

Respectfully submitted this 5th day of March, 1929.

The Tongue River Reservation is the home of the Northern Cheyennes. The report is made by Edw. T. Cahill, E. E. Hynchman, and D. T. Deverill, and reads:

BUSBY, MONT., February 11, 1929.

Mr. C. B. LOHMILLER,
Superintendent Tongue River Agency, Lame Deer, Mont.

DEAR MR. LOHMILLER: We, the undersigned, in compliance with your request, have this 11th day of February, 1929, made a thorough investigation of the Tongue River Boarding School, and respectfully submit the following as our report on conditions as found by us at said school:

FOOD

We visited the dining room at noon and the following menu was on the table: Boiled beef, boiled potatoes, gravy, sweet corn, bread, peaches for dessert, and milk to drink. Apparently there was plenty of food on each table and it was well cooked.

The children appeared to be well nourished. We found the kitchen nice and clean and the cook appeared to be efficient.

Inspection was made of the warehouse or commissary, and an abundant supply of food was found, which was in excellent condition and stored in a good building. These supplies consisted of the following: Beef, 8 or 10 freshly slaughtered hogs, beans, dried peas, hominy, rolled oats, corn flakes, flour, dried and canned fruit, sugar, lard, sirup, cocoa, etc. The quality of all food appeared to be of the best.

CLOTHING

The individual lockers in the building contained each child's clothing, which consisted of extraheavy underwear for both girls and boys, work and school dresses for the girls, and heavy corduroy suits for the boys. The girls each have a woolen cape and a warm, blue serge Sunday uniform. The boys each have a wool uniform for Sunday and a heavy mackinaw. Each child is provided with two pairs of overshoes during the school year. All these items of clothing were in the lockers. The clothing was of good quality and the children appeared neat and contented. An abundant supply of clothing was also found in the commissary, same consisting of shoes, boys' uniforms, underwear, dress goods, etc.

HOUSING CONDITIONS

Inspection was made of both the girls' and boys' dormitories, and same were found to be well ventilated, steam heated, clean linen was on each bed, and each bed was provided with four blankets. The matron informed us that the linen was changed once a week. All dormitories were apparently well kept and sanitary.

The schoolrooms were well heated, but one of the two of them were very crowded. The basement of the building is used as playrooms for the children. The need of a gymnasium or large recreation room is very evident.

Both boys and girls have a bathroom, wash room, and toilet facilities.

Your attention is invited to the fact that a combination gymnasium and school building should be constructed, as the classrooms are now in the dormitory building, and studies are more or less interrupted by the noise and other activities of those out of the classrooms.

The school plant is lighted by a Delco light system, which is old and worn out and at times, we are told, breaks down and the plant is unlighted. This condition prevailed at the time the investigation was being made.

MEDICAL ATTENTION

A supply of medicine and emergency equipment is kept at the school. The matron is a practical nurse. The agency physician is located at Lame Deer, 22 miles distant from the school, and is connected by telephone and can be called when wanted.

Individual toothbrushes, towels, combs, and brushes were found in both the boys' and girls' wash rooms.

The children appeared to be healthy and contented. The principal informed us that only 14 cases of sickness occurred during the school year, and these consisted of light cases of the flu.

CRUELTY

A number of the students were personally interviewed, and they stated they were not whipped nor punished. They also stated they had plenty to eat and were well treated.

The employees appeared to be polite and kind-hearted.

We found 89 boys and girls at this school, and they appeared to be happy and contented, well fed and clothed, and housed, and the Tongue River Boarding School created a more favorable impression than other State institutions we have visited in the past.

In conclusion, the committee would state that the above has been arrived at after a conscientious and thorough investigation of conditions at this school.

Very truly yours,

INSPECTION MADE BY CITIZEN'S COMMITTEE OF THE BLACKFEET BOARDING SCHOOL ON FEBRUARY 8, 1929

GENERAL PLANT AND GROUPING OF BUILDINGS

The general arrangement of the buildings at the boarding school is in the nature of a square, the various buildings being grouped around an open court, which is about 150 yards in each direction. At the south end of this square are situated the hospital and physician's living quarters. On the east side are the school building and the boys' dormitory. On the north side are the employees' quarters and the principal's residence and office. On the west side is the girls' dormitory, which also contains the general dining room and kitchen. Behind the girls' dormitory is the bakery, the laundry, and the commissary building. To the southeast of the square at a distance of about 100 yards is the dairy barn and hog lot. Near the dairy barn is the residence of the farmer (incomplete). The hospital, of course, is not included in the actual school plant, but on account of its proximity it is mentioned because it has a definite bearing on the health of the children.

We found 136 children in the school, 54 being housed in the boys' dormitory, 71 in the girls' dormitory, and 11 in the hospital. Two of these last are confined to the hospital, one with frozen feet and the other with a severe case of impetigo. Four girls and four boys, who are classed as arrested pulmonary-tuberculosis cases, and one boy, with a rather severe heart condition, are housed and fed in the hospital, and go from there to attend classes in the school, but are not allowed to mingle with the other children or do any work.

DETAILED DESCRIPTION OF THE PHYSICAL PLANT, INCLUDING CONSTRUCTION AND EQUIPMENT

Dairy barn: We found that the dairy barn is a frame building of recent construction, and modern in every respect, and very adequate and plenty large for the use of this institution.

School building: We find the school building consists of a 4-room brick building, three rooms and the auditorium having been built a number of years ago and in not a good condition. There is a recent addition of one schoolroom to the school bulding, which in itself is good, but not complete. We find that the steam-heating system has not been carried to this new room, and that the same is heated with a stove, which leaves a part of the room very cold. In going over the heating system, we find an old obsolete boiler, wholly inadequate for the heating of the school building. We also find the system of heating mains in a very poor condition. We also find that there is very poor equipment in the new schoolroom, being composed of old desks that are broken and not at all substantial, together with tables and chairs to complete the seating of this room. We find that the basement windows are broken and out and frames filled with temporary boards for weatherproofing. The three schoolrooms and auditorium we find neatly painted, and general sanitary conditions equal to the average school, except that there are no toilet facilities in the school at all in the way of toilets, drinking fountains, or washing facilities. We find that the boy pupils from this school have to go to their dormitory for toilet facilities, there being only one toilet in the general toilet room, and one toilet on the second floor, for approximately 55 pupils. This by all means should be corrected and proper toilet facilities given the boys attending the school. These facilities apply as well to the girls, who have to go to the girls' dormitory for toilet facilities, approximately 200 yards.

Boys' dormitory: The boys' dormitory is an old brick building in very bad condition. We find the heating plant for this building in the same condition as that of the school, being totally inadequate for the heating of this building, the plumbing and heating mains leaking, and needing immediate work on same to make the building reasonably habitable. We find that the floors in this building, outside of the main hall on the first floor, are badly worn and very rough. The doors and windows badly fitted and not at all weatherproof. The plastering broken in many places. It is evident that the superintendent in charge has done everything possible within his means to make the building as sanitary as possible. As previously mentioned, there are not sufficient toilet facilities for the number of boy pupils, there being two stools on the first floor, one of which was out of order, and one stool on the second floor. Washing facilities with soap and hot water are provided in the wash room adjacent to the toilet on the first floor, but towels are provided only just previous to each meal. For this reason it is impossible for the pupils to wash their hands after casual visits to the toilet, as they are instructed to do. In the dormitory rooms the only equipment present are the beds themselves. There being no chairs, dressers, or other furniture at all. There were not even nails in the wall on which to hang the children's clothes; when they undressed they must lay their clothing across the foot of the bed. There were four of these bedrooms, and in some of them the beds were only 9 inches apart. The air space per pupil varied from 325 feet to 462 feet. Window space for lighting and ventilation is adequate in all rooms. Quite a few of the beds are occupied by two boys. There are sufficient beds to allot one to each pupil, but the doubling up is necessary because of the lack of blankets. The playrooms were entirely without equipment, except for three or four benches arranged around the walls. Not a single chair was seen in the whole boys' dormitory. Just off the boys' playroom is a room equipped with cupboards for the boys to keep their personal belongings. These cupboards being entirely without locks, and no provision made for the security of their belongings.

Girls' dormitory: We find that the girls' dormitory is a large brick building that has been built some years ago and in better condition than the two buildings previously mentioned. This building, aside from the flooring in the second-story hall, is in fairly good condition, considering the age of the building. In this building is the general dining room for all pupils and a kitchen, the same being equipped with a meat room, with ice storage adjacent thereto, which keeps the food in satisfactory condition. The plumbing in this building is old, obsolete plumbing and sadly in need of replacement. The heating seems to be adequate, but the same conditions prevail in regard to furniture for the girls' dormitory as previously set forth in the boys' dormitory, there being the same lack of towels in the basement toilet, the same lack of chairs and other equipment in the bedrooms and the playroom, and a serious deficiency of blankets, which necessitates quite a few of the girls sleeping two in a bed. The dining room arrangements are a number of tables seating eight children. Stools are used for seats and the dishes are aluminum.

Laundry: The laundry building is situated in the rear of the girls' dormitory, is an old brick building with obsolete laundry equipment. Included in this building is also the bakery, with equipment not much better than that in the laundry. In the lean-to to the rear of this building is the boiler room, furnishing the steam for the laundry and operation of the water-supply system. We find that the reservoir on the south end of the grounds, on the high bank, only provides 35 pounds water pressure, which is not sufficient for proper fire protection for the buildings at this plant. The laundry equipment, as before stated, being obsolete, is also dangerous, inasmuch as the mangle is not protected by proper guards for same; also there are not sufficient guards on belting running this machinery, which makes it dangerous for operation.

We also find that these buildings are served by sewer connected to a septic tank which is inadequate for the buildings.

PHYSICAL CONDITION OF CHILDREN

The storage of the food supply consists of the commissary building, which is rat and mouse proof, and the food is in very good condition, being free from contamination or insect infestation. The root cellar or pit for storage of green vegetables, while crude, is apparently efficient.

The children were found to be cheerful, reasonably clean, and well behaved. The weight charts in the various schoolrooms show that 26 out of the 136 children were 10 per cent or more underweight; none, however, were as much as 15 per cent underweight. This compares very favorably with the average public-school group. The children are weighed monthly, and the general average of gaining during the past five months is approximately 6 pounds per child. The children receive a regular weekly medical inspection besides frequent irregular inspections by the physician, and the teachers are instructed to constantly observe the condition of the pupils and to be particularly on the lookout for evidence of incipient sickness. Quite a few of the children show evidence of trachoma, which is under regular treatment of the physician in charge, and few show some evidence of impetigo, which is also being treated. No head lice were observed.

Food: Weekly menus are prepared by the matron and approved by the principal. The supply is apparently abundant and variety is adequate. Two green vegetables are usually furnished at the noon meal, besides the meat and potato ration. Butter is served at two meals daily. The dairy furnishes an average of about 250 pounds of milk a day, and this is used up entirely by the pupils and hospital patients. Each child receives at least a pint of milk a day, and sometimes more than this, as either raw milk or in cocoa.

Clothing: Each child is supplied with three union suits of winter underwear of sufficient weight. The boys have corduroy suits and caps, and the girls plain dresses and sweaters. All are provided with shoes and stockings, which seem to be in fair condition. In general, the clothing seems to be reasonably adequate and in good condition. Each child receives clean clothing and bed clothing once each week, and each child receives a shower bath under supervision each Saturday. Those who are in active work or athletics also bath at irregular intervals.

Instruction: The pupils are divided into seven grades for instruction, one teacher having the first grade and beginners, one the second and third grades, one the fourth, and one the fifth, sixth, and seventh grades. The teaching appears to be of an average order, being handicapped somewhat by shortages in equipment already mentioned. The expenditure of a very little in the schoolrooms would very materially increase the possibility of high-grade work on the part of the teachers. The school bell is broken and as a result there is considerable irregularity in the time of assembling and recess periods. The records of attendance are scarcely adequate or satisfactory. It is noted that all children are in school for a full school day, the work details and other assignments being assigned to them outside of regular school hours. A good-sized assembly hall is included in the school building, but the absence of any seating facilities makes its value doubtful. The hall is not large enough for indoor games, although some attempt has been made to play basketball in it.

Work details: Several of the larger boys assist in the farming operations and some slight shop work, and a number of the larger girls serve details in the laundry, general dining room, and kitchen and employees' mess. Girls also serve a detail in the sewing room, and all pupils apparently participate in the cleaning of the buildings. Work details, according to the best information available, are limited to not more than two or three hours daily, which does not seem to be at all excessive.

Recreation: The school seems sadly lacking in equipment for either organized or unorganized play. The rooms designated for indoor play are entirely bare of any equipment, and the one attempt at playground apparatus is useless, because the rings and swings are missing from the frames. A very creditable band is organized among the students, and in favorable weather Sunday walks are encouraged and participated in by pupils, teachers, and employees.

General treatment: Within the schoolrooms the discipline seems to be free and satisfactory. The teachers report that occasional disciplinary problems arise, but there was no apparent sullenness, fear, or unsatisfactory relations between the teacher and pupil. At recess time the children walked freely from the buildings, but at meal times a more formal order is maintained. Smaller children are given some assistance in the dining room in serving their food. The children appear to be cheerful and reasonably affectionate toward those in charge of them. According to the testimony of Principal Sellars, corporal punishment, which was always very limited, has been eliminated entirely as a means of correction. The only punishment which appears available for the use of the teachers is added duty and work details.

The Fort Belknap Reservation is inhabited by Assinniboines and Gros Ventres. I place here the report of C. H. Wilhaun, G. C. Braudvold, and Rev. F. B. LaFavre:

HARLEM, MONT., February 11, 1929.

The COMMISSIONER OF INDIAN AFFAIRS,
Washington, D. C.:

Survey of Indian Boarding Schools by Citizen Committee.

Your committee wishes to state that it made a careful investigation of all portions of the plant at the Fort Belknap Agency and we find the conditions of each practically as follows:

BOARDING SCHOOL

We found the buildings kept very neat and clean, everything was sanitary, and we found the food that was being fed the children abundant as to quantity and better as to quality and preparation than one could reasonably expect from an institution of this kind. The children were being well cared for and we are certain that the most commendable methods are being used in the administration of this institution.

We visited the school and found three departments with an approximate enrollment of 118. The teachers were as modern as any of the teachers of schools outside of the reservation. The children were busy in their work and we could see no evidence of cruelty or partiality in the matter of discipline of the children. The equipment appeared to be adequate and on the whole your committee left with a favorable impression as to the management of this school.

We found that the health education was, in our opinion, superior to that of the public schools of our county. The doctor at the agency has charge of the health work and the data that he showed us regarding the improvement in regard to the children in the matter of health after two or three months' residence at the school was in itself sufficient testimony as to the character of the food and care given the children.

We inspected the barns and other outbuildings and found that those who had them in charge were caring for them in approved and modern ways. The dairy barn being especially noticeable because of its neatness and the splendid condition of the stock.

The hospital plant, while small, was taking care of severe cases of illness in a manner that met with the hearty approval of the committee.

If we were to offer any criticism of this plant, whatsoever, it would be to simply say that the buildings are old and when constructed made no provision for ventilation and other modern arrangements for accommodating and caring for the health of all concerned. While we do not consider this a serious matter because of the efficient way in which the attendants were caring for the proposition with the means at hand, we believe that the schoolroom is crowded and that at least two more rooms should be provided to accommodate and properly care for the children that are now enrolled in the school. In so far as the children themselves are concerned, your committee believes that they are being cared for as to food, clothing, and instruction, better than the average of the white children of our county or surrounding counties.

On the Fort Peck Reservation are Indians of the Assinniboine and Yankton Sioux Tribes. The investigating committee there consisted of A. T. Listug, Frank H. Livingston, and Dr. C. B. Larson. It is as follows:

POPLAR, MONT., February 11, 1929.

Mr. CHARLES EGGERS,
Superintendent Fort Peck Indian Agency, Poplar, Mont.:

This is to certify that we, the undersigned members of the investigation committee, have on this 11th day of February, 1929, completed a thorough and detailed investigation of the conditions and affairs and local supervision of the Indian schools.

First. We find the foods to consist of fresh and cured meats, fresh and canned vegetables, cereals, bread, butter, cocoa, milk, and desserts, all well prepared by trained cooks in clean and sanitary kitchens. Meats and other perishable foods are kept in coolers. An inventory of the food-supply warehouse indicates a full and complete line necessary for cooking and kitchen service. All the children get as much food as they want, as it is served in home style and they can have as many helpings as they may wish. (Bread is served—all they want—at each meal.)

Second. We find the children all well clothed. The boys have woolen uniforms (of the United States Army grade, O. D.), other heavy and serviceable grades for work clothes, good mittens, overshoes, and underwear. In addition some Indian children who have the means are also permitted to buy fancy shoes or clothing if they so wish.

The girls are provided with heavy blue-serge dresses, heavy sweaters, and overshoes, also house dresses of usual practical materials. In fact, they are completely and well dressed for all ordinary needs, and in addition many of the girls provide coats of such kind and styles as they may want.

We find the buildings to be of rather old construction, but in excellent state of repair. The girls' and boys' sleeping quarters are well heated and ventilated, with steel stairway fire escape that seems ample and safe. The individual beds are clean and well kept. The heat is kept at a suitable and even temperature night and day.

The boys and girls are housed in separate buildings. These are both well kept and supervised. The lavatories, bathing and toilet facilities, while not of the most modern types, appear to be ample.

The classrooms are clean and orderly and seem to be in charge of competent teachers. The work done in the respective grades by the students reflects progress and discipline. If we make a recommendation here, it is in regard to the lighting of the schoolrooms. There are cross lights which are hard on the eyes of the children. Windows can be put on one side of each room at little expense. The reading library is limited. A small amount of money would easily remedy these minor defects.

A new, modern hospital of 28 beds, equipped with X-ray instrument and dressing sterilizers, large operating room, well lighted; dressing room; complete stock of hospital and medical supplies; very complete and sanitary cooking and kitchen service. The ventilation, sun parlors, beds, and linens are among the best in this section. This hospital is under the direct supervision of Dr. C. D. Fulkerson, assisted by two trained nurses, Mrs. Dale and Miss Haan. Both the doctor and the nurses are careful and doing excellent work in their line. This is evidenced by the records and the results at this hospital. Doctor Fulkerson, of the hospital staff, makes a thorough medical examination of all the school children twice each year, and more often in cases of epidemics or other emergencies. Weight charts, where monthly records of weights are kept, show healthy and normal increase of weights from time to time.

We find that proper supervision is given to all the detals, such as regular hours for rising, for meals, for play and recreation, retiring, etc. Our observations are that the children at the Fort Peck Indian Boarding School are fully as well cared for in all matters as any average class of white children in our public schools.

We find no evidence, either from inquiring or otherwise, where any corporal or unusual punishment is used, and any report to the contrary, in our opinion, does not state the facts.

We are especially impressed to find that the Fort Peck Agency officials are anxious to furnish all detailed information and the actual facts to this committee.

They further state that the Indian Department at Washington, D. C., has never once turned down any request they have made pertaining to things needed for this school. If there is anything lacking, it is because some official in charge has neglected or omitted to place the proposition properly before the Indian Department at Washington.

In making this report we have made personal investigation of the various items involved and also supplemented this information with inquiries from first-hand sources, and our findings are made accordingly.

Respectfully submitted.

The Rocky Boy Reservation Indians are Crees and Chippewas. A committee consisting of Robert R. Lucke, R. C. Timmons, and E. C. Carruth made the study there, and reported as follows:

REPLY TO CIRCULAR NO. 2546, DATED FEBRUARY 2, 1929

Mr. E. B. MERITT,
Commissioner Indian Affairs, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: Your circular No. 2546, dated February 2, 1929, addressed to the Indian superintendents, has been handed to us for reply for Government Agent Shotwell, of the Rocky Boy Indian Agency situated in Hill and Choteau Counties, Mont.

We, your committee, Robert Lucke, chairman of the Havre Chamber of Commerce; R. C. Timmons, sheriff of Hill County and representative of the Kiwanis Club of Havre, Mont., beg leave to report to you as follows:

We have visited the agency and the schools and are thoroughly acquainted with conditions and the Rocky Boy Band of Indians.

FOOD

We investigated the menus for the pupils in the schools, of which there are two in the Rocky Boy Agency, and at random selected two days' rations. Hot cocoa is served at 10.30 every forenoon. Monday, February 4, 1929, was as follows: At noon they served macaroni and tomatoes, mashed potatoes, beef extract with gravy, butter, hot baking-powder biscuits, and sirup. Tuesday, February 5, 1929, they served escalloped potatoes, creamed peas, stewed peaches, whole-wheat bread, butter, and sirup. The children told us that they were amply supplied with food. We found no complaint on this whatever.

CLOTHING

The schools open in September and in the fall the boys are given two suits of underwear, shirts, overalls, and mittens, and when these are worn out they are given others. The girls are given underwear, dresses, and mittens, and in asking those who could talk English and from observation, we figured that they were well clothed and have no complaint from them whatever.

HOUSED

The Rocky Boy day school is at the agency proper. It is a large log building, lined with beaver board; has a kitchen, a wash room, a dining room, and two schoolrooms, 24 by 24 with an 8-foot ceiling. One schoolroom has 169 cubic feet of air space and 163 cubic feet of air space in the primary room. The advance schoolroom has over 50 square feet of window glass, while the primary room has over 64 square feet. They have regular school desks.

The building is an old one, somewhat hard to heat, rather poorly lighted, and, if possible, we would recommend that a new and larger building be constructed as this school takes care of, at this time, 48 pupils, equally divided, 24 boys and 24 girls, coming from about 27 or 28 families in the agency neighborhood. The second school building is approximately 3½ miles northwest of the agency on what is known as Little Box Elder Creek, near where the Sun Dances are held. This building is new, has very good light, and is well heated. At this school they have over 18 pupils and it is constantly growing. We would estimate, from discussion, that there will be 25 more pupils in the next year or so. These people will need another school and from discussion with the agency authorities we would figure it should be placed about 4 miles toward what is known as Beaver Creek and should be established for the primary grades.

MEDICAL ATTENTION

The agency doctor is Dr. D. S. McKenzie, of Havre, Mont., located at a distance of approximately 35 miles from the agency buildings. Doctor McKenzie is a graduate from the Rush Medical College and has practiced medicine in Havre since 1900. He is one of the very prominent public men in northern Montana and gives the service very close attention. It is impossible to give a report from Doctor McKenzie at this time, on account of his absence from the city, as he is at Rochester, Minn., attending the clinic there and won't be back home until after the 20th of February.

I think we have taken up the items in rotation as requested in your circular but we will add some more information in case it is desired.

There are approximately 26 Indian log and frame houses at the agency proper. Nearly all of the Indians move to the agency in the winter on account of its severity. We find that there is an English Lutheran Church at the agency—Reverend Gable the minister. There is also a Catholic mission there, with the priest taking care of the services from Havre. The postmaster is Reverend Gable, who is married and has three children living in the agency. They teach up to the fifth grade in the advance school. The younger children are rapidly learning to talk English, and after about two years can get along very nicely. Nearly all bands can either talk English or make themselves understood. The tribe languages, or the languages that they talk, are Cree, Chippewa, Piegan, Blackfeet, and other languages tributary to Montana. They have a very good school nurse at the agency. Her name is Ruth Riss, aged 32, a graduate from a Pennsylvania college and has very good control over the children.

The farmers (Indian) grow wheat, oats, and hay. They don't take care of their lands and will not summer fallow; therefore they are pestered with fan weed and other weed pests. They have cayuses and small horses, but no large or good stock.

The agency should have a hospital and a resident physician on account of the large number of children in and about there. We understand from Agent Shotwell that it has been under consideration. We recommend consideration.

In discussing the matter of the opening of the school in September we ascertained from the school-teachers that nearly all of the boys and girls were underweight, due to the fact of the outside Indian life during the spring and summer and not having regular meals, which, of course, is not the fault of those in charge at the agency. For example: Fred Alexander weighed 90 pounds in September, 1928 (9 pounds underweight); gained 4 pounds by February 1, 1929. Edward Belcourt weighed 68 pounds in September, 1928 (15 pounds overweight); gained 4 pounds by February 1, 1929. The school nurse informed us that all of the children showed a gain of from 4 to 10 pounds between September 1 and February 1, occasioned by the regular meals and wholesome diet.

From observation and consultation with the authorities, we would figure that they are short of money to handle the rapidly growing agency school work.

At the school at the agency proper there are two teachers, a man and his wife, about 28 years of age, named Norman E. Howes. They both teach and have two children—a boy of 11 and a girl of 5.

At what is called the new school, 3½ miles from the agency, they have a man teacher named Willard Howland, aged 31, married and has a baby. The wife helps get the lunch, make the cocoa, etc.

The winter in northern Montana has been very severe this year, at least since January 15, the thermometer ranging from zero to 46 below at the agency. However, the Indians have fared very well, and there has been very little suffering; but at a time like this they really need a local hospital and a resident physician.

In the past and during the time that Agent Shotwell has been in charge of the affairs at the Rocky Boy Agency the people in Havre and Box Elder, near-by towns—Box Elder being 12 miles from the agency and Havre 35 to 40 miles from the agency—have become well acquainted with him and with the work that he is doing, and we have always found him a very capable, efficient, and energetic worker. The sheriff, R. C. Timmons, comes in contact with the people in Hill County and, naturally, quite frequently with the Indians and with Agent Shotwell, and he compliments him very highly on the efficient work that he is doing. Bob Lucke, a merchant in Havre and chairman of the chamber of commerce, comes in contact with many of the Indians who trade and often visit Havre, and he is in a position to know the conditions here; and E. C. Carruth, operating the Havre Hotel for the past 25 years, and representing the Rotary Club of Havre, considers himself very well acquainted with the Bearpaw Mountains, with the Cree Indian conditions, with Agent Shotwell's work, with the agency physician, Dr. D. S. McKenzie, and his work, having made many trips to the agency during the past few years, and also acquainted with the farming operations and many of the older Indians at the agency, as he has been one of the Havre people who have been interested in the welfare of the Indians before they secured that part of the Fort Assinniboine Reservation as an Indian agency.

Finally, we, your committee, desire to say that there is absolutely no complaint from the Indians in the Rocky Boy Agency on their manner of treatment, either as to food, clothing, housing, medical attention, or general welfare.

As chairman of the Committee on Indian Affairs, I have had sent to me copies of similar reports from all of the States in which Indian administration is important. Many of them have been placed in the RECORD by Representatives from those States. All are well worthy of study and consideration. They point constructively the way to some needed reforms, and they also set forth encouraging progress which has been achieved.

NATIONAL ORIGINS

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, by direction of the Committee on Rules I present a privileged resolution, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

House Resolution 349

Resolved, That upon the adoption of this resolution it shall be in order to move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of House Joint Resolution 402, to amend subdivisions (b) and (e) of section 11 of the immigration act of 1924, as amended. That after general debate, which shall be confined to the House joint resolution and shall continue not to exceed 30 minutes, to be equally divided and controlled by those favoring and opposing the House joint resolution, the House joint resolution shall be read for amendment under the 5-minute rule. At the conclusion of the reading of the House joint resoution for amendment the committee shall rise and report the House joint resolution to the House with such amendments as may have been adopted, and the previous question shall be considered as ordered on the House joint resolution and the amendments thereto to final passage without intervening motion except one motion to recommit.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, I yield 20 minutes to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GARRETT].

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I yield 10 minutes of that time to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. JENKINS].

Mr. JENKINS. Mr. Speaker, ladies and gentlemen of the House, according to this morning's paper, we see the announcement that the principal reason for our convocation to-day is to pass this resolution. For one, I can not see for the life of me why we should desecrate the Sabbath in order to attempt to pass a matter that is of such little importance as is the matter contained in this resolution. What does the resolution propose to do? It proposes to postpone the law of 1924 which was passed with all the formality and solemnity of the passage of any other law. I refer to that provision of the immigration bill of 1924 which has to do with the establishment of the quotas under which immigrants come to this country. That law provided two methods by which the quota might be established. One was the census of 1890 and the other was what was called a national-origins provision.

Why was the census of 1890 selected? Purely as a matter of expediency at the time. The immigration act of 1924 marked a real epoch in the enactment of immigration legislation. It was a real turning point. It was the establishment of a quota law. No one can claim that the figures we had at that period were of sufficient accuracy to establish a permanent quota. They accepted the 1890 census in the act of 1924.

Mr. MICHENER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield there?

Mr. JENKINS. Yes.

Mr. MICHENER. Was not that the first census taken in which nationalities were developed?

Mr. JENKINS. I can not answer that question accurately because the successive censuses as developed have been taken along different lines.

Mr. MICHENER. I understand the census of 1890 was the first one that was taken in that way, and I understand that is the reason why it was adopted as the basis in the act of 1924.

Mr. JENKINS. That was not the reason. I can tell you the reason. We all know the policy of restriction is aimed to restrict immigration from southern and eastern Europe. If the 1920 census had been accepted, the result would have been that there would have been more immigrants out of Italy than out of England. The immigration, as we all know, has come from different countries in different periods. In the immigration from England, Scotland, North Ireland, and Wales were many of the real pioneers and builders of this Nation.

Mr. CONNERY. Right there, what does the gentleman mean by "the real pioneers"?

Mr. JENKINS. I mean that is what they were. That is the fact.

Mr. CONNERY. The gentleman said "northern Ireland." If he had said "southern Ireland," there would be something to it. [Laughter.]

Mr. JENKINS. I will digress a moment to answer the gentleman's question. If you were to take the census of those who framed the Constitution of the United States, you would find that 80 per cent of them were from the countries I named. You would find where they came from, and you would find that they came from those countries.

Now, take the immigration from other countries. We have had, in our history, immigration from all the countries of the world; a splendid immigration. Take the immigration from Germany, for example. Who wants to say a word against the immigration from that country? But they came within a certain period, largely from 1850 to 1870. The immigration from southern Europe came, as I told you before, in the last three or four decades. Now, if you had accepted the 1920 census, you would have found more immigrants from Italy than from Great Britain, Scotland, and North Ireland. That is the real reason. The policy of the Congress was to restrict immigration from southern Europe.

Now, they say in opposition to the national-origins proposition and in justification of this resolution that this provision ought to be postponed again. Why? We want to answer that question. Why should this provision be postponed again?

Mr. JACOBSTEIN. I will answer it.

Mr. JENKINS. The gentleman can do that in his own time. My time is speeding. I want to ask who are opposed to the national-origins proposition? Who are they? I will tell you who they are principally. The people who are opposed to the national-origins proposition are those who have opposed every restrictive measure from the beginning. They have always opposed restrictive legislation and they are favoring this resolution for that reason.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. Is the gentleman opposed to the national-origins proposition?

Mr. JENKINS. No.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. JENKINS. No; I must decline to yield. I think I know what the gentleman is going to ask. I know what the question is that the gentleman wants to ask, and I can answer the question without his putting it. Who else is against the national-origins proposition? They are a fine group of people. They are people who have a constituency who have quotas from those respective nations increased by the unfairness of the 1890 census. They are people from northern Europe. But if you are going to establish a quota of immigration, why not establish it scientifically? Why accept any particular census, either the census of 1890 or 1920? Why not accept a real scientific basis? How are you going to get a scientific basis? You would have to consult scientists. You can not safely consult guessers. You do not want to consult people who want to have Congress vote according to the color of their constituencies.

Whom do you want to consult? The people who know something about the censuses of this country. Who are they? I answer, our own Government departments. What do they say? If you gentlemen remember the hearings had before the Senate committee, you will see that the greatest expert in the United States on this subject, a man against whom no one points the finger of suspicion, is Doctor Hill. What does he say? He says that after years of investigation they have arrived at what they think is the most accurate basis. If our Census Department has done that, why postpone? There is absolutely no reason except that of expediency.

Well, some one says to you and some one says to me, "It will not work." Why will it not work? Who said why it would not work? None! What is wrong with it? If you establish a quota on one basis, can you not enforce the law just as effectively on that basis as if you had established it on another basis? Who is the authority on these things? Go down to the department and consult the people who know. What does Mr. White say? He says in effect that the national-origins provision can be put in effect as easily as the 1890 census plan. In substantiation of this I refer you to the hearings before the Senate committee.

Now, ladies and gentlemen, in the one minute remaining to me I want to call your attention, and especially the attention of those of you who have been restrictionists, to this one proposition, that this is a momentous day in the history of restriction of immigration. Two days ago we took a long step backward when we gave our sanction to the first steps in a program of blanketing into citizenship probably 500,000 aliens. If this resolution passes to-day it means the death knell of this proposition, and another long step backward. It is the entering wedge against restriction.

Who favor this proposition? Some one asked me that question a while ago. Let me tell you who favor it. The great American Legion. Who else? The Sons of the American Revolution, the Daughters of the American Revolution, and the Junior Order of United American Mechanics. Let me sum up in one word and say this, that this resolution is opposed to-day by every patriotic organization in America, every one of them. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Ohio has expired.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. NEWTON]. [Applause.]

Mr. NEWTON. Mr. Speaker, the distinguished gentleman who has just closed has referred to a number of leading organizations of the country who, he says, favor the national-origins provisions and oppose its repeal. Among them he named the Sons of the American Revolution. I have been a member of that organization for many years. So far as I can recall I have never received one word from any national officer asking for my opinion as a Member as to the merits of the national-origins provision as distinguished from the 1890 census provisions of existing law. So far as I can recall, the Sons of the American Revolution have never taken any action in favor of one as against the other. Possibly some member of that organization with no right whatever to speak for it has assumed the right to speak for it. What is true of them is undoubtedly true of a good many other organizations whose names have appeared in the papers of late as supporting the national-origins provision. Furthermore, the responsibility of legislating rests upon each individual Member. That responsibility we have no authority to delegate to any individual or association of individuals no matter how large that organization may be.

Mr. Speaker, this is not a contest to-day between the definite acceptance or rejection of the national-origins provision as distinguished from the 1890 census provisions. All this resolution attempts to do is to extend the time of the taking effect of the national-origins provisions for one year. Why should we do this? I shall briefly summarize the reasons prefacing those reasons with a brief résumé of the history and development of numerical-restriction legislation.

Gentlemen, you know that I am a firm believer in numerical restriction. Notwithstanding what the gentleman from Ohio had to say as to those who are opposing national origins, I am here to say that I am a numerical restrictionist. I believe the 1924 numerical restriction act is one of the greatest pieces of constructive legislation that has been passed during my 10 years of service here. It is because I am a numerical restrictionist and want to see that principle of legislation prevail that I favor the adoption of this resolution.

As a member of the Committee on Foreign Affairs in my first term of service here it was my privilege to support and, if my memory is correct, to report out a resolution continuing war-time visas as a temporary method of immigration restriction. In 1921 I supported the first numerical restriction act. This was based on the 1910 census. The quota percentage was 3 per cent.

In 1924 I stood with the distinguished chairman of the Committee on Immigration and fought the substitution of the theoretical national-origins plan for the 1890 census basis. That fight was successful. The bill went over to the Senate with the 1890 census as the base of the quota provisions. It was in the Senate that the national-origins provisions were inserted into the 1924 act. We in the House had to accept or else see the entire legislation defeated. We did so reluctantly and because a provision was included postponing the going into effect of these provisions for three years. This would enable investigation, study, and report as to the plan which sounded all right in theory but which most of us felt could not be successfully applied in practice.

The question has been asked why was the 1890 census used as a base instead of the current census. The current census would have been a discrimination against racial stocks and nationalities coming over to this country early in our history and who furnished the bulk of the people who settled up America. That was the fault with the 1921 act which used the 1910 census as a base. It was found that the 1890 census was that census which most nearly and fairly represented these various racial stocks that had settled America from the early days up to 1920.

Mr. Speaker, the first report was made two years ago. The experts who compiled the figures and drafted the report frankly said they did not know where they were at and either asked or intimated that they should be given further time to study and investigate. It is enough to say that their initial report varied substantially from the estimates that were submitted by the so-called experts who submitted estimates at the time the national-origins provisions were inserted in the bill.

In 1928 the committee of experts submitted another report. This report as to a number of the racial stocks varied substantially from the report submitted in 1927. For example: The Belgian quota was jumped from 410 to 1,328; France was reduced from 3,837 to 3,308; Great Britain was reduced from 73,000 to 65,000; Russia was reduced from 4,700 to 3,500, and so forth.

The other day this commission of experts submitted a further report to Congress. As compared with the 1928 report, we find, for example, Austria reduced from 1,639 to 1,413; Belgium from 1,328 to 1,304; France from 3,308 to 3,086; Germany is increased about 1,000; Great Britain remains about the same; Poland is increased from 6,090 to 6,524; Russia is reduced from 3,540 to 2,784. There are slight reductions in the quotas from Denmark, Norway, and Sweden.

Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Ohio talks about "guessers." Why, guessing is the very basis of the national-origins provisions. The experts—I do not mean the propagandists—admitted it. It can not be otherwise. There is no stable foundation upon which to start. In the report submitted February 25, 1928 (S. Doc. No. 65), the committee in referring to the classification used pointed out that it involved "a considerable element of uncertainty," because, as they said, "partly because many family names undergo changes as times go by, and partly because many names are common to two or possibly more countries." The next President of the United States, a member of the commission, said it was impossible to ascertain the national origins accurately and favored its repeal.

Here you have, then, the experts revising and varying their figures from year to year. Under those circumstances should we not then seek further light before permitting this new basis of finding quotas for numerical restriction to go into effect?

One of the great faults of the national-origins provisions, as I see them, is the uncertainty involved in arriving at the figures. One man's guess is just as good as another's. All of this tends to develop racial and group consciousness. The purpose of immigration restriction was to accomplish eventually its elimination. The very uncertain features of the national-origins provisions promote group and racial consciousness. This is the very thing which Washington and other great leaders in the early history of our country warned us against.

Another reason for postponement: We will be taking a census late this fall or early this coming year. Why not, then, wait the outcome of that census before putting into effect this theoretical quota basis?

Let me say this to some of the advocates of numerical restriction. Your insistence upon a theoretical, uncertain, strife-promotion plan will tend to drive out of your ranks a large number of people who have consistently supported numerical restriction. During all of the discussion leading up to the passage of numerical-restriction legislation in 1921 and its perfecting in 1924, the principle of numerical restriction had the support of that portion of our citizenry who had been born in or whose ancestors had originally come from northern and western Europe. I do not recall receiving a single letter against the principle of numerical restriction from any such individual. On the contrary, I have received many advocating that principle. Let us, therefore, continue as we have been with the 1890 census as a base. It is fairly representative. It is absolutely fixed and certain and its continuance will avoid the promotion of racial feeling and group consciousness. The reasonable thing to do, the American position to take, is to adopt this resolution and postpone action until we can have further light, and that is the only question that is before us for action now. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Minnesota has expired.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I yield seven minutes to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. McREYNOLDS]. [Applause.]

Mr. McREYNOLDS. Mr. Speaker, ladies and gentlemen of the House, when the immigration act was passed in 1924 we went back to the census of 1890 because we felt that a quota on that basis would come nearer giving the people of the United States of America a correct representation in reference to nationalities than any other census. When this bill went over to the Senate an amendment was offered by Senator REED of Pennsylvania, providing for a national origins act. That was added to this bill and was to go into effect after 1927. A commission was appointed to make the investigation and make a report. Twice since that time has this matter been postponed. The distinguished gentleman who has just preceded me states that a postponement does not mean that he is in opposition to the national-origins plan but that he wants further light and further investigation. A recent report made by a commission of experts, whose duty it was to make this report, and this report is dated February 21, 1929, uses this language.

We are of the opinion that further study would not appreciably modify these results.

I take the position, ladies and gentlemen of the House, that those of you who vote for this resolution vote against the national-origins plan. The position we have always taken is not that the alien or the foreigner of this country is entitled to representation, but it is the American citizen who is entitled to say who shall come to this country, how many, and under what conditions. [Applause.]

Why postpone when the commission of experts has made its final report? The reason of the postponement is because it affects some different nationalities.

I am not supporting this bill because it will lower the percentage of certain nationals who come to this country, neither am I opposing it on that account; but I am supporting it because I feel that if the national-origins matter is put in action it will give a greater representation to the American people.

The national-origins provision provides that the immigration coming to this country shall not exceed one hundred and fifty thousand odd. Under the present bill it is 164,000.

So I say to those of you who are in favor of strict immigration, who are in favor of keeping our people as they are, who are in favor of leaving to the American people who are to come to this country, under a limited number, you should not support this resolution to extend.

If you will put the national-origins proposition into effect you cut down the amount of immigrants who come and you give representation to the various nationalities that have been responsible for the upbuilding of this country. If you want to be fair to all nations, if you want to avoid racial discrimination, if you want to keep the blood of the United States of America in proportion as it is now, you will vote against this resolution. [Applause.]

I yield back the balance of my time, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, I yield two minutes to the lady from California [Mrs. KAHN]. [Applause.]

Mrs. KAHN. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the House, we have heard so much to-day as to what the founders of our Government thought and did about immigration, I thought it would be not only opportune but interesting to read a set of resolutions passed by the Continental Congress on August 14, 1776.

These resolutions were prepared by Thomas Jefferson; Richard Stockton, of New Jersey; James Wilson, of Pennsylvania, appointed later by Washington to the Supreme Court of the United States; and Benjamin Franklin, added later to the committee. The resolutions are as follows:

Whereas it has been the wise policy of these States to extend the protection of their laws to all those who should settle among them, of whatever nation or religion they might be, and to admit them to a participation of the benefits of civil and religious freedom; and the benevolence of this practice, as well as its salutary effects, have rendered it worthy of being continued in future times; and

Whereas His Britannic Majesty, in order to destroy our freedom and happiness, has commenced against us a cruel and unprovoked war and, unable to engage Britons sufficient to execute his sanguinary measures, has applied for aid to foreign princes who are in the habit of selling the blood of their people for money, and from them has procured and transported hither considerable numbers of foreigners. And it is conceived that such foreigners, if apprised of the practice of these States, would choose to accept of lands, liberty, safety, and a communion of good laws and mild government in a country where many of their friends and relations are already happily settled, rather than continue exposed to the toils and dangers of a long and bloody war, waged against a people guilty of no other crime than that of refusing to exchange freedom for slavery; and that they will do this the more especially when they reflect that after they have violated every Christian and moral precept by invading and attempting to destroy those who have never injured them or their country, their only reward, if they escape death and captivity, will be a return to the despotism of their prince, to be by him again sold to do the drudgery of some other enemy to the rights of mankind; and

Whereas the Parliament of Great Britain have thought fit by a late act not only to invite our troops to desert our service but to direct a compulsion of our people taken at sea to serve against their country: Therefore

Resolved, That these States will receive all such foreigners who shall leave the armies of His Britannic Majesty in America and shall choose to become members of any of these States; and they shall be protected in the free exercise of their respective religions and be invested with the rights, privileges, and immunities of natives, as established by the laws of these States; and, moreover, that this Congress will provide for every such person 50 acres of unappropriated lands in some of these States, to be held by him and his heirs in absolute property.

Resolved, That the foregoing resolution be committed to the committee who brought in the report, and that they be directed to have it translated into German and to take proper measures to have it communicated to the foreign troops.

Resolved, That Doctor Franklin be added to the said committee.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Chairman, I yield three minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. JACOBSTEIN]. [Applause.]

Mr. JACOBSTEIN. Mr. Speaker and Members of the House, one day while the committee of experts were working on the national-origins proposition I happened to be at the Census Bureau. The commission was to report to the President of the United States what figures he should use as a basis for the national-origins provision. To my surprise I found the man in charge of the statistics was juggling them around to meet certain preconceived notions or objectives. I said, "Why do you do that," and he replied, "Because we have no scientific basis for the national-origins proposition and we have to manipulate it so as to satisfy all the national elements."

Now, mind you, geneltmen——

Mr. BOX. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JACOBSTEIN. I am sorry. I can not yield, as I have only three minutes.

Think of it. We pass a law to allocate immigration into the United States and then ask experts in the Census Bureau to get up figures which at best are sheer guesses.

Now, why do they have to juggle them there? I will tell you why. Anyone who knows anything about American history knows that in the census of 1790 the census enumerators never asked a man where he came from, what his nationality was, or what his racial stock was. We simply took his surname, "Jones," "Smith," "Barker," and so forth. On the basis of the name we later derived or deduced or guessed his national origin. Now, how can you determine a man's national origin from his name? It can not be done.

We know that people change their names. George Washington's name was not always "Washington." His forefathers bore the name of Wyssington. People often change their names. The people who settled America were no exception. The census of 1790 is no sensible, scientific basis for determining immigration, and that is why the commission which was appointed to figure this out never was able to arrive at any just conclusion. While I was opposed to the 1890 basis, I claim it was much fairer, much more scientific, and much more workable than this hodgepodge, this monstrosity known as the "national-origins" proposition.

I can understand why some people should want to perpetuate the so-called "colonial stock," even though I do not accept the principle. But in allocating immigration quotas to nationalities to-day it is impossible to use the census of 1790, which did not collect or publish such data. The contest between the use of the national origins and the 1890 census is a contest between the English on the one side and the Germanic-Scandinavian stock on the other. I maintain you can not settle this contest by using the 1790 census.

I can not understand how anyone who knows American history, who knows how the early censuses were taken, can advocate the national-origins proposition. It is ridiculous. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself one minute.

Mr. Speaker, it seems to me, if I am correctly informed as to the situation in the other body, that independent of the merits or demerits of this proposition, we are about to do a very futile thing; that is to say, we are about to spend a half hour or more in discussion and then in the passage of a proposition that in all probability is not going to pass the other body. I may be misinformed about that; at any rate, I do not think it ought to pass.

Mr. TILSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Yes.

Mr. TILSON. Has the gentleman any information from the other end of the Capitol on the subject? My understanding does not coincide with that of the gentleman.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Well, I may be misinformed concerning the matter, but if they do pass it they ought not to, and I hope this body will stop it here. [Applause.]

Mr. McCORMACK. The gentleman is speaking as the minority leader or individually?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Oh, I speak individually, of course.

Mr. DOUGLASS of Massachusetts. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. I yield.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Tennessee has expired.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Then, Mr. Speaker, I yield the three minutes I have remaining to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HOLADAY].

Mr. DOUGLASS of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman from Tennessee may be extended one minute.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. The time has been fixed. I would gladly yield to——

Mr. DOUGLASS of Massachusetts. I just want you to know you do not represent the northern Democracy in your position as a southern Democrat to-day.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I hope the gentleman from Massachusetts will note that I did not claim to. [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. DOUGLASS of Massachusetts. And you never will have the right to claim it, either.

Mr. HOLADAY. Mr. Speaker and Members of the House, five years ago, when the restricted immigration law was passed, the House committee and this House, for reasons they thought were for the best interests of our country, fixed upon the 1890 census. In the Senate the national-origins amendment was added. The House conferees were opposed to that amendment; but as the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. BYRNS] said this morning in speaking of another bill, a conference report is in the nature of a compromise.

At that time I was opposed to the national-origins provision, not because I was opposed to the result, but because I could foresee this very day. In my opinion the final result between the national-origins provision and the 1890 census basis is not especially material to the future of this country.

The national-origins clause reduces the number of immigrants some 14,000 and shifts a few thousand from one country to another. In my opinion, it is not especially material whether a thousand is taken from Sweden and added to Great Britain or a thousand from Great Britain and added to Sweden.

The trouble we have found in the national-origins proposition, and its inclusion in the 1924 immigration bill was from the day of the passage until this day it has been a cause of unrest on the part of certain foreign groups. Here is one foreign group that gets less under the national-origins proposition, than under the 1890 basis, and so they are opposed to its going into effect. The nationalities that would gain 200 or 1,000 are in favor of it. The result is that the national-origins clause has been hanging in the balance during the past five years that we have had a state of unrest.

If we postpone the operation of the national-origins clause for another year we continue the uncertainty and the unrest for another year. The thing that the House should do, the sensible thing for Congress to do, the thing that is best for this country is to repeal the national-origins clause, or to defeat this resolution and allow the national-origins clause to go into effect at once. [Applause.]

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. VINCENT].

Mr. VINCENT of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, the statement was made on the floor by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. JENKINS] that all persons who are in favor of the suspension of the national-origins clause are against restriction of immigration. I have been a member of the Committee on Immigration since the beginning of my service in Congress. I have been a strong restrictionist in respect to every action that has been taken on this subject. I helped prepare the 1924 immigration law. I believe in numerical restriction. I voted to make the total number less than was provided in the original bill introduced by the chairman of the committee, and as it was carried in the law the total was less than proposed in the bill as introduced.

Gentlemen have asked why suspend the national-origin clause again? I want to tell you one reason why, if you believe in scientific, accurate legislation. Because the so-called committee of experts have figured, under this complicated provision, the quotas of the various countries three different times and have given a different answer for the quotas of the various countries every time they have figured. They have never given out the quotas twice alike. If this committee of experts get a different answer to the quotas of foreign countries every time they act, what can be said of a Member of Congress who has to go to his district and tell his constituents how the matter is determined. Take the case of the British quota. This is just one example among many. At first, the experts said it would be 73,000; and they say now it will be 65,000 in round numbers per year. That is 8,000 people different from the quota of the former figures. They testified before the committee that it takes 600 mistakes in the allocation of the people of this country to the stock of a foreign country in order to make one mistake in the incoming immigrant number or quota. Six hundred times 8,000, gentlemen, makes 4,800,000 that they themselves testify that they had erroneously allotted to the British stock.

If such enormous errors as that can result under this provision—as indeed have resulted under it—and every time they figure the quotas from different countries under this provision they come to different results, I ask you whether this is legislation that the Congress of the United States desires to have the immigration to this country based upon? It is indefensible, because even the experts can not give the same answer twice.

Mr. BURTNESS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. VINCENT of Michigan. Yes.

Mr. BURTNESS. Assuming the national-origin provision would go into effect, would not the department always be under pressure to change their figures from year to year?

Mr. VINCENT of Michigan. Certainly. Every person in this country interested in some nationality, under this provision of law, if it goes into effect, will feel that such nationality has been cheated in the figures, and will constantly be carrying on prapaganda for a change, thus preventing the law from ever being regarded as stabilized and satisfactory.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Michigan has expired.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the resolution.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee) there were—ayes 185, noes 78.

So the resolution was agreed to.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of House Joint Resolution 402, to amend subdivisions (b) and (e) of section 11 of the immigration act of 1924, as amended. Pending that, I ask unanimous consent that one-half the time be controlled by myself and one-half by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. Box].

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Washington moves that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the House Joint Resolution 402. Pending that he asks unanimous consent that the time be equally divided, one-half to be controlled by himself and one-half by the gentleman from Texas, Mr. Box. Is there objection?

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I would like to know whether I can have five minutes.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. I have had 50 requests for from 1 to 15 minutes. I have only 15 minutes at my disposal. I can not make any such promise.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Washington that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the House Joint Resolution 402.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of House Joint Resolution 402, with Mr. HOOPER in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

House Joint Resolution (H. J. Res. 402) to amend subdivisions (b) and (e) of section 11 of the immigration act of 1924, as amended

Resolved, etc., That subdivisions (b) and (e) of section 11 of the immigration act of 1924, as amended, are amended by striking out the figures "1929," and inserting in lieu thereof the figures "1930."

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Chairman and members of the committee, your chairman of the House Committee on Immigration and Naturalization has been embarrassed many times and in many ways, not only at home but elsewhere, as well as in the deliberations of the committee, by this national-origins clause of the 1924 act. The plan is not easily understood. It is true that the House committee, in passing the 1924 restrictive immigration act, resisted the insertion of the national-origins clause, which was a Senate proposal. Gentlemen will remember while we were driving for the permanent law in 1924, to replace the temporary quota law of 1921, which was to expire on June 30, 1924, we had to work with considerable speed. Some 20 days were spent in conference between Senate and House. Oriental exclusion and other serious matters held the boards. Some things had to be done in haste. One of these was the national-origins paragraph. After numerous amendments, it was agreed to in conference. It has caused misunderstanding ever since.

Each postponement by Congress has developed changes in the origin, or blood stock, of the earliest people in the Colonies. Each such change has altered the figures showing the blood stock in the population as shown by the census of 1920.

It so happens that my paternal and maternal ancestors were of colonial stock. I have the honor to be a member of the Sons of the American Revolution; also of the Spanish War Veterans, the American Legion, and other similar organizations which are reported as having indorsed the national-origins plan. Nevertheless, I am opposed to aristocracies of blood, and I am opposed to aristocracies of every kind in the United States of America. I am opposed to organized alien groups in the United States. I am opposed to the demands made by these groups for political power. I am opposed to their activities through the foreign-language press. It makes it harder to assimilate those who really desire to be assimilated and affects the second generation.

The public demands more restriction of immigration, and I am in hopes that a bill can be prepared which will more effectively restrict. Quotas should be issued for whole families and not for individuals of a family.

In my opinion, both the 2 per cent of 1890 and the national-origins proposal are merely yardsticks for getting a measure that will cut quotas and keep us within our treaty obligations. Whichever plan prevails, the total quota for new seed immigrants should be much less.

We suffer now from much blood-stock animosity because we were fully 25 years too late in the restriction of immigration. These charges of prejudice and discrimination will continue, no matter which plan finally prevails. It persists because of the stock from which any one of us sprung in a population of 120,000,000 souls. Pride of ancestry is a noble attribute; just as noble in an Irishman as in a Welshman. A Roman can be as proud as a Dane, and in the United States it takes several generations to wear away the hyphen.

In my opinion the putting into effect of the national-origins provision will result in a new charge of discrimination, new schemes for the allocation of quotas, and new demands for the use of the 1930 census.

The 1921 quota law was the first positive step toward restriction to numbers certain. It was Public Act No. 5 of the administration of President Harding. The permanent quota act was signed by President Coolidge, and is certain to stand out as one of the great acts of his administration. [Applause.]

I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CHINDBLOM].

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Mr. Chairman, I presume I disclose no secret when I tell the Members of this House that, while myself native born, I am one of those of rather recent European origin who both here and elsewhere have been labeled as likely to be less patriotic than some others. I resent any such imputation, and I ask both sides of this discussion to refrain from any further reference to such a preposterous and slanderous suggestion. Patriotism and loyalty are attributes of the heart and mind and are not proven by ancestry or genealogy.

We are here to determine the one question, whether the national-origins provision shall go into effect immediately or be postponed for another year. I am a restrictionist and have supported every measure for the restriction of immigration that has come up for action during my membership in the House. I voted for the immigration act of 1921 as well as the immigration act of 1924, although in the latter case I opposed the national-origins provision, as I do now.

When the immigration act of 1924 was passed the House based future immigration quotas entirely upon the census of 1890, providing that 2 per cent of the number of persons born in each foreign country then resident in the United States should constitute the immigration quota from that country. The Senate amended the bill by inserting the national-origins provision. The House twice rejected this amendment, but eventually, the session drawing to a close, we were advised that if there was to be any restriction of immigration at all the conference report containing the present national-origins provision would have to be accepted. Even then the Congress realized that the national-origins basis was not immediately definite or workable and therefore postponed the operation of that provision until July 1, 1927, and also provided that the determination of the quotas on the basis of national origins should be made by the Secretary of State, the Secretary of Commerce, and the Secretary of Labor jointly. On January 3, 1927, these Secretaries submitted to the President a tabulation of quotas as prepared by employees in their departments, and in their report they said:

The report of the subcommittee is self-explanatory and is stated to be a preliminary report, yet, in the judgment of that committee, further investigation will not substantially alter this presentation.

Although this is the best information we have been able to secure, we wish to call attention to the reservations made by the committee and to state that in our opinion the statistical and historical information available raises grave doubts as to the whole value of these computations as a basis for the purposes intended. We therefore can not assume responsibility for such conclusions under these circumstances.

The Senate on February 1, 1927, passed a resolution postponing the operation of the national-origins provision until 1928. The House Committee on Immigration and Naturalization amended this joint resolution so as to provide for the repeal of the national-origins provision. Since the Congress was about to expire on March 4, the joint resolution was recommitted to the committee which subsequently reported a resolution for postponement, and on March 3, 1927, the resolution for postponement passed the House by an overwhelming vote—234 to 111.

The committee of Secretaries made a second report to the President on February 25, 1928, and their subcommittee then stated that they had made a further investigation of the subject matter and had secured the result of the investigations made by research experts, employed by the American Council of Learned Societies, which indicated that the English element, as given in the Century of Population Growth, published by the Bureau of the Census about 20 years ago, was too large and that on the basis of data which they had submitted and of information derived from other sources the subcommittee had come "to the conclusion that the English element, as there given, should be reduced by a little over 10 per cent and the amount of the reduction distributed among the other nationalities represented in the population of the United States in 1790." The subcommittee also stated that it had revised its estimates for territory not covered in the census of 1790 and had also made "estimates" of the "unrecorded immigration which came to this country between 1790 and 1820." This report was so unsatisfactory that both the Senate and the House with practical unanimity passed another postponing resolution which became effective on March 31, 1928.

The changes which had been made during the year by the subcommittee, acting for the committee of Secretaries, affected about 10,000,000 of the present white population of the United States. This year the committee of experts has again reported to the President on February 21, 1929, that they have made further investigation, and that the processes followed in utilizing census and immigration statistics, as explained in their previous reports, have been reviewed and somewhat improved. The committee stated, however, that "as a result of the very considerable amount of effort thus expended, the figures previously submitted have been slightly revised." No claim is made that the figures are more trustworthy or reliable than they were in previous reports.

In the presidential campaign last fall both of the candidates for President, of the Republican and Democratic Parties, declared their opposition to the national-origins provision. President-elect Hoover said in his speech of acceptance at Stanford University, California, on August 11, 1928:

> No man will say that any immigration or tariff law is perfect. We welcome our new immigrant citizens and their great contribution to our Nation; we seek only to protect them equally with those already here. We shall amend the immigration laws to relieve unnecessary hardships upon families. As a member of the commission whose duty it is to determine the quota basis under the national origins law I have found it impossible to do so accurately and without hardship. The basis now in effect carries out the essential principle of the law, and I favor repeal of that part of the act calling for a new basis of quotas.

Mr. Hoover, as Secretary of Commerce, with the Secretary of State, Mr. Kellogg, and the Secretary of Labor, Mr. Davis, was charged specifically with the duty of determining the figures or numerical calculations which were to form the basis for immigration quotas upon the theory of national origins. In fact, the Bureau of the Census in his own department performed the greater part of the work and necessarily conferred with him in reaching its conclusions. No better authority on the subject can be conceived than Mr. Hoover himself.

The fundamental difficulty about this matter is that the census of 1790 gave no information whatever as to the national origins of the inhabitants of the Colonies, and therefore advocates of the national-origins plan have been forced to try to determine the origins of those inhabitants by the names of the people at that time. Did you ever know that Nobel, the man who founded the Nobel Foundation, was a Swedish citizen? Do you know that De Laval, the man who invented the cream separator, was a native of Sweden? Who would guess that the names of Hamilton, Douglas, Dickson, Wachtmeister, and Wallenberg are Swedish names; and still they represent some of the leading families of Sweden. As is well known, one of the 13 Colonies (now the State of Delaware) was of Swedish origin and bore the name of New Sweden in its early history.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Mr. Speaker, I wish to express, under the leave to extend my remarks, my appreciation of the attitude in this matter of the chairman, the gentleman from Washington [Mr. JOHNSON], and the other members of the Committee on Immigration and Naturalization. They originally reported a bill to repeal the national-origins provision, when this matter was first presented in 1927.

They realized the futility of the attempt to reach a fair and accurate conclusion upon the available historical and statistical data. The members of the committee, like other members of the House, have been flooded with telegrams, letters, and communications, which have tried to place the issue of this numerical computation upon the plane of patriotism and devotion to true Americanism. The fact is that many of those who so persistently have advocated the national-origins plan are not themselves free from the influences which they impute to those who differ with them. They speak of their "own national stock" and of their "own ancestry," in many cases so remote that they certainly can not trace them except through tradition or hearsay. It is unfortunate to raise such distinctions and classifications of our citizenship at a time when we particularly should be solicitous in securing national unity. The immigration, frequently designated as postcolonial, which has been the subject of these aspersions, has rendered valuable contributions to the growth and progress of our Republic, and in our national emergencies it has borne its full share of sacrifice of life, limb, and treasure for the preservation and welfare of our common country. Happily, these views have the approval of the great mass of our citizenship, without reference to their own national origin.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman from Texas use some of his time?

Mr. BOX. Mr. Chairman, I yield two minutes to the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. OLIVER].

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. Mr. Chairman, I wish to register at this time an emphatic protest against three actions on the part of the majority party in the closing days of this Congress: First, the deliberate decision yesterday afternoon to hold no session last night and to take a recess until 10 o'clock this Sunday morning. I challenge the majority leader to show any justifying reason for holding a business session of Congress on this the Sabbath day; next I protest against the action taken Friday at the urgent insistence of the Republican leaders, whereby you legalized all unlawful entries in this country of aliens prior to the year 1921, and armed them with the right to become American citizens, and later bring to our country millions of their foreign relatives; and next I protest against the effort now being made on this Sunday morning to defeat what is known as the national origins law, and which in the absence of further legislation will become effective on July 1 next, and reduce thereafter the number of aliens who can annually enter by approximately fourteen thousand.

Mr. BOX. Mr. Chairman, I yield four minutes to the gentleman from Florida [Mr. GREEN].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Florida is recognized for four minutes.

Mr. GREEN. Mr. Chairman, I shall ask not to be interrupted by questions.

In the legislation which is now before us, gentlemen, you have an opportunity to vote to directly express yourselves in favor of the alien bloc of America or in favor of the national patriotic organizations and American institutions. You have a chance of expressing yourselves here by your vote to-day for those original colonists who came here and founded the country and show the country that the alien blood shall now devour us. You have your chance to stand for the supremacy of native Americans. If you will notice, the gentlemen who are to-day advocating a delay and putting off the application of the national origins are 9 out of 10 of them for open immigration, not for restriction. They work against restrictions because they represent alien districts.

Mr. KVALE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GREEN. No; I can not yield; I am sorry. However, I do blame the chairman of the Committee on Immigration when he says he is a restrictionist and yet knows that putting off the national origins will admit thousands more aliens into the United States; I blame him when he comes here and poses as a restrictionist and yet calls upon the members of his party to put off once more the operation of the national-origins clause.

Mr. SCHAFER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GREEN. No; I can not yield.

I hope those who have behind them the courageous and patriotic Sons of the American Revolution and the other allied patriotic organizations of this Nation will heed these requests and vote against putting off the application of the national origins.

A large number of alien organizations have petitioned your Committee on Immigration to put off the national-origins provisions. On the other hand, every organization I know of in America which stands for the perpetuity of our national institutions and American ideals have called upon you to vote against putting it off. Now, which are you going to do? You had just as well face the facts. Are you going to join the alien blocs and organizations and refuse to heed the request of 90 per cent of the American people to have restriction or are you going to vote for restriction? It is a matter of voting against restriction or a matter of voting for restriction. I shall vote for restriction of immigration. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Florida has expired.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Chairman, I yield two minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. JACOBSTEIN].

Mr. JACOBSTEIN. Mr. Chairman and members of the committee, in order that you may know what the basis of the national-origins provision means you must know what the 1790 census was, since that is the basis for working out this plan. I have here in my hand the 1790 census. Only the male heads of families were enumerated. Women did not count. Their blood does not count in allocating the quotas under the national-origins provision of the immigration act of 1924. The census of 1790 does not directly give us any information regarding racial or national lineage. To determine this we assume that certain surnames indicate racial or national origins. This is pure guesswork.

I ask you, gentlemen, where would you classify Johnson, Johnstone, Jonson, Johnston, Jensen? Is it Irish, is it Scotch, or is it English? What are you, Mr. JOHNSON? "Johnsons" may be Swedes or Scotch or English. How can the experts decide? They guess at it. How do they know where to place him? I will ask you, Mr. GARRETT, how the experts are going to decide whether you are Irish, Scotch, French, or English? "Garrett" is spelled with variations in many ways.

There is nothing in the records to indicate whether Garrett is or was originally "Garrett" or "Gerot." Take the name of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. JENKINS], who defends the national-origins plan. Is it English? Why, no. It probably is Welsh. I asked the distinguished Speaker of the House [Mr. LONGWORTH] why his name is not in the 1790 census. Why is not his name here? His ancestors were here. The census takers just overlooked them. There are many such omissions. They fought in the Revolutionary War, but their names are not in this original census list.

Gentlemen, the 1790 census is the most ridiculous basis for allocating immigration quotas that can be proposed. The military records of the patriots of the Revolutionary War are the best proof of the inadequacy of the 1790 census. The confusion in the spelling of names by the enumerators is undoubtedly responsible for many errors. Folks changed their names then as they do now. A man's name to-day is no proof of his ancestors' origin. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired.

Mr. BOX. Mr. Chairman, how does the time stand?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has nine minutes remaining.

Mr. BOX. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks and to include some brief quotations.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. BOX. Mr. Chairman, ladies and gentlemen of the House, the very fact that this proposition is pending is unfortunate. If the national-origins provisions of the immigration law are bad, they should be repealed. If they are sound, we should let them alone. It is a pity to see certain alien blocs and politicians holding Uncle Sam astride the fence. Being unable to completely control him, they pull him back every time when he desires to go on his own American way.

Mr. McREYNOLDS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BOX. Yes.

Mr. McREYNOLDS. Is the gentleman advised that the Senate has recessed until 11 o'clock to-morrow, and that they do not intend to take up this matter?

Mr. BOX. I think it would make this more popular if it were understood that it did not mean anything.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BOX. Certainly.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. The gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. TILSON] asked me a few minutes ago if I had any recent information from the Senate. I have now. The Senate has recessed until 11 o'clock to-morrow.

Mr. TILSON. That does not change the situation so far as we are concerned. We should do our duty regardless of what another body may do. [Applause.]

Mr. BOX. I must pause here long enough to deal with some of the quibbling statements made during this debate by those who are trying to destroy these salutary provisions of the law. The gentleman from New York [Mr. JACOBSTEIN] undertook to interpret to this House the findings or views of the Census Bureau on the sufficiency of the data on which the national-origins quota is to be based. In view of what I know to be the attitude of Doctor Hill, Assistant Director of the Census and chairman of the board of experts, and the view of at least some of his responsible associates on that board, I am driven to the conclusion that the gentleman from New York [Mr. JACOBSTEIN] either talked with some politician in the bureau or thereabouts who, like some gentlemen here, wants to see this law destroyed, or that he talked with some mouthy, irresponsible clerk. The idea of having such a personal conversation presented here as information on which this House should act is itself ridiculous. This is still more pitiful in view of the fact that there are abundant official sources from which explicit information on this point can be obtained.

On January 18, 1927—committee hearings of that date, pages 7 to 25—concerning the work of that board under the provisions of the law, Dr. Joseph A. Hill, Assistant Director of the Bureau of the Census and chairman of that board, among other things, said:

The CHAIRMAN. But, on the contrary, errors one way would be balanced by errors the other.

Mr. HILL. That is true. We must remember with regard to most nationalities that that portion which came from 1790 stock forms only a relatively small part of the total quota, and you might have a considerable margin of error in that part without affecting the total very much.

The CHAIRMAN. It was suggested to me at one time that if the committee of which you were chairman had had authority to take all the population up to 1790 and then double the minority of the population, admitting the greater part of it is British, even that doubling would not greatly affect the total reached?

Mr. HILL. It would not make a very great difference.

Mr. DOUGLASS. How extensive was that first census of 1790?

Mr. HILL. It covered all the United States, then.

Mr. DOUGLASS. By comparison, if you have an opinion on the matter, how does it stand as to later censuses as to accuracy, if you have an opinion? In other words, are not the facilities of to-day more comprehensive and more liable to give us exactness than in 1790, when there was not the same means of arriving at accuracy?

Mr. HILL. My opinion would be the contrary in view of the fact that at the present time our great difficulties in these censuses come from the big cities where we have congested population, and we had nothing of that kind then. The communities were smaller. The enumerator would have a better personal knowledge of the people he enumerated. My belief is it would be easier to take an accurate census in those days than now. They did not hurry, but took their time, went from house to house. There were no big cities with a mixed, congested population at that time, and, consequently, I feel it is more accurate.

* * * * * * *

The CHAIRMAN. We had a small population, mostly from certain principal countries, and as he said, it is not so much of a guess; an estimate of a few at that time makes very little difference to the computation, and that is an answer to the question of Mr. DOUGLASS.

Mr. BOX. You do not say that it is unsafe or do not argue about its safety or the policy, but you say that such a research as might be made might add somewhat to the accuracy of it?

Mr. HILL. Yes; that is correct.

* * * * * * *

Mr. JENKINS. What would be your judgment as to whether or not the population of these increases of territory, the Louisiana purchase, the Florida purchase, and the acquisition of Texas, would affect your figure?

Mr. HILL. It would have some effect. We took that into account. It is rather a small element, perhaps 150,000 or 156,000; we took such figures as we found available.

Mr. BOX. So all those that were here in 1790 were considered as native stock?

Mr. HILL. We called them native stock, and only those that have come in since immigrant stock.

Mr. BOX. As to these elements outside of the thirteen Colonies, you had access to different records you found in history and otherwise, as to whether the Spaniards settled Texas or Florida, the French Louisiana, etc., and you figured those elements as factors in this computation?

Mr. HILL. Quite right.

At the 1928 hearings by the Senate, Senator DAVID A. REED asked the following question of Doctor Hill:

Senator REED. I would like to ask Doctor Hill, who is a census expert, what, in his opinion, is the fairest way to all of the nationalities involved of calculating the distribution of the aggregate quota of immigration that Congress sees fit to admit?

Doctor HILL. I am not sure that my qualifications as a census expert make my judgment on that question of more value than other people's. I will say, however, that no proposition has been brought to my attention that seems to me fairer than this one of national origins. There seems, indeed, to me to be a rather marked absence of alternative proposals, except the 1890 basis; that is about the only alternative I have had brought to my attention as against the national-origin plan. (Hearing, 1928, p. 17.)

Moreover, we have the recent official report, dated February 25, 1929, Senate Document No. 259, in which the three Secretaries show that they have been able to make these computations. On page 2 of that report the language is:

In compliance with the directions of this statute we have appointed a departmental committee to study this subject and to make calculations of what the quotas should be under the provisions of the law; and after consideration of and based upon the report of that committee, we, in the discharge of the duty laid upon us by the statute, have made the determination provided in subdivision (c) of section 11 of the act and jointly submit herewith the quota of each nationality determined as provided in subdivision (b) of the act. We also transmit the report, with its two inclosed tables, of the departmental committee appointed by us to study this subject and make calculations of what the quotas should be under the foregoing provisions of the act.

The committee appointed by the three Secretaries to make and report this ascertainment had, on February 21, 1929, made a report to them in which, among other things, they said:

SIRS: The committee which you appointed to determine immigration quotas on the basis of national origin as prescribed by the immigration act of 1924 respectfully submit the following report:

As a result of careful search carried on during the year that has elapsed since the previous report of February 25, 1928, was submitted, a limited amount of additional data, principally in the field of foreign statistics of emigration to the United States, has been obtained and utilized. At the same time the processes followed in utilizing census and immigration statistics, as explained in our previous report, have been reviewed and somewhat improved. As a result of the very considerable amount of effort thus expended, the figures previously submitted have been slightly revised. We are of the opinion that further study would not appreciably modify these results.

That report was signed by Richard W. Flournoy, jr., and S. W. Boggs, representing the Secretary of State; Joseph A. Hill, chairman, and Leon E. Truesdell, representing the Secretary of Commerce; and W. W. Husband and Ethelbert Stewart, representing the Secretary of Labor.

The answer to the unfortunate statements made here to the effect that such an ascertainment can not be made is that it has been made, and that the experts were so well satisfied with it that they felt justified in saying that "further study would not appreciably modify these results."

Inquiry was made of Doctor Hill about the accuracy of the showing of the foreign-born population in the country by the 1890 census as to its proportions to our entire population. I give the questions and answers:

Senator REED. Does the distribution of quotas based on the 1890 census reflect with any accuracy the proportion of nationalities that now exists in the United States?

Mr. HILL. No, indeed; it does not.

Senator REED. It gives the German quota, for example, 51,000 out of a total of 164,000.

Doctor HILL. Yes.

Senator REED. Is the German element in the American population 51 to 164, namely, 31 per cent?

Doctor HILL. No, sir; it is not. I do not see how anyone could be surprised at the fact that the German element forms a smaller portion of our total population in 1920 than it did of the foreign-born population in 1890; and in the same way with some of the other nationalities. Everyone must know, I suppose, that the English formed a larger proportion of the original stock in 1790 than any other nationality, and that they must form a larger proportion of the present population than they did in the foreign born in 1890. That seems to me almost self-evident without regard to whether our figures are accurate or not. That is a general fact that must result from the shifting from the 1890 to the national-origins basis. (Senate hearings, 1928, p. 17.)

Doctor Hill further testified as to the lack of accuracy of the 1890 census figures showing the foreign born merely as statistical records of such foreign born by countries of birth, with the following result:

Senator REED. If the question be raised of the element of uncertainty due to changes in political boundaries of Europe, it is true, is it not, that the element of uncertainty pertains as much to the 1890 basis as to national origins?

Doctor HILL. Quite true.

Senator REED. There is a necessary factor of guesswork there?

Doctor HILL. Or of estimate; yes.

Senator REED. In the effort to determine what portion of German immigration, let us say, came from German Poland?

Doctor HILL. Yes; I think there is perhaps a somewhat erroneous impression about that. Most people, I believe, have the idea that the 1890 basis rests upon exact figures, but that is rather far from being the case, because the 1890 census does not show how many people there were in the United States in 1890 who were born in that portion of Europe which is now Czechoslovakia. That had to be estimated. It does not show how many people there were in the United States in 1890 who were born in that portion of Europe which is now Yugoslavia; that had to be estimated. It does not show how many people there were from that portion of Europe which constitutes the present Germany or the present France, or the present Irish Free State; all through that had to be estimated. The law contemplates that. It provides that where there have been transfers of territory the number of people born in the transferred territory shall be estimated. So there is a pretty large element of estimate in the 1890 basis.

Senator REED. Of course, that is true of all the new countries created by the war; for example, Poland, Lithuania, Latvia, Estonia, Finland.

Senator WILLIS. That is practically a matter of guesswork?

Doctor HILL. We worked it out as carefully as we could. In making the 1890 allocation, as there was not very much time for careful study, the committee adopted rather arbitrarily the assumption that the immigration from the original country had been spread evenly through the parent country—say that 10 per cent of the population had been transferred from one country to another, it was assumed that the transfer took with it 10 per cent of the immigration. That was the assumption we made in arriving at the quotas on the 1890 basis. (Senate hearings, 1928, pp. 11 and 12.)

I call your attention to the statement of Doctor Hill, last above quoted, as to the estimates and uncertainties involved in the computation of the quotas based on the census of 1890. It may be that the suggestion of Senator Willis that, because of the elements mentioned, and, I may add, others not mentioned, the making of quotas based on the census of 1890 was "practically a matter of guesswork" is not quite justified. But I am justified in saying that there are many assumptions and uncertainties in computing quotas based on the census of 1890 as there would be in reckoning from the figures of any other one census. We have a right to make assumptions necessary to the maintenance of our restrictive policy. I will stand by the basis which the country fixes. If we are left nothing but the census of 1890, I will stand by that. But the national origins is more logical, more scientific, sounder, and would probably be more enduring than would the census of 1890, which was adopted only as a temporary basis. No part of the population of Europe and no bloc of people here, with or without strong foreign attachments, has any vested right in any temporary or permanent quotas which the country has found it convenient to use.

Another group of unjustified assertions were made in this debate in the desperate effort to discredit the support which the American Legion is giving to national origins and their great interest in its application. It was said that if anybody had spoken for the American Legion in support of national origins it was done without authority by some one who took upon himself that function and properly represented no one but himself in making such statements. Now, compare that statement with the facts. Mr. John Thomas Taylor is vice chairman of the legislative committee of the American Legion, appointed by the national executive committee and the national commander of the Legion to represent the Legion in legislative and other matters at Washington.

Mr. Taylor has held that important place for some 10 years. He appeared before the Senate committee during the early days of February, 1929, in behalf of the Legion and made an extensive and very strong statement before the Senate committee in opposition to just such a proposition as this one. Moreover, his authority to speak for the American Legion on this question does not result from his position alone. At its national convention, held in San Antonio, Tex., during 1928, its last preceding national convention, the American Legion specifically indorsed the national origins provision of the immigration law. That was done by a formal resolution. I now quote the language which their official spokesman used before the Senate committee of this Congress on February 9 in indorsing national origins, as follows:

(1) The Legion believes firmly in restrictive immigration. We believe that this is our country, and that we are entitled to be the judge of whether we shall allow people to come here from foreign countries to make their home with us, or to say to them, "We now have sufficient persons of other races within our shores."

(2) As we favor restrictive immigration, the question of how the immigrants should be chosen is of paramount importance. The selection of immigrants upon the basis of the foreign-born population resident in America at any selected date is manifestly unjust, and opens such a basis to the charge of discrimination. This discrimination must inevitably exist, regardless of the census upon which it may be based.

(3) The theory of the national origins of the entire population of the United States is therefore the fairest basis upon which immigration quotas may be based.

It is probable that this very language is largely a quotation from the resolution passed by the Legion in its national convention.

The groundless assertions that no one had any authority to speak for the American Legion on this question is an example of the desperate straits of those who are advocating this resolution and are on a parity with Mr. JACOBSTEIN'S repetition of gossip with some clerk or politician in the Census Bureau whose findings and conclusions have been so clearly stated by Doctor Hill.

An effort has been repeatedly and continuously made to create in this House the belief that the national-origins quota is based solely on the census of 1790 and that is followed by quibbles about names appearing on that census roll and the changes through which they have gone since. The census of 1790 is but one factor, and a relatively small factor, in the computation of the quotas under the national-origins plan. In his testimony before the House committee on the 18th day of January, 1927, Doctor Hill showed the fact just stated. I quote:

The CHAIRMAN. But, on the contrary, errors one way would be balanced by errors the other.

Mr. HILL. That is true. We must remember with regard to most nationalities that that portion which came from 1790 stock forms only a relatively small part of the total quota, and you might have a considerable margin of error in that part without affecting the total very much.

The CHAIRMAN. It was suggested to me at one time that if the committee of which you were chairman had had authority to take all the population up to 1790 and then double the minority of the population, admitting the greater part of it is British, even that doubling would not greatly affect the total reached?

Mr. HILL. It would not make a very great difference.

Note that Doctor Hill says that—that portion which came from the 1790 stock forms only a relatively small part of the total quota—

And that we—might have a considerable margin of error in that part without affecting the total very much.

The report of each census following 1890, the history of emigration from the countries contributing to our population stock, the history of the elements of population in Louisiana, in Florida, in Texas, and all information from all sources constitute the basis of the national-origins quota ascertainment. The purpose is to proportion our immigration to the racial stocks in America, computing native born along with all the rest, as the basis of our quotas as distinguished from a foreign-born basis. It is distinctively American in character. That is one of the chief causes of objection to it.

Everyone who is opposed to the restrictive features of the immigration law is opposing national origins and supporting this proposition, not because the proposition will not work, but because it will work.

Informed supporters of the immigration laws have from the first known the difficulty of maintaining the quota system with the census of 1890 as a permanent basis. That date is receding and will recede too far into the past. Because that and other weaknesses in that basis were recognized when the act of 1924 was written, the national-origins provisions were made the permanent basis and the keystone of the arch of the quota system. When you remove it you imperil the whole structure. Some of us will try to hold the pieces together, but there will be difficulty.

This attack does not result from sound reasoning in the interest of the law; it comes from bloc consciousness, bloc selfishness, and want of Americanism in certain foreign-born and hyphenated groups. Chief among these is the Steuben Society, which is the successor of the disloyal German-American Alliance. I quote from an article in the issue of the Progressive of February 15, 1927. The Progressive seems to be the main organ of the Steuben Society. The article from which I read is entitled "The Genesis of the Steuben Society of America." It begins with this sentence:

The fact that the German element in the United States did not make its influence felt to prevent President Wilson from dragging the country into war has been both a puzzle and a reproach. * * *

Of efforts to organize German forces in America, this article further says:

Efforts were not lacking to gather the clans. A meeting attended by representatives of all the German societies throughout the United States and attended by prominent Irish leaders—who proved steadfast during the war and were in intimate touch with Sir Roger Casement later—was held at the Willard Hotel in Washington in January, 1915.

Boasting of the loyalty of this type of German-Americans to the German Empire during the World War, this article says:

But still the German-American middle-class citizens did not waver; and hardly a shopkeeper or home owner among them but scraped his till to subscribe to the German war loans.

I shall show that this act, which you are asked to pass here to-day, is a part of the program these men have marked out for you. Continuing, and showing how these German elements, representing the old German-American Alliance and similar societies, merged into the Steuben Society, this article says:

A number of these stout-hearted men in New York resolved to form a secret society to which only American citizens of German blood, however remote their ancestry, should be admitted, hoping in this manner to supply a rallying point for all of their kindred who have suffered such shocking disappointment of faith in a government, * * * [meaning the Government of the United States].

He continues, and engages in a vicious and slanderous attack on the American Legion, saying:

The movement was inaugurated with great secrecy. The armistice had been signed, the war was at an end, but the air was still charged with high explosives. The American Legion, an organization of ex-service men, made some notorious attempts to continue the war in the United States.

Continuing to refer to the American Legion, he says:

In various localities they invaded German-American women's bazaars, held to raise money for the starving women and children of Germany.

Still venting disloyal German spleen on American war veterans as organized in the American Legion, this article continues:

In North Dakota a gang of rowdies, under the Legion banners in automobiles, armed with rifles and revolvers, stampeded a valuable herd of milch cows that had been collected at great financial sacrifice to be entrained for the East for shipment to Germany to relieve the milk famine.

But for the activity of that group some other good people whom they have stirred up would never have found occasion for complaint.

Our late lamented colleague, Hon. William N. Vaile, a thoughtful, diligent Member of this House and of its Committee on Immigration and Naturalization, on the 16th day of November said in this Chamber:

Mr. Speaker, an organization composed of American citizens of German birth or descent, known as the Steuben Society of America, is waging a vigorous campaign for the amendment of the immigration act of 1924.

Their opposition is based on the fact that these provisions are American and not pro-German. That group has grossly assailed one of our Presidents, now dead, and the President now living. I shall insert here what they said about President Coolidge in the very organ which they have used to attack these laws. That attack was made because he is an American and not a pro-German President.

In the June 15, 1927, issue of the organ of the Steuben Society is an article entitled "Sacred Hypocrisy," from which I quote:

Regarding President Coolidge's Memorial Day address, we readily concur in a good part of the criticisms which have been made upon it, notably with the opinions expressed by the German press with regard to his professions of principles, rendered little short of ridiculous in the light of our share in the making of the Versailles treaty.

* * * * * * *

The United States can afford to be above hypocrisy, but as long as Coolidge and his school of political leaders are in and about the White House the United States will never know the truth from official sources; the archives will never be opened that the motives why we entered the war may be revealed to the light of day.

In the same connection I shall insert, not all, nor a considerable part of their vile slandering of Mr. Hoover, but enough of their expression to show how they formerly hated him and when and how their attitude toward him changed.

In the June, 1928, number of their organ, the Progressive, which is a considerable magazine, published at Chicago and New York, on page 14, Frederick F. Schrader, editor of the Progressive, said:

The United States discovered Mr. Hoover during the late war. The great corporations and syndicates of England and Asia which specialize in the exploitation of natural resources of the undeveloped areas of the world knew him well before that time.

That and former issues of the Progressive are filled with matter about Mr. Hoover which I shall not disseminate and perpetuate by including in my remarks.

On page 4 of the August number of the same magazine is an article entitled "We Admit Our Error in Our Fight Against Herbert Hoover," by George W. Angerstein, president the Progressive magazine.

In the same issue of the same magazine is an article to the same effect by the editor, Mr. Frederick F. Schrader.

Why this sudden change of attitude by the organ of the Steuben Society between June, 1928, and August, 1928? In the New York Times of July 13, 1928, with a Washington date line of July 12, the following appears:

GERMANS WILL VOTE LARGELY FOR HOOVER, WORK IS ASSURED—SIX SPOKESMEN IN WASHINGTON COUNT 95 PER CENT FOR REPUBLICAN TICKET

* * * * * * *

(Special to the New York Times)

WASHINGTON, July 12.—While Secretary Hoover was conferring today with callers on plans for the campaign, Chairman Work, of the Republican National Committee, received representatives of several German-American organizations, who told him he could expect not less than 95 per cent of the citizens of German blood to vote for Hoover and Curtis.

* * * * * * *

LEADERS HAIL GERMAN REPORT

The report on the German-American vote information was considered of such importance that the national committee this afternoon made the facts of the conference the subject of an official statement, as follows:

"Six representatives of German-American groups pledged their support to Secretary Hoover at a conference with Chairman Work to-day.

"The delegation was composed of George W. Angerstein, organizer of the Steuben Club of Chicago and president of the Progressive magazine; Frederick F. Schrader, of New York City, editor of the Progressive, former secretary of the National Congressional Committee, and author of the first Republican textbook in the campaign in 1896; Thomas C. Angerstein, president of the National Historical Society; and Walter Miller, vice president of the Steuben Club of Chicago; Walter H. Brandenburg, vice president of the Board of Education of Chicago; and John J. Gorman, former Member of Congress from Illinois, and attorney for the Steuben Club.

"In deciding to support Mr. Hoover, members of the delegation admitted they were reversing their former position in opposition to him. The members of the delegation predicted that 95 per cent of the so-called German vote would go to the Republican nominee.

"Voters of German ancestry in the United States are interested especially in the national origins act, members of the delegation told Doctor Work, because they feel it is a reflection upon the quality of their citizenship. The delegation which visited the chairman was chosen at a general conference in New York City, which was attended by German-American publishers and representatives of German-American groups in New York, New Jersey, Illinois, Missouri, Nebraska, and Wisconsin."

* * * * * * *

The American Legion is another American institution which they hate bitterly and have widely slandered, because our boys, from the humblest privates to the officers in high command, were the opposite, very opposite, of pro-German. The American Legion is one of the leading organizations opposing this pending measure, which is a cowardly cringing to pro-German demands. I have already quoted several of their attacks upon the Legion and could quote many more, but I desist.

The American Legion was strongly represented before the Senate committee in support of national origins as an American provision of these laws. Along with the Legion are the Sons of the American Revolution, the Daughters of the Revolution, Daughters of the Union Veterans of the Civil War, Ladies of the Grand Army of the Republic, United Spanish War Veterans, Sons of the Confederacy, Daughters of the Confederacy, Disabled American Veterans of the World War, the National Women's Relief Corps, and some seventy other patriotic groups of the very best of our people, moved by devotion to dear American ideals—not catering to political machines and alien blocs—not running for office or pursuing any selfish design, but loving and working for good America, as their fathers and mothers did, without money and without price.

All these, led by the American Legion, are asking you not to do this thing.

This Chamber is the battle ground between two lines of opponents. The American Legion and their associates, blessed by the good wishes of a vast majority of America's millions, are on one side, while the Steuben Society leads certain politicians, hyphenated blocs, and kindred associate groups on the other side. I wonder who will win the contest—the American Legion and their associates and friends or the Steuben Society and their allies? The result will be a victory for one and a defeat for the other. If it were an open fight, I would expect the Legion, the Sons of the Revolution, and their fellow patriots to win. But they do not know all the wiles and camouflages of politics and politicians. I shall feel deeply humiliated if, in this devious arena, Uncle Sam's own boys and girls get lost in the maze and suffer defeat. If the long, loud roll of ayes repudiates the position of the American Legion on this question and proves that the pro-German and alien forces are the stronger, it will constitute a sad tattoo, a retreat, temporary, I hope, of heroes and patriots.

If our votes sustain the Sons and Daughters of the Revolution and all like them, headed by the American Legion, the flag will look still more distinctively American and the future brighter.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Chairman, we are about to conclude the debate on this distressful subject. The debates on this and other bills from the Committee on Immigration and Naturalization will give you some idea of the labor and stress that goes on in the committee. That strain is great. You can well imagine. I desire now to thank my colleagues on the committee for long hours of faithful work. We get along nicely in spite of our violent differences. We all desire to serve the country and to do what is best for the future of the country. I thank the gentleman from Texas, Judge Box, for his energy and fidelity and his earnest study of these problems. I owe thanks to the gentleman from Illinois, Judge SABATH, for his detailed knowledge of many laws on the subject, he being the ranking member in point of service on the committee. I thank Mr. VINCENT, Mr. FREE, Mr. JENKINS, and all of the others, for their efforts to hold our own committee debates to reason and to sane law.

I regret that it has been necessary so often to change the membership of the committee. Strong men here who have been on the committee two or three terms have moved to other committes—"moved up," as the saying goes. Perhaps some other committees are of higher rank and with greater privileges on the floor, but, my colleagues, this overworked Committee on Immigration and Naturalization holds the key, I firmly believe, to more of the problems of the United States, present and future, than any other committee. One member who left our committee to "move up" to a place on the quiet, dignified Committee on Foreign Affairs told me afterwards that he imagined that he felt like a man who had divorced his wife when he should not have done so. [Laughter.]

But our Committee on Immigration moves on. By the very nature of things we become extremists, and yet we progress by compromise. The mail from every congressional district to the committee is heavy. We have not enough clerks. Imagine the requests for informative documents about "national origins." Just how is the plan worked out? What is the mathematical progression? How solid is the colonial stock base? We have few public documents covering these questions in the language of the layman. We have population tables and national-origins figures as of 1924, as of 1927, 1928, and 1929—enough to supply Einstein with all the statistics his "relativity" theory will ever need. Our figures, however, deal with native stock, colonial stock, immigrant stock, and great grandparents, grandparents, parents, and their progeny—the "relatives" problem—which is harder of solution than Einstein's "relativity." I shall put some statements on national origins from all viewpoints and from the best authorities into the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD as an extension of this speech. Postponement is the problem before you now. Whatever your vote, however the President elect acts, national origins will continue to be a problem.

My colleagues, all phases of immigration are problems—even harder now than before restriction—the great act of nearly closing the doors. I had hoped that this Congress might act on a suggestion from our committee, name a congressional commission of Senators and Members of the House to study the laws, the evasions, to revise the naturalization code, to bring out in book form the "origins" studies, and to report to the Seventy-first Congress in December. Perhaps it is too late for us to act, but I sincerely hope that the incoming President may appoint a commission on which there will be Senators, Representatives, and prominent citizens, with authority to study and analyze these problems and recommend to Congress some legislation that will take the kinks out of one of the most important, certainly the most necessary, law we have on our books. [Applause.]

We hear it said and see it printed, "If they will not become naturalized, deport them." And you can not do it that way. We hear the cry from the orphan, from the stepchild, from the wife. We want to cure the hyphenated portions of our population, but you can not do it with a meat ax or a club. Keep your eye on the second generation—their children and our children. Make way! They are here!

Devise plans to get them out of the crowded and crooked cities. Get up something in place of the old homestead laws. Reclaim the waste lands, irrigate, develop, open the Columbia Basin, dike the overflowed lands, stop the erosions in the South. Assist the people to the land. That will help the farmer and not hurt him. It may cost something, but it will save millions. Be as far-sighted as were the fathers.

As the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. ROBSION] said here in an informative speech two or three days ago—

The 30,000,000 children in the schools of the United States to-day are the Republic of to-morrow.

It is true. A generation has grown up during the time I have served in Congress.

Macaulay, in his letter on American Institutions, said that our danger was from within, not without. But we did something that Macaulay could not forsee. We brought too many too fast from "without" to add to our problems from within.

Nearly all of each foreign-born first generation have done their best. But too often these days we find too many of the second generation piled up by thousands on thousands in the congested places. Starvation will drive them out some day, but only after much travail, disorder, gang government, and decline of city authority. We must all see that. For fear that some one will declare that I am assailing the foreign blood, I will hasten to say that we are all of alien ancestry, and that our own posterity is getting caught in the metropolitan maelstrom.

My colleagues, I desire to pay a tribute and recall to your memory our good old farmer friend from Kansas, Hon. HAYS B. WHITE [applause], who is ending five terms in Congress and who is contemplating this fight from a quiet, vine-covered homestead in far-away Kansas. Homely philosopher, corn-fed farmer, patriot, and poet, and always a sane legislator. Broken in health, he was not a candidate for a seat in the Seventy-first Congress. He lost his health, I believe, from slaving on the Committee on Immigration through the strenuous battle for the 1924 restrictive immigration act. His colleagues on the committee join in this tribute, as do you all, I am sure. [Applause.]

I also remind you that Judge Raker, of California, broke down as a result of his work on the committee, which hastened his death; and Vaile, of Colorado, overstrained himself, weakened his heart, and died suddenly. And may I say to my good friend Judge Box, of Texas, that while he throws so much energy and so much strength into the work of this committee and works equally as hard on other committees, I am afraid he will pay the penalty in health and strength all too soon, just as others of us have.

Try as we will, we can not make the immigration laws perfect. We hear the cries of those on the hustings, "Keep the good immigrants; throw out the bad ones." It can not be done just that way.

My colleagues, we have turned the corner in behalf of immigration restriction. Never again will the bars be down. Tighter and tighter will be the demand. People who were against restriction 15, 10, and even but 5 years ago are restrictionists now. Labor-saving machinery is increasing. In spite of prosperity there is more hand-to-mouth living than ever.

The next great problem must be the checking of immigration from countries of this hemisphere, and more particularly from Mexico.

Economic pressure pushes the peon people out from that Republic; economic suction draws them into this Republic. Slave and serf never sustained any Republic, never created any real prosperity. Unless we stop them right soon we will have in 15 or 20 years a great race problem in all of the southwestern part of the United States.

The Mexican peon will fill the fertile valleys of California and Arizona and the rich plains of Texas, crawling farther north every year. We must stop it. I will help Box, of Texas, in that fight. [Applause.]

In conclusion, let me impress on you that the census of next year, 1930, will show us to be more than 123,000,000. Also that, as President Coolidge himself put it, we are all in the same boat. Whether one here was born of slave ancestry, or descended from the Montezumas, or came from the loins of the Bourbons of France, or from the vikings of the northland, or from the Hapsburgs of Austria, or from the Lombards of Italy, or from Moses, Alexander, or the Cæsars we have carried on the Republic for more than 150 years, and are still carrying it on—the United States of America, which is not a democracy but a republic. We overworked the melting pot. In truth, I am afraid that we can not unscramble it now, but we can finish the job of restriction. We can strive on to amalgamate our 123,000,000 people. We are all here under this flag.

For a brief moment we do our part in sailing the ship of state. Another generation comes on. I thank you for your attention. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time for general debate has expired. The Clerk will read the resolution for amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Joint resolution (H. J. Res. 402) to amend subdivisions (b) and (e) of section 11 of the immigration act of 1924, as amended

Resolved, etc., That subdivisions (b) and (e) of section 11 of the immigration act of 1924, as amended, are amended by striking out the figures "1929" and inserting in lieu thereof the figures "1930."

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out, in line 6, the figures "1930" and insert the figures "1932."

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the House, the amendment which I have offered, if adopted, will postpone the national origin law, which I have always designated as a scheme, and which is a scheme, going into effect for three years instead of one year provided for in the resolution. I offer the amendment not so much for the purpose of having it adopted as for the purpose of enabling me to answer statements made by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. Box] and the gentleman from Florida [Mr. GREEN].

It is to be deplored and regretted that it is permissible for Members from time to time to make statements and charges for which there is no warrant or justification and which are made solely for the purpose of creating prejudice and resentment in our country against the immigrants—yes, and against the foreign born.

The gentleman from Texas made a charge on this floor, and many times heretofore, that the proposed resolution is being brought in here at the behest and command of the so-called foreign bloc. I say without fear of successful contradiction that the statements are not only unwarranted but untrue, as there is no such thing as a foreign bloc, and no one knows it better than the gentleman from Texas. But, as I have said, these charges are being made deliberately and without any foundation. There is a bloc, and everybody knows there is, but it is a bloc of restrictionists who in to-day's and yesterday's newspapers served notice upon the membership of this House that the resolution must not pass. The gentleman from Texas has called attention to the many patriotic orders and organizations whose names are attached, but he has failed to state the name of the main organization responsible for this contemptible, threatening proclamation which is not signed by this main organization, namely, the Ku-Klux organization, whose chiefs utilize the names of many of these organizations without their consent, and in some instances without their knowledge, relative to this legislation, but whose few officers abuse their official position and permit the organizations' names to be attached without reference to the desires of the membership. This unheard-of and unprecedented coercion in to-day's and yesterday's expensive advertisements should be resented and condemned by all self-respecting Members. The gentleman from New York, Mr. LAGUARDIA, the gentleman from Massachusetts, and other officers and ex-service men have positively stated that their great organization has never sanctioned the use of its name for this purpose, and this, I am sure, applies to a majority of the other organizations outside of the professional and restrictionist groups. The gentleman from Florida, as usual, tries to outdo the gentleman from Texas in wild, unfounded statements. The only thing that is pleasing to me is that neither the gentleman from Texas nor the gentleman from Florida speak for the Democratic Party or even for their respective States.

I do not like to abridge the privileges of Members, but I feel that in the near future in the interest of the dignity of the House some action will be necessary to preclude and prevent speeches and charges that have no foundation and are made only, as I have stated, to create prejudice and resentment against millions of our foreign-born people who are being maligned in that way without having any opportunity to answer these scurrilous charges and accusations.

For years these professional prohibitionists and paid lobbyists and under-cover Ku-Klux dictators have had a free hand in distributing falsehoods by their lying propaganda so as to close the doors of the United States to immigration, and anyone who has dared to oppose their program of discrimination was charged with favoring the open-door policy so that millions, as they charge, of undesirable immigrants could swarm into the United States, and this notwithstanding that they know that there are no such efforts being contemplated on the part of anyone.

I, who for 22 years have been a member of the Immigration Committee, have always opposed harsh and discriminatory immigration legislation, but have not been, and am not now, for the open-door policy. I have stated many times on this floor that I recognize the present policy of this Nation to restrict immigration which will remain the policy of our Nation for many years to come, but I opposed, and still do oppose, the willful and deliberate discrimination which keeps the doors wide open to Great Britain, Canada, the British possessions, and Mexico, and deliberately and willfully cuts down immigration from all the other nations of Europe to an unwarranted, negligible number on the false theory of these peoples' inferiority. Anyone who has studied conditions in Washington on the question of immigration, and is not blind to the facts, can not help but know that we are pursuing a British immigration policy, and this is what I am opposed to. I favor an American immigration policy—a policy which would be fair and just to all. Anyone who is familiar with the history of America and its development must recognize that the German, Irish, Bohemian, Polish, Lithuanian, Swedish, Scandinavian, yes, and many of the other nationalistic groups, have, by their genius and ability, aided in the progress and development of our Nation in all lines of endeavor and that they are as loyal and as patriotic as those who come from Great Britain. The last World War, and before it the Spanish-American, Civil, and Revolutionary Wars, proved that.

Instead of calling this law which is going into effect the national origin law it should be properly designated as the British origin law, as everyone who has been advocating it, I am absolutely certain, is of British leaning or of British stock, and has had the support of the British under-cover, subway diplomacy, and subsidy.

The three varying reports of the commission show that there is no way of ascertaining with any degree of accuracy the number that should be allocated to the respective nations according to origin. I herewith insert a compilation of these reports showing the glaring discrepancies in them.

With all due respect to Mr. Hill and the commission, composed of distinguished Secretaries Hoover, Kellogg, and Davis, these reports clearly demonstrate that they are merely guesswork plus a few ameliorating changes brought about by pressure and given as a balm to some of the peoples most discriminated against.

If the restrictionists are so determined to cut down immigration from certain countries as is being done by the national origin law, why not do it openly and aboveboard instead of camouflaging the issue.

If the proponents of this legislation favor actual restriction to protect American labor, why have they failed to place Canada, Cuba, Mexico, South and Central America, and the West Indies on a quota basis which will reduce immigration by 150,000 annually?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington, Mr. LAGUARDIA, Mr. DICKSTEIN, and several other Members rose.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Washington.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment, but doubt if it is necessary to carry on the debate any further. Therefore, I ask for a vote.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Chairman, I move that all debate on the resolution and all amendments thereto close in five minutes.

Mr. DICKSTEIN rose.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Washington that all debate on the resolution and all amendments thereto be closed in five minutes.

The question was taken, and the motion was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from New York [Mr. LAGUARDIA] in opposition to the amendment.

Mr. DICKSTEIN. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. DICKSTEIN. I have filed an amendment to one of the provisions of this joint resolution.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has not yet offered his amendment.

Mr. DICKSTEIN. I asked for recognition.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair promised recognition to the gentleman from New York, but his promise was foreclosed by the motion just agreed to to close debate. The Chair would be glad to recognize the gentleman, but it is impossible under the circumstances. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from New York [Mr. LAGUARDIA].

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Chairman, much has been said this morning on the floor, in the press, and in paid advertisements as to the standing of the American Legion on the question of the national-origins plan. I now state definitely that the American Legion, of which I am a member, has never taken any official stand on this question. [Applause.] I state further that the American Legion has a legislative committee, and only matters that are taken up by this legislative committee may speak for that great organization.

Mr. JENKINS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. I warn the American Legion that if any of their paid employees around Washington commence to interfere and speak for the Legion on matters on which they are not authorized to do so we will take this matter up in the convention of the Legion. [Applause.]

I say further to the American Legion that it must necessarily restrict its efforts to matters in which the Legion is peculiarly and particularly interested; otherwise if employees or minor local officers are permitted to lend the name of the organization to all sorts of legislation, the Legion will soon find that its influence has been dissipated.

Mr. SIMMONS. Why use the word "commence"? We know that one man claiming to represent the American Legion has been doing that around Washington for years.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. And for that reason he has weakened his standing in Congress and before committees of Congress, and I submit that to every member of the American Legion who is a Member of this House. The name of the Legion should not be peddled around. The Legion's indorsement should not be given unless specifically authorized by the national convention.

Mr. CONNERY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Yes.

Mr. CONNERY. In order that the matter may be clear in the RECORD, I ask the gentleman this question: At the last convention of the American Legion did the committee on resolutions of the Legion report any resolution in favor of this national-origins provision, and did the convention adopt such a resolution?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. It did not and it would not, and our legionnaire colleagues all know that.

Mr. CONNERY. I just wanted that to be clear in the RECORD.

Mr. LEHLBACH. Would not the amendment now pending before the House compel the President of the United States to open this question in April of the year of the presidential election, just at the time when the primaries throughout the country are being held?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. The dates speak for themselves.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SABATH].

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. DICKSTEIN. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry. Do I understand that debate is closed on this whole resolution?

The CHAIRMAN. Debate is closed on the resolution and all amendments thereto.

Mr. DICKSTEIN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to address the committee on this question for three minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent to address the committee for three minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. I object.

Mr. LEHLBACH. Mr. Chairman, I submit that we are sitting under the direction of the House itself, and the House limited the time. We in committee can not change that.

The CHAIRMAN. The committee has limited the time itself and has closed all debate.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. But the committee can extend that time.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise and report the resolution back to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I have a preferential motion. In view of the fact that this is dead and in order that we may get to something that may have a chance of passing, I move to strike out the enacting clause.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman care to be heard on that?

Mr. TILSON. Mr. Chairman, debate is closed.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Tennessee to strike out the enacting clause.

The question was taken, and the motion was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. If no further amendments are proposed, the committee will rise automatically under the rule.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. HOOPER, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration House Joint Resolution 402 and, pursuant to the rule, he reported the same back to the House.

The SPEAKER. Under the rule the previous question is ordered. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the House joint resolution.

The joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, and was read the third time.

The SPEAKER. The question is, Shall the joint resolution pass?

Mr. BOX. Mr. Speaker, on that I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 192, nays 152, not voting 83, as follows:

MEYER JACOBSTEIN AND FINIS J. GARRETT

Mr. CELLER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to put in the RECORD a portion of an article in the Woman's Journal on the subject of our colleagues, the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GARRETT] and the gentleman from New York [Mr. JACOBSTEIN].

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

Mr. CELLER. Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to insert in the RECORD a portion of an article appearing in the March issue of the Woman's Journal concerning our distinguished colleagues, MEYER JACOBSTEIN and FINIS J. GARRETT, which is as follows:

The gallery gods of Congress have looked their last upon several prominent Members who did not run, or ran behind. Senator JAMES REED, of Missouri, goes, singing his swan song to his favorite tune: "The war councils of every great nation have prepared plans for the sinking of the American Fleet, the bombardment of American cities, and they have laid out the roads over which the armies are to travel in case of war with the United States." The dwindling ranks of the wets are losing three of their mainstays in Senators EDWARDS, of New Jersey, BRUCE, of Maryland, and GERRY, of Rhode Island. Over on the House side, the outstanding losses are FINIS J. GARRETT, of Tennessee, and MEYER JACOBSTEIN, of New York, both Democrats of high principles and clear thinking.

Mr. JACOBSTEIN, a Representative who showed a disconcerting tendency to think in terms of economics rather than party policies, is one of the most generally liked men on the House floor, a rare example of the economic student in politics. It should be remembered to his credit that he presented to Congress one of the most complete and logical plans yet advanced for solution of the many problems in the unstable bituminous coal industry, which still sticks out like a sore thumb in the economic structure of the Nation. His name is attached to no important acts of Congress, and few pages of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD were required by him for "extension of remarks." But to a good many people who heard his reasoned, polite, beautifully phrased statements to congressional committees considering his bills, Mr. JACOBSTEIN will stand for some time as pretty nearly the ideal Congressman.

NATIONAL INSTITUTE OF HEALTH

Mr. SIROVICH. Mr. Speaker, I move to suspend the rules and pass Senate bill 4518, to establish and operate a national institute of health, to create a system of fellowships in said institute, and to authorize the Government to accept donations for use in ascertaining the cause, prevention, and cure of disease affecting human beings, and for other purposes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York moves to suspend the rules and pass a bill, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury is authorized and directed to establish and operate a national institute of health under the jurisdiction of his department and the administrative control of the Surgeon General of the Public Health Service, which shall be devoted to scientific research in the problems of the diseases of man and matters pertaining to health. The Hygienic Laboratory shall hereafter be known as the National Institute of Health. The Secretary of the Treasury is authorized to utilize the site now occupied by the Hygienic Laboratory, and the land adjacent thereto owned by the Government and available for this purpose, or when appropriations have been made therefor, to acquire by purchase, condemnation, or otherwise, in or near the District of Columbia, and to erect thereon suitable and adequate buildings, including furniture and equipment for the use of such institute. In the administration and operation of this institute the Surgeon General shall select persons who show unusual aptitude in science. The Surgeon General, with approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, may make such rules and regulations for the government and administration of such institute as he deems advisable. The Secretary of the Treasury is authorized and directed to submit to Congress not later than December 2, 1929, plans and estimates of appropriations necessary to carry out adequately the provisions of this act.

SEC. 2. The Secretary of the Treasury is authorized to accept, unconditionally, on behalf of the United States, gifts by will or otherwise for study, investigation, and research in all problems of the diseases of man and matters pertaining thereto. Any such gifts shall be held in trusts and shall be invested by the Secretary of the Treasury in securities of the United States, and the income thereof shall be administered by the Surgeon General, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, for the purposes indicated in this act. The Surgeon General is authorized to establish fellowships in the national institute of health, and utilize the proceeds thereof in aid of individual scientists who have demonstrated or give promise of marked proficiency in research and investigations relating to the diseases of man. Donations of $500,000 or over in aid of research will be acknowledged permanently by the establishment within the institute of suitable memorials to the donors.

SEC. 3. Individual scientists designated by the Surgeon General to receive fellowships may be appointed for duty in the national institute of health established by this act. During the period of such fellowship these appointees shall hold appointments under regulations promulgated by the Secretary of the Treasury, and shall be subject to administrative regulations for the conduct of the Public Health Service. Scientists so selected may likewise be designated for the prosecution of investigations in other localities and institutions in this and other countries during the term of their fellowships.

SEC. 4. The Secretary of the Treasury, upon the recommendation of the Surgeon General, is authorized (1) without regard to the classification act of 1923, to designate the titles and fix the compensation of the necessary scientific personnel; (2) in accordance with the civil service laws to appoint, and in accordance with the classification act of 1923, fix the compensation of such clerical and other assistants; and (3) to make such expenditures (including expenditures for personal services and rent at the seat of government, for books of reference, periodicals, and exhibits, and for printing and binding) as he deems necessary for the proper administration of such institution.

SEC. 5. The facilities of the institute shall from time to time be made available to bona fide health authorities of States, counties, or municipalities for purposes of instruction and investigation.

The SPEAKER. Is a second demanded?

Mr. MAPES. Mr. Speaker, I demand a second.

Mr. SIROVICH. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that a second may be considered as ordered.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York [Mr. SIROVICH] is recognized for 20 minutes, and the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. MAPES] is recognized for 20 minutes.

Mr. SIROVICH. Mr. Speaker, ladies and gentlemen, in 1826 a very distinguished Englishman gave the sum of $550,000 to the Congress of the United States for the purpose of diffusing knowledge, education, and culture to the citizens of the United States. The gentleman who gave this money was a man by the name of Smithson, and the Smithsonian Institution has been named to commemorate his name and his fame.

To-day we have before the House what I consider one of the most important bills that has ever been presented to the Congress of the United States. It is a bill that, if passed by the Seventieth Congress, will make America, this great country of ours, the most scientific nation in the field of medicine throughout the civilized world.

This bill of mine that passed the Senate the other day is designed to establish and operate in our country a "national institute of health." It creates a system of fellowships to deserving students that have been graduated from American universities and authorizes the Government to accept donations from philanthropic citizens to be utilized in ascertaining the cause, prevention, and cure of all the unknown diseases that afflict humanity.

All the great advances that have been made in preventive, scientific, and therapeutic medicine during the last half century have emanated with very few exceptions from the laboratories of Germany, supported by its government. Robert Koch was the pioneer in the field of tuberculosis, and his findings are to-day being utilized in the treatment of tuberculosis. The cause of diphtheria, as well as its toxin and antitoxin, was discovered by Von Behring in these German institutes. The French contributed somewhat to its development. The world to-day is utilizing the genius of German intellectuality when it treats lockjaw as well as cholera. The ravages of typhoid fever were eliminated by German savants in the discovery of the bacillus typhosus and the Widal reaction which recognizes the disease. This discovery helped England to eliminate typhoid fever in the Boer War, the Japanese in the Russo-Japan War, while the Americans used it to great advantage in the World War. A decade ago the cause of syphilis was as unknown and as mysterious as that of cancer to-day, yet German laboratories utilized the microscope of science and forced it to yield its secret. The result was the discovery of spirochitæ pallida, the cause of syphilis, the Wassermann reaction, and above all its cure by Ehrlich's salvarsan, or 606, treatment, all the result of Germany's laboratories supported by the government.

Mr. CRAMTON. Has this bill ever been reported by any committee of the House?

Mr. SIROVICH. This bill passed the Senate only two days ago. The House Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce has had no hearings on this measure. That is why I requested the Speaker to suspend the rules of the House, to bring this measure immediately before this historic body, and try to see if we can not have it passed before Congress adjourns to-morrow.

What a glorious contribution the Seventieth Congress of the United States would give to the world in helping to organize, perfect, and develop this national institute of health. To you distinguished gentlemen who come from the South—you realize how malaria has plagued your forbears, yet some of the finest work done in the field of malaria came from the English in India and Africa until American genius, under the supervision of Walter Reed and his associates, blotted it out from the civilized frontiers and outskirts of the world. [Applause.]

Mr. O'CONNELL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SIROVICH. Yes; I yield to my distinguished friend.

Mr. O'CONNELL. It is reported that this bill is going to cost a lot of money. Will the gentleman state approximately what the cost will be?

Mr. SIROVICH. This bill, as amended by the Senate, carries no appropriation for the present whatsoever. It authorizes the Secretary of the Treasury to make all the necessary formal plans and specifications, so that when Congress convenes in December, 1929, the necessary costs will already have been determined. Then appropriations will be asked for to carry into realization all the principles and ideals that belong to an American national institute of health.

Mr. Speaker, ladies and gentlemen, in 1892 Japan established a national institute for the study of tropical diseases to safeguard and protect its citizens. In that institution they discovered the cause and treatment of bubonic plague, as well as the shiga bacillus that is responsible for various forms of dysentery that has caused the death of millions of people throughout the world.

What would humanity do to-day without the use of the X ray? Yet that extraordinary discovery comes to us from the laboratories of Germany.

Cancer, next to heart disease, is killing millions of men and women throughout the world. Yet, outside of the surgeon's scalpel, the only available treatment for that terrible disease is the utilization of radium, which has been discovered by Madame Curie, working in French laboratories, supported by the Government. Have you forgotten Pasteur and Metchnikoff, working in the Pasteur Institute and bringing distinction and fame to the tricolor of France?

To-day the cause of cancer is unknown, yet it is no more mysterious than syphilis, yellow fever, malaria, and meningitis were a few years ago. If you establish a national institute of health to ferret out the causative factor of unknown diseases, you may be instrumental in saving the lives of millions who are destined in the future to die from pneumonia, kidney and heart disease, and disease of hardened blood vessels, the four conditions that cause most of the deaths in the world.

Mr. Speaker, ladies, and gentlemen, this bill of mine in the House, and of my associate, Senator RANSDELL, in the Senate, has the indorsement of the American Medical Association, the American Chemical Society, the American Public Health Association, the American College of Surgeons, the American Institute of the City of New York, the American Association for the Advancement of Science, the American Dental Association, and countless others. It has the personal approval of two of the greatest surgeons in the world, Drs. William and Charles Mayo. It has the indorsement of America's greatest pathologist, Doctor Welch, of Johns Hopkins. Prof. Reid Hunt, the most eminent authority on pharmacology in the United States and professor at Harvard, has come to Washington to urge its approval. George Vincent, president of the Rockefeller Foundation, has sent his personal approval of the measure. Prof. Lewellys F. Barker, the successor to Professor Osler at Johns Hopkins University, the most distinguished clinician in America, is for this bill.

President Coolidge has signified his intention to sign it if passed. Secretary Mellon, of the Treasury Department, has written enthusiastically in its support, and last, but not least, Surg. Gen. Hugh S. Cummings, Chief of the Public Health Service of the Government of the United States, the foremost and outstanding genius in public-health work, is for this bill. Should we hesitate to pass it? Mr. Speaker, ladies, and gentlemen, at West Point and Annapolis we have the greatest military and naval institutes in the world. Here the flower of American youth is trained to love our country in time of peace and to patriotically fight for its preservation in times of war! There is not one of us in this House that would not gladly bare his breast to shot and shell that our country may continue to prosper, flourish, and grow, yet no greater monument could be erected in times of peace to perpetuate the name and fame of those whose life blood hallows the military and naval cemeteries of our Republic than through the erection of a national institute for public health that will serve all the people of our Republic, irrespective of race, creed, or color. [Applause.]

Mr. CRAMTON. Will it interrupt the gentleman to ask a question?

Mr. SIROVICH. I will yield to the distinguished gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. CRAMTON. It is just a question of proper legislative methods. The House is one of the two bodies charged with the responsibility, and the proper committee—and it is a very able committee—has not seen fit for some reason to report this bill. It carries authority for unlimited charges on the Federal Treasury. The bill provides:

> There is hereby authorized to be appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, such sums as may be adequate to carry out the provisions of this act.

There is no limit whatever on the appropriation.

Mr. SIROVICH. That has been amended by the Senate, and I sent up the amended Senate bill which takes out the money appropriation.

Mr. CRAMTON. That is another illustration of the fact that the House has not even the bill in printed form.

Mr. SIROVICH. It is just to allow the Secretary of the Treasury to make formal plans and specifications so that we may know when we come back here on December 2, 1929, how much money will be necessary to carry the ideals of the national institute of health into fruition.

Mr. CRAMTON. But the bill does establish the institute.

Mr. SIROVICH. Exactly.

Mr. CRAMTON. And calls on the Secretary to make plans and specifications, and so forth.

Mr. SIROVICH. And report back to the House at the next session, on December 2, as to what we shall do. It gives us a year's time in which to work.

Mr. CRAMTON. But it gives the membership of the House no time whatever to examine the provisions of the bill that is before us. If the House wants to abdicate its functions and let the Senate do the legislating and the House act as a rubber stamp, this would seem the proper course, but I can not understand it on any other basis.

Mr. SIMMONS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SIROVICH. I yield to the gentleman from Nebraska.

Mr. SIMMONS. I find on page 3, line 2, of the bill a misspelled word. The word "established" is misspelled, so that it means nothing. How is the gentleman going to correct that by this procedure?

Mr. SIROVICH. That is a typographical technicality which can be taken care of. I am not worrying about that.

Mr. SIMMONS. The establishment of it is the important part, I should presume.

Mr. O'CONNOR of New York. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SIROVICH. Yes.

Mr. O'CONNOR of New York. May I say to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CRAMTON] that the situation about which he complains is so usual in this House that within the past few days I believe that in at least 20 instances we have passed a Senate bill which was never reported by any House committee and never considered before in the House.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Twenty? About 100 instances.

Mr. O'CONNOR of New York. Perhaps nearer 100 instances.

Mr. SIROVICH. Mr. Speaker, I reserve the balance of my time to reply after others have spoken.

Mr. MAPES. Mr. Speaker, I think the membership of the House ought to understand the legislative situation before acting upon this motion to suspend the rules and to pass this very important piece of legislation. The Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce has jurisdiction of the legislation. The bill has been pending in the Senate for several months. The gentleman from New York [Mr. SIROVICH] says it has been before the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce. If it has been, as one member of that committee, it was not called to my attention. No hearings have been had upon it, and no request for any has been made that I know of, and I think the chairman of the committee will bear me out in that statement.

It was pending in the Senate for a great many months. It passed the Senate on Friday night, about 10 o'clock, and was messaged to the House of Representatives yesterday. A great many members of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce have been requested to make this motion to suspend the rules and to pass the bill, which the gentleman from New York now makes. The members of the committee have refused to make the motion. The chairman of the committee was asked to make it, and he said he could not do so because the committee had not considered the legislation and had had no opportunity to pass on its merits. Under such conditions he was unwilling to take the responsibility of asking the House to pass it.

Mr. ABERNETHY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MAPES. Yes.

Mr. ABERNETHY. This is an unusual circumstance. We are legislating on Sunday, and how could we do better than to legislate in the interest of humanity? [Applause.] Why can not we do it?

Mr. MAPES. If the gentleman from North Carolina wants to take the responsibility of passing legislation without having it considered by any committee of the House of Representatives, that is his business. I, for one, do not care to do so.

I have been looking over the RECORD of the proceedings in the Senate for the last week with a little more care than usual, and the Senators have taken the high and mighty position, or some of them have, that the House itself was to blame for not getting House bills over to the Senate in time for them to be considered by the committees of the Senate. That was in reference to minor matters of legislation. Here is a piece of legislation of major importance that has come to this body within the last 24 hours. There has been no opportunity for any committee of the House of Representatives to consider it. It is a poor rule that does not work both ways.

Mr. SIROVICH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MAPES. No, I can not yield; I have not the time. As the House knows, the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce reported some public-health legislation at the last session of Congress. This bill, in its present form at least, was not a part of that legislation. The details of this bill have never been considered by any committee of the House. The gentleman from New York says the bill was amended in the Senate in some respects. We have not had an opportunity even to see a copy of the bill as it finally passed in the Senate. I supposed the copy that has been handed us was the same as it came from the Senate until the statement just made by the gentleman from New York. He says that it does not require any appropriation, does not "ask for an appropriation of a dollar," to quote his language. Let us see what the Senate had before it until 10 o'clock Friday night. The bill says:

> The Secretary of the Treasury is authorized * * * to acquire by purchase, condemnation, or otherwise in or near the District of Columbia, and to erect thereon suitable and adequate buildings, including furniture and equipment for the use of such institute.

The bill also carries this further provision:

> There is hereby authorized to be appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, such funds as may be adequate as to carry out the provisions of this act.

The gentleman from New York says that the bill does not ask for a dollar out of the Treasury. It does not actually make the appropriation, but it authorizes—> the Secretary of the Treasury to make such expenditures (including expenditure for personal services and rent at the seat of government for books of reference, periodicals and exhibits, and for printing and binding) as he deems necessary for the proper administration of such institution.

Yet the gentleman says that it does not ask for a dollar!

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MAPES. Yes.

Mr. CRAMTON. I have in my hand the bill as it comes from the Senate. The amendment makes no real change. There is a change of language, but not of effect. Appropriations without limit are authorized by this bill. It provides:

> That the Secretary is authorized and directed to submit plans and estimates of appropriations necessary to carry out adequately the provisions of this act.

That is unlimited authority for appropriations. Those estimates will go to the Appropriations Committee and not to any legislative committee.

Mr. MAPES. Mr. Speaker, because of the fact that a subcommittee was appointed to consider public-health legislation in the last Congress, of which I was chairman, I am making this statement; and in doing so I am speaking, as far as I know, the sentiment of the members of the committee.

The committee takes no responsibility for this legislation; it has no knowledge of its merits or demerits except what has been said here on the floor; it has had no opportunity to consider it, and it feels that it is an important piece of legislation, too important to be put through in the closing hours of this session of Congress without consideration by a committee. We are going to be in session again in the near future, and this legislation can be taken up at that time. It ought not to pass without the recommendation of some committee of this House.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MAPES. Yes.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. I call the gentleman's attention to the fact that as shown by page 45 of the Senate committee report this bill is without the approval of the Director of the Budget, and there is no recommendation in its behalf by any department or any responsible governmental office. Furthermore, as I am informed, every Member, both Democratic and Republican, of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce has been invited to make the motion to suspend the rules, and all of us have been unwilling to do so. Also, it is my information, may I say to my Democratic friends, that every Democrat on the committee is opposed to having the bill passed under this procedure without having been considered by the committee.

Mr. MAPES. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. SIMMONS] has just called my attention to another fact. The bill authorizes the Secretary of the Treasury, upon the recommendation of the Surgeon General, without regard to the classification act, to designate titles and fix the compensation of the necessary scientific personnel or such as he deems necessary to administer the act. Mr. Speaker, there could be no broader language used to give the Surgeon General of the Public Health Service through the Secretary of the Treasury unlimited authority to go ahead and conduct this institute and to spend money as he sees fit than is used in this bill.

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MAPES. Yes.

Mr. CRAMTON. And if this House establishes this precedent and allows one bureau to fix its salaries without regard to the compensation act, it will have opened the doors for every scientific bureau in the Government to do the same thing.

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MAPES. I think the gentleman ought to get his time from the other side. In brief, the position of our committee is this: This legislation may be all that the gentleman from New York says for it. We do not know. The House does not know. No committee of the House has passed upon it and it is altogether too important to act upon without the recommendation of some committee of the House. I reserve the remainder of my time.

Mr. SIROVICH rose.

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. Mr. Speaker, before the gentleman from New York begins, will he yield to me for a question?

Mr. SIROVICH. Yes.

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HUDDLESTON] stated that this bill did not have the approval of the Director of the Budget. I state to the House that this bill has the approval of the Director of the Budget and the Secretary of the Treasury, and the bill is simply carrying out the provisions written in the Democratic platform with reference to public health. Respecting the statement made by the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. MAPES], it is a matter of fact that the Interstate and Foreign Commerce Committee did not even have any hearings when it asked the House to pass a bill providing for a survey of the Nicaraguan route for the canal.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SIROVICH. I think the gentleman from Alabama should get his time from the gentleman from Michigan.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman declines to yield.

Mr. SIROVICH. Mr. Speaker, ladies, and gentlemen, the pioneer of medicine is the research worker. In the battle with bacteria, he is invariably the martyr and pays the penalty with his life. To this soldier of science, the national institute of health would be a veritable paradise. Here would be his home. Here would be the Mecca to which the scientific youth of America would gravitate, and from here, the Capital of this great Nation, he would be sent as a messenger of "peace and good will" to carry and bring back as an American fellow the labor and fruit of scientific genius wherever it is found. To the philanthropist, who is anxious to bequeath of his monetary wealth, this bill is a godsend. Because it enables a man by his contribution to immortalize his name and perpetuate his fame by endowing the mind of genius to unravel nature's mysteries in the realm of disease. [Applause.]

Science knows no barriers, no races, no classes. It has no boundary lines. Its services are universal. Behold America's four great geniuses: Alexis Carrel, the winner of the Nobel prize; Simon Flexner, the distinguished director of the Rockefeller Institute and the discoverer of the cure of epidemic meningitis; Hideyo Noguchi, Nippon's favorite yet America's adopted son, whose great contribution to scientific medicine has not been equaled in this the twentieth century of civilization, and who died at Gold Coast in Africa, a martyr to science; and last but not least, the great medical soldier from my district on the east side of New York, Dr. Louis Goldberger, whose heroic and wonderful research work in the South in pellagra, hookworm, and yellow fever will forever perpetuate his name in the hall of fame of America's immortals. [Applause.]

For the fiscal year 1928 the Government of the United States has spent about $600,000 for the utilization of the Surgeon General to investigate sickness and disease in our country.

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. Will the distinguished gentleman from New York yield?

Mr. SIROVICH. I yield to the honorable gentleman from Georgia.

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. I call the gentleman's attention to the fact that within the last five years this House has appropriated $54,000,000 for the eradication of diseases in plants and animals, but only $3,000,000 for the preservation of the life of the Nation.

The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CRAMTON] is a member of the Committee on Appropriations, and if any money is asked for to carry out the provisions of this bill it would necessarily have to come before his scrutinizing eye, and unless there is merit to it, of course not one dollar would be appropriated.

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SIROVICH. In a minute. My distinguished friend, Mr. CRAMTON, who always champions the principle of prohibition as its leader and is always happy to spend the public's money to enforce prohibition, should certainly welcome the opportunity to conserve and preserve the health of the people of the United States by the establishment of a national institute of health.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield there?

Mr. SIROVICH. Yes.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Is not the public health just as necessary as education, and ought it not to be on a par with it?

Mr. SIROVICH. Yes; and on a par with public morals. [Applause.] Mr. Speaker, I reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. MAPES. Mr. Speaker, how much time remains?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the gentleman from New York desire to use more of his time?

Mr. SIROVICH. If the gentleman from Michigan does not, I do not.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from New York has two minutes remaining and the gentleman from Michigan six minutes.

Mr. MAPES. I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. DENISON].

Mr. DENISON. Mr. Speaker, of course any of us could mention the names of many great doctors who have made great sacrifices in the study of diseases. But that is purely a question of sentiment. That is not the question to be decided here. There is no time left this near the close of Congress to pass a very important and far-reaching bill as this is. I do not think it ought to be done.

Mr. SIROVICH. You did the same thing with the Nicaragua resolution.

Mr. DENISON. No; we did not. There is no use in making such a statement. Our committee considered carefully and reported the bill concerning Nicaragua. The bills that have been considered without consideration of a committee have been private bills, not bills of any great importance or bills of a general character.

I do not think we ought to take up and pass this bill at this time, because none of us knows what it contains. I confess I do not know what is in the bill. I may be in favor of it after I have had a chance to study it and know something about it. Why should we legislate in the dark? We ought not to do that. Congress is going to convene early in April and——

Mr. ABERNETHY. But we are to be restricted in the subjects that will be considered then.

Mr. DENISON. No. The Speaker might recognize anyone to suspend the rules and pass such legislation in the extra session of Congress. The Speaker can recognize the gentleman from New York to suspend the rules and pass this bill in the extra session of Congress. I say if we are going to legislate on this matter we can do it at the extra session of Congress as well as now, and in the meantime we can have an opportunity to find out what is in the bill.

Mr. LINTHICUM. We did not have any hearings on the Jones bill even when 43 Members asked for a hearing.

Mr. MAPES. Mr. Speaker, I yield three minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. PARKER].

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from New York is recognized for three minutes.

Mr. PARKER. Mr. Speaker, I simply want to state that the position of the committee of which I have the honor to be chairman is not so much in opposition to the bill as in opposition to the method of procedure. We are not discussing the merits of this bill, because we know nothing about the bill itself.

I was requested yesterday to ask for a suspension of the rules and take this bill from the Speaker's table and pass it, but I refused to do it, not because I was opposed to the bill but because I do not know anything in the world about it. I could not stand here on this floor and commend it.

Mr. JOHNSON of Oklahoma. Has not the gentleman voted for a hundred or more bills that have been passed in the House in the last few days without full and serious consideration?

Mr. PARKER. No. This is the only bill that I know of that has been brought up in this way.

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. PARKER. Yes.

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. Is there anything unusual about the procedure of considering a bill that has passed the Senate and when the House is asked to consider it?

Mr. PARKER. I did not yield for a speech; only for a question. I think it is decidedly unusual to bring up a bill of this character in this way.

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. But if the subject is important, would not that be all right?

Mr. PARKER. It is somewhat unusual, I repeat, to bring up a bill of this kind without the consent of the committee to which this character of bill should be referred.

Mr. CROSSER. Was not the gentleman's attention called to the bill the other day, when its advocates sent around to each member of the gentleman's committee a copy of it, with a request for its consideration over their signatures?

Mr. PARKER. I think so.

Mr. WATRES. Has anything been urged as an emergency that could show the necessity for the consideration of this bill under the circumstances?

Mr. PARKER. No. A request was handed to me only yesterday, asking that the rules be suspended and the bill passed.

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Speaker, so far as I know, I do not know of the House passing even a private bill unless an identical bill has been considered and been reported by a committee. I know of no exception to that.

The SPEAKER. The question is, Shall the rules be suspended and the bill passed?

The question was taken; and two-thirds having failed to vote in favor thereof, the motion to suspend the rules and pass the bill was rejected.

CHARLES N. NEAL

Mr. GLYNN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of Senate bill 5679 for the relief of Charles N. Neal.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Connecticut asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of Senate bill 5679, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That any disability occurred in line of duty by Charles N. Neal while serving as an officer of the Army of the United States during the World War from March 26, 1917, to December 11, 1918, inclusive, shall be deemed and considered to have been so incurred while serving as an officer of the Army of the United States other than as an officer of the Regular Army, so as to entitle said Neal to the benefits and privileges of the emergency officers' retirement act (Public, No. 506, 70th Cong.): Provided, That such disability rating is sufficient and said Neal is otherwise eligible for retirement under the terms and conditions of said act: And provided further, That said Neal shall not be entitled to any back pay or allowances by the passage of this act.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. SCHAFER. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, has a similar House bill been reported by the Committee on Military Affairs?

Mr. GLYNN. It has, and I have a copy of the report here.

Mr. SCHAFER. By unanimous vote?

Mr. GLYNN. Yes; by unanimous vote.

Mr. SCHAFER. I shall not object.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I think the gentleman should give us some explanation as to why this bill is brought forward in this way. It is my understanding there is no precedent for passing a private bill for the benefit of a World War soldier, and that we have heretofore remitted such cases to the Veterans' Bureau for the payment of compensation under the general statutes.

Mr. GLYNN. I think a great many such private bills are put in. This is the case of a man who was an emergency officer and who was discharged in 1920 suffering from tuberculosis. Later his disability was arrested, and he was appointed a captain in the Quartermaster Corps of the Regular Army. Then later he was discharged as a captain. If he had continued as an emergency officer, or if he had been discharged originally as an emergency officer, he would have been entitled to the benefit of the provisions of the emergency officers' retirement law; but having accepted a commission, and holding it for about two years, in the Regular Army, in the Quartermaster Corps, he is barred from the provisions of the emergency officers' retirement act.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. How much disability compensation is this veteran now receiving under the compensation laws?

Mr. GLYNN. I think he is receiving none.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Why is he not receiving it? He is certainly eligible to receive it. Is his tuberculosis arrested?

Mr. GLYNN. Yes; it was an arrested case; but it is no longer arrested.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Is it active?

Mr. GLYNN. Yes.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Then he is entitled to receive compensation from the Veterans' Bureau at the full rate. Let me ask the gentleman whether this veteran was retired for disability?

Mr. GLYNN. I think not; I think his case was arrested.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. As I understand, he became disabled by reason of tuberculosis while holding a Regular Army commission?

Mr. GLYNN. No; while holding an emergency officer's commission.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Then why is he not eligible for retirement as an emergency officer?

Mr. GLYNN. Because when his case was arrested he accepted a commission in the Quartermaster Corps.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. In the Regular Army?

Mr. GLYNN. Yes.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. And then when his case became active again he was retired for disability from the Regular Army; is that right?

Mr. GLYNN. I think he was retired as an emergency officer, but having been a Regular Army officer he is not entitled to the benefit of the provisions of the emergency officers' retirement act.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. I will say to the gentleman that it is quite beyond all possibility, as I see it, that a Regular Army officer would be retired for disability as an emergency officer. I do not understand how that could happen.

Mr. GLYNN. I understand there are two or three cases——

Mr. HUDDLESTON. I see present here several members of the Committee on World War Veterans' Legislation——

Mr. RANKIN. I am just waiting for the gentleman to conclude in order to take that question up with the gentleman from Connecticut.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. The responsibility is theirs, but I want to know whether we are to start in on a system of giving benefits by private legislation to veterans of the World War or are we going to adhere to our previous policy of requiring them to seek their relief under the general law. It is time for us to make that decision now.

Mr. TILSON. Is it the purpose of either of the gentlemen to object to the consideration of this bill?

Mr. RANKIN. I am going to try to get some information about it.

Mr. TILSON. The gentleman has not made up his mind whether he is going to object or not. If he has, I wish he would let me know.

Mr. RANKIN. I am trying to find out whether or not this bill has been referred to the Committee on World War Veterans' Legislation.

Mr. GLYNN. It has not. This bill was reported favorably by the Senate Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. RANKIN. I understand that.

Mr. GLYNN. And was passed by the Senate, and a similar bill is reported here.

Mr. RANKIN. I understand that, but has a similar bill been reported by the Committee on World War Veterans' Legislation of the House?

Mr. GLYNN. Not that I know of.

Mr. RANKIN. Or by any other committee?

Mr. GLYNN. Yes; by the Military Affairs Committee.

Mr. RANKIN. I understand that, but this legislation comes primarily within the jurisdiction of the Committee on World War Veterans' Legislation.

Mr. Speaker, this is a very important proposition. The Chairman of the Committee on World War Veterans' Legislation has consistently refused to permit legislation of this kind to come from his committee. I do not think it would be the proper policy to begin now to permit breaking around the rules of the House and start doing by indirection what we are not permitted to do by direction and I hope the gentleman will withdraw his request and let this bill go to the Committee on World War Veterans' Legislation for further consideration.

Mr. GLYNN. This is not my bill, I will say to the gentleman from Mississippi, and if the gentleman wants to block a worthy measure he must take the responsibility.

Mr. RANKIN. The gentleman from Mississippi does not mind taking responsibility whenever it becomes necessary to do so.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the chairman of the Committee on World War Veterans' Legislation, who is opposed to legislation of this kind, and in view of the fact that it has not been considered by the committee, I must object for the time being.

JOHN J. HELMS

Mr. GLYNN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (S. 5386) extending benefits of the World War adjusted compensation act, as amended, to John J. Helms.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That in administration of the World War adjusted compensation act, as amended, John J. Helms, formerly private, Supply Company, One hundred and twenty-third Regiment United States Infantry, World War, shall be held to be entitled to the benefits thereof in the same manner and with the same effect as if a separation from the military forces of the United States on October 24, 1918, had been honorable.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, this bill has not been referred to the Committee on World War Veterans' Legislation has it?

Mr. GLYNN. In reply I want to say that this bill was referred to the Committee on World War Veterans' Legislation on February 4, 1929, and on February 19, 1929, was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. RANKIN. Is this a question of adjusted compensation?

Mr. GLYNN. It is a question of discharge.

Mr. RANKIN. It should go to the Ways and Means Committee and not to the Committee on World War Veterans' Legislation. This is a matter that does not come to our committee.

Mr. MICHENER. Regular order.

Mr. SIMMONS. Reserving the right to object——

The SPEAKER. The regular order has been demanded. Is there objection?

Mr. SIMMONS. I shall object if we can not have an explanation of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Objection is heard.

HON. FINIS J. GARRETT

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for two minutes.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the gentleman from New York is recognized for two minutes.

There was no objection.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, as I shall be unavoidably detained from the Chamber to-morrow, I desire to say a few words regarding the retiring leader of the minority.

Probably no man on the Republican side of the House has been more intimately associated with the gentleman from Tennessee, Mr. GARRETT, for the last 14 years than I have. We have occupied places on opposite sides of the table in the Committee on Rules during this entire period. Notwithstanding the many controversial and political questions that have come before that committee during all that time, during the World War, during the reconstruction period, and down to the present time, if my memory serves me correctly, and I think it does, there has never been one unkind word or one moment of unfriendly feeling. [Applause.]

During the time I have had the honor of being chairman of that committee I have consulted Mr. GARRETT a great many times on account of his long experience and intimate knowledge relative to matters of parliamentary procedure and precedents of the House. He has always given me freely of the best advice and counsel in his power to give, notwithstanding the fact he belonged on the opposite side of the Chamber.

Now, Mr. Speaker, during my service in this House there have been very few men, in my judgment, who have combined more qualities to make them ideal legislators than has the gentleman from Tennessee, Mr. GARRETT. [Applause.] He is a student, able and energetic. He is forceful and eloquent in debate, and, above all, he has the courage of his convictions [applause], and, in my judgment, that is a mighty essential quality for any legislator to possess.

His retirement from the House at this time is not only a loss to his district, a loss to his State, to the House, but also to the entire American people. [Applause.] We need men of his type and character in the American Congress.

I know that I speak the wish and the desire of every man on the Republican side, as well as on the Democratic side, when I say that I wish for him in his new position of public activity as long, as successful, and distinguished career as he has had in the House of Representatives. [Applause.]

Mr. GARRETT, our good wishes, our respect, our admiration go with you. [Applause.]

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I am profoundly grateful to the gentleman from New York, chairman of the important Committee on Rules of the House, with whom I have served so long and so agreeably, for the very generous words which he has used with reference to myself. It is touching to my heart; it is a matter of profound gratification to know that I have the respect of the chairman of this important committee with whom I have served so many ins and outs in the life of the House. I thank you, Mr. SNELL, most cordially. [Applause.]

HARRIMAN GEOGRAPHIC CODE SYSTEM

Mr. TEMPLE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (S. 5722) to provide for the purchase of the use of the Harriman Geographic Code System, an identical House bill being on the calendar (H. R. 16953).

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk began the reading of the bill.

Mr. JEFFERS. Mr. Speaker, it is my intention to object to the bill.

The SPEAKER. The bill is objected to.

RESTORATION OF THE LEE MANSION

Mr. LOWREY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD on the bill passed yesterday.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. LOWREY. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the House, in the deficiency bill which has just passed there occurs an item of peculiar interest to many generous people North and South. I refer to the appropriation of $90,000 for the restoration of the Lee mansion as authorized in Public Resolution 74.

That this is in full accord with the spirit of our country and our times has again been demonstrated. This Congress has recently broadened the scope and increased the appropriation in the matter of placing markers at the graves of Confederate soldiers. Furthermore, the commander of the United Confederate Veterans with his organization has entered fully into the plan for the pending inaugural ceremony. From my own State come a score of veterans in gray who are occupants of the Confederate Soldiers' Home, which home was originally the estate of Jefferson Davis. These heroic old men come bearing large placards with sentiments of loyalty like these: "Hoover is our President, too"; "No more war, please"; "We are for the Union now"; "Kill sectional strife."

In the face of such fraternal demonstrations, God pity the souls of people, North or South, who would still stand for the spirit of hate, and prefer disunion to a genuine reunion.

But at this point I simply ask to repeat in the RECORD some of the remarks which I made a year ago when the Congress had passed a smaller appropriation for this same purpose.

For years there has been a growing and a commendable feeling that Arlington should in some way be marked and remembered as the home of the heroic leader of the Confederate Army. John Ball Osborne, Military Order of the Loyal Legion, says in his book, The Story of Arlington:

"Arlington will always remain closely associated with the name of Gen. Robert E. Lee, the leading military figure of the Southern Confederacy, for it was his home during 30 years and the place where his happiest days were spent."

Thirty years ago I came to Washington, as people occasionally do, with a party of sightseers, about a hundred people, all of them southerners. Most of them were on their first visit to the National Capital. I noted with grief, and yet with approval, their expressions that in and around the splendid residence of Robert E. Lee there was not one thing to remind us by atmosphere that this was once his home. There mingled into our party a stalwart New Englander, who had come to visit the grave of his father. As he heard these expressions from my southern friends, he quitely remarked, "I don't blame them; I should feel that way myself."

From that day to this I have had a growing conviction that this thing ought to be changed, and that one day it would be changed. "His enemies themselves being judges," Lee stands as one of the purest and gentlest and at the same time one of the most brilliant and heroic men in American history.

An editor of a great New York magazine referred to him recently as the most splendid and heroic character of the Civil War, and said, "I am glad to have the columns of this magazine used to honor his name." When I spoke from this floor on this subject some years ago, the lamented Congressman Osborne, from California, was the only Union veteran in the House. He wrote me a letter of cordial appreciation and assured me he considered it a privilege to join in such a cause.

Seven years ago, within two months after I began my service in the Congress, I began my advocacy of this measure with a speech in which I urged that the home of Lee should be restored, should be kept in its original form and beauty, and, like the home of Washington, should be held sacred in the hearts of our people. It has taken seven years for this to come to pass, but I remember the patriarch of old who served seven years, and then another seven, before he got the full desire of his heart.

During these years I have often discussed this matter publicly and have urged it through personal appeals and private interviews enough perhaps, to gain the reputation of a nuisance and a crank with people who were not interested in the subject. But I have found all along some happy surprises as to people who showed a vital interest in the matter. One of the most ardent advocates of the cause has been that brilliant penwoman, Mrs. Frances Parkinson Keyes, of New Hampshire, who was born in Virginia and maintains a spirit of loyalty and devotion to the Old Dominion and its people. Again, Public Resolution 74 was brought before the House and sponsored by Representative CRAMTON, of Michigan, son of a Union soldier, who has said to me that he received his high opinion of Robert E. Lee from his good father, who went south and fought against Lee for four years.

* * * * * * *

We of the South have been called on to pay tribute to the valor of the North, and gladly we have paid it. As worthy foemen we have honored the soldiers in blue; as honest foemen we have respected them; as reunited brethren we have worked with them; as comrades in arms our sons have shed blood under a common flag with theirs through two wars in a common cause. For more than half a century our money has been added to theirs to pension the veterans of the Grand Army, against which we fought; to buy, beautify, and maintain Federal cemeteries from Gettysburg to Vicksburg; to erect monuments to Federal leaders.

The loyalty of the South is established, sealed with the blood of her sons. Before the secession she had given largely to the building of the Nation. Since the reunion she has given just as generously. I would not say that she has come back to the Union conquered, because in her attitude toward the Government she has exhibited none of the animus of defeat.

The South has come back with head erect and eyes unafraid, having fought to her last energy for a principle which she considered vital, but accepting the issue of battle with good grace and honest courage.

In true southern and true American spirit we now accept this national tribute to Robert E. Lee, not as an expression of sympathy or mercy to an unworthy cause or a recreant people, but as an expression of a Nation's honor to one of that Nation's greatest heroes, who deserves every tribute that may be paid to his high character, his great ability, and his splendid achievements. [Applause.]

ADDRESS OF HON. PAT HARRISON

Mr. WILSON of Mississippi. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by printing a speech by the senior Senator from Mississippi, PAT HARRISON, on the life and character of one of our great benefactors.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The speech is as follows:

SPEECH DELIVERED BY SENATOR PAT HARRISON ON SUNDAY AFTERNOON, JANUARY 6, 1929, IN THE CITY OF GULFPORT, MISS., AT THE UNVEILING OF A BRONZE BUST OF CAPT. WILLIAM H. HARDY, GIVEN TO THE CITY OF GULFPORT BY HIS SON, HON. LAMAR HARDY, OF NEW YORK CITY

Amid the false trimmings of this new and modern day it is refreshing to know that gratitude still abides in the hearts of men. Monuments are indicative of the character of a people. Truly the poet was right when he said:

"Ill fares the land, to hastening ills a prey,
Where wealth accumulates and men decay."

No greater disaster can befall a civilized people than for them to be untouched by sentiment or unmoved by tradition. It is to the credit of the finest traditions of old New England that in the populous city of Boston, cemeteries wherein lay heroes of the Revolution and historic landmarks of that imperishable period have been maintained and preserved against the assaults of progress. No commercial or industrial emergency has ever been able to supplant those hallowed places. A nation's glories are but the accomplishments of her citizenship. The finest inspiration to posterity is found in the priceless legacies of glorious achievements. The Greek youth of old represented the highest type of physical perfection. At the Olympic games he joined in the applause which greeted the victor and returned home determined that some day he would wear the crown of wild olive.

The child of Italy, beneath the golden splendor of Italian skies, looks with rapture upon the paintings of Angelo and lies down at night to dream of the days when his own work, chiseled in marble or painted upon canvas, may rival that of his great master. The little French peasant boy is stirred by the Marseillaise because he has read in the strong lines of his Napoleon the military glories of his country. No Englishman ever visited London without a fixed resolve to wind his way up to Trafalgar Square, where he might look upon the towering monument to England's mighty hero. No greater compliment has ever been paid the Capital City of this Nation than when it was referred to as the "City of Monuments." In that city of beauty, rich in lore and history, upon every square and in every circle enduring testimonials of a grateful people rise to many of our country's illustrious dead. Throughout our State, in hamlet, town, and village, towering shafts and costly monuments have been erected to her distinguished dead, whose services in peace or war have added to the glory and progress of our Commonwealth. It is in keeping with that fine custom that this memorial is erected in this magic city by the sea to our illustrious friend and pioneer citizen, William H. Hardy. He was a remarkable character, endowed by the Creator with a grace and dignity and personality that was striking. It was impossible for his commanding figure to be lost in any crowd. His fine native ability, his studious nature, his analytical mind, his constant search for truth embellished his character and endowed him as a leader of men. As a philosopher he ranked high; as a lawyer among the best of his profession; as a statesman he left his imprint upon the pages of constructive legislation; as an orator he was most eloquent; as a jurist he was discerning, just, and able; as a citizen he was progressive and unselfish; as a Christian he was tolerant of the views of others but steadfast in his devotion to the high purposes and calling of his church; as a family man he was tender and true; as a friend he was loyal; as a soldier he was brave. As successful as he was in the many high positions of honor and trust which he held, from member of the State senate to judge of this circuit district, from codifier of our laws to counselor and advisor of governors and high dignitaries, it is not of these services that I desire to speak to-day, but of those things that I know if he were living and in this presence he would desire more to be known to posterity than all others. Coming to Mississippi immediately following his college training at the Cumberland University and before he had reached his majority, he saw the wonderful opportunities for future development that lay in the piney-woods section of Mississippi. Amid the environments of the little town of Paulding, in Jasper County, with a prophet's eye he visioned the then three great commercial metropolises of the Nation—New York in the East, New Orleans in the South, and San Francisco in the West—connected by great trunk lines of railroad. He visualized the virgin forests, the rich agricultural lands, and the fine opportunities for a great port on the Mississippi coast. The future development of this section to him was dependent only upon transportation. To carry through only capital was to be obtained and mobilized. He was the first Mississippian to conceive the necessity of a railroad connecting New Orleans with the ports along the Atlantic seaboard through the construction of a railroad running out of New Orleans in a northeasterly direction through Meridian. It was in those circumstances that he began to lay plans that meant so much to the future of Mississippi and this section.

In 1868 he wrote an article for the press that was given wide publicity, calling attention to the opportunities of south Mississippi, and the possibility, as well as the necessity, of building a trunk line through the shortest route between New York and New Orleans over Lake Ponchartrain. The idea with him was not a financial dream, but a project to which he had dedicated his talents, and was as fixed in his purpose to achieve as the stars in heaven. It was in the early seventies that he mobilized all his talents and concentrated all his efforts toward arousing interest in and winning favor for his plan. It was no little task in the early seventies to finance a great railroad construction, and yet, at that time this young piney-woods pioneer and lawyer not only gave to the country his conception, but sold the bonds that the survey might be made, and later traveled to the hard-boiled centers of financial New York to gain further financial assistance.

For one from our State in this day of high finance and fictitious values to interest New York or French or English capital in the purchase of $2,500,000 worth of bonds is no easy task, but when we think of the difficulties that confronted one without means of affluence in the late seventies or early eighties to have been able to negotiate such a loan for the construction of a railroad, we can appreciate the very efforts the more. For more than a decade this pioneer citizen kept constantly at his task, and not until 1884, nearly 16 years after he had first advocated the project, did he behold that this dream had come true. Often have I heard him describe the thrill that came to him following the completion of that railroad:

"When I first began to agitate the building of this road across this immense body of water and marsh land," said he, "I was ridiculed and charged with being a dreamer, but I had an abiding faith in the project and was given a thrill of joy as I traveled as one of the first passengers in palace Pullman cars across this 21-mile bridge at the rate of 40 miles an hour." What James J. Hill, as a builder, did for the great Northwest, Captain Hardy did as a pioneer building for south Mississippi.

With all the self-satisfaction and glory attained from such an achievement, his indomitable energy and consuming interest in the development of this section, called him to another great effort. In 1880, while lunching near the intersection of Bowie and Leaf Rivers, along the line of his almost completed New Orleans & Northeastern Railroad, he visualized another road connecting a great port on the Mississippi coast with metropolises along the Great Lakes region and crossing his own railroad at a point where he was then sitting. He then and under these circumstances laid out the city of Hattiesburg, named it after his beloved and devoted wife, and began an agitation for the construction of the Gulf & Ship Island Railroad. It was not until 1886 or 1887 when he took active charge of the construction and financing this project, revising and amending charters, entering public lands, battling and confirming those interests in the high tribunals at Washington, and laying the plan for a network of railroads in south Mississippi that was to give it a prominence and position second to no other section of the State. He did not carry to full completion the construction of the Gulf & Ship Island Railroad—general financial depression hampered and disturbed railroad construction throughout the country, but the ground work that he laid, the project he started, became a reality, and to-day our section is so linked in the arterial railroad system of the Nation that we play our part in the trade and commerce of the world.

Few lessons are found in the career of this remarkable man that more illustrate his broad wisdom and keen perception than his dream of this great harbor and the plat and plans for the building of this magic city by the sea.

Forty years ago wide boulevards and unnecessary parking spaces were ridiculed as public extravagance, and yet this seer and philosopher reckoned with prophetic accuracy the coming of such new modes of transportation as would require greater space for transportation and greater convenience for parking. It was his foresight and his genius that gave us these wide streets, constructed as though he knew more than 40 years ago that the automobile in time must be parked and space and convenience provided therefor. Great as were the many achievements of this pioneer citizen in laying out the many cities and towns in south Mississippi, bringing new industries to the section and giving its development an impetus never dreamed of before, through his railroad conception and construction, I like to think, too, of the fine patriotic qualities that blessed and endowed his manly character. He loved his country with consuming devotion. The deeds and services of the Nation's mighty dead were an inspiration to him; but the South to him was a song—it was a story—it was a sentiment.

There was no apology in his heart for the men and women of this section who sacrificed or died for principles in which they believed. His greatest oratorical efforts were manifested when describing the hardships and suffering of the Confederate soldier or the fine virtues of his vicarious leader. One of the finest incidents marking the career of this pioneer patriot was when in 1861 he formed his company of farmer boys, and, leading them to the battle front, he was tendered the commission as major. He declined it because he said: "I had promised the mothers and fathers of my country boys that I would take care of them, and I thought I could do that better as their captain than as major of their regiment."

It was the fine associations there formed and the many hardships then incurred that caused him until the day of his death to prefer being called Capt. W. H. Hardy to that of any other name.

It is so fitting that this memorial should be placed in this, as he styled it, "the town of my dreams," where in his closing days he expressed the desire that "my remains be placed in its sacred soil."

There it stands, given to us by a devoted son, who, although for many years a resident of New York City, he has never allowed that fine love of sentiment and southern tradition to be remolded in a colder caste of city environment.

There it stands, the work of one who comes from the same foreign country from which financial assistance was obtained that made possible the crowning success of our illustrious citizen's greatest effort.

There it stands, a masterpiece, the workmanship of which will not detract from the international reputation of the artist who molded it.

There it stands, mounted upon its pedestal of granite taken from the heart of his own beloved South; yes, from the hard sides of historic Stone Mountain, upon whose face is to be carved the mightiest heroes of our departed friend.

There he is in sight of the harbor of which he dreamed. There he is, with his face turned toward the cities he planned, the section he loved, and the people whom he labored to help.

May you remain there, illustrious citizen, through the years to come; and as this city grows in importance, and as this section develops, as it will, and the chariots of commerce charge by, may your spirit know that your dreams have come true. And as the girls and boys of the future gaze upon your likeness, may they with Longfellow say:

"Lives of great men all remind us,
We can make our lives sublime,
And departing, leave behind us,
Footprints on the sands of time."

NATIONAL-ORIGINS PLAN

Mr. SCHAFER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by printing an article by my colleague from New York [Mr. LAGUARDIA] in the current issue of a magazine, on the national-origins plan.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. SCHAFER. Mr. Speaker, under permission granted to extend my remarks, I desire to read an article written by our colleague, the Hon. FIORELLO H. LAGUARDIA, of New York, on an national-origins plan, which appeared in the November, 1928, issue of Current History. The article, I am sure, will be informative to all interested in this subject.

Mr. David A. Orebaugh in his article on the immigration act of 1924 works up to the startling climax that "selfish and insincere alien groups have twice succeeded in postponing presidential proclamations putting into effect the national-origins plan." He states and charges specifically that "at the last session of the Sixty-ninth Congress alien influence procured the passage of a resolution postponing the proclamation for one year, or until April 1, 1928, and at the first session of the Seventieth Congress the same influences succeeded in postponing presidential action for another year." Let us examine the "influences" and the real reasons for postponement. The President's message of January 7, 1927, is known as Senate Document No. 193, Sixty-ninth Congress. The law required that the determination of the number allowed to the various races under the so-called national-origins plan should be made by the Secretary of State, the Secretary of Commerce, and the Secretary of Labor. Here is what these officials stated in suggesting a postponement of the law:

"Although this is the best information we have been able to secure, we wish to call attention to the reservations made by the committee and to state that in our opinion the statistical and historical information available raises grave doubts as to the whole value of these computations as a basis for the purposes intended. We therefore can not assume responsibility for such conclusions under these circumstances.

"FRANK B. KELLOGG,
"Secretary of State.
"HERBERT HOOVER,
"Secretary of Commerce.
"JAMES J. DAVIS,
"Secretary of Labor."

Surely three Cabinet officers designated by the law itself to work out the plan can not be properly classified as a "selfish and insincere alien group."

It so happens that even one of Mr. Orebaugh's "own group" joined in the resolution postponing the plan—none other than the "100 per center THOMAS HEFLIN." When the resolution was before the Senate on March 20, 1928, the Senator made this statement, which may be found on page 5242 of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of March 20, 1928:

"Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, in view of the fact that this [resolution to postpone national-origins plan] in no way changes the immigration law, I shall not insist on my objection at this time. I have worked for 20 years in the two Houses to strengthen the immigration law, to restrict immigration, and I do not want any loopholes made in the law by any separate enactments from time to time. Since I am assured that the committee, composed of Democrats and Republicans and Progressives, all agree that this measure should pass at this time, I will not object."

So, after all, the alleged "victory for the enemies of the restricted principle the sinister import of which should not be underestimated," again quoting from Mr. Orebaugh, is the direct result of the recommendation of three members of the President's Cabinet, after a vain attempt for two years to determine the figures, and they were joined by the most rabid restrictionists in and out of Congress. The record is entirely bare of any other influence.

Then, again, Mr. Orebaugh, sounding the clarion call to "gird our loins for battle here and now," complains bitterly that a horde of aliens appeared before the committee at the hearings held on January 18, 19, and 26, 1927, and protested vehemently. Of the 82 pages composing the record, 64 pages are devoted entirely to the statements of the Government representative and to friends of the national-origins plan and 18 pages to the representatives of organizations in opposition thereto. (Hearing No. 69.2.1) A reading of the hearings will disclose the attitude of the committee toward the various persons who appeared before it.

THE PRESENT QUOTA

Just what the national-origins plan may really mean, notwithstanding the description contained in Mr. Orebaugh's article, may best be gleaned by simply quoting the estimated figures thereof. Under the present law the total number of quota immigrants allowed in one calendar year is 164,647. Under the estimated figure submitted by the commission in 1924 the number permitted under the national-origins plan was 150,000, and, according to the estimate submitted on February 27, 1928, it is 153,685. Neither Mr. Orebaugh nor the few individuals supporting the national-origins plan hide the fact that its sole purpose is to increase the quotas from certain countries and decrease the allowance from other countries. They describe it more eloquently and with more high-sounding names; but, stripped of all insincerity and cant, it is simply writing into the law part of the program of the discredited and disappearing order of the Ku-Klux Klan in its intolerant and bigoted program against certain races and certain religions.

The whole plan is the creation of a narrow mind nurtured by a hating heart. The first figures submitted with this novel and far-fetched plan betray the real purpose of its bigoted authors. Of the 150,000 in the original estimate submitted to Congress in 1924, 85,135 were allotted to Great Britain and North Ireland. This left less than half, or, to be specific, 74,865, to be allotted to the rest of the world, comprising 29 different countries. It allotted to Germany 20,028, which left but 54,000 to be divided among the 28 remaining countries of the world. Such allowance permitted of the boast that Jews and Catholics were practically shut off from entering the country. To prove this point it was gleefully pointed out that instead of taking Great Britain and Ireland as one or taking Great Britain and Ireland separately Great Britain was taken together with the north of Ireland, or, as the klansmen emphasized, "Protestant Ireland." This juggling naturally reduced the quota from the Irish Free State, where the emigration is mostly Catholic. The Irish Free State's quota is reduced from 28,567 to 17,427. The figures speak for themselves.

On January 7, 1927, the first official figures were submitted to Congress. The number determined for Great Britain was within a thousand of the original estimate above given; to Germany within 3,000 of the original estimate. Much to the embarrassment and confusion of the sponsors who sought in certain quarters to disguise the real mathematics of the scheme by creating the so-called Nordic idea, the figures determined by the committee did not go far enough. All arguments, estimates, and promises that the Nordic countries besides Great Britain would have a corresponding increase over the southern and eastern European countries went to pieces. Denmark, which is allowed 2,789 immigrants under the 1890 census basis, was reduced to 945 under the original estimate; Norway from 6,453 to 2,053, though pegged up later (1927) to 2,403; Mohammedan Turkey jumped from 100 to 233; Sweden from 9,561 under the present act decreased to 3,072, with a promise of about 300 more under the estimated figures of 1928. It was this predicament which first caused panic in 1927 among the sponsors of the national-origins plan. In the hope of being able to juggle figures again or to determine quotas by synthetic statistics the "study" of the problem was continued another year. The figures were so confused and, as frankly stated in the statement submitted by the President of the United States, so uncertain and unsatisfactory that it was simply impossible to put the plan in operation.

Every time consideration is given to the plan there is such variance of figures as to make the report entirely irreconcilable with its predecessor.

The whole plan is uncertain and inaccurate.

It can be figured out any way, according to who does the figuring, which proves its unscientific basis. Mr. Orebaugh would make one believe that it is very simple. He states boldly, in the face of the statements submitted by the President, that it would be possible to proclaim the determination and put the law into effect. But let the expert from the Census Bureau who worked out these figures speak. To Joseph A. Hill, assistant to the Director of the Census, was assigned the task of working out the mathematics of this strange proposition. The committee did the best they could under the circumstances and here is how it worked out. Mr. Hill says:

"Now, we realize, and I think everyone realizes, that you can not classify the population of the United States into so many distinct classes and say there are so many people here who are of English descent and so many here who are of Scotch descent, so many of Irish descent, etc., because the population through intermarriage has become very much mixed as regards national origin * * * that being the case we had to assume at the outset that by number of inhabitants of English origin, for instance, is meant the amount of English stock in the United States expressed as equivalent to so many inhabitants."

PROBLEM OF RACIAL MIXTURE

In other words, the committee which labored with this plan had the task of not only ascertaining the number of various races in the United States from 1790 to 1920, but also to ascertain the proportionate racial mixtures in each individual and credit that particular country with so many fractions of each human being. To quote again from Mr. Hill's testimony:

"For instance, if you had four people, each of whom had one German grandparent and three English grandparents, so that each of them was three-fourths English and one-fourth German, we can say that we have the equivalent here of three English persons and one German person. In other words, we had to take the inhabitants as a unit of measure in which to express the amount of English blood or Irish blood, etc., that is found in the American people of the present day."

And yet the plan is called simple, logical, scientific, and necessary. Here are just a few of the things the committee was required to do to obtain even a semblance of a report in compliance with the requirements of the law. The committee first analyzed the number of immigrants from the records of immigration from 1820 to date; second, the decennial census from 1850 to 1900; third, a classification was made of the racial stock of the white population enumerated in the census of 1790; fourth, the white population of the United States was divided into two main portions or divisions—(a) one representing the population which is the descent of the inhabitants enumerated at the first census of 1790, which was called "original native stock"; (b) the other comprising the population which is descended from and consists of immigrants who have come into this country since 1790, including immigrants themselves, children, grandchildren, and great grandchildren. A perfectly simple matter, says Mr. Orebaugh.

Lest it be said that the scheme is purposely made intricate, involved, or even senseless by the writer, it is best to quote the statement made by the expert as to just how the proposed figures were reached. Continuing Mr. Hill's testimony, which, by the way, may be found in the hearings referred to by Mr. Orebaugh held by the Committee on Immigration on January 18, 1927 (p. 7):

CENSUS EXPERT'S TESTIMONY

"Mr. HILL. Let me explain, if you have this table before you, just what it means and how it is to be read. Suppose we take for illustration age group 35–40. Those persons who were from 35 to 40 in 1920 were born between 1880 and 1885. That generation, born between 1880 and 1885, has been enumerated four times in the censuses of the United States. It was enumerated for the first time in 1890, when it was between 5 and 10 years of age, and at that time the census showed that 76.17 per cent of these native children between 5 and 10 years of age were the children of native parents. This same generation was enumerated for the second time in 1900, when it was between 15 and 20 years of age, and, according to the census at that time, the percentage having native parents was 75.84. It was enumerated again in 1910, at the age of 25 to 30, when the percentage was 77.15, and again in 1920, when it was from 35 to 40 years of age, and 77.65 per cent were reported as having native parents.

"There is an average of those four percentages, 76.70. The percentages change a little at every census, but that might be expected. One stock may die off faster than the other, so that there is a change in the proportions.

"The result of this computation is that we have figures showing what percentage of the children born in each 5-year period had native parents.

"Again using for illustration the population that was between 35 and 40 years of age in 1920, and therefore was born between 1880 and 1885, the table shows that 76 per cent (leaving out the hundredths of per cent) of the children born in that period were the children of native parents. Then we can ask ourselves this question: What proportion of the parents of these children were themselves the children of native parents? Now, the parents of these children born between 1880 and 1885, we will assume for the purpose of simplifying the illustration, were between 20 and 35 years of age in 1880 and, therefore, between 25 and 40 years of age in 1885. Now, a parent who was between 20 and 35 years of age in 1880 was born when? Between 1845 and 1860. We find that of the population born between 1845 and 1850, 87 per cent had native parents, and of the population born between 1850 and 1855, 82 per cent had native parents, and of those born between 1855 and 1860, 76 per cent who had native parents.

"Suppose we take the middle one of these three percentages as an average, and say that 82 per cent of the parents of the children born between 1880 and 1885 were themselves the children of native parents. See how far we have got. We started with population between 35 and 40 years of age in 1920 and we found that 76 per cent of them had native parents and that 82 per cent of the parents of those children also had native parents.

"Now, a parent of a parent is, of course, a grandparent. So we can say that of the population that was between 35 and 40 years of age in 1920, and therefore born between 1880 and 1885, 76 per cent had native parents and of those that had native parents 82 per cent had also native grandparents. Eighty-two per cent of 76 per cent is 62 per cent. So of the population between 35 and 40 years of age in 1920, 62 per cent had native grandparents."

Very simple, is it not? Mr. Orebaugh implies that only illiterate, low foreigners, alien groups, and politicians fail to grasp or understand the proposition. He also charges that "the average business and professional man of American ancestry has but a vague conception of the meaning and importance of the national-origins plan." To these "groups" Mr. Orebaugh in all fairness should have added the President of the United States, the Secretary of State, the Secretary of Commerce, the Secretary of Labor, the unanimous vote of the Senate, and the majority of the House of Representatives.

THE INFLUX OF MEXICANS

As to the total number of immigrants, the difference between the present law and the national-origins plan is 14,647. That difference, with a population of 120,000,000, certainly can not produce the terrible danger so fearfully described by Mr. Orebaugh.

The sincerity of the extreme restrictionists and of the sponsors of the national-origins plan must be necessarily questioned when they seek to base their proposition on an economic necessity and a desire to keep up the American standard of living. While the doors were shut, and the wisdom is not necessarily questioned here, to the countries producing the people who built up this country, the doors were left open and are now wide open to the cheapest kind of peon labor. The advocates of the national-origins plan were conspicuously silent when the Committee on Immigration was holding hearings to prevent the importation of cheap contract labor from Mexico. The testimony before the House Committee on Immigration is voluminous. It was there disclosed that Mexicans are imported and working on sugar-beet fields at wages that American labor refuses to accept. Railroad executives appeared before the committee in opposition to the restriction of Mexican labor on the ground that they wanted that very kind of cheap labor. A conservative estimate fixed the number of Mexicans illegally in this country at 1,500,000. They are coming in at the rate of 350,000 a year. That, in comparison with the total number of 164,647 sound, clean, healthy immigrants who must undergo no less than three physical examinations, two literacy tests, and produce documentary proof of good character. Relatives who understand conditions here are able to advise the newcomer of American wages and the American standard of living. The European immigrant can no longer be exploited. The Mexican peon is preferred because he is willing to work for starvation wages and live under the most degrading and unsanitary conditions. So, is it really a desire to continue the so-called Nordic stock or is it, after all, the wish to get the cheapest kind of labor at the lowest possible wage and bring down the American standard?

In closing, no better description of the national-origins plan can be given than that offered by Mr. Orebaugh himself: "It has become a sort of 'homeless Hector' repudiated by the leaders of both the great parties." Surely everybody can not be wrong.

ANALYSIS OF APPROPRIATIONS FOR AGRICULTURE

Mr. ANDRESEN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD and to print an article from the Minneapolis Tribune of February 17, 1929, by George F. Authier on funds appropriated for the Department of Agriculture.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection.

There was no objection.

Mr. ANDRESEN. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include an article written by George F. Authier, of Washington, D. C., which was published in the Minneapolis Sunday Tribune, of Minneapolis, Minn., on February 17, 1929.

The article sets forth a comprehensive analysis of appropriations for agriculture.

UNITED STATES FARM AID TOTAL PADDED, FIGURES SHOW—FUNDS APPROPRIATED DIRECTLY FOR AGRICULTURE ARE ONLY THIRD—MUCH OF DEPARTMENT'S ALLOTMENT GOES TO ROAD BUILDING

By George F. Authier, the Tribune's Washington correspondent

WASHINGTON, February 16.—Agriculture, laboring under the mistaken apprehension it is having appropriated exclusively for it, through the Department of Agriculture, the annual sum of $155,000,000, will find upon examination the figures are padded to the extent of about three times the real amount.

Instead of an annual $155,000,000 appropriated for agriculture through the department there really is being allocated for direct benefit to agriculture $34,150,000, only a small percentage of the total appropriation for agriculture, usually described as about 4 per cent of the entire amount of governmental funds expended.

But even of the $34,150,000 appropriated seemingly for the direct benefit of agriculture, further analysis discloses that even this sum is not devoted entirely to the benefits of agriculture, much of it being used for the general public good. A conservative estimate would place the total amount expended for the direct benefit of agriculture, through its department at Washington, at approximately $20,000,000. Even with this comparatively small sum, great benefits are derived and probably there is no governmental investment which returns such practical returns or in such huge figures.

FUNDS DIVIDED

This diversion of the funds presumably devoted to the benefits of agriculture was touched upon at the recent gathering in Washington when the congressional delegations of Minnesota, North and South Dakota, and Montana met here in a conference to consider direct means of aiding agriculture by means of increased development of the county-agent system for better dairy and beef-cattle breeding. Closer scrutiny shows the extent of this diversion was not known. Here is something that such men as Representative ANDRESEN, Minnesota's member of the Committee on Agriculture; GILBERT N. HAUGEN and L. J. DICKINSON, of Iowa; the Northwest Agricultural Foundation; the various land-grant colleges of the Northwest; and others may consider with profit and interest. The figures which will be used to substantiate the startling claim made above are authenticated by the officials of the Department of Agriculture.

Let us start with the annual appropriation of $155,000,000 for the Department of Agriculture. Analysis will show the major portion spent for the "general good of the public," as Secretary Jardine describes it in his annual report, undoubtedly worthy purposes, but purposes which should not be checked up against direct benefit to agriculture as an argument for denying more funds for that great industry.

While this fund is 4 per cent of the total Government expenditures, we can wipe out at the start $90,000,000 devoted to Federal aid to States in road building and for the construction of forest roads and trails. This sum alone, certainly not devoted to the exclusive benefit of agriculture, makes up nearly 59 per cent of the total appropriation devoted to the department as a whole and reduces the percentage for agriculture of the total Government expenditures to about 1⅛ per cent instead of the 4 per cent with which we started.

FARMER'S BENEFIT SMALL

Of course the farmer benefits from good roads, but certainly no one looking over the post-office addresses of automobile owners, including foreign touring cars, passing through this State, will have the temerity to say that the farmer is the sole beneficiary or even the chief beneficiary. This is especially true of forest roads and trails. So much for this item.

Let us take up some others. For example: The Bureau of Animal Industry spent last year $13,000,000 or 8½ per cent of the total of the department appropriation.

That sounds like direct benefit to the farmer and agriculture in general. But—let us see! Of this sum, $5,000,000 was for the Government meat inspection service in the packing houses throughout the United States and $6,000,000 was for cooperation with the States for the eradication of tuberculosis from the dairy herds and other cattle, and most of it went for the Federal Government's share of indemnities paid to owners of tuberculous cattle slaughtered as part of the campaign for healthy herds and pure milk supply.

Now, this work was not done for an altruistic interest in the welfare of the cow. It was done to preserve the health of the community and the resident of Hennepin Avenue, Minneapolis, or Woodward Avenue, Detroit, or Fifth Avenue, New York, was as much a beneficiary as the farmer. Tuberculosis is no respecter of persons, or occupation, or residence.

ANOTHER CUT

Again the Forest Service spent $12,500,000, or 8 per cent, of the department's total for 1928. Presumably trees are products of the soil and might be classed as coming under the head of agriculture. They might come under the jurisdiction of the Department of the Interior with as much justice. The bulk of this large fund went for the management and supervision for the general public use of the 159,000,000 acres of the national forests owned by the Federal Government for the benefit of the entire public. More than 20,000,000 people are visiting these forests each year in search of recreation and health. The number is increasing by leaps and bounds. All this is very fine, but how much does it benefit the milkman in Omaha, the corn raiser in Iowa, the wheat growers in North Dakota, or the fruit grower in Michigan?

The Forest Service cooperates also with States and private timberland owners in promoting scientific utilization and the best practices for the protection and conservation of all our forests and conducts research in tree growing, and of processes of vital interest to the wood-using industries of the country. This is all to the good, but of just what superior advantage is this to the farmer?

Suppose we take a look at the weather—concerning which Mark Twain remarked much was said about it, but little done. They do about $2,600,000 worth of it in the Weather Bureau. Some one had the happy thought once that there must be an essential relationship between weather and crops. No weather, no crops. Hence, with irresistible logic, the Weather Bureau was put in the Department of Agriculture.

WEATHER BUREAU'S SHARE

Of course the farmer benefits by weather forecasts, although how much is a matter of speculation. Everyone is familiar with the general local weather forecasts issued by the department, but how many farmers know that his Weather Bureau is at work with its valuable meteorologists giving storm warnings to ships at sea, forecasting weather conditions in forest areas as part of the campaign against fires, and forecasts of upper-air meteorological conditions as an aid to aviation, just to mention a few of the major purposes to which it is put. Certainly no one will deny these activities, valuable as they are, are for the benefit of the general public and might well be paid for directly out of the Public Treasury.

Take the food, drug, and insecticide administration for which the department spent last year $1,300,000. This law is better known as the "pure food law." Also for the enforcement of the tea act, the milk import act, the caustic poison act, and other laws which the general public has come to regard as indispensable as health-protective measures. This administration enforces also the naval stores act (greatly to the benefit of agriculture, no doubt) providing for the handling of rosin and turpentine products used so extensively in the paint and varnish trades, and the insecticide act, which regulates traffic in preparations entering into interstate commerce used for killing bugs, whether on the farm or in the city home, together with disinfectants and similar products.

The Biological Survey spent over $1,000,000 in protecting and conserving the birds and wild life of the United States, including such species as elk and bison. The open and closed seasons on migratory game birds are also supervised in this bureau. Something like more than half of its funds were spent for these purposes, and the remainder was used for cooperative campaign to control and exterminate wild animals, such as wolves, coyotes, and the like, which prey on the herds of stockmen, and injurious rodents, including rats and mice, the latter operating in city homes as well as those in the country.

The Bureau of Home Economics spent over $100,000 for research work on food, clothing, and household equipment, designed to make city homes as well as farm homes happier and better places in which to live.

FARM BENEFITS

This brings us to the items which more correctly may be described as being devoted directly to the benefit of agriculture. They are—

Bureau of Plant Industry	$4,000,000
Bureau of Animal Industry (exclusive of $5,000,000 for meat inspection)	8,000,000
Extension Service	1,600,000
Payments to States for agricultural extension work	6,000,000
Office of Experiment Stations	350,000
Payments to States for State experiment stations	3,350,000
Bureau of Entomology	3,170,000
Bureau of Chemistry and Soils	1,100,000
Plant Quarantine Board	1,000,000
Bureau of Dairy Industry	550,000
Grain Futures Administration	100,000
Bureau of Agricultural Economics	5,000,000
Total	34,150,000

Secretary of Agriculture Jardine has pointed out in his report that it is not correct to assume that these expenditures, totaling $34,150,000, are all for direct help for the farmer. On the contrary, practically every one of these bureaus just listed, seemingly designed for the exclusive benefit of the farmer, are carrying on activities of direct interest to the general public.

OTHER DEPARTMENTS

Look into the administration of the Bureau of Entomology, for example. While primarily it works out methods for control of insect pests injurious to crops, it is as vitally interested in controlling or eliminating those injurious to man and animals. House moths are not exclusively the luxury of the farm home nor are their operations on last winter's overcoat or the new davenport confined to the farm area. Yet this is a pest against which the bureau is at war. None are too humble for the eagle-eyed entomologist to seek out, as, for instance, the humble bed bug, concerning which the entomologists know a lot. He may be taboo in polite society, but certainly no one will assert he thrives better in the country than in the city.

Consider the Bureau of Farm Plant Industry. This has a tang of the soil about it. But one of its chief activities is the development of drug plants which can be grown in this country in place of menthol imported from the Orient. It will be admitted this is of as much value to industry as to agriculture.

Again some of the department's money is being spent in searching the world over for species of trees that can be grown here in place of the chestnut tree, rapidly approaching extinction. Presumably the farmer could get along without chestnut trees or their substitutes, but the chestnut happens to be the chief source of supply of the tanning materials for the leather industry. If a domestic supply can not be obtained, we will have to depend upon foreign countries. This would not be so good for industry.

The Bureau of Agricultural Economics is spending more than $5,000,000 a year, but the greater part of this goes for service activities in connection with the marketing of farm products and the enforcement of laws to regulate and promote the orderly marketing of these crops.

These include the grain standards act, the cotton standards act, the cotton futures act, the United States warehouse act, that vitally touch the conduct by the public of everyday business. Also the extensive market news and inspection services of this bureau are of the same direct benefit to the shippers and handlers of farm commodities as they are to the farmers. The relationship of the department's activities to the nonfarming population permeates practically every one of the so-called farming bureaus.

The point of it all is that agriculture will be denied its share of Government funds so long as activities that are not essentially part of agriculture are charged up against it.

CHAMP CLARK

Mr. ROMJUE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for one minute.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. ROMJUE. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen, in the closing hours of this session, however important the business may be, I can not let this opportunity go by without calling the attention of Members of this House to the fact that this is the eighth anniversary of the death of one of the greatest men that ever sat in this body. Eight years ago on the 7th of this month there was laid to rest in the beautiful cemetery in Bowling Green, Mo., that great statesman, great Missourian, great American, whom many of you knew and loved. I want to take this opportunity to call our minds back to him and to the great service and the good that he has been to the country, the Hon. Champ Clark. May his rugged honesty, his sterling democracy, and his great character be an inspiration to the youth of our land. [Applause.]

THE BLUE AND THE GRAY

Mr. HOWARD of Nebraska. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for two or three minutes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Nebraska is recognized for two and one-half minutes. [Laughter.]

Mr. HOWARD of Nebraska. Mr. Speaker, I have secured this time for the express purpose of calling the attention of this body to a very odd situation. One year ago I introduced a bill to provide for a joint reunion, here in Washington, of the survivors of the mighty armies of the Blue and the Gray. Instantly kindly sentiment developed in favor of the legislation. It was referred to our Committee on the Judiciary, and there it met much favor. Hearings were held, and when the printed hearings were distributed they brought back to the author of the bill a flood of commendation from the veterans of both the Blue and the Gray. But the Judiciary Committee in its wisdom declined to report the bill, and now it is inevitable that the joint reunion planned for 1929 must go over until 1930. The refusal of the committee to report the bill was based solely upon the absence of indorsements by the Grand Army of the Republic and the United Confederate Veterans. We hope to get those indorsements when the two great organizations of veterans shall hold their reunions during the present year. I do not like to see the joint reunion go over for another year because the best estimates agree that between this day and the autumn of 1930 more than 25,000 of the aged veterans of the two armies will have "gone away to meet Grant and Lee." My chief purpose in this moment is to direct the attention of my every colleague toward effort to procure, during the present year, the official indorsements of the Grand Army of the Republic and the United Confederate Veterans, and thus brush away the only obstacle confronting a favorable report on the bill by the committee.

SUNDAY OBSERVANCE

Mr. LANKFORD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD upon the question of Sunday observance.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection.

Mr. KNUTSON. Mr. Speaker, I object.

Mr. TILSON. The gentleman has the right to do that, and an objection will not prevent it.

Mr. LANKFORD. Mr. Speaker, I wish to thank Mr. TILSON, the majority leader, for the many, many courtesies he has shown me from the time I came as a Member of Congress to the present moment. Mr. TILSON has always been most considerate not only of me but of every Member, without regard to party, section, or the merit of their contention.

When I first came to Congress Mr. TILSON, a leading legislator, came to me, a halting, timid, ignorant new Member, and stated he would help me whenever opportunity presented itself. These words, though few, were golden to me. He has not only kept his promise to me but has helped every Member whenever opportunity presented itself. I shall not forget, and Congress and the country can not forget, the unselfish, patriotic, magnificent service of Mr. TILSON.

But, as indicated, I wish to say a few words about Sunday observance. There are many throughout the Nation who will attempt to construe this Sunday session of Congress as a deliberate desecration of the Christian Sabbath of the American people. In behalf of the great majority of Congress and the overwhelming majority of the very best people of America, I deny this vicious imputation. A round of applause came from the galleries as this morning's session convened. In 10 years' service this is the first applause I have seen or heard from the gallery upon the convening of Congress. Evidently the enemies of the Christian Sabbath were rejoicing at what they thought was a desecration of the Sabbath and a further destruction of the faith of our people in the Bible and its teachings.

Oh, what a mockery of all that is highest and best in our civilization is sought by this gloating over everything that can be distorted into a thrust at Sunday observance, the Bible, and the faith of our fathers.

Our honored and beloved Speaker, those in charge of legislation here, and the majority of Congress did not determine to hold a session of Congress on Sunday as an affront to the great Christian masses of the American people who believe Sunday is a day to be kept holy.

Congress is about to adjourn. A situation has arisen which our leaders feel constitutes such an emergency as authorizes a meeting of Congress for a short time on Sunday. The majority of the Members of Congress are neither atheists nor Sunday haters. The Senate, I understand, has just adjourned on a direct vote on whether that body should remain in session or not on Sunday. I have been assured by those in control here that a recess until Monday will be moved in a few minutes in order to allow the fullest recognition of Sunday compatible with the dispatch of urgent, important business which would not be transacted if left over until to-morrow.

This occasion demonstrates more fully than ever before the favorable sentiment of the Congress in behalf of Sunday observance. I am now convinced more than ever that a reasonable Sunday bill will pass both Houses of Congress whenever presented. Members of Congress represent the American people and the people favor at least some sort of a Sunday law for the Capital of the greatest Christian Nation on earth.

I know there are a few Members of Congress that do not associate with the Christian people of their districts or do not ascertain their views who say their people believe in rampant, notorious desecration of the Christian Sunday in the Nation's Capital. I wish these Members would find out just what their people want, in order that they may represent the good as well as the bad.

Hundreds of petitions in favor of Sunday observance have come to my office for presentation to Members for filing. These petitions were signed by many, many thousands, and came from almost every congressional district in the Union. In each case the petitions were sent to the Members of the districts from which they came with the request that they be filed, but stating in each case if the Member did not wish to file them, that I would be glad to call for them and file them myself. With only a few exceptions each Member has expressed himself as being glad to file the petitions for their constituents, and have since filed them. A number were courteous, but stated they did not wish to file the petitions, but would be glad for me to do so. This I have done.

Less than a dozen out of the entire membership was discourteous to my clerk when presenting the petitions, ignored and disregarded the express desires and wishes of their constituents and not only refused to file the petitions, but destroyed them in order to keep me from filing them.

It matters not how many petitions I receive in future from the constituents of these Members, I shall never present any more to them for filing. I shall make proper acknowledgment of the petitions and file them myself. I have never refused to file any petition presented by my people, regardless of whether is was contrary to my view or not.

At this time I do not propose arguing the merits of a reasonable Sunday law for the District of Columbia. I have done this heretofore and hope to do so again. I only wish to make this statement, and to predict that as soon as Congress senses the true sentiment of our people a Sunday observance law for the Nation's Capital will be passed by an overwhelming majority.

JOHN J. HELMS

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. Speaker, I objected to the consideration of the bill (S. 5386) extending benefits of the World War adjusted compensation act, as amended, to John J. Helms. I have since had an opportunity to read the report and find that compensation is now being paid by the Veterans' Bureau to the heirs of this service man, that he had a dishonorable discharge due to insanity, and, in my judgment, the probability is that the bill is a fair one. I wish to withdraw that objection, and I ask unanimous consent that it may be taken up now and considered.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Nebraksa asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of the Senate bill 5386, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That in administration of the World War adjusted compensation act, as amended, John J. Helms, formerly private, Supply Company, One hundred and twenty-third Regiment United States Infantry, World War, shall be held to be entitled to the benefits thereof in the same manner and with the same effect as if a separation from the military forces of the United States on October 24, 1918, had been honorable.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The bill was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

A motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

NATIONAL FOREST RESERVATION COMMISSION

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following communication which was read:

WASHINGTON, D. C., February 26, 1929.

Hon. NICHOLAS LONGWORTH,
Speaker of the House of Representatives.

MY DEAR MR. SPEAKER: I hereby tender my resignation as a member of the National Forest Reservation Commission.

Most respectfully,

SAM D. MCREYNOLDS, M. C.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the resignation will be accepted. To fill the vacancy the Chair appoints the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. ASWELL].

CELEBRATION AT NEW BERN, N. C.

The SPEAKER. Pursuant to House Concurrent Resolution 60, the Chair appoints the following committee on the part of the House to participate in the celebration of certain historical events at New Bern, N. C.: Mr. WILLIAMS of Illinois, Mr. ANDRESEN, and Mr. ABERNETHY.

MIGRATORY BIRD REFUGE COMMISSION

The SPEAKER. Pursuant to Senate bill 1271 (Public Act 770, 70th Cong.), the migratory bird refuge bill, the Chair appoints on the part of the House the following committee: Mr. ACKERMAN and Mr. MCREYNOLDS.

A. ROY KNABENSHUE

Mr. STRONG of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table and consider the bill (S. 3809) conferring jurisdiction upon the Court of Claims of the United States or the district courts of the United States to hear, adjudicate, and enter judgment on the claim of A. Roy Knabenshue against the United States for the use or manufacture of an invention of A. Roy Knabenshue, covered by Letters Patent No. 858875, issued by the Patent Office of the United States under date of July 2, 1907, and consider the same.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kansas asks unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the bill S. 3809, and consider the same. Is there objection?

Mr. SCHAFER. Mr. Speaker, I reserve the right to object. What is it about?

Mr. STRONG of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, a similar bill passed the House, being H. R. 11764.

Mr. TILSON. As I understand it, Mr. Speaker, the Senate and the House have each passed identical bills.

Mr. STRONG of Kansas. Exactly.

Mr. TILSON. And it is necessary that the House pass the Senate bill or both will be lost.

Mr. SCHAFER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STRONG of Kansas. Yes.

Mr. SCHAFER. We are about to pass the Senate bill to-day?

Mr. STRONG of Kansas. Yes.

Mr. SCHAFER. Mr. Speaker, this House worked until 11 o'clock on several evenings passing House bills, while the Senate announced that they had no time to call meetings of their committees to consider House bills. Why should we be called upon to pass the Senate bill, when they will not consider House bills?

Mr. STRONG of Kansas. If you want the bill to become a law you must now pass the Senate bill.

Mr. SCHAFER. In view of the fact that we might show the Senate, by passing this bill, what the proper procedure is, I shall not object.

Mr. CRAMTON. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, our calendar states that House bill 11764, which is said to be identical with this, has passed and become Private Law No. 10. I think if we pass these House bills once that is sufficient. If the gentleman can show that that record is wrong I will withdraw my suggestion.

Mr. STRONG of Kansas. The House did pass an identical bill, but the Senate did not pass it. Now, the Senate passed this bill.

Mr. CRAMTON. But the calendar says that House bill 11764 was approved by the President on May 3, 1928, and became Private Law No. 10. The gentleman may have had the number wrong or something of that kind. I am taking the number that has been given.

Mr. STRONG of Kansas. Senate bill 3809 is on the Speaker's table now.

Mr. CRAMTON. That is Private Law No. 110.

C. C. SPILLER, DECEASED

Mr. STRONG of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, I desire to call up the bill S. 5787, which is identical with a House bill which passed the House and has not passed the Senate.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the Senate bill.

The Clerk read as follow:

A bill (S. 5787) for the relief of the estate of C. C. Spiller, deceased

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to the estate of C. C. Spiller, deceased, late of Hamilton County, Tenn., the sum of $8,000, found to be due him by the Court of Claims, in congressional case No. 10549, as appears by Senate Document No. 173, Fifty-ninth Congress, second session, being his share of the reasonable charter value, together with the destruction thereof, of a small steamboat, known as the Paint Rock, taken and used by the United States, and while in their possession accidentally destroyed and never paid for, all while the said C. C. Spiller, deceased, was a loyal citizen of the United States, as evidenced by the findings or report, dated June 27, 1864, of a board of claims designated by the commanding officer of the Department of the Cumberland, by Special Field Orders, No. 104, dated April 12, 1864, still of record in the War Department.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of this bill?

Mr. CRAMTON. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, the House Calendar says H. R. 11339, for the relief of the estate of Mr. C. C. Spiller, passed the Senate.

Mr. BYRNS. The Senate bill passed the Senate, but since that time the Senate passed the House bill.

Mr. CRAMTON. Then you do not want this passed?

Mr. STRONG of Kansas. No, sir.

Mr. BYRNS. I am very much obliged, however, to the gentleman from Kansas for calling it up.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE

Mr. WAINWRIGHT, by unanimous consent, was granted leave of absence on account of serious illness in his family.

NATIONAL ORIGINS

Mr. MCCORMACK. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks on the national-origins resolution.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Massachusetts?

There was no objection.

Mr. MCCORMACK. Mr. Speaker, the resolution reported by the House Committee on Immigration and Naturalization deferring the operation of the national-origins clause should be adopted. The time is too short to give proper consideration to the repeal of this unfair and discriminatory provision. To defer its operation for another year is the only safe step to take at the present time. Necessity compels those who believe in its repeal or who are seeking further information on this subject to adopt this course. To permit it to go into operation will mean that its repeal will be less possible than if it is deferred at this time.

Furthermore, this action is the keeping of faith with the American people on the part of the Representatives in Congress of both parties. The reporting by the committee of the resolution delaying its operation is an effort on the part of the majority party to keep the promises that its standard bearer made during the campaign. On February 14, 1929, in discussing this subject before the House, on page 3477 of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD I said:

Both parties through their standard bearers in the recent campaign went on record as favoring the repeal of the national-origins clause. Between now and March 4 action will have to be taken in order to prevent its operation. While both parties have responsibilities the party in the majority will be directly responsible for this iniquitous, discriminatory law unless proper action is taken to repeal or defer its operation.

On February 14 my purpose in addressing the House on this important subject was to call to your attention the necessity for action; the brief time remaining, and whether or not the promises made during the campaign were, like many others in the past, to be thrown into the wastebasket. Members of both parties owe it to the American people to keep faith. During the course of my remarks of February 14, I presented evidence showing the practical impossibility of the basis of determination for national origins, and that it depended upon guesswork to determine the quotas in the main. The absence of records of any definite kind prior to 1850, with no official record prior to 1790, were called to your attention on the question of uncertainty. The fact that President-elect Hoover looked upon this clause with such disfavor as to unreservedly favor its repeal and to advocate it, was also called to your attention. The differences in the reports of the President's commission in 1927 and 1928 were also referred to. Another year has gone by and another report has been made showing further changes. Every year that a report has been made changes have been recommended. This clearly shows the uncertainty of the basis of determination and therefore its unfairness.

It must be borne in mind that the controversy over the national-origins clause does not involve the question of restrictive immigration. We already have a restrictive policy existing in America. Under our present policy 164,000 immigrants are the maximum number admissible to the United States each year from quota countries, while under the national-origins clause about 154,000 will be admissible each year from the same countries. There is no restrictive policy with reference to the Western Hemisphere. People should not be deceived in this respect. The real issue should be understood.

The permitting of this clause to go into operation results in many of our important elements being affronted. Such a condition will bring about dissatisfaction, all of which is unnecessary upon careful consideration of the facts. Those of Scandinavian, French, German, Swiss, and Irish birth and descent will be affected by the provisions of this clause. While none of our racial elements, which term is merely used descriptively, should receive any marked benefits under any law, on the other hand none of them should be discriminated against by the operation of an unwise, impracticable, un-American law.

Under this law each and every one of us must ask ourselves, "What is my national origin?" It compels every one of us, no matter how far back our ancestry in this country goes, to ask ourselves that question. Under it we must ask ourselves, "What am I? Irish, German, French, English, Scot, Italian, Swedish, Norwegian, Armenian, and so forth?" But under no interpretation of this clause can any American ask himself or herself the question, "Am I an American?" For the purposes of determining the quotas established by this law the American type of citizen, the product of generations of intermarriage by citizens of different births and descents, is destroyed. To anyone who prides himself on his American citizenship this must be distasteful, and such a situation must bring to the rational mind the realization of its inadvisability and dangers. This is particularly true when the uncertainty of determination is appreciated and considered. This uncomfortable and un-American situation should be avoided. The only way that it can be avoided is by passing this resolution deferring the operation of this law, and during the first session of the Seventy-first Congress it should be removed from our law and the necessity of further consideration by the people by Congress repealing its provisions.

PRESIDENT COOLIDGE

Mr. TILSON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed out of order.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. TILSON. Mr. Speaker, whether the President of the United States and the Congress get along well together is always a matter of the greatest interest to the whole country. Theoretically, our Government is divided into three separate branches, the legislative, the executive, and the judicial, and this separation has been regarded as one of the strong points of our Government making for progress as well as stability. The separation of the judicial branch from the other two is quite clear and complete, and this is generally recognized as one of the very wise and fortunate features in our system.

In the very nature of things the legislative and executive branches can not be so distinctly separated. The system of checks and balances established between the two has in a measure made them interdependent, but on the whole has worked well. The veto power, for instance, is essentially a legislative function, making the executive to this extent a vital part of the legislative machinery. Making appropriations for the conduct of the executive branch of the Government is a legislative function, but by reason of the fact that funds thus appropriated are disbursed under the law by the executive department, these two branches of the Government are closely tied together. While the legislative branch makes the laws, it is the function of the executive to enforce them, and this again connects most vitally these two branches of the Government. It will thus be seen that the entire country is deeply interested in having the relations between Congress and the President of the most satisfactory character, because it is not only important, it is vitally necessary, that Congress and the President shall cooperate.

Different Presidents have used widely differing methods in dealing with Congress, with varying degrees of success. President Cleveland failed to command through much of his administration the support of even his own party in Congress, and both he and the country suffered from it. McKinley, by reason of the fact that he had served for many years in Congress, was able to influence legislation very largely through his personal knowledge of the workings of Congress and personal contact with the Members, many of whom he had known intimately during his service in Congress. During the Roosevelt administration that dynamic individual used such persuasive powers as he had, and in addition he used the "big stick," a large part of the press, and a very considerable degree of support from the people to help work his will. President Taft, most amiable of men, lacked much of being successful in securing the full cooperation of his Congress. President Wilson ruled at first very largely through a wholesome fear inspired by him in his own party, but in the stress of war had the good fortune to receive the support of his political opponents in all matters necessary for the conduct of the war. President Harding, fresh from a term in the Senate, where he had established many close friendships, had less vital contact with the House than most Presidents, but always listened most courteously to all Members of the House, while maintaining the most intimate relations with his former colleagues of the Senate, but he did not live to thoroughly test out how effective his policy of working with Congress would prove to be.

President Coolidge's relationship with Congress has been different from that of all his predecessors. Quite often disagreeing with Congress on matters of legislation, there never developed any rancor or bitterness over the differences. He has impressed everyone with the feeling that he acts at all times conscientiously, without the slightest influence from fear or favor, and with an eye single to the general good as he sees it. He seems to have proceeded upon the theory that others will do their duty in the same spirit, and, therefore, has not attempted unduly to sway others toward his own point of view. Who has been in the right, and who in the wrong when differences of opinion have arisen, culminating in a veto, can never be settled, because in the last analysis they are, and must remain, simply differences of opinion; but in the light of what has since transpired, including the high degree of abiding confidence which the President has inspired and continues to hold throughout the country, he can safely leave to the judgment of his countrymen the final decision as to whether he or Congress has been right in the greater number of individual instances. It would depend somewhat upon the score keeper, of course, but the President would probably have nothing to fear on this score in a fair reckoning at the bar of public opinion.

The point I now rise to make and to emphasize is that during the entire period of the Coolidge administration the President has been a quiet, though mighty, force in legislative matters. Without ostentation, without threatening or wheedling, but in a straightforward, dignified, and strictly constitutional manner, he has used the power and influence of his great office effectively in the advancement of wise legislation, as well as in opposition to unwise, unnecessary, and expensive legislation.

President Coolidge has earned and retained the highest personal regard of the individual Members of Congress, not only by the firmness and consistency of his attitude toward public matters, but by always hearing with patience such Members as came to him, and by doing whatever he could properly do to aid them in solving their problems. In fact, I recall no instance where the President has failed to meet Congress halfway in trying to work out difficult legislative problems, as, for instance, in the complicated flood-control problem, or where he has ever failed in showing the respect and consideration due the elected Representatives of the people, so that he retires from the Presidency with the highest personal regard of all Members of Congress. The result is that although the President at times has not been found in agreement with Congress, as shown by his vetoes, I recall no period during my long service in the House when there has been such universal confidence among its Members in the soundness, patriotism, good faith, and good judgment of the Chief Executive as in the period now drawing to a close. [Applause.]

A personal word will be excused in my own case. As majority leader of the House, it has been my duty and my privilege to confer frequently with President Coolidge. These conferences have always been helpful to me and of the most satisfactory character so far as a thorough understanding is concerned. It would be an intolerable, if not disastrous, situation if the President and the responsible leaders of his party in Congress were not able to work together in substantial cooperation. President Coolidge has at all times shown a desire to work with Congress, and, in cases where he could properly do so, to make every effort to so adjust matters as to reach substantial agreement. In endeavoring to work toward this end I have found, as everyone else has found who has come in contact with the President, that while he is ready to yield in nonessentials, he stands firm and unwavering in what appears to him to be matters of principle.

It is well known that President Coolidge is in all cases most careful in making promises, being at all times slow to commit himself, but having arrived at a decision, and having committed himself to it, there is no need for fear that he will deviate or swerve one hair's breadth from the path he has indicated. One fortunate enough to receive from him an assurance as to any matter whatsoever may safely go home, go to bed, and sleep soundly, not dreading to greet the new day lest it bring the disturbing tidings that the President has changed his mind over night.

The people of the United States are most fortunate in having as their President at this period in our history a man of the soundness, firmness, high purpose, and fine practical common sense of President Coolidge. It is not eulogy, but in my judgment only a plain statement of fact, to say that no one could have filled the position with greater resulting good to the entire country, or while filling it would have inspired greater confidence in the minds of all the people during the period in which he has served the Nation as its Chief Executive than has President Coolidge. [Applause.] As he now, by his own choice, lays down the cares and responsibilities of the greatest office in all the world, I am sure that I voice the universal sentiment of this House in wishing him the fullest enjoyment and benefits of a well-earned vacation in whatever manner he may choose to spend it, and the most abundant success, with long life, health, happiness, and prosperity in whatever field of activity he may choose to enter. [Applause.]

EXTENSION OF REMARKS—THE FORTHCOMING TARIFF REVISION

Mr. TILSON. Mr. Speaker, as the floor leader in the House of Representatives of the party again placed in power upon a protectionist platform, and after a campaign in which no subject was more frequently referred to, it is appropriate that I should say something on the subject of the proposed tariff revision. It is not my purpose to make a tariff speech. The result of the last campaign would seem to make this unnecessary. It is fitting, however, that I say something in regard to how the subject of revision is to be approached and to what extent the revision will probably go or ought to go. I shall undertake to speak for no one but myself, although I shall do my best to impress members of the Ways and Means Committee and others with the wisdom of my views on the subject.

In order to have something in the way of a proper background for what I am about to say I wish to refer briefly to the origin of the present demand for tariff revision and the circumstances leading up to it. During the last three Congresses the question of farm relief in one form or another has been acute. A bill for relief bearing the names of its coauthors, Senator MCNARY, of Oregon, and Mr. HAUGEN, of Iowa, was finally formulated and submitted to Congress, but was defeated. A little later it came up again in a slightly different form and passed both Houses, but failed to receive Executive approval. At the first session of the Seventieth Congress another McNary-Haugen bill, like the previous one, again passed both Houses of Congress and was again vetoed by President Coolidge.

During the long period covered by the discussion of the farm relief bill in three Congresses quite naturally some feeling was developed on the part of the proponents of the bill and reprisals by way of reduction in the tariff were more or less openly threatened in order to punish the industrial but recalcitrant East for its supposed hostile attitude on farm-relief legislation. Finally Senator MCMASTER, of South Dakota, introduced in the Senate a resolution calling for the immediate revision of the excessive rates of the present tariff, the obvious inference being a drastic downward revision of duties on manufactured articles. In the floundering attitude in which many found themselves this straw was grasped and the resolution came near to being adopted. It did pass the Senate by almost a 2 to 1 majority.

The Members of the House were in the same desperate straits as were the Senators, as they faced the approaching election without farm-relief legislation, and some were disposed to vote for this measure as a last-resort remedy for helping the farmer. Finally, by the narrow margin of only 8 votes in the House, a motion to refer the resolution to the Committee on Ways and Means—the committee having charge of tariff revision—was laid on the table.

During the agitation caused by the McMaster resolution there grew up a kind of understanding, and it helped to defeat the resolution—that an early revision of the tariff with special reference to farm relief would be undertaken. Certain industries other than farming, which were suffering for lack of adequate protection, also joined in the demand for tariff revision. It had become apparent that in their desperation some of those earnest in their espousal of the farmers' cause were ready to accept almost any remedy offered, and so were willing to go the length of demanding a drastic downward revision of the tariff on manufactured articles upon the theory that the farmer would be indirectly benefited. Better counsels prevailed, however, and the false theory upon which this proposal was based failed of acceptance.

In reaching the very wise conclusion to reject the method of hostile attack upon the tariff it was in effect agreed that the better course to pursue was for the friends of the tariff to beat its enemies to a revision, by sponsoring a revision by its friends along protective lines instead of the opposite plan proposed in the McMaster resolution. I then believed that if we, the friends of protection, were not willing to undertake such a revision, the McMaster resolution, or something worse, would prevail.

At the Kansas City convention I was one of those to go before the resolutions committee and urge that the Republican Party, the traditional friend of the protective tariff, should stand sponsor for such a revision of the tariff as recent developments and changed conditions would warrant. A plank to this effect was inserted in the platform adopted by that convention, as follows:

We reaffirm our belief in the protective tariff as a fundamental and essential principle of the economic life of this Nation. While certain provisions of the present law require revision in the light of changes in the world competitive situation since its enactment, the record of the United States since 1922 clearly shows that the fundamental protective principle of the law has been fully justified.

The campaign was carried on with this as one of the major planks of the platform, and on the stump was more often referred to than any other plank in it.

Farm relief and the tariff were inseparably connected from the beginning of the agitation for a revision, and they remained so throughout the campaign. Before the end of the campaign the conclusion was reached that unless something definite were done in connection with farm relief at the short session it would be wise to call Congress into early extraordinary session for the consideration of these two subjects, and with the decisive Republican victory came the obligation to take prompt steps in this direction.

It will be seen by reference to the protection plank in the platform from which I have quoted, that it declares the tariff law as it has stood since 1922 to be on the whole satisfactory; and that only such changes are promised as will readjust and bring into line any portions of the act which by reason of new developments or changed conditions need readjustment. We stand upon this promise and assume whatever responsibility may be necessary for redeeming it. The House of Representatives took this view of the situation and began promptly the necessary preliminary preparation for carrying out its obligation in the premises.

In order to make ready for an early and prompt tariff revision general hearings by the Ways and Means Committee of the House were begun on January 7 and continued until the last of February just passed. The entire field of the tariff act was necessarily covered, because it is impracticable to attempt to revise one portion of the act without at the same time considering all parts of it. If this were not done, the action upon those portions revised might throw other related or interdependent portions of the act out of line, making the last state of the law worse than the first. Therefore, the entire field covered by the act was included in the hearings, and the information thus gathered is now undergoing a thorough study by subcommittees of the Committee on Ways and Means.

While it is necessary to consider the entire tariff act as a complete whole, it is hoped and expected that it will not be necessary to make material changes in a very large proportion of the very great number of items covered by the law. A test of seven years' actual experience has demonstrated that the present law is basically sound, and this makes it possible within the shortest time and with the least amount of difficulty to ascertain and readjust such rates as changed conditions or new developments have made necessary.

In the tariff hearings recently closed the majority of those who appeared, whether they so intended or not, made it evident that a very large share of the myriads of articles produced in this country are already reasonably protected and do not need additional duties. On the other hand, many cases were clearly shown to the committee where changed conditions have made changes necessary, and to the making of such changes the committee will now address itself.

A thorough study of the vast mass of information brought out during the hearings is to be made and may prove all demands well founded, but meanwhile it is feared that some of those presenting their case before the committee took counsel of their fears rather than of their necessities, and in so doing asked for too much in order that they might the more surely receive enough, or at least that they might not have taken away from them a portion of that which they already have. I believe in being careful and in taking reasonable precautions. Coming from Connecticut, the land of steady habits, it is but natural that I should be favorably inclined toward proper safeguards for the future. Some of those who appeared before the Committee on Ways and Means, however, went beyond what I consider reasonable caution and attempted to enter the realm of sure things even beyond what a Connecticut conservative could justify.

The overcautious ones to whom I have referred remind me of a Connecticut friend who, I think, is making for himself a record in taking care for the future. He was a little over 60 years of age when prohibition came, and seeing it coming he laid by an ample store. Being over 60 years of age, as I have said, he knew something of his imbibing capacity, and stocked his cellar accordingly. Almost 10 years have passed, during which he has kept careful statistics. He is now threescore years and ten. I met him the other day, and he is still going strong, but was worrying. I asked him what was the trouble and he told me his story. He said that the statistics carefully kept by him show that at the same rate at which he has been drinking, the normal rate for a gentleman, his supply of liquor will last for only 37 years longer, and he is now worrying about what he will do for liquor after that. Some of those who appeared before the Committee on Ways and Means have sufficient protection for the immediate present, but by their testimony are evidently beginning to worry about what is going to happen to them some time in the future. I believe that if we can secure the protection now needed we may with assurance trust future Congresses to continue the same sound policy of providing protection as the need for it shall be made to clearly appear.

As I said in the beginning, I speak only for myself when I say that in my judgment reasonably adequate protection as appears from the facts will be given in the coming tariff revision to every article and every industry making its case. On the other hand, I feel quite certain in my own mind that those who are asking rates of duty not shown by the facts to be necessary for proper protection are doomed to disappointment. If I sense aright the spirit and purpose of those who are charged with the writing of the new tariff bill, a very sincere and earnest effort will be made to find as nearly as humanly possible the line which accurately measures the need for protection, as shown by the facts to exist, and having found it will stick to this line.

It is my hope and, I may say, my ambition that the action of the present Congress, with its comfortable protectionist majority, may demonstrate that the protective policy is not only correct, but that it is capable of being so carried out that revisions of the tariff may be made at comparatively frequent intervals; in fact, I believe that this can be done whenever the need may appear without alarming business and without producing any substantial disturbance in our industrial life. The present revision will be the test. If it can not be done promptly and without business disturbance at this time and under present conditions, it can not be done at any time. If my hopes and ambitions in this direction are realized in the coming revision, I shall be not only content, but shall be proud of having been a Member of the Congress that has brought it to pass.

SENATE

MONDAY, March 4, 1929

(Legislative day of Monday, February 25, 1929)

The Senate met at 11 o'clock a. m., on the expiration of the recess.

ENLARGEMENT OF THE CAPITOL GROUNDS

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business, House bill 13929.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 13929) to provide for the enlarging of the Capitol grounds.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill is in the Senate and open to amendment.

Mr. KEYES. Mr. President, I dislike very much to take even a moment of this closing hour of the Seventieth Congress, but I do want to appeal to the Senate to allow the pending bill to come to a vote. It is an extremely important measure. It will have to go back to the House because of very slight amendments, but I am sure that action on the amendments will be taken in the House.

I ask the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. BLAINE] if he will not be willing to forego action upon his amendment at the present time?

Mr. BLAINE. Mr. President, I understand it is contemplated that the war section of the Government hotels will be undisturbed for at least two more years. I am also convinced that the amendment which I have proposed, if agreed to by the Senate, could not receive the approval of the House of Representatives at the present session of Congress. I have no desire to retard the progress of the bill providing for the improvement of the plaza and I therefore ask unanimous consent to withdraw the amendment which I have offered.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none and it is so ordered. The bill is in the Senate and the question is on concurring in the amendments made as in Committee of the Whole.

The amendments were concurred in.

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed, and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time, and passed.

J. H. B. WILDER

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the amendment of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 5715) for the relief of J. H. B. Wilder, which was, on page 1, line 8, to strike out the word "interest" and insert "increased."

Mr. HARRIS. I move that the Senate concur in the amendment of the House.

The motion was agreed to.

A TRIBUTE TO SENATOR CHARLES CURTIS, VICE PRESIDENT ELECT

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, some one has said:

A rose to the living is more
Than sumptuous wreaths to the dead.

Happy is he who lives to hear deserving tributes of himself, for eulogies are empty praises when life's work is done.

It is my privilege to pay honor to one of our associates who has been a Member of this body since 1907, except for two years. He has been promoted from membership in the Senate to its Presiding Officer, under the Constitution.

This promotion is additional evidence that the American people do reward faithful and honest public service.

Senator, now Vice President CURTIS, began life amid primitive and humble surroundings. In his veins runs the blood of a Puritan Englishman, a French-Canadian, and an Indian maiden. That remarkable fusion brought forth a real American, whose career demonstrates the boundless possibilities in the land we love.

Senator CURTIS has lived a most interesting and unique life. The key lies in industry, courage, self-reliance and good cheer. He has made himself what he is, without riches and without powerful influence.

He seized every opportunity to earn an honest living, to acquire an education, to succeed in private and public undertakings. In every sphere of activity he has summoned all of his mental and physical powers to the task.

At 69 our honored and beloved colleague can look back upon a life journey with pride and satisfaction, in which a grateful people share, for he is now the chosen guardian of the people's interests in a larger and wider field.

CHARLES CURTIS is a child of the West. He is nearer than the rest of us to being a real native American, for his mother was the daughter of an American Indian, the real natives of our land.

In his public career he has absorbed the spirit of the West and until this hour has carried in his breast a sturdy and tender devotion for those who sacrificed so much to build America. He has been one of the first to take a stand for the development of the West. He helped make all Indians citizens of the United States. He helped to secure homes for settlers in the West.

He was one of the first in Congress to recognize the need for farm relief. He has supported every measure of interest to the farmers and producers, protecting the products of the farm. Thus he has responded to his birthright.

He was one of the first to stand for woman suffrage, and has promoted every cause for the advancement of the welfare of women.

He has always taken a stand against unnecessary debate in the Senate, and assisted in bringing about an amendment of the rules permitting two-thirds of the Senate to close debate under certain conditions.

As a Member of the House of Representatives, CHARLES CURTIS's record was clean and brilliant. He was a colleague of the great statesmen who guided legislative affairs in the House from 1892 to 1906. He served on the most important committees, and was a safe adviser and counselor. He was one of a committee of 11 selected by Speaker Reed to draw up the gold standard act of 1900, which settled a long controversy.

He never yielded to any unsound experiment in our money standards.

When CHARLES CURTIS first came to the Senate, he already was a seasoned legislator, and brought with him an experience and a wisdom that commanded the attention of the leaders. Defeated in 1912, he returned in 1914 and crowned his career with added laurels. He was made assistant Republican floor leader, and in 1924 floor leader.

Few Senators have held the esteem, regard, and, I might say, the affection of their colleagues, as has Senator CURTIS. He has always displayed unusual ability and zeal, and worked unceasingly for his country, his State, and his party. His record in this body has won the personal friendship of all, even in times of party strife. He has been uniformly fair and just. These qualities have attracted friends and held them.

He has taken high rank as a Senator, serving on the most important committees, Finance, Appropriations, and chairman of Rules.

Senator CURTIS, the time has arrived when your colleagues in the Senate, many of whom have worked with you for several years, must now bid you farewell as a Senator. You are soon to take an important place, and preside over us as the Vice President of this great Nation.

From prosecuting attorney in a small county in your State of Kansas to the position of Vice President of the United States, you have won laurels you richly deserve—a reward of merit.

As your honors grow and shine, so will our love and affection for you. We will feel more tolerant, more considerate, and more wise, as we look into your kindly eyes. We will profit by the example you have set us.

Yet, no honor, no exalted position can add to your lofty character, your warm heart, and your serene sincerity.

We salute you as Vice President! [Applause.]

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, the party system of government which has prevailed since soon after the adoption of the Federal Constitution is continued because, on the whole, it is promotive of efficiency and patriotism in government. During political campaigns the currents of partisanship run strong. Following a national election partisan tension relaxes. On behalf of the Democrats in the Senate, not with enthusiasm, but in a spirit of acquiescence [laughter], I rise to pay a deserved tribute to the Vice President elect. He is a worthy successor of the genial gentleman, the able statesman [Mr. Dawes], who to-day retires from the chair. The experience of Senator CURTIS in the legislative affairs of the Nation has been prolonged. He has to his credit a long record of usefulness in both Houses of the Congress of the United States. Notwithstanding the proper partisanship which he has displayed, his frankness, fairness, and courage have earned the respect, the confidence, and the admiration of his political antagonists. We feel that the best traditions of the Senate of the United States will be observed and continued during his service as the Presiding Officer of this great body. [Applause.]

NATIONAL ORIGINS CLAUSE OF IMMIGRATION LAW

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. President, I ask the Chair to lay before the Senate a joint resolution coming over from the House of Representatives.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate House Joint Resolution 402, which will be read.

The Chief Clerk read the joint resolution (H. J. Res. 402) to amend subdivisions (b) and (e) of section 11 of the immigration act of 1924, as amended, as follows:

Resolved, etc., That subdivisions (b) and (e) of section 11 of the immigration act of 1924, as amended, are amended by striking out the figures "1929" and inserting in lieu thereof the figures "1930."

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. President, it will be remembered that on Saturday last the House of Representatives rather unexpectedly received from its Committee on Immigration this joint resolution, with the recommendation that it pass. The joint resolution proposes to amend the so-called "national-origins" clause of the immigration act by providing that, instead of it being put into effect by the President this year, it shall not go into effect for one more year. This is in line with what has twice been done by Congress, and is also in line with what was stated by the President elect of the United States in his speech of acceptance as his belief as to what should be done.

The House of Representatives on Saturday proceeded to adopt a rule whereby the House would meet in extraordinary session on Sunday, and, breaking the usual precedents against Sunday meetings, would transact business. Evidently the House of Representatives believed that this measure was in the nature of an emergency or otherwise it would not have broken the precedents by meeting on Sunday in order to transact business.

When we on this side of the Capitol learned of this action on the part of the House and of the probability that not only would it meet on Sunday but that it would act and would pass this joint resolution and send it over, realizing that there would be very little time to-day for its consideration, we ourselves, endeavored on Saturday evening to secure a Sunday session, meeting 1 hour and 10 minutes after the House of Representatives would meet on Sunday, in order to give that body time to act, and so that the Senate might be in session to receive a message from it and act also on this joint resolution.

It will be remembered that after a considerable parliamentary struggle those in favor of this procedure won by a majority of 1, and the Senate recessed until 11.10 o'clock yesterday. On the meeting of the session yesterday, the very distinguished and greatly beloved leader of the minority party, the distinguished Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON,] in a very urgent and beautifully worded appeal to the Senate, expressed his belief that the Senate ought not to break its usual practice, even though the House of Representatives had done so, and that the Senate, out of regard to the Sabbath, ought to recess until to-day. There would have been no objection whatever to that motion, nor would there have been any votes against it, had he been willing to agree that to-day we might secure a vote on this important measure, in order that the Senate might be permitted to go on record as to how it felt with regard to the joint resolution sent over by the House of Representatives.

However, Mr. President, the Senator from Arkansas objected to the Senate doing even so much business as agreeing by unanimous consent to vote to-day and pressed his motion for a recess until to-day at 11 o'clock. That motion carried by a majority of 1.

The junior Senator from North Dakota [Mr. NYE], in an effort to secure a reconsideration of that motion, changed his vote, and endeavored to secure the attention of the Chair after the motion had been carried by a majority of 1. It was obvious that the Vice President could not recognize anyone for any purpose after the Senate had recessed. Therefore, it was impossible for the Senator from North Dakota to make the motion to reconsider.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. BINGHAM. Certainly.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. Mr. President, is it not possible for the Senator from North Dakota, having placed himself in the majority, to make his motion this morning to reconsider the vote by which the Senate took a recess yesterday?

Mr. BINGHAM. I should be very glad to yield to him for that purpose, but I am surprised that the Senator from Pennsylvania should make such a suggestion.

Mr. EDGE. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Connecticut yield to the Senator from New Jersey?

Mr. BINGHAM. I yield.

Mr. EDGE. I take it, the Senator from Connecticut is very anxious that the joint resolution should be adopted by the Senate. Does the Senator think there will be any possible opportunity to adopt the joint resolution, if he shall occupy all the time up to 12 o'clock?

Mr. BINGHAM. I do not intend to occupy more than 30 seconds more; and I would not be on my feet now had I not been interrupted. I move, Mr. President, that the Senate consider and pass the House Joint Resolution 402.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Connecticut that the Senate proceed to the consideration of House Joint Resolution 402.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Pennsylvania.

Mr. GLASS. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

Mr. HEFLIN. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Pennsylvania has the floor.

Mr. HEFLIN. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. I do not yield for that purpose.

Mr. President, under Rule XIV of the Senate, it is very wisely provided that all bills and joint resolutions from the House shall be read three times on three different days. This joint resolution has been read the first time to-day. I can scarcely believe that the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. BINGHAM] would disregard the rule and try to have the joint resolution read three times on the same day, and try to have it passed on the very day on which it has been messaged to the Senate. If he should attempt to do so or if that should be the meaning of his motion, I should feel compelled to make the point of order that the bill must be read three times on three different days.

But, Mr. President, this question ought not to be left to the country on a mere point of order, and for a few moments only I wish to make a statement about this controversy which has been so generally misunderstood. It is the sentiment of the people of the United States, by a vast majority, that immigration into this country must be limited in number. That is the sober and considered judgment of the country, and if the last election meant anything on any issue it meant that.

Five years ago the Congress adopted the permanent immigration law of the United States, limiting the number of persons that might come to this country from Europe. It was obviously necessary. Because of the far higher rates of wages and far better living conditions here than in foreign countries, America drew immigrants like a magnet and, had we not restricted immigration, every employment office in the United States would have had its queue of aliens waiting to take the positions now filled by Americans. I need not debate that, nor need I debate the wisdom of the existing law.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. Not for a moment, if the Senator please.

Having settled the point that numerical restriction was necessary, the Congress had to decide how to apportion that aggregate among the various nationalities that sought admittance to our doors. It was obviously impossible to say that we would admit immigrants after a qualitative examination, because no two persons could agree as to what sort of immigration was best in quality. Some of us might think that a worker with his hands was preferable to a clerk. We never could agree on that. Some of us might prefer some nationality, and think that the peasant from one corner of Europe was better than the best man from the opposite corner. Some of us might think that illiteracy was a conclusive bar, and others might think that that was immaterial. We never could agree to divide these immigration visas according to a qualitative examination; and so it became necessary to establish quotas for the different nationalities according to some rule.

As a temporary measure, frankly so declared in the immigration law, the foreign-born persons who were listed in the census of 1890 were taken as the basis, and the quotas were apportioned among the countries in exact proportion to the foreign-born reported in that census.

It has been generally stated and assumed that that meant an exact method. It has been said by disputants on this question that the 1890 method, whatever its defects, at least furnished something that was accurate and sure. But, Mr. President, that census was, of course, taken in terms of pre-war geography.

There was no list of persons born in Yugoslavia, for example; and when we came to establish the 1890 quotas it was only by a process of elaborate guesswork that quotas were established for Yugoslavia, for Poland, for Czechoslovakia, for Lithuania, for Estonia, for all the new countries that came out of the storm of the war and the treaty of peace. Necessarily, that involved elements of speculation and uncertainty; and I ask the Senate to remember, when these two methods are criticized, that the 1890 method involves a vast amount of uncertainty and speculation.

And then, Mr. President, when we consider the essential fairness of the thing, it is obvious at the first glance that the temporary 1890 method was wholly unfair to us who were born in America. It took as a basis all of these foreign-born persons, whether they were naturalized or not, and it ignored every one of us who was born in this country. It ignored the descendants of the signers of the Declaration of Independence. It ignored the descendants of the men who made the Constitution. It ignored the descendants of the men who fought the War of the Revolution and created this country. It ignored the descendants of the men, and the men themselves, who had fought so bravely on both sides in the Civil War. It ignored all of us native born, who have at least as much at stake in the welfare of America as has a recently arrived unnaturalized European.

Obviously, that was unfair; and the Congress cast about for some method that might take account of those of us who were born here. We did not want to claim that we native born were in any way superior to these recently arrived Europeans, but we did want to claim that we were their equals, for the purposes of matters so important to the future of America. And so, Mr. President, out of that reflection grew what was called the national-origins feature of the immigration law.

That provides, in effect, that the aggregate immigration to America shall be 150,000 a year instead of 164,000, as under the temporary method. It reduces the aggregate to 150,000, plus normal quotas of 100 to a lot of small countries which do not use them but must necessarily be listed. In practical effect, it reduces the inflow of immigration about 14,000 persons per year. It provides, not that we shall take each present living individual and try to trace his pedigree and determine what percentage of him is German and what percentage French and what percentage British. Of course, that is absurd. It provides, on the other hand, that the process shall be worked from the past down to the present by taking the record of immigration into the United States from various countries, and determining from that, with the known factor of increase, what percentage of the present population of the United States owes its origin to each of the European nations from which immigration is permitted. That process had been worked out long before immigration was restricted. It had been studied coolly and scientifically long before the matter of national origins was ever heard of in connection with immigration matters.

In 1910 the Census Bureau had put out a most carefully studied publication dealing with the composition of the stock of America at that time; and that, made up without any partisanship, without any strife among these different nations, was the foundation of the work of the quota board in establishing these national-origins quotas. The results can be well tested by the claims that these different nationalities made before this became a contentious question. The best authorities among the German element in the United States have claimed for Germany that she was the mother country, directly or through the ancestors of the present population, of 17 per cent of the present-day population of America. Working quite apart from them, working through this method that I have outlined, the national-origins result is almost exactly 17 per cent of the aggregate quota for Germany. The quota gives them substantially exactly what they claim in their own publications, written before this became a debated question.

And so it is with the Irish. I need not stop to quote from publications, but it has all appeared in the hearings of the Senate Immigration Committee. The quota board has given them what they claimed before immigration became a subject of dispute; and see what the temporary basis does. Fifty-one thousand out of 164,000 is the German quota under the temporary 1890 basis.

I yield to no man in admiration of the Germans as desirable immigrants. They are desirable immigrants. They blend well with our population. They soon learn our system of government. They behave themselves well. They are a desirable immigrant stock. But why in the world should Germany, having one-sixth of the present-day population of America as its origin, have one-third of all our immigration? Who can defend that basis?

And so with Ireland. Her quota to-day is more than twice what her proportion in the national stock entitles her to. It is not that we are trying to reduce the immigration from those nations because of any prejudice against them. It is only that we are trying to put the immigration on a basis of impartiality which will endure. It is not that we are trying to say that Nation A is better than Nation B. We cheerfully admit that all of them are absolutely equal for this purpose.

Mr. BINGHAM rose.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. Just indulge me a minute. But, Mr. President, if we want our immigration policy to endure, if we want to protect the America of our grandchildren and their grandchildren, we must make it impartial. Only such a law as is impartial can endure, and that is why this national-origins controversy goes to the very essence of the law and controls its permanency; and that is why some of us have felt it imperative upon us to insist that it be maintained.

I ask to have incorporated in my remarks at this point telegrams which I have exchanged with Mr. William Green, president of the American Federation of Labor, in which he expresses most emphatically his approval and that of the executive committee of the American Federation of Labor of the national-origins part of the immigration law. It is no superficial opinion that they give, because they have studied this matter since long before we ever passed an immigration restriction act.

I ask that the telegrams may now be read by the clerk.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? Without objection, the clerk will read as requested.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

WASHINGTON, D. C., February 20, 1929.

Hon. WILLIAM GREEN,
President American Federation of Labor, Miami, Fla.

I am very much interested in your stand with respect to immigration restriction as reported in the newspapers. We have just succeeded in blocking proposals further to postpone the application of the national origins law. While this ends the prospect of action during the remainder of regular session, subject is bound to come up in next session with renewed pressure for larger quotas. It would be of great assistance if the executive council of the federation should find it consistent to indicate its opposition to any change in the national origins law, or as an alternative ask for further restrictions to protect the position of American labor. Should be glad to discuss immigration question with you upon your return to Washington. Best regards.

D. A. REED,
United States Senate.

MIAMI, FLA., February 21, 1929.

Hon. DAVID A. REED:

Your telegram has been received and the information you convey is very much appreciated by the executive council, American Federation of Labor. You may rely upon us to support legislation which has for its purpose the protection of existing immigrations laws and to oppose with all the power we possess any proposal for a change in the quota provisions which would provide for an increase in immigration. We propose to ask for further immigration restriction to protect American labor. Will be glad to discuss this question with you at the earliest possible date after my return to Washington.

WILLIAM GREEN.

Mr. WILLIAM GREEN,
President, American Federation of Labor,
Alcazar Hotel, Miami, Fla.:

Have I your permission to read your telegram to Senate? Welcome you as ally in immigration fight.

D. A. REED,
United States Senate.

MIAMI, FLA., February 25, 1929.

Hon. DAVID A. REED:

Yes, you have my permission to read my telegram to the Senate if in your judgment it would be advisable and helpful to the cause of restrictive immigration legislation.

WM. GREEN.

Soon thereafter the Sergeant at Arms, David S. Barry, announced CHARLES CURTIS, of Kansas, the Vice President elect, accompanied by the chairman and members of the joint committee on arrangements, consisting of Senator GEORGE H. MOSES, of New Hampshire, chairman; Senator FREDERICK HALE, of Maine; Senator LEE S. OVERMAN, of North Carolina; Representative BERTRAND H. SNELL, of New York; Representative LEONIDAS C. The VICE PRESIDENT administered the oath of office prescribed by law to the Vice President elect.

ADDRESS OF VICE PRESIDENT DAWES

The VICE PRESIDENT. In a few minutes it will be the last official duty which I am to perform to adjourn the Senate of the Seventieth Congress of the United States.

The passing of a Congress is but an incident in the life of our great Republic, now entering the one hundred and fortieth year of its existence, never stronger in that which is its greatest bulwark, the love and devotion of a united and a happy people. But to many in this Senate Chamber it means the breaking of close ties formed by the association of years in a common endeavor, human ties, whose strength is never realized until the time of their sundering is at hand.

I want to express my heartfelt gratitude to the Members of the Senate, and to the Members of the Senate staff, and especially to Mr. Charles L. Watkins, the parliamentarian of the Senate, for his invaluable aid to me; and for the courtesy, and the kindness, and the consideration, and the generosity with which you have all treated me.

I have tried to be worthy as best I could, and in the occupancy of this chair I have never consciously deviated from the duty which inseparably attaches to it, that of impartiality in partisan, personal, and sectional differences. [Applause.]

At the time of parting between friends, there is no place for acrimony, and I assure you there is none in my heart. But I could not be true to myself and to my conception of the duties of this position if as I leave it for the last time, when, if ever, disinterestedness should characterize my convictions, I did not speak again of the collective error of this great and powerful branch of the Government. Alone of all the deliberative bodies of the world, the Senate of the United States, under its rules, has parted with the power to allot its time to the consideration of the subjects before it in accordance with their relative importance. This defect of procedure is fundamental. I take back nothing. [Applause.]

To my successor in office, my dear friend and the dear friend of us all, Senator CURTIS, I wish the great success which his fine character, his ability, and his long experience in this body make certain.

I declare the Senate of the Seventieth Congress adjourned sine die.

MORTON ARBORETUM AT LISLE, DU PAGE COUNTY, ILL.

Mr. REID of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD in regard to arboretums and to include therein a description of the Joy Morton Arboretum in Du Page County, Ill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Illinois?

There was no objection.

Mr. REID of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, I desire to call to the attention of the House, and to the country at large, a laudable undertaking by Joy Morton in establishing at Lisle, Du Page County, Ill., in my congressional district, one of the great arboretums of this country.

In 1921 he created a foundation to be known as the Morton Arboretum for—among other things—to increase the general knowledge and love of trees and shrubs and bring about an increase and improvement in their growth and culture.

This arboretum is so well equipped and has been so intelligently conducted that already many thousands of trees and shrubs have been raised in the propagating department from seeds collected in all parts of the world, and there are more than 3,000 different species and varieties of woody plants now growing, besides great numbers of rare specimens of plant life, a full description of the arboretum appearing later herein.

The Government maintains no arboretum at the present time, although it does have in Washington a small Botanical Garden, but the Secretary of Agriculture is now engaged in purchasing land near the Anacostia River here in Washington for a national arboretum, under a law enacted March 4, 1927.

An arboretum is an area devoted to the trial and experiments upon trees of different regions and localities. Arboretums serve as trial grounds in which we may know whether or not a given species is adapted to the local soil and climatic conditions in which the trial is made. They afford an opportunity to test the suitability of trees for various purposes as to their rate of growth and their ability to fruit and flower under the trial conditions. They are research centers of the highest type and many more of them are needed in America to fill in the gaps in our knowledge of trees.

What is called an arboretum in the United States is usually called in foreign countries a botanical garden.

A number of arboretums have been started in the United States to determine for the specific locality in which established the suitability of trees for that region. Most of these have been established by institutions, a few have been established by the individual States. Others have been established through the efforts of far-seeing men who have seen the need and envisioned the place that these will occupy in the future life of the Nation.

Among those who have seen the vision of what an arboretum can provide in the way of an opportunity for the improvement of our native forests and trees and contribute to the future welfare of our country is Mr. Joy Morton, who created the foundation to be known as the Morton Arboretum at Lisle, Du Page County, Ill.

It is through the public-spirited efforts of such men as Mr. Morton that the scientific foresters are able to tell us what they can about our trees and shrubs, about the possibilities of new species and varieties for American conditions and of the possibilities of these species when our own are attacked or threatened by foreign diseases and insects.

So that one may see how important this kind of work is and how our future welfare may be dependent on it, I will make a short statement on the subject. But before I do so, I desire to state that this country needs more far-seeing public-spirited men like Joy Morton and those men who are able to do so, on account of success in the commercial world, and who desire to perpetuate their memory in a praiseworthy way and at the same time help a great cause in a great way, could do no better than to follow his example.

When the first voyagers came to the American shores they discovered in the new land, a wealth of trees and of forest such as had never before been found. The forests presented such an alluring and inviting appearance that the returning adventurers told wondrous tales in the homeland which served only to whet the curiosity of other adventurous spirits who desired to explore further the unknown lands. Thus, the early accounts show that the first voyagers and explorers noted the large varieties of trees and shrubs possessed in the new lands, ranging from the stately pines and the dark spruces of the North Atlantic region, to the magnificent hardwood and pine forests found in the neighborhood of the Jamestown colony in Virginia, and to the extensive pine forests of the Florida coast.

Throughout the early literature are constant references to the wonderful possibilities that these forests afforded, and the First Supply of the London Virginia Company brought to our shores artisans who were to supply the British Isles with material from the Virginia forests. In fact, of the three boats in this First Supply expedition in 1608, one returned to England laden with forest produce consisting of cedar planks, posts and shingles, pitch, tar, and turpentine, and pot-ashes. American forest tree seeds were also taken in this first supply and planted in the royal gardens of the Queen, who had in part financed the expedition.

Explorers and travelers in America in the eighteenth century reported with delight the many new varieties and species found, species that afforded opportunities in agriculture no less than in forestry. Walnuts and hickories there were in abundance with their supply of nuts for human consumption as well as for livestock; sassafras there was for its medicinal values; mighty oaks, suitable for shipbuilding, produced abundant acorns for fattening the hogs of the colonists; mulberry trees grew in a profusion that suggested the production of silk in early colonial times; pines there were of great value for their pitch, tar, and turpentine; cedar, cypress, locust, and other durable woods for building purposes abounded.

It was not necessary in those early days to introduce other tree species into the new land, although Micheaux, the famous French botanist, and others did so on an exceedingly limited scale. The American forest was looked upon in many instances as a barrier to settlement, and the object of the early agriculturists was to eliminate the forest that crops might be planted. This was unlike many another region which man has since visited for elsewhere he has generally found the local forest inadequate to supply him with the kind and character of wood, fruit, or shelter, suited for his local needs. Thus, for example, early colonists of Australia and South Africa found the eucalyptus hardwood forest furnished wood unsuited for building purposes, and it was not long before they had introduced the Californian Monterey pine to supply them with lumber for construction material.

However, in America, as time passed and the dense forest was supplanted by farms, need arose for species of trees most suitable for particular American conditions. Thus in the settlement of the western prairies, wood was needed for fuel, posts were needed for fencing, shelter was needed for livestock.

This need of the early prairie settler was met by extensive experiments carried on by a professor of Illinois College who, in a small arboretum of his own development, discovered that the Osage orange met fully the requirements of the prairie farmer. This discovery hastened the settlement of prairie lands not only throughout Illinois but in the western prairies where, before the days of the railroad, fuel, fencing, and shelter was difficult, if not impossible to obtain.

Other needs have developed. Our main wood-pulp species, the spruce and the fir of the Northeast and Canada, have been seriously depleted by fire, insects, and by overcutting, the result of our tremendous use of paper. To assist in meeting the need for a fast-growing species of tree commercially adapted for pulping the manufacturers have turned to the trial grounds, the arboretum, and have discovered certain improved strains of trees that grow faster than any of the wild aspens or poplars from which the strain was developed. Manufacturers of high-grade furniture are looking for strains of maple and walnut that will breed true and furnish the curly grain wood we so desire in our cabinets and interior finish. Naval-stores operators would obtain greater returns from their pine orchards did they have a tree of high resin production adapted to growth under American conditions.

For the most part the forester in America must deal with the wild stock of the forest as it has come to him, modified by no human considerations. In agriculture, we are dealing with plants that have been in the process of evolution for hundreds of years, and in some cases probably thousands. Plants of rapid growth, of quick bearing, of high yields, of resistant strains, have been developed and are being developed. In forestry no such enterprise on an adequate scale has been yet attempted, but here and there, at arboretums, are men who have been studying and working to develop our trees and to procure for us trees of higher yields, better growth, and more suited for our uses than the species our forefathers found at their hand.

What the scientist has done for agriculture, and what the horticulturist has done for our flowers and fruits, only serves to focus attention upon the great gains which can accrue to our country through research in forestry at arboretums and at the forest experiment stations.

There is another side to the development of these trees that should be considered distinct from the mere utilitarian development of the rapid-growing trees with special manufacturing qualities, a side which makes the development of arboretums a national economic necessity and stresses their importance as a potential resource. This is the use of the arboretum to test out the suitability of foreign trees for American conditions and their resistance to disease and insect pests which continually threaten our own native species.

As America has developed and as commerce has brought plants from many lands to our shores, there has also been brought to us tree diseases and forest insects which threaten our trees and forests. Among the most notable of these may be mentioned the chestnut blight which has spread with previously unheard-of rapidity for a tree disease, throughout the entire range of the chestnut, resulting in the loss of this most valuable timber species from our eastern hardwood forests. The chestnut is passing rapidly out of the picture, and in a few years will be practically extinct in America. The gipsy and brown-tail moths, introduced insects, have caused tremendous damage to the forests of New England and have destroyed many shade trees throughout southern New England. So also the larch canker, now found in scattered localities in the northeast, is making a serious threat to the valuable Douglas fir forests of our Pacific coast. Such forest diseases and insect pests were known abroad for many years, and in fact they have caused serious damage there.

But in their natural habitat, enemies and climatic conditions have either kept these destructive agencies in check or the trees have developed a resistance which has enabled them to overcome their troubles. Whether or not the trees to which these insects and diseases are hosts are equal or superior to our native trees which the diseases are attacking here, is not known, and neither is it known whether many of these resistant tree species are suitable for American conditions. As trial grounds, for this reason if for no other, arboretums in America are of exceedingly great importance.

MORTON ARBORETUM AT LISLE, DU PAGE COUNTY, ILL.

It seems that it still is little understood by the general public what really is the aim of the Morton Arboretum and what it does propose to accomplish for the common good.

Most frequently the arboretum is mistaken for a nursery and is requested to supply certain plants, or it is looked upon as a private park, which is open to the public. In reality it is neither of the two.

The term "arboretum" is usually explained as designating an "outdoor museum of woody plants," but the Morton Arboretum expects to do more than to merely collect all the hardy woody plants of the world, and to exhibit them in museum fashion, though in a living state. To test all the hardy woody plants under various conditions, to find out for what they may be used, and in particular, to test and study all the hardy timber trees of the world, which may be used for reforestation purpose is, in short, the aim of the Morton Arboretum. No plants are for sale at the Morton Arboretum, which is raising plants only for its own needs. The public is welcome to visit the arboretum, but is requested to refrain from picking flowers, which they are trying to preserve, and not to walk through the newly planted groups until paths have been prepared to make them accessible.

Primitive man, we are told, was dominated by the forest, and history is rich in evidence of the achievement of human progress through knowledge derived from wood.

With wood man learned to build homes and create architecture; to construct ships and master navigation; to build bridges; and through the agency of wood to acquire more fundamental knowledge of related subjects than he has of the properties of wood itself.

Abundant forests have made the United States the greatest wood-using nation and also the greatest wood waster of the world. Conservation of the remaining forests in the public domain and the full utilization of cut-over lands, now barren and practically worthless, by comprehensive, persistent, and systematic reafforestation is unquestionably the duty of our Government and should receive the approval of all good citizens.

With due appreciation of America's future need for lumber and after careful investigation of the few arboretums of the northern temperate zone, the Morton Arboretum at Lisle, Du Page County, Ill., was founded in 1921 by Joy Morton for the purpose of giving facilities for forestry observation, study, and research.

The fine achievements of the Arnold Arboretum at Boston, for more than half a century under the forceful direction of Prof. Charles S. Sargent, the Royal Botanical Gardens of Kew at London and the splendid work that has been done in France, Belgium, and Germany, all suggested to the founder that Illinois could have and should have an arboretum growing all the woody plants capable of withstanding the climate of Illinois.

The purposes and aim of the Morton Arboretum, as expressed in the declaration of trust establishing it, are stated as—

"Creating a foundation to be known as the Morton Arboretum," for practical, scientific research work in horticulture and agriculture, particularly in the growth and culture of trees, shrubs, and vines by means of a great outdoor museum arranged for convenient study of every species, variety, and hybrid of the woody plants of the world able to support the climate of Illinois, such museum to be equipped with an herbarium, a reference library, and laboratories for the study of trees and other plants, with reference to their characters, relationships, economic value, geographical distribution and their improvement by selection and hybridization; and for the publication of the results obtained in these laboratories by the officials and students of the arboretum, in order to increase the general knowledge and love of trees and shrubs, and bring about an increase and improvement in their growth and culture."

LOCATION

The 400-acre tract selected for the arboretum is situated about 25 miles west of Chicago, in Du Page County, and is easily reached by motor cars over Ogden Avenue or Roosevelt Road or by train to Lisle on the C. B. & Q. Railway. The arboretum is 1 mile north of Lisle.

The land is rolling and well watered by the east fork of the Du Page River; bordered by timbered hills, about 80 feet higher than the valley, with a good stand of native trees, and it is believed, is so far away from the railroads and the city of Chicago that the veteran trees of the old forest, as well as the valuable new plantings will never be injured by smoke or gas.

Visitors are welcome except in wet weather, when the roads are muddy. There are over six miles of good dirt motor roads and several miles of foot paths which afford visitors an opportunity to see all parts of the arboretum.

NURSERY AND GREENHOUSES

In developing an arboretum it is necessary to do a large amount of propagating because many of the varieties wanted can not be otherwise obtained. New plants are derived from seeds, cuttings, layering, or dividing. For this reason it is necessary to have a propagating department including an equipment of greenhouses and nurseries.

Some seeds, like those of hawthorns, require two seasons to germinate. In some cases, therefore, propagating is a matter of years. Many thousands of trees and shrubs have already been raised in the propagating department of the Morton Arboretum from seeds collected in all parts of the world; many seeds, cuttings, and scions have been obtained from the Arnold Arboretum, including seeds of several hundred kinds of hawthorns.

About 3,000 different species and varieties of woody plants are now growing at the Morton Arboretum.

GENERAL PLAN OF THE ARBORETUM

The trees and shrubs are generally arranged according to their botanical classification so that related plants may be easily compared, but there are also geographical groups, areas to illustrate forests, and planting for landscape effect.

The plantings for landscape effect are chiefly along the boundaries of the arboretum and borders of streams, lakes, and drives. All the various groups are made to harmonize with each other.

In the forestry plantings are large groups of trees valuable for forestry purposes, whose economic and practical value is being tested.

GEOGRAPHICAL GROUPS

The geographical groups in the arboretum now include and will include further specimens of trees forming typical collections from Japan, northern and central China, Amurland, Siberia, Balkans, Caucasus, the Pyrenees, and elsewhere.

A—THE JAPANESE GROUP

The Japanese group is not yet complete, but is well started, and the arrangement of the trees and shrubs has been made in such a way as to represent five zones of vegetation found in the rapid rise of the surface from sea level to everlasting snow on the mountain peaks, so noticeable in Japan.

These five bands or zones of plant life are: I, the pine forest of the lower levels; II, the deciduous forest of the lower region; III, the prairie region which has afforded many garden flowers grown in all parts of the world; IV, the deciduous forest of the upper levels; and V, highest of all, the coniferous trees of the upper regions extending up to the timber line.

The first or lowest zone includes some curious and beautiful evergreens, of which may be mentioned the peculiar Sciadopitys verticillata, specimens of which are making good growth.

The second zone contains, besides several kinds of the famed Japanese cherries, catalpas, and magnolias, a thorny tree with leaves like the castor bean, Acanthopanax ricinifolium.

A very handsome evergreen ilex (Ilex crenata), trees of the apple groups, firs, spruces, junipers, and larches are to be found in the fourth and fifth zones. Forms of quinces, Cydonia, occur in both the upper and lower zones.

B—THE EUROPEAN FOREST

East of the Rose Garden several acres are used for European plantings such as larches, oaks, mixed wood, alder grove, beech wood, spruce forest, birch grove, and pine forest.

As elsewhere throughout the Morton Arboretum, the trees are set to give a parklike effect, like little islands with openings between, separating the various groups. The grass paths, as well as the roads, are also used as boundaries between the various plantings.

NATIVE TREES AND PLANTS

A printed list of plants—trees, shrubs, perennials, annuals, and ferns—growing naturally in the territory of the Morton Arboretum has been published, identifying about 300 different plants native to the locality. A more complete list will be issued later.

FORMAL GARDEN

Specimens of various unusual forms of trees, such as those with pendant, weeping, or drooping branches, trees with leaves of different color from normal types, such as yellow or red foliage, have been gathered together in the Formal Garden. Here are growing such trees as weeping dogwood, similar forms of red-leaved and cut-leaved birch, and pendant and creeping evergreens, including Norway and Colorado spruce in various garden varieties, also nurserymen's variations of junipers and cedars, and good specimens of the red-leaved beech, birch, and Japanese maple. These odd or freak specimens would be out of place in the general botanical collections, so here they have a place by themselves, inclosed by a hedge and surrounded by the collection of woody vines.

THE ROSE GARDEN

Adjoining the Formal Garden on the south is the Rose Garden. The northern part of this space is to be devoted to the best roses for this locality. The collection now includes about two hundred kinds of hybrid garden roses. On the west side of the middle path are the hybrid tea roses, on the east side the hybrid perpetual roses, while edging the middle path are the polyantha roses. Two beds on a little slope on the north end of the main rose collection are filled with several plants of each of the "Twelve best roses of America," as determined by a questionnaire sent out by the American Rose Society.

THE LABELING SYSTEM

For the identificatiion of the plants growing in the arboretum a zinc label is attached to each specimen plant on which is embossed the botanical name of the plant and a number which refers to the card catalogue. In this catalogue a card may be consulted which bears the number given and from which information as to origin, date of planting, and so forth, may be secured. Information as to the location of other plants of the same kind is also recorded.

To the south is the collection of wild roses, of which many are growing in groups showing their relation to each other.

THE HERBARIUM

Additional information to that given in the card index will be found in the herbarium, which contains flowering and fruiting specimens, and seedling specimens of everything raised from seed that is growing in the arboretum. If the seed came from trees cultivated in the Arnold Arboretum, the herbarium usually contains specimens also from the parent tree, and information as to where its seed was collected.

THE MORTON ARBORETUM LIBRARY

The library, which is intended to be more a working library of up-to-date books than a book collection, contains nevertheless some rare works. Among them: A complete set of Curtis' Botanical Magazine, of the Gardeners Chronicle, the Botanical Cabinet, the Botanical Register, and many other famous works of botanical writers of all countries. Fortunately, just at the time when the Morton Arboretum Library was begun a number of large English private libraries were being broken up and sold, and thus books have been secured that ordinarily would be unavailable.

BIRDS IN THE MORTON ARBORETUM

The Morton Arboretum is a bird sanctuary, and with protection, many places for nests, and an unusual amount of food, including varieties not found elsewhere in this locality, the conditions are so favorable that many birds are now making the arboretum their home. Other birds visit the arboretum, including water fowl attracted by the several bodies of water.

Bulletins of popular information are issued by the Morton Arboretum to plant and tree lovers, containing reports on work accomplished in the arboretum, and are devoted to the spread of knowledge of worth-while plants, practical observations on cultivation of hardy plants, and the outcome of experiments in the arboretum. Crabapples, lilacs, roses, cacti, shrubs, spring flowering trees and shrubs, trees and shrubs with colored foliage, conifers, hedges, and a short report on some observations of general interest made during a winter trip through parts of Germany, France, England, and Holland were some of the subjects covered last year.

FOCH AT THE TOMB OF WASHINGTON

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, when Marshal Foch was over here during the disarmament conference, I happened to be at Mount Vernon when he came out to lay a wreath on the tomb of Washington. I am possibly the only living man in public life to-day who witnessed that scene, one that will be an inspiration for poets and painters for centuries to come.

The chances are that before we meet again that great leader of the allied armies will have passed away.

I wrote a short description of that incident, and I am going to ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD and to include my article written at that time.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

The article referred to reads as follows:

On Saturday, October 29, 1921, I witnessed one of the most solemn and impressive scenes that ever transpired on this continent when Marshal Foch, the venerated leader of the allied armies in the World War, paid his respects to the memory of the Father of his Country. Without military pomp or affected ostentation this celebrated hero, who less than three years ago commanded the greatest army the world has ever seen, visited the tomb of Washington and placed a floral wreath above the remains of America's most distinguished patriot.

Congress was not in session, the House having adjourned on Friday over until Monday, and Mrs. Rankin and I had gone out to Mount Vernon with a party of friends who wished to see the Washington home. The old darkey who watches the vault in which rest the remains of the General and Mrs. Washington informed us in a spirit of confidence that Marshal Foch would more than likely come out some time during the day to visit the home and pay his respects to Washington's memory. As we turned to leave he called our attention to a couple of photographers who had arrived and were adjusting their instruments, and alluded to the fact as almost positive evidence that the distinguished Frenchman was on his way.

We then decided to wait and get a glimpse of the "man of the hour" in the world's greatest tragedy. While we were waiting the old darkey enlightened us with a lecture on the various and sundry objects of importance connected with Mount Vernon, including himself. He said his ancestors belonged to General Washington, but that he himself was reared in an adjoining county, which he described as the "gyarden" spot of the world; that he had been on the estate for a great many years, and was familiar with every foot of its ground and every incident of its history. While engaged in this monologue, he glanced around at several young men who had approached the double iron gates of the vault and were looking in at the Washington tomb, upon which rested a beautiful floral tribute, recently placed there by General Diaz, of Italy, and, seeing that the boys wore their hats, the humble old servant said in a quiet, courteous tone, "Gentlemen, please remove your hats in the presence of the Father of his Country."

He then continued his discourse as if nothing unusual had happened, pointing out and naming the different trees near by that had been planted by distinguished hands. An acacia bush that had been planted near the tomb by some noted visitor, he said, had come from the Holy Land; a European fir tree just to the right of the walk that led down to the boat landing was planted by the Prince of Wales; a beautiful maple with spreading boughs and brilliant foliage was placed there by Li Hung Chang, the noted Chinese statesman. Another one was planted by Grover Cleveland, another by Theodore Roosevelt, and others by various and sundry persons of distinction from all parts of the earth.

While he was thus entertaining us some one announced that General Foch had arrived and was going through the mansion, and in a very few minutes we saw the famous visitor and his small party coming briskly down the walk. He was dressed in a gray uniform, which gave him somewhat the appearance of a Confederate soldier, with laced boots and a brilliant red cap. His strong face wore a sublime expression of profound solemnity as he passed through the open gate and quietly placed a wreath of flowers on the marble casket. I leaned forward and peeped into the somber silence of that vault, and as I did I looked upon one of the most serenely inspiring pictures that ever met the gaze of mortal man. There in the twilight of the tomb the greatest soldier of the twentieth century stood with bowed, uncovered head above the remains of the greatest figure of the New World, his lips moving in silent supplication.

Words can not describe that scene. The camera could not penetrate the shadows of the dusky precinct, and, unfortunately, there was no painter present who possessed the genius to reproduce it on his canvas, give it to the world, and transmit it to the generations yet to come.

He turned and left the vault, hastily inspected the surroundings, and began to retrace his steps to where his car was waiting to carry him back to Washington. With boyish interest and enthusiasm, he seemed to observe everything in sight. As he passed the old carriage house, he turned aside and placed his hands up to his face to shade his eyes from the light while he looked in on the cumbrous vehicle driven by Washington a century and a quarter ago. He went from there to the old kitchen, and as he wound his way out through the old flower garden, he glanced back several times, as if to get a last, long, lingering look at the most interesting house in America—if not in the entire world.

At the front gate his car stood waiting, and as he stepped into it he looked back again, surveyed the crowd, smiled, saluted, and disappeared.

We had looked upon the unassuming great.

HON. DANIEL R. ANTHONY, JR.

Mr. WOOD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. WOOD. Mr. Speaker and Members of the House, I expect that the two hardest words in our vocabulary to pronounce when they are fraught with sincere feeling are the words "good by." These words will be feelingly spoken many times here to-day.

There are separations to be made that will be trying. One of the great compensations in being a Member of this House is the friendship that is created and cemented here. This friendship is not parted by the center aisle. There is no division when it comes to such friendships. Some of the warmest friends I have had since I came into this House 14 years ago are on this side, and were on this side, many of whom have passed beyond.

To-day we are to say good-by to one who has rendered splendid service in this House for more than 20 years. I refer to our colleague, our fellow committeeman, DANIEL R. ANTHONY. [Applause, the Members rising.]

For 20 years he has been a faithful Member of this body, discharging the duties that fell upon him with conscientious devotion. He is to leave us in person, but in memory he will long abide; and the goodly deeds in and out of this chamber that he has done will be remembered for a long, long time. [Applause.]

I know I am voicing the sentiment of every Member of this House when I say that we regret his going. When he has gone we will have lost a valuable Member, his State a valuable servant, the country a valuable statesman, and I know I am also voicing the sentiment of every one here when I proclaim that when we say to him good-by we will do so with the full force of what those words literally mean—God be with you. [Applause.]

Mr. BYRNS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. BYRNS. Mr. Speaker, I wish to join in the tribute which has been paid by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. WOOD] to the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, the Hon. DANIEL R. ANTHONY, who is voluntarily retiring from Congress. [Applause.] I am sure that I express the individual and personal sentiments of every Member of Congress on both sides of this Chamber when I say that we regret that the condition of his health impelled him not to seek reelection to the Seventy-first Congress, and that we hope that the rest and his relief from the arduous duties under which he has labored for the past 20 years will soon restore him to a vigorous state of health and that he may soon return to public life. [Applause.] The country can ill afford to lose a man in public service of the character, fidelity, and ability of DANIEL R. ANTHONY. [Applause.]

During my service on the Committee on Appropriations it has been my fortune to serve under five chairmen—Mr. Fitzgerald, Mr. Sherley, Mr. Good, Mr. Madden, and Mr. ANTHONY. All of them have made great chairmen, all of them have been faithful, devoted, conscientious public servants, interested not only in conserving the Public Treasury but in seeing that every proper activity of the Government was given every opportunity to function as it should function in the interest of our Government and of the people.

And may I say in this connection that, since the people have determined to continue the Republican majority during the next Congress, I am very glad that we are to have another chairman in the person of the distinguished gentleman from Indiana [Mr. WOOD] [applause], who will measure up in ability, in fidelity to duty, with all of those who have preceded him.

The position of chairman of the Committee on Appropriations is an exceedingly difficult and arduous as well as a most responsible position. Frequently the time comes when he has to deny the request of some of his closest friends. It requires a great deal of labor, a great deal of work, and I wish for Mr. WOOD in his administration the same degree of success that has attended the other gentlemen under whom I have served.

We all love DAN ANTHONY because he is a genial, kindly, lovable humane fellow. [Applause.] We admire him and respect him because of his great ability, his devotion to duty, and the splendid service which he has rendered throughout the years he has served in the Congress of the United States. [Applause.] I express the wish of everyone when I say that we trust he will prosper in his every undertaking and that he may decide to again enter public life in the interest of the public service. [Applause.]

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Speaker, if the control of the Government should change in this House from one side of the aisle to the other the gentleman who has just spoken, the gentleman from Tennesee [Mr. BYRNS] would, in the natural course of things become the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations and under him it would be a great pleasure to serve, and the interests of the country would be very safe. [Applause.] Gracious, generous, and broad-minded, the tribute which he has just made to the retiring chairman, the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. ANTHONY], and to the incoming chairman, Mr. WOOD, is emphasis of the fact that politics do not prevail in the consideration of matters in the Appropriation Committee. That is proper, because whether one is a Republican, Democrat, or Socialist, he is expected to bear his full share in the contributions for the support of the Government, and is likewise entitled to equal consideration in the operations of the Government through its various activities.

It has been my good fortune, one of the rich experiences of my congressional career, to have had at times a close personal contact in committee work with the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. ANTHONY], both in the committee room and in the field.

He is a lovable character, he is a devoted public servant, he is gentle and unassuming and courteous, and considerate always, but I have found him in his committee work and in his official duties possessed of an abundance of independence of spirit, the highest integrity of character, and an unyielding devotion to what he considers to be right. [Applause.]

He came to the Committee on Appropriations immediately following the World War. He was chairman of the Subcommittee on Military Appropriations in the period of demobilization, the transition from the Army of the World War time to the Army of peace times following. It was my pleasure to serve on that subcommittee under his chairmanship. Other members of that subcommittee were the gentleman then from Virginia, Mr. Slemp, who later became Secretary to the President, and our late, lamented friend, the gentleman from Mississippi, Mr. Sisson. That was before the Budget system was fully inaugurated. The appropriation estimates for the Army came to the Congress at $660,000,000. When the committee had completed its work under his wise leadership, his painstaking effort, and his devotion to the proper expenditure of the public funds, that bill was reported to the House, not at $660,000,000, but at $328,000,000, and that without any interference with the proper performance of the functions of the Army. That merely instances his wise leadership, his knowledge of the subject, and his devotion to public service. I have seen him in the field, I have traveled with him, and I know what a delightful companion he is always.

He is leaving us now and if anyone was ever entitled to a vacation from public service after years of service well done, it is DAN ANTHONY, and now, giving preferred attention for the first time in 20 years or more to his own affairs and his own health, we all wish to him prosperity and a complete return to health. [Applause.]

HON. EUGENE BLACK

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for five minutes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. BACON). Without objection, it will be so ordered.

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, Thomas Jefferson once said that there were only three questions necessary to be asked of a candidate for public office: Is he honest, is he qualified, is he faithful?

We are to-day losing one of our Members who, measured by that standard, has not had a superior in this body since I have been a Member of Congress. I refer to EUGENE BLACK, of Texas, who is now about to retire. [Applause.]

I did not rise to make a speech, but to express what I know to be the sentiment of every individual in this House, Democrat and Republican, that from the standpoint of honesty, of courage, of faithfulness, of diligence, of devotion to duty, and to the best interests of the country, we are losing one of the most valuable public servants the American Congress has ever seen. We all regret to see him go, and we wish for him a long, happy, and prosperous career in the enjoyment of those laurels he has so richly won in this House, when, regardless of circumstances, regardless of criticism, regardless of opposition, he has had the courage to do what he thought was right. [Applause.]

HON. JOHN M. MORIN

Mr. McSWAIN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for two minutes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. McSWAIN. Mr. Speaker, ladies, and gentlemen of the House, I think it is fit that I, from the Democratic side of the aisle should, without any prompting or suggestions from anyone whatever, say a word about the public services of a gentleman who comes from the State of Pennsylvania, who professes a different political faith from mine, and who for 16 years has been a faithful and unassuming and useful Member of this House, and who for the last four years has been chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs, on which I have the honor to serve. As a testimony of the esteem in which the members of that committee hold the Hon. JOHN M. MORIN, when we realized that his term of service was about to expire, all of us joined in signing a statement testifying our confidence in his integrity as a man, in his faithfulness as a public official, and in his fairness and justice as the presiding officer of that committee. And we evidenced in a material way by a beautiful gift our esteem of him as a friend.

Therefore I have asked this privilege to record in the permanent records of the Nation the fact that this courteous, gracious, unassuming gentleman has for 16 years been a patient and a faithful and effective worker in the welfare of the Republic, and that he goes to other fields of labor with the confidence and well wishes and the affectionate regard, not only of the members of the committee with whom he was intimately associated day after day but with the regard and esteem and confidence of all of the Members of this House. [Applause.]

Mr. ABERNETHY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for two minutes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. ABERNETHY. Mr. Speaker, ladies, and gentlemen of the House, we are coming now to the close of this session, and I rise to offer one word that may go down in the records of this country, to the effect that after all is said and done we Members of the House know that there is no dividing line in this membership. We have our differences of opinion, we have our differences in political beliefs. I have been a Member of the House now for six years or more and have received the same fair consideration from the Republican side of the House that I have received from the Democratic side of the House. I had the extreme pleasure to spend 60 days on an extensive trip from New York to Alaska and return with the distinguished gentleman from Kansas [Mr. ANTHONY], and I pledge you my solemn word that I never thought of him as a Republican until we got back here to Washington, and I don't believe in his heart he is a Republican—I think he is a Democrat. [Laughter and applause.] That is the way I feel about it. I want also to pay a tribute to the gentleman from Texas, [Mr. BLACK]. He is a good fellow, and my friend TOM BLANTON is a good fellow and so is JOHN MORIN—they are all good fellows, and I wish that we could fix some way so that the membership of this House would not be disturbed every two years. [Laughter and applause.]

HON. MEYER JACOBSTEIN

Mr. O'CONNOR of New York. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for two minutes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

Mr. O'CONNOR of New York. Mr. Speaker and ladies and gentlemen of the House, most of the men about whom reference is made to-day are Members of long service in this body; but there is voluntarily retiring from this House of Representatives to-day a man who in just a few terms has exceptionally distinguished himself as an economist, a professor of economics, and a philosopher. I refer to the Hon. MEYER JACOBSTEIN, of New York. [Applause.]

Few men have come to Congress better qualified to discuss the great economic questions which confront us than Professor JACOBSTEIN. You will readily recall how on the questions of farm relief, of reapportionment, and of the census he clearly demonstrated to this House what a young man, a man with only a short service, can do when he is properly equipped and willing to work. It is therefore a real loss to the State of New York and to the Nation when Congressman JACOBSTEIN retires from the service of his country. [Applause.]

HON. ASHTON C. SHALLENBERGER AND HON. JOHN NATHANIEL NORTON

Mr. HOWARD of Nebraska. Mr. Speaker, may I speak for two or three minutes?

The SPEAKER. Without objection the gentleman is recognized for two and three-quarter minutes. [Laughter.]

Mr. HOWARD of Nebraska. I rise to express the regret of all the Nebraska delegation, and I think the regret of many of you, with reference to the untimely retirement of two of my colleagues. They fell outside the breastworks in the late battle, but their faces were to the fore. I refer to Governor SHALLENBERGER [applause] and to our newer colleague, Mr. NORTON. [Applause.]

Mr. SHALLENBERGER lives out in what we call the short-grass country of Nebraska, and I can recall the time before his coming when no Democrat was able to raise his head higher than the Buffalo grass in Nebraska. [Laughter.] And if you people are acquainted with the Buffalo grass, you will know that it grows very close to the ground. But Mr. SHALLENBERGER has the habit of coming back. I think he has been defeated about three times and elected six or seven times, and he always comes back. [Applause.] And he will come again two years from now if he shall want to come, and he will bring NORTON back with him, because all the world seems to feel that two years from now there will be a righteous revolution that will bring back many good men. [Applause and laughter.]

REPRESENTATIVES WEAVER, BULWINKLE, AND LYON

Mr. DOUGHTON rose.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from North Carolina is recognized.

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Speaker and Members of the House, while it seems to be in order to express regret concerning those who are voluntarily or involuntarily retiring as Members of this House, and I concur in all that has been said, it is a matter of very deep regret to me, as I am sure it is to each Member of this body, that North Carolina is losing the services of three of her ablest and most distinguished Representatives, to wit, Mr. WEAVER, Mr. BULWINKLE, and Mr. LYON.

Representative WEAVER, of the tenth district of North Carolina, is and has been for some years a member of the Committee on the Judiciary. Mr. WEAVER possesses every qualification of mind and character necessary and essential to the making of a first-class Congressman, and his retirement is a distinct loss to this House, the country, his State, and his district. [Applause.]

Then there is Major BULWINKLE, of the ninth district of North Carolina, a man who equals in character and ability, in fact every qualification, any Member of this body. Major BULWINKLE has displayed diligence and efficiency of the highest order. He has been for some years a member of the Veterans' Committee of the House and has specialized on legislation in behalf of our ex-service men. Major BULWINKLE measures up to the highest standard of excellence in the American Congress. [Applause.]

It is also regrettable that the Hon. HOMER LYON, of the sixth district of North Carolina, has seen cause to voluntarily retire and return to the practice of law, his chosen profession, having been an ornament to the bar in North Carolina before coming to Congress. Mr. LYON has rendered conspicuous service as a Member of the House and especially on the Committee on Rivers and Harbors. [Applause.]

I know I can truthfully say the retirement of these three capable and faithful Representatives is regretted by every Member of this House.

Should Major BULWINKLE and ZEB WEAVER desire to come back, I have no doubt they could do so. The cause of their defeat was in no way chargeable to anything in their records, but only due to the vicissitudes of politics and an unfortunate situation in North Carolina for which they were not in the least responsible and over which they had not the slightest control.

Gentlemen and ladies of the House, I thank you. [Applause.]

ENLARGING THE CAPITOL GROUNDS

Mr. ELLIOTT. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the bill H. R. 13929, with Senate amendments, and concur in the Senate amendments.

The SPEAKER. The clerk will report the bill by title and the Senate amendments.

The clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 13929) to provide for the enlarging of the Capitol grounds.

The Senate amendments were read.

The SPEAKER. The question is on concurring in the Senate amendments.

The Senate amendments were concurred in.

HON. VICTOR BERGER

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes.

The SPEAKER. Without objection it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Speaker, it seems that I always have a peculiar mission to perform. In these closing hours of tribute, when both sides of the House have been represented, I want to pay a tribute to a Member who leaves the House, perhaps unsung, but with the affection and respect of every Member of the House, the gentleman from Wisconsin, Mr. VICTOR BERGER. [Applause.]

When Mr. BERGER first entered political life in this country he represented a school of thought and a political and economic philosophy which was considered in this country as radical and in the countries of Europe as the extreme left.

To-day that same school in Europe has become, in many countries, the extreme right, the conservative wing, while in our own country many of the policies and principles he has advocated have been adopted and accepted and some of them do not appear so extreme and radical to-day. Many of the things which in his early days seemed paternalistic have been accepted as a proper and necessary municipal, State, or governmental function to-day. [Applause.] For instance, his views on common carriers, on the railroads, were considered so absurd as not to even receive consideration, but 25 years later they were accepted, adopted, and advocated by the Great Commoner, whose talented and charming daughter will sit in and grace the Seventy-first Congress. [Applause.]

Mr. BERGER serves our Nation in the capacity of a pioneer, popularizing ideas of political and social reform long before they are accepted by the many, and while they are still frowned upon by the majority and denounced by political leaders. It is, for the most part, a thankless and unenviable task, but it must be done. It is part of the price that is paid for political and social progress, in all ages and in all lands. Pioneering requires courage, devotion to the common weal, ability to defend one's views and faith in their ultimate vindication. Mr. BERGER possesses all of these qualifications.

In this House, to which he was the first Socialist elected, Mr. BERGER had a peculiar mission to perform. As he stated a few days ago, he was not in a position to pass legislation, but he was here to point out the defects he finds in our political and economic structure, to focus attention on economic and political wrongs, as he sees them, and to indicate what his party would do to remedy these defects if it had the power. In doing this he sets the pace, as it were, just as he set the pace many years ago for many of the reforms that have since become the law of the land. He performed his mission in this House faithfully and ably, with credit to himself, his district, and his party, and in a manner that attracted the attention of the House and gained for him the respect of its membership.

Mr. BERGER returns to private life to continue, in a somewhat different capacity, that of a newspaper editor, his work for the principles in which he believes, and his service to the people. He is now well advanced in years. He leaves this House with the good wishes of us all. [Applause.] I am sure the membership will join with me in wishing him good health and happiness in the years to come. [Applause.]

OLD-AGE PENSIONS

Mr. MEAD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks and to insert a statement by Governor Roosevelt on the question of old-age pensions.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks and to insert a statement by Governor Roosevelt, of New York. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MEAD. Mr. Speaker and Members of the House, within the last decade a number of States have adopted legislation for the relief of the aged and several other States have created commissions to study the problem. In Europe a number of countries have already adopted laws granting old-age pensions. Numbering amongst these progressive nations can be listed England, Belgium, France, Austria, Germany, Greece, Iceland, Italy, Poland, Portugal, Rumania, Spain, Sweden, Switzerland, Yugoslavia, and Czechoslovakia. South American nations are also seriously concerned with regard to the problem of caring for their aged, and Chile and Argentina have already passed laws providing for old-age insurance. In far away Australia and New Zealand similar legislation has been approved. The great State of New York, which I have the honor to represent in part in the House of Representatives, has a commission studying the question at the present time, and it is expected that legislation will be adopted without much further delay. The Hon. Franklin D. Roosevelt, the progressive and humanitarian Governor of New York, in a recent message to the legislature, takes an emphatic stand in favor of the immediate adoption of a measure which will make provision for the aged of our State. Governor Roosevelt's message follows:

The majority party in your honorable bodies has stricken out from the appropriation bill which I submitted to you pursuant to the constitution an item to defray the expenses of a proposed commission to study the question of security against old-age poverty and want in this State. I can not believe that it was your intention summarily to dismiss in this manner all consideration of the pressing needs of our numerous aged poor. For that reason there is being introduced for your consideration a bill creating such a commission, and I urge upon you its immediate adoption.

New social conditions bring new ideas of social responsibility. The problem of how to take care of the aged poor outside of State institutions is now occupying the attention of other States of the Union as well as of foreign countries. We can no longer be satisfied with the old method of putting them away in dismal institutions with the accompanying loss of self-respect, personality, and interest in life.

This State abandoned some time ago the principle of institutional care for poor children and adopted the method of helping them in their own homes. Similar provision should be made for old age.

Poverty in old age should not be regarded either as a disgrace or necessarily as a result of lack of thrift or energy. Usually it is a mere by-product of modern industrial life. An alarmingly increasing number of aged persons are becoming dependent on outside help for bare maintenance. While improved medical science has increased man's span of life, the rapid pace of modern industry has proportionately increased the number of years during which he is an unsought employee. While the worker of to-day, on the average, may look forward to a longer life than did his grandfather, he must necessarily count on a shorter period of industrial availability. No greater tragedy exists in modern civilization than the aged, worn-out worker who, after a life of ceaseless effort and useful productivity, must look forward for his declining years to a poorhouse. A more modern social consciousness demands a more humane and efficient arrangement.

Some of our States and some foreign countries have dealt with the problem by adopting a straight pension system, where the government distributes a certain periodic stipend to aged persons fulfilling the requirements as to residence, citizenship, etc. I am informed that such a system has been adopted in Montana, Kentucky, Wisconsin, Alaska, and Nevada, and in Australia, Denmark, the Irish Free State, New Zealand, Norway, and Uruguay. Objections have been made to this method on the ground that it savors too much of a straight governmental dole and that it is likely to sap a man's self-reliance and discourage thrift.

On the other hand, a number of countries have adopted a system in which workers really insure themselves with the aid of the State against old-age want. They contribute certain fixed weekly amounts into a capital fund, during their more youthful years of industrial productivity. These contributions are equally matched by the government itself; so that the worker and his government are equally sharing the burden of insuring against the needs of old age. Provision is made under such plans, for temporary cessation of such contribution by the worker during enforced unemployment. In general, this scheme of old-age insurance is followed out in England, Belgium, France, Argentina, Austria, Chile, Czechoslovakia, Germany, Greece, Iceland, Italy, Poland, Portugal, Rumania, Spain, Sweden, Switzerland, and Yugoslavia.

There is no reason why our State, which is one of the foremost centers of industry in the world, should not now investigate the plans of these various jurisdictions as well as other proposed methods, and, indeed, the entire question of security against old-age want, to determine what, if anything, should be done by it to meet this rapidly growing problem within our own borders.

It must be borne in mind that, although the adoption of any plan of old-age pensions or old-age insurance will be expensive, the present method by which the State's aged poor are being taken care of in institutions is also expensive. Four or five years ago the United States Department of Labor, through the Bureau of Labor Statistics, made a study of the poor farms and almshouses throughout the Nation, with a view to ascertaining the expense of maintaining them and the value of the capital invested, including the land, buildings, and equipment.

In the State of New York, the investigation covered 61 institutions housing 9,203 inmates. The report shows that the capital value of these institutions was $16,321,338, or $1,773.49 per inmate, and that the annual maintenance cost was $2,753,327, or $299.19 per inmate. In other words, there were then invested almost $1,800 of public moneys for each inmate of our poor houses in this State, and almost $6 per week was being spent by the public to maintain each person. This present high cost should be carefully considered in deciding upon the advisability of making a change in our policies of providing for the dependent aged. I look forward hopefully to the day when our poorhouses will be used, if at all, only for the helpless incurables of the State who by virtue of physical or mental handicaps are unable to provide for themselves.

Apart from the apparent justice of making some provision for our aged poor outside of institutions, a wise public policy dictates the necessity of an early formulation of a definite intelligent policy along these lines. The sooner this problem is met scientifically, the more economical will be its operation.

Our changing economic structure makes imperative the necessity for a proper and immediate solution of this great question. While the progress now being made in medicine and surgery adds to the expectancy of life, industry, on the other hand, prompted by a desire for greater efficiency in production, has adopted methods prohibiting the employment of workers who have reached or advanced slightly beyond middle age, thereby adding to the number of our people who must turn elsewhere for relief in their advanced years.

There are many reasons and causes which make a man dependent in his later years. Many are impaired by loss of health, for sickness and disease must of necessity exact their terrible toll. Occupational and other maladies likewise contribute their great share. Bankruptcy in business, financial failures, poor investments, and other causes tend to increase the number. The prevalent discrimination practiced almost everywhere against the older employee and in favor of youth is likewise a contributing factor. Aside from the very few States which now have old-age pension legislation upon their statute books, our dependent aged are cared for in almshouses and similar institutions. In many of these public almshouses are to be found the unfortunate imbecile, the criminal, the idiot, and other wrecks of humanity, housed with the aged citizen who, through no fault of his own, has become an object of public charity, but who may enjoy at least fair health, an honorable reputation, and an intellect that has been strengthened rather than weakened in life's struggles. The brutal system which compels the aged and infirm to spend their few declining years in the poorhouses of the Nation is a pitiful and tragic indictment against the civilization of our time. It is neither fair, just, nor humane. Its cost is expensive and its results are destructive.

My colleague from New York, the Hon. WILLIAM I. SIROVICH, has introduced a resolution, which has been referred to the Committee on Rules, and which, if adopted by the Congress of the United States, will provide for the appointment of a commission to study this important question. I trust this legislation will be adopted within the very near future, so that a nation-wide investigation and report can be made on the subject, which I am sure will be beneficial to the Nation as well as to the several States. Representative SIROVICH has also introduced a bill designed to have the Government of the United States appropriate a sum of money to every State that is willing to apply the principle of old-age pensions to its citizens. If this legislation should be adopted by the United States and subsequently by the several States of the Union, the Federal Government would appropriate a part of the money, leaving the remainder to be appropriated by the individual States.

HON. WILLIAM P. COLE

Mr. LINTHICUM. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes.

The SPEAKER. Without objection it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. LINTHICUM. Mr. Speaker, there came into our midst in the Seventieth Congress a gentleman from the second congressional district of Maryland, the Hon. WILLIAM P. COLE, the successor of our distinguished Marylander, Senator TYDINGS, who went to the Senate. This young man, Capt. WILLIAM P. COLE, came from a line of men distinguished in statecraft and in public life, a graduate of the University of Maryland, distinguished for his service on the battle fields of France in the World War. He entered this House and has made an excellent record as a member of the Committee on the District of Columbia. He has been one of our very best associates and has made a most excellent record as a Member of this House and is beloved by everyone who knows him. He represents the largest district in the State of Maryland and has represented it as efficiently as any man could possibly have done.

It is with a great deal of regret on the part of the Maryland Members of this House, and I am sure on the part of all who know him, that the Hon. WILLIAM P. COLE, because of the tidal wave in the last election, has been swept from our midst. I feel there is destined for him a brilliant career in public life and that he will again be among us to finish the splendid and most useful work he commenced. The lovable, useful, and brilliant young statesman that he is. [Applause.]

HON. B. G. LOWREY

Mr. QUIN. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the House, we have a good man from Mississippi, our distinguished colleague, Mr. B. G. LOWREY, who goes out of this House to-day. This gentleman, high, great, honorable, known all over the State of Mississippi for his splendid work in educational and religious matters, as a Member of this House has a splended record.

This splendid man, who retires to private life, carries with him the hearts of this great body back yonder to Mississippi where the men and women and the school girls whom he has helped to educate for the last forty years know and love him, and I want you gentlemen to remember our dear friend and splendid colleague after he has gone. Our hearts are with him. God bless you, Mr. LOWREY. [Applause.]

HON. DANIEL R. ANTHONY

Mr. FRENCH. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the House, I was called out of the House Chamber a few moments ago when several Members of the House expressed their regret at the withdrawal from our membership of DAN ANTHONY, of Kansas. My regard for my colleague is such that I must voice something of my appreciation of the life and services of this distinguished man. [Applause.]

There are only eight Members of Congress who have had service in this House for a longer period of time, and only five other Members whose services have approached in length his service.

I suppose there is no organization in the world that more promptly takes an appraisal of those who become members of its group than does the House of Representatives. Rather the impression the Members of our body have of their colleagues is the impression that the Members themselves compel us to have. The impression we have is the impression that they compel us to have through their daily life. If a Member, as did DAN ANTHONY, comes to occupy a high place in our regard, it is because of industry, because of his habits of study and application as applied to the tasks given him to do, because of his candor in debate, and because of strength of character that sustains him in the heavy hours of responsibility.

DAN ANTHONY was a stalwart man physically, and he had not been among us very long before we came to regard him as a stalwart man mentally, as a stalwart man in that general ability that enabled him in brief time to take a commanding place in the actions and the deliberations of this Chamber.

Our colleague is withdrawing voluntarily on account of ill health, and yet, although he had been afflicted for several years, last spring when the distinguished and beloved chairman of the Apppropriations Committee and an outstanding leader of this body, the late Martin Madden, was called from us by death, DAN ANTHONY was drafted as his successor as chairman of that committee. He was like a soldier who, though wounded, is willing to carry on, and he has carried on admirably and well during the eight or nine months of his chairmanship, and he has still further enriched his record of things accomplished.

In his public service Mr. ANTHONY has so borne himself as to command the respect of the membership of this House and to challenge the admiration and confidence of his fellows who have served with him and under his leadership upon the Committee on Appropriations. As he separates himself from further activities in this body, the best wishes of the entire membership go with him for the greatest abundance of health and strength for continued service during many years that we hope may stretch out ahead. [Applause.]

HON. JAMES T. BEGG

Mr. KEARNS. Mr. Speaker, there is one of our colleagues who is leaving the House to-day who is perhaps as well known as any man who has served amongst us in many years. I refer to the Hon. JAMES BEGG, of Ohio. [Applause.]

Mr. BEGG has a name in this House that perhaps few in the history of the membership of the House have ever enjoyed. He has been one of the leaders for the last four or five years. I do not suspect there has ever been a visitor to the Capitol who has not met JIM BEGG.

He is retiring, not because he was defeated, because such an occurrence as that could not have happened in his district. He was one of the most popular men that the district ever produced. He was one of the most popular men who has ever had a seat in this Congress, perhaps, in the history of the Congress.

He retired because he was a candidate for Governor of the State of Ohio, and it must be one of his fond recollections that he was only defeated for the nomination by a very small majority. I am sure that if a greater effort on his part had been put forth he would have been nominated. I know it is with a tinge of sadness that the membership on both sides of the House note his leaving to-day. But when he leaves here he will find a field of activity that will be for the benefit of the country, because whenever JIM BEGG is in action there is going to be a benefit to all the people, not only in his own district, but in the entire State and Nation. [Applause.] We all know that in whatever occupation he is engaged he will be one of the leaders wherever he is.

Again I say, I hope for him, as you hope for him, a prosperous continuance in public life, because a man with the talent of JAMES BEGG will always be in demand.

Therefore it is with sorrow to all of us that we witness his departure to-day. [Applause.] Jim, we wish you well, happiness and every success. [Applause.]

HON. IRA G. HERSEY

Mr. WHITE of Maine. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the House, on this day my colleague the Hon. IRA G. HERSEY [applause] closes his present congressional services. He came to this body with unusual qualifications; he was a lawyer, grounded in the fundamental principles of the law, and of wide experience gained through practice of many years in all the courts of the State of Maine.

He came with long legislative experience in both the house and the senate of his native State. He came with habits of industry, independence of spirit of thought and of judgment, and with character. This experience and these qualifications have made of him one of the useful and respected Members of this body. [Applause.] As he served his State with distinction and with credit, so he has served the country here. I express for him my respect, my feelings of personal affection, and I am sure that the entire membership of the House join with me in these sentiments toward him. [Applause.]

ADDRESS OF HON. ANDREW J. MONTAGUE

Mr. CONNERY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by printing a scholarly address by the gentleman from Virginia, the Hon. ANDREW J. MONTAGUE, on the one hundred and fiftieth anniversary of the Battle of Lexington, delivered at Lexington, Mass., on Sunday, April 19, 1925.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. CHINDBLOM). Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The address referred to is as follows:

ONE HUNDRED AND FIFTIETH ANNIVERSARY OF THE BATTLE OF LEXINGTON

Mr. Chairman, ladies, and gentlemen, I would not construe the invitation that brings me into this presence as a compliment to myself. I would, rather, think of it as a recognition by Massachusetts of her associations with Virginia when these two Commonwealths led in the Revolution as well as in much of its subsequent accomplishments.

Massachusetts and Virginia were the first of the Colonies to sense the rising storm and the first to discern that the solution of the conflict must be found not in protest, not in resistance, but in independence. To this end Lexington was the first to shed her blood and Yorktown the last to stanch the gaping wound.

Virginia is affectionately mindful of the confidence and good will of Massachusetts. She recalls that in the old formidable days John Adams and Samuel Adams sat in high and holy council with Jefferson and Henry and Lee. She proudly remembers that Massachusetts summoned Washington to command the armies of the united Colonies and that she named Marshall for the judgment seat of the new Republic.

Patrick Henry, writing to John Adams on May 20, 1776, from the Constitutional Convention at Williamsburg, which five days before had declared Virginia's full independence of Great Britain, and had ordered her delegates in the Continental Congress to propose a similar resolution for the action of that body, said:

"Would to God you and your Sam Adams were here! It shall be my incessant study so to form our portrait of government that a kindred with New England may be discerned in it; and if all your excellencies can not be preserved, yet I hope to retain so much of the likeness that posterity shall pronounce us descended from the same stock. I shall think perfection is obtained if we have your approbation."

John Adams, replying on June 3, 1776, and referring to Henry's part in framing the first written constitution known to man, said:

"I know of none so competent to the task as the author of the first Virginia resolutions against the stamp act [the resolutions of May 29, 1765], who will have the glory with posterity of beginning and concluding this great Revolution."

This comradeship, this patriotic alliance, between the two Commonwealths was evidenced by the resentment of the people of Virginia to the arbitrary writs of assistance, and later to the Boston port bill, a measure apparently designed by the British Parliament to punish the people of Boston for their resistance to the tea tax and to compel the colony to submission. Your great Senator, the late George F. Hoar, in speaking of this occurrence, said:

"But George III and his councilors had Virginia as well as Massachusetts to reckon with. Her generous people rose as one man. Not only letters of sympathy came pouring in to the selectmen of Boston but there came substantial contributions of money and food, which, considering the poverty of the time and the difficulty of communication and transport, are almost without parallel in history. The House of Burgesses appointed a day of fasting and prayer, and ordered 'that the members do attend in their places to proceed with the speaker and the mace to church for the purposes aforesaid.' But they did not leave Boston to fast. Meetings were held all over the Old Dominion. In Fairfax County George Washington was chairman and headed the subscription with 50 pounds. The convention over which he presided recommended subscriptions in every county in Virginia. Mason ordered his children to keep the day strictly and to attend church clad in mourning. In Westmoreland County John Augustine Washington was chairman. He inclosed in his letter a bill of lading for 1,092 bushels of grain. The generous flame spread among the backwoodsmen. Not only from tidewater but from over the mountains, where the roads were little better than Indian trails, the farmers denied themselves to make their generous gifts. Their wagons thronged all the roads as they brought their gifts of corn and grain to tidewater."

Senator Hoar has alluded with great feeling to the march of Daniel Morgan with 12 companies from Virginia to Boston in 21 days. If accomplished within this time, and the evidence is uniform to this effect, the rapidity of the movement exhibited not only a high sense of duty but tremendous enthusiasm.

I make these allusions with no purpose of stressing the sympathy or generosity of Virginia, but rather that we may not forget or outlive the comradeship of the olden days—days when Virginia's eyes beamed with delight in beholding the deeds of Massachusetts—days when Massachusetts heard gladly the words of counsel and affection from Virginia. Hand in hand these two Commonwealths entered the great struggle, and hand in hand they undertook to consummate its incomparable achievements in the establishment of a mighty Republic. They have in the past sometimes differed in opinions, but their ancient ties and heroic memories should forever solder their affections.

The deed we this day commemorate is an event not alone in the history of Massachusetts and America but in the history of the world.

"What wonderful things are events," cries Disraeli; "the least are of greater importance than the most sublime and comprehensive speculations!" But I venture to observe that the explanation of an event, the complex antecedent instances and consummating circumstances, the inexorable trend and environment, is sometimes of more importance than the event itself. Surely if one could accurately assemble and assess, could truthfully identify and apply, all the precedent causes of this potent event, it would seem almost to have been predetermined.

Let us first consider the event itself. Some 800 British troops on the night of the 18th of April moved from their protected areas in Boston for the purpose of rescuing the military stores at Concord and arresting Samuel Adams and John Hancock in Lexington. The march of these troops was made known to the people along the roads and in Lexington by Paul Revere and William Dawes in their daring and famous rides, one coming by way of Charlestown and the other by way of Roxbury, recorded in song and story, in rhythmic verse and glowing orations. The alarms given by these brave riders occasioned the assembling in Lexington of Captain Parker's company of some one hundred and forty members, but the British not appearing the company was unfortunately dismissed, only shortly to reassemble on the Lexington Green at the beating of a drum by William Diamond between 4 and 5 on the morning of the 19th, with 77 men, the others not returning or not found in company formation. This small band, confronting an overwhelming number of British regulars, was ordered by Major Pitcairn to lay down their arms and disperse. This they refused to do, thereby stamping themselves as types of the new man in the New World. In obedient response to Captain Parker's strict orders, the militia did not at first fire or assume the offensive. A volley was fired by the British, resulting in no casualties, and then followed by a second volley of deadly character, which was returned in a desultory manner by the militia, wounding some three or four of the British regulars. Ten of the historic Minute Men were killed—John Brown, Samuel Hadley, Caleb Harrington, Jonathan Harrington, jr., Jedediah Munroe, Robert Munroe, Isaac Muzzey, Jonas Parker (the bravest of the brave), John Raymond, and Nathaniel Wyman. Their blood marks the beginning of the War for Independence, and their names should be embalmed in our memories and handed down as heirlooms from generation to generation. Early in the eighteenth century a desperate charge upon an Austrian center was saved to the French by the daring and death of a private soldier, Latour d'Auvergne, whose name was ever after called first at the parades of his battalion, when the oldest sergeant, stepping to the front, would answer, "Died on the field of honor!" To-day, if the roll of Parker's company could be called, and if the gallant captain could answer for the 10 immortal absentees, sorrowfully and proudly would he respond, "Died on Lexington Green, the field of honor!" And then might not the tragic agony be assuaged by the inspiring salutation of Samuel Adams, "O, what a glorious morning is this!"

It is the first step that counts. That step had now been taken. Oppression by King and Parliament and governor will now be answered by sword and not by word. War will be both the reply and the argument. And war had begun, and the great event is beginning to reveal itself in its portentous potentiality. The crisis must be met, and it was met, and greatly met.

I have suggested that Lexington was somewhat predetermined. It is said that history does not so much solve questions as it teaches us to examine them, and perhaps our understanding of history is sometimes spoiled by knowing too much of the event. We are too close to its activities, we are too disconcerted by the proximity of its forces, our sympathies cloud our judgments and warp our conclusions; later we may more truthfully arrange and proportion the predisposing incidents and influences and causes that effectuated the culmination. This, of course, should not be done on this occasion, though a brief and unmethodical survey may throw light upon the memorable event and the historic sequel.

The dominant idea in the Colonies as well as in England was that taxes should only be imposed by the consent of the people through their representatives. Hence the popular conviction that taxation and representation go hand in hand. Lord Camden had said in the British Parliament that, "Taxation and representation are inseparable," and the Colonies declared that "taxation without representation" was tyranny. The Colonies had no representation in Parliament, and the exercise of the right of taxation by colonial legislatures had been revoked by Great Britain, therefore revolution and war seemed the inexorable alternative.

In 1765 the famous stamp act was passed by Parliament, resulting in excitement and anxiety throughout the Colonies, especially in Massachusetts and Virginia. Her House of Burgesses, on May 29, under the spell of the eloquence of Henry, whom Byron appraised as "the forest-born Demosthenes, whose thunder shook the Philip of the seas," adopted a resolution condemning the right and validity of the act, and asserting that taxation was alone within the power of the several Colonies. Massachusetts looked with approval upon this resolution, and the Boston Gazette wrote that—

"The people of Virginia have spoken very sensibly, and the frozen politicians of a more northern government (British) say they have spoken treason."

Washington, little accustomed to public speech, but with commanding dignity and compelling earnestness, asserted—

"I will raise 1,000 men, subsist them at my own expense, and march myself at their head for the relief of Boston."

But condemnation of British action and the ominous resentment of the Colonies were unavailing. The British fleet and troops thronged the harbor of Boston, resulting in the massacre of March 5 and the military occupation of the city.

The Boston port bill came as a further reprisal, provoking thundering protests from the Colonies, especially South Carolina and Virginia, the latter declaring, "That the cause of Boston is the cause of us all"; for it was evident that if the Parliament could close the port of Boston, and revoke her charter, the right and safety of every colony was likewise menaced. Virginia appealed for the cooperation of the Colonies to prepare to meet these ominous dangers, and on the 5th of September, 1774, a convention composed of delegates from 12 of the 13 Colonies met in congress at Philadelphia. On the next day Henry, with a prescience almost unbelievable, sounded the first note of nationality heard in America, crying out—

"British oppression has effaced the boundaries of the several Colonies; the distinctions between Virginians, Pennsylvanians, New Yorkers, and New Englanders are no more. I am not a Virginian, but an American."

The township system of Massachusetts, that kindling flame of democracy, which never found its way into Virginia to the deepest regret of Jefferson, was uprooted for the time being by the regulatory acts of Great Britain.

The act of Parliament restraining the New England people from the privilege of fishing on the banks of Newfoundland, and soon thereafter extending the prohibition to all of the Colonies except New York and North Carolina, further aroused the resentful passion and patriotism of the Colonies.

While not in chronological order but as one of the contributing causes of the Revolution, I should not omit to recall the extraordinary juridical procedure employed by Great Britain in issuing "writs of assistance" (so powerfully resisted by James Otis), and the right of deportation of the citizens of the Colonies to Great Britain for trial for certain offenses, thus violating the elementary common law of vicinage and community rights.

Criticism and condemnation of the attitude of Great Britain by the Colonies evoked the deepest sympathy from many in that ancient island, among whom were Pitt and Burke, Horne-Tooke, and Wilkes, great friends and advocates of the rights of the Colonies, and whose reason and eloquence lent approval to their policies and encouragement to their aspirations.

In May, 1774, the Virginia House of Burgesses declared that the common interest of all the Colonies was in jeopardy, and appealed for a general congress to consider the course to be pursued. Speaking of this congress in the British Parliament, Pitt declared "that though he had studied and admired the free states of antiquity, the master spirits of the world, yet for solidity of reason, force of sagacity, and wisdom of conclusion no body of men could stand in preference to this congress."

The confidence of the Colonies was immediately extended to this Congress, which reassembled in Philadelphia on September 5, 1775, and quickly threw down the iron gauntlet of defiance to the foes of independence, and soon gave to the world the Declaration of Independence, that scroll of light and leading and of hope and courage to a waiting and forward-looking people.

British taxation was not resisted by reason of the rate or amount of the tax imposed, but resisted because such an exercise of the taxing power was among the "unalienable rights" of the people of the Colonies asserted in the Declaration of Independence. These "unalienable rights" were believed to be the gifts of nature and not of government. Government existed to protect and preserve these rights that were possessed by man in defiance of government itself, and "to secure these rights governments are instituted among men, deriving their just powers from the consent of the governed."

I need not argue the philosophy of this declaration. I need not discuss the doctrine of "unalienable rights," whether or not they are founded in nature, and whether or not governments are established by contract in order to assure them by appropriate and adequate guaranties. The colonists were confronted by stubborn facts of oppression which they were determined to resist upon two grounds; first, that the action of Parliament was unconstitutional; and, second, that if not unconstitutional this action was against the natural or "unalienable rights" of the people of the several Colonies. Wise, practical, and courageous statesmen were developing these arguments and their conclusions into revolutionary convictions and activities.

An accumulation of incidents and accidents, of passion and prejudice, of instinct and aspiration, of oppression and resistance, of truculent obstinacy and offensive arrogance, of many trials and tribulations, all swelled and vexed the fast-rising waters; but greater than all was the new environment, within which man gained an aspiring stimulus and an invigorating independence that could only come from the powerful forces at play in a "new world."

The civilization which first discovered and occupied the southern portion of this hemisphere expended its energy and philosophy in an environment of languor and enervation. The English-speaking Colonies found their genesis in 1607 in the great liberalizing and energizing environment of which I have just spoken, and with the first two colonizations came the active operations of a great force, namely, the perfection of printing, and its consequent distribution and communication of information and knowledge upon the readable page. Consider these inherited liberties and "unalienable rights" planted by such sturdy stock in an environment so transcendent, separated by vast and rolling seas from the intimate touch of the mother land, and who can fail to see that the forces of destiny would sooner or later sweep the Colonies into revolution and independence?

It is not my province to speak of Concord and Bunker Hill and Boston; of Ticonderoga and Saratoga; of Washington at Cambridge and the attack upon Charlestown; of Trenton and Princeton; of the crossing of the Delaware; of Bennington and Brandywine; of Germantown and Valley Forge; of Savannah and Charleston; of Camden and Kings Mountain; of Cowpens and Guilford; of Ninety-six and Eutaw, save to observe that they are all commanding stations along the epic road from Lexington to Yorktown.

Most generally have I spoken of Lexington—the event, its antecedent and auxiliary causes—and I would beg your brief consideration of the mighty result. Lexington and Yorktown would have been the unavailing incidents in the train of events between these two historic towns, unless the result could have bodied itself forth in some righteous and liberal and stable government. This result was accomplished to the wonderment of the world in the form of a written Constitution drafted in Philadelphia in 1787. This Constitution is the most progressive contribution to government known to mankind. Under it we have grown from a nation of 3,000,000 to one of 115,000,000, existing in a state of liberty and order, progress and comfort, prosperity and happiness not so fully possessed by any other nation of the world.

This incomparable instrument, with its authorizations, its limitations, and its reservations has established the path wherein our civilization has thus far moved and developed. This Constitution, the "greatest work ever struck off at one time by the brain and purpose of man," as avowed by Gladstone, was the work of the thirteen original Colonies. It is the matrix of "an indissoluble Union of indestructible States," in the words of your great Webster, upon which depends in a large measure the progress and the civilization of the world. Does it not behoove Massachusetts and Virginia and the remainder of the original thirteen Colonies to renew with increasing responsibility and courage their faith in the Government thereby established? In view of its immeasurable accomplishments and transcendent contributions to the peace and happiness of man should we not resist all the reactionary forces which make for its bespoilment?

The Union did not create the States, but the States created the Union. The preservation of these governments in constitutional proportion and vigor is the need and duty of the hour.

Some 60 years ago a great and tragic war nearly destroyed the Union. Now there is grave apprehension that the Union may destroy the States.

Local and State governments provide the best opportunity for the citizen to learn the duty and art of self-government, without which the State and Nation will decay at the roots.

Massachusetts is rich in nourishing traditions and in the successful administration of government. These precious assets she can best preserve within her own radiant orbit. To-day Massachusetts possesses more Federal power than any other American State. She sits in council, in Cabinet, on august judgment bench, and in the mighty Magistrate's chair. But with responsibility comes duty, and as she won the hearts of her sister Colonies at Lexington, so may she exert her present prestige to quicken the ties between all of the American States and to balance and preserve the vital equilibrium between State and Nation.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. GUEVARA. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to insert in the RECORD a statement of Hon. Angel Suntay, member of the Philippine Legislature, who is now in Washington on the free-trade relations between the United States and the Philippine Islands; and a statement of Mr. Vicente Villamin.

Also a statement by Gen. Frank B. McIntyre.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the Delegate from the Philippines?

There was no objection.

STATEMENT OF HON. ANGEL SUNTAY

Mr. GUEVARA. Mr. Speaker, under the leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following statement of Hon. Angel Suntay:

THE UNITED STATES TARIFF AND THE PHILIPPINES

The most important problems confronting the United States Government to-day with respect to the Philippine Islands, is the status of trade relations between the United States and the Philippines.

There is at present a strong agitation before the Congress of the United States for the enactment of laws restricting the free entry of Philippine products into the United States market. A satisfactory solution is necessary to both the United States and the Philippines, in order to maintain the good relations now existing between the two countries.

The stand of the Filipino people on this important question has been ably presented before the House Ways and Means Committee by our official representative in Congress, Resident Commissioner Hon. PEDRO GUEVARA and Gen. Frank McIntyre, the Philippine trade commissioner, whose statements have been reported in the press throughout the length and breadth of the United States.

In my capacity as a member of the lower house of the Philippine Legislature, may I state that any favorable action by Congress on any of the measures that have already been presented embodying such restrictions against the interests of the Philippines, would be considered by our people as a grave injustice and it may bar not only the harmony and cooperation that now happily exists in the islands toward the United States but also such would create distrust on the part of the people of the islands as to future trade relations between the Philippines and America.

The Philippine Legislature has on many occasions shown a desire to encourage not only American business in the islands but also American trade in general. To cite only a few instances of the good will and confidence of the people of the Philippines toward the United States, the Philippine Legislature in the last regular session amended our corporation laws giving all the opportunities and advantages to American capital that might be employed in the islands. The Philippine Legislature also, in friendly accord has passed legislation appropriating funds for the employment of technical advisers to the Chief Executive, although it did not consider such service necessary because we have always considered that the legally constituted agencies of our Government are sufficient for this purpose. It would indeed be a source of great disappointment on the part of the Filipino people if the United States Congress in view of these friendly acts of the Philippine Legislature, would pass laws discriminatory to the Filipino people just for the sake of certain selfish commercial and industrial interests in America.

When our missions for independence have been sent here by our people to ask for our freedom and to plead for the fulfillment of the most solemn promise of America not only to the people of the Philippines but to the whole world, our adversaries then stated that the Filipinos should not demand their independence because their welfare would be better protected under the American flag, than as an independent nation, and that by remaining with America, the Philippines would enjoy the benefit of free trade.

Thus the protest of the Filipino people against such unfair treatment is fully justified, should such discrimination take place, yet they have not lost faith in America, that this country will act with justice as she always has in the past in her dealing with the islands, for America stands to-day not only for individual freedom but for freedom of trade between all the peoples under the dominion of the American flag.

Despite the fact that certain elements in America are attempting to violate America's code of fair dealing, our people nevertheless will never lose their confidence and their faith in the United States, the greatest Republic in the world. We hope the American Congress will never depart from the policy that has always characterized this Government for a square deal and justice and has repeatedly enunciated that their purpose in establishing their Government in the Philippines is "not to exploit but to develop, to civilize, to educate, and to train in the science of self-government." Any attempt to restrict our trade with the United States while we are under the protection of America would mean a backward step in the American policy, it would mean going back to the old doctrine of colonial relations in which the colony of a country is held for exploitation and benefit of the mother country.

If the United States desires to eliminate competition with the products of the Philippines, the only right thing to do is to place the islands in the category of a foreign country by granting her complete independence, but while the United States retains the islands America is in duty bound to extend the privilege of free trade and to protect the islands from any discriminatory laws against her interests or economic development, and we should be permitted to enjoy the privileges that the American flag extends to all that come and are under it.

STATEMENT OF MR. VICENTE VILLAMIN

Mr. GUEVARA. Mr. Speaker, under the leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following concluding statement of Mr. Vicente Villamin, Filipino lawyer and economist, at the final hearings before the Ways and Means Committee of the House of Representatives, February 25, 1929:

THE ECONOMIC EXPATRIATION OF THE PHILIPPINES

Mr. Chairman, we keenly regret the injection by our opponents of the explosive element of political independence in the economic questions under consideration by this committee. We interpret their action to mean that they are unwilling to place their case on purely economic grounds.

Our opponents have fallen in love with the Filipinos head over heels. It is so sudden they are ready for a wedding even outside of heaven. They are wishing liberty on the Filipinos, alas, wishing it on them with a vengeance. That liberty, sir, is the liberty that is wished on a man when he is discharged from employment. We refuse even to be amused by their siren's song and we tell them right now we reject their love overtures.

Mr. Chairman, when I addressed your committee on Saturday night last upon section 1626, copra, I promised, in answer to questions from several members, to define my position on Philippine independence. I do so now with pleasure.

Opposed to immediate separation but committed to eventual independence and militantly against the integration and annexation of the Philippines to the United States—such is my position. It is dictated by prudence, common sense, and the aspiration to see a real and enduring Filipino nation.

That position may be explained by the answer to the two queries which I am going to propound now:

Are the Filipinos mentally prepared to maintain an independent government? I reply yes emphatically. Mental capacity to maintain a government is a question of relativity, depending on a multiplicity of conditions and circumstances. We can establish a government. It may not be as good and effective a government as we now have, but it will be a government, I hope, that will be satisfactory to the Filipinos. In the last analysis, Mr. Chairman, the satisfaction of the governed is the test of a good government.

The next query is this: Is it wise for the Filipinos to separate from the United States now and thereby lose the political, the diplomatic, the economic and the military protection of the United States? My reply is an emphatic negative.

Mr. Chairman, at this juncture, I desire solemnly to state as a Filipino citizen, proud of that birthright, that I would deserve nothing but immitigable scorn if and when we are economically prepared I should not favor independence for my country. Categorically expressed, if we have the economic preparation now, to-day, yea, this fateful hour, I would be for immediate, complete and absolute independence with all my heart and soul, publicly and privately, tenaciously and actively.

With these prefatory statements permit me now, Mr. Chairman, to say a few valedictory remarks in the closing hours of these congressional hearings in which I have the honor to have participated.

The courtesy with which the official and unofficial spokesmen for the Philippines have been heard by your committee deserves the grateful acknowledgment of the Filipino people.

The appearance at these hearings of Filipinos and Americans jointly in defense of the Philippine cause proves once again that nationally and internationally there exists an identity of interests between the United States and the Philippines.

The privilege accorded to Filipinos of being heard by committees of Congress in the formulation of legislation and policies affecting them is a reminder of the fact that the Philippines is a member of the American commonwealth of States, Territories, and possessions, and that carries the guaranty that the rights of the members are sacredly equal as they are equally sacred.

Mr. Chairman, since the inauguration of these congressional hearings nearly two months ago I have witnessed an impressive procession of American interests inveighing against other American interests and bringing to bear against each other their respective arsenal of facts, both genuine and synthetic facts. It is in this atmosphere of contention that the Philippine case is found.

Therefore I wish to let it go from this hall to the Filipino people that they should not overly despair of their present case if it appears shrouded with anxious forebodings, for if it is reasonable and just it will surely prevail.

I desire now to restate the simple and vital but oft-forgotten fact that the free entry of Philippine products to the United States is reciprocated by the free entry of American goods to the Philippines.

The proposal of our opponents is to restrict the movement of Philippine products to the United States without a corresponding action respecting the goods moving the other way.

Such a proposal, sir, is patently unjust both to the Philippines, by reason of its one-sidedness, and to those industries in the United States which sell their products to that country, by impairing its purchasing capacity.

The American people, Mr. Chairman, are going continuously to hear our protest against the economic expatriation of the Philippines, a peculiar form of expatriation that is complicated and aggravated by the fact that the political responsibility of the United States is not mitigated or surrendered thereby.

We now rest our case under the palladium of American justice with the plea that, since the Philippines has no representation with voice and vote in Congress, Members of that body when dealing with the Philippines may forget their congressional constituencies and function as national legislators for that noble political entity known as the United States of America whose territory extends to the other side of the globe.

STATEMENT OF MAJ. GEN. FRANK M'INTYRE

Mr. GUEVARA. Mr. Speaker, under leave granted to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I insert the following statement of Maj. Gen. Frank McIntyre, of Washington, D. C., representing the Philippine government and the Philippine Sugar Association:

General MCINTYRE. At this time it is desired to refer to the general trade relations between the United States and the Philippines embodied in section 301 of the tariff, only as it is necessary to make that question understood, and the remarks will be confined principally to the importation of sugar.

It is probable that a fuller discussion of this subject will come up when the administrative provisions of the tariff are under consideration. At this time it is desired to discuss only the Philippine sugar industry, its relations to the United States market, its likelihood of interfering in any way with the progress of sugar elsewhere under the American flag, and the necessity of retaining the special-trade relations unless it is desired to destroy an industry in the islands which is of great importance to the progress of the people.

It will be shown that even under the stimulus of the free admission of sugar into the American market, the growth of the sugar industry in the Philippine Islands has been slow, due to other handicaps which do not exist in any other large sugar-producing country.

It will be shown that the admission of Philippine sugar free of duty into the United States has no effect on the price of sugar grown elsewhere under the American flag.

It will appear that the suggestion that the amount of sugar from the Philippines to come to the United States free of duty be limited has its origin with those interested in the production of sugar in Cuba and was later taken up, through misinformation, by those producing sugar elsewhere under the American flag.

The trade relations between the United States and the Philippine Islands, as set forth in section 301 of the United States tariff act now in effect, are in accordance with principles enunciated since we first took possession of the Philippine Islands. Business between the islands and the United States has been built up on the principles so stated. The development of the islands has, to a large extent, been guided by confidence that the United States would not change its principles in dealing with the islands.

The act of March 8, 1902, provided, in section 2:

"That on and after the passage of this act there shall be levied, collected, and paid upon all articles coming into the United States from the Philippine Archipelago the rates of duty which are required to be levied, collected, and paid upon like articles imported from foreign countries: Provided, That upon all articles the growth and product of the Philippine Archipelago coming into the United States from the Philippine Archipelago there shall be levied, collected, and paid only 75 per cent of the rates of duty aforesaid."

At the time of the passage of this act Article IV of the treaty of peace with Spain was, in effect, as follows:

"The United States will, for the term of 10 years from the date of the exchange of the ratifications of the present treaty, admit Spanish ships and merchandise to the ports of the Philippine Islands on the same terms as ships and merchandise of the United States."

In 1905 the question of amending this act of 1902 was taken up and the majority of the Committee on Ways and Means submitted a report. In the majority report it was stated:

"The only logical result from our possession of the Philippine Islands is free trade between the islands and the rest of the United States. It is definitely settled that we retain them until the people are prepared for self-government. To bring about this will require at least a generation. The question of their final disposition must be postponed for many years. In the meantime they are wards of the United States, a part of our common country, and are entitled to fair trade relations. It is now as much our 'plain duty' to give them free trade as soon as practicable as it was in the case of Porto Rico.

"It would be manifestly unjust, however, to give them free access to our markets while they collect the same rate of duty upon articles imported from the States that they do upon articles coming from the rest of the world. The free entry of our products into the Philippine Islands is impracticable at the present time. The treaty of Paris provides that Spain shall have the same advantage in tariff duties on exports to the Philippine Islands that the United States receives for a period of 10 years. This treaty stipulation expires by its own limitation in January, 1909. Until that time we can not give our products free entry into the Philippine Islands without giving the same privilege to Spain. Such a measure would greatly cripple the revenues of the Philippine Islands."

The recommendation of the committee was, briefly, to reduce the 75 per cent imposed under the act of March 8, 1902, on Philippine products entering the United States to 25 per cent of the tariff imposed on like goods from foreign countries.

The minority report provided in respect of this matter in a substitute bill:

"That all articles the growth and product of the Philippine Archipelago coming into the United States from the Philippine Archipelago shall hereafter be admitted free of duty."

Neither the bill reported by the majority nor the minority substitute passed, so the act of March 8, 1902, continued to govern until the passage of the United States tariff act of August 5, 1909.

When the tariff act of 1909 was under consideration, the 10 years during which Spanish ships and merchandise were admitted to the ports of the Philippine Islands on the same terms as ships and merchandise of the United States, under Article IV of the treaty of peace with Spain, had expired, and there no longer existed the reason given in 1905 for not admitting into the United States products of the Philippine Islands free of duty. In fact, it should be noted that the minority, even in 1905, were desirous of doing this.

So that in the United States tariff act of 1909 it was provided, with certain limitations and under certain conditions, that articles the growth and product of the Philippine Islands should be admitted into the United States free of duty. The provision, in so far as it parallels the section quoted of the act of March 8, 1902, was as follows:

"That there shall be levied, collected, and paid upon all articles coming into the United States from Philippine Islands the rates of duty which are required to be levied, collected, and paid upon like articles imported from foreign countries: Provided, That, except as otherwise hereinafter provided, all articles, the growth or product of or manufactured in the Philippine Islands from materials the growth or product of the Philippine Islands or of the United States, or of both, or which do not contain foreign materials to the value of more than 20 per cent of their total value, upon which no drawback of customs duties has been allowed therein, coming into the United States from the Philippine Islands shall hereafter be admitted free of duty, except rice, and except, in any fiscal year, sugar in excess of 300,000 gross tons, wrapper tobacco and filler tobacco when mixed or packed with more than 15 per cent of wrapper tobacco in excess of 300,000 pounds, filler tobacco in excess of 1,000,000 pounds, and cigars in excess of 150,000,000 cigars, which quantities shall be ascertained by the Secretary of the Treasury under such rules and regulations as he shall prescribe: And provided further, That sugar, refined or unrefined, and tobacco, manufactured or unmanufactured, imported into the Philippine Islands from foreign countries, shall be dutiable at rates of import therein not less than the rates of import duty imposed upon sugar and tobacco in like forms when imported into the United States."

This section included also provisions that producers of sugar in small amounts should be given preference; that in consideration of these exemptions, all articles the growth, product, or manufacture of the United States should be admitted to the Philippines from the United States free of duty; that in order to obtain the benefit of this free entrance, shipments should be direct; exempting articles which came from the Philippines to the United States free of duty from the payment of the export tax in the Philippine Islands; imposing internal-revenue taxes on such articles as were so taxable in the place of their consumption.

The operation of this tariff was beneficial to the islands in many ways. It also greatly increased American trade with the islands. However, when the next revision of the United States tariff was taken up, it was decided that the time was appropriate to make those changes which experience indicated would be naturally beneficial and at the same time definitely establish trade relations in accordance with the oft-enunciated principles which should govern.

The limitation in the tariff act of 1909 on the amounts of sugar and tobacco which could be brought into the United States free of duty was a compromise designed to placate those persons interested in sugar and tobacco in the United States. From the Philippine point of view, these limitations were decidedly unfair in that there was no corresponding limitation on imports of American goods into the Philippines. From the American point of view, they were temporarily wise in order to demonstrate to the interests in the United States that the free admission of Philippine sugar and tobacco would not affect the market in the United States.

It was notorious to those acquainted with affairs in the Philippine Islands that, under the conditions governing distribution of land and labor supply, development must necessarily be slow, and unless capital in considerable quantities was introduced into the islands, even the hoped-for progress could not be made. It was later found that the announcement of a limit beyond which the industry would not receive the encouragement of the American market placed it at the greatest disadvantage.

There had likewise been included in this section in 1909 a prohibition against the introduction of Philippine rice into the American market. The demand of American rice growers for this provision arose from a complete ignorance of conditions in the Philippine Islands, the Philippines being then and having been for a great many years one of the greatest importers of rice and not an exporter.

In other words, while the tariff of 1909 contained these limitations and restrictions, which have since been removed, they were not placed there in accordance with any accepted principle or any definite policy, but simply to ease the passage of a tariff bill and to accord a certain relief to the Philippine Islands. This was essential if the market in the islands was to be made a free market to American exporters.

In reporting the tariff law of 1913, with reference to the trade between the United States and the islands, the House committee said:

FREE TRADE WITH THE PHILIPPINES

"Paragraph C is a substitute for Section V of the Payne tariff law. The material changes in this paragraph provide for the granting of absolute free trade between the Philippine Islands and the United States without the limitations that exist in the present law prescribing the amount of rice, tobacco, and sugar that may be imported from the Philippine Islands into the United States free of duty. Under the present law the imports from the United States to the Philippine Islands and from the Philippine Islands to the United States are limited to articles the growth, product, or manufacture of the two countries, except articles the product of the Philippine Islands which do not contain foreign materials to the value of more than 20 per cent, were admitted free of duty. At the suggestion of the War Department the per cent of foreign material that may be contained in these articles admitted free of duty has been increased from 20 to 50 per cent to encourage the development of certain lines of manufacture in the Philippine Islands, notably handmade lace made by the native women of the islands."

The minority report, signed generally by the very gentlemen who in 1905 had said, "The only logical result from our possession of the Philippine Islands is free trade between the islands and the rest of the United States," naturally did not oppose the granting of free trade. This brings us to the conditions existing to-day.

In 1895 there were exported from the Philippine Islands 336,075 long tons of sugar. This represented the peak during the Spanish administration of the islands. It was muscovado sugar, the product of the old mills then in use. From the same cane there would have been secured by modern centrifugal mills 560,000 long tons of sugar; that is, if modern mills had been in use the exports of sugar in 1895 would have exceeded the export in any year up to and including 1927.

The question not unnaturally arises why, when the production in Hawaii had gone from 205,000 to 745,000 long tons, in Porto Rico from 54,000 long tons to 596,000 long tons, and United States beet from 32,000 to 974,000, the Philippines had in the same period but barely attained the production of 1895?

All of these Territories were under the American flag, but Java had in this period increased from 715,000 to 2,359,000; Formosa, in a lesser period (1904–1927), had increased from 68,000 to 489,000; Cuba from 336,000 to 5,000,000 long tons.

The answer to this question will allay any reasonable fear of any producer of sugar under the American flag that the Philippine Islands' production will in future in any way disturb his own progress, affect the price of his product, or fill the place which his production leaves vacant in the American market.

The reply will be, for convenience, included under the following headings:

1. The treaty with Spain: The treaty with Spain provided that:

"The United States will, for the term of 10 years from the date of the exchange of the ratifications of the present treaty, admit Spanish ships and merchandise to the ports of the Philippine Islands on the same terms as ships and merchandise of the United States."

This meant, of course, that products of the United States could not be admitted free of duty for the period of 10 years into the Philippines. It was admittedly unfair to grant to the products of the Philippines free admission into the American market for that period. However, as has heretofore been pointed out, the products of the Philippine Islands were admitted into the United States on the payment of 75 per cent of the tariff duties. This was of no practicable benefit to the Philippines, however well-intentioned.

The Philippine Commission and the several Secretaries of War and the Presidents, following the passage of the act of 1902, urged a more liberal treatment of the Philippines, and in general urged that the 75 per cent be reduced to 25 per cent.

The progress of Philippine sugar during these 10 years, or its lack of progress, demonstrates clearly that it required for its welfare more than was offered.

The depression in cane production due to the insurrection in the islands had not been overcome in 1909, the total production in the islands being still materially less than that in the last years of Spanish sovereignty. The annual exports for the five years ending 1909 averaged 125,964 long tons; the average for the five years ending in 1897 was 245,392 long tons.

It should be noted that during these 10 years Cuba had progressed from 336,000 to 1,559,000 long tons; the United States beet production had increased from 32,000 to 451,000; Hawaiian production had increased from 205,000 to 478,000 long tons; and Porto Rico from 54,000 to 479,000.

2. The land laws: Stated in hectares, the customary unit in the Philippines (a hectare being equal to 2.471 acres), the area of the Philippine Islands is 29,629,600 hectares. Of this, in 1918 there were in private ownership 4,563,723 hectares, of which 2,415,778 hectares were cultivated and 2,147,945 uncultivated. That is, something over five-sixths of the land in the Philippines was public land. This is still true.

The cultivated land in private ownership was and is devoted largely to food crops, principally to the cultivation of rice. There were large areas cultivated to coconuts and other areas in fruit trees.

The coconut tree comes to bearing normally at the end of seven years, and areas devoted to coconut trees can not be used for other purposes.

Obviously any great development in the Philippine Islands must result from the placing in beneficial use those parts of the public land suitable for cultivation.

In the Philippine organic law of 1902 the Philippine Commission was authorized to enact a public land law, but was restrained from providing for the sale or lease of public lands to any corporation in excess of 1,024 hectares. This effectually prevented the utilization of any part of the public lands to the sugar industry, for under the well-recognized theory of efficiently and profitably cultivating sugar in the Tropics several times that amount of land was necessary, and without control of a large area it was difficult to secure the erection of a modern mill. Furthermore, it was provided in that act that "every corporation authorized to engage in agriculture shall by its charter be restricted to the ownership and control of not to exceed 1,024 hectares of land."

This applied to private lands, so effectual development of the sugar industry in the way with which we were accustomed and which is effective in Cuba, Porto Rico, and Hawaii was impossible. These laws are still in effect in the Philippine Islands. The effect of this will be explained later, showing why the sugar industry in the Philippine Islands is different from the industry in these other places.

In 1916 Congress granted to the Philippine Legislature authority to enact land laws subject to the approval of the President. The Philippine Legislature adhered in principle to the congressional legislation of 1902, and did not in its act of 1919 liberalize the land laws in a way to encourage sugar development.

It should be observed that these restrictions were embodied in and made effective by the local corporation law. Even the amendments to the corporation law enacted at the last session of the legislature continues these limitations.

3. Labor: The area of the Philippine Islands is 114,400 square miles, and in 1918 there was an average of 90 inhabitants per square mile. In certain Provinces the population was materially denser.

Congress by the act of April 29, 1902, extended the Chinese exclusion laws to the Philippine Islands. It is notable that in the far eastern Tropics there has been no serious development in a large way except by the free use of Chinese labor. This exclusion, together with the sparse population of the Philippine Islands, was another deterrent to the development of sugar in a large way. These exclusion laws are still in effect. It is, of course, true that so long as the existing land and corporation laws are effective the question of immigration is purely academic.

4. Capital: As a result of the three preceding conditions, capital has been slow to enter the Philippine Islands. Another deterrent has been the uncertain status of the Philippine Islands, and particularly the disposition to urge radical changes in the principles which have governed our relations to the islands, thus not granting to business in the islands that security which is necessary to continuous progress.

The restraint in the development of the Philippine Islands due to the treaty with Spain passed at the expiration of the 10-year period in 1909. The other restraints to development enumerated—the land laws, the labor situation, the restriction on Chinese immigration, and the absence of capital—continue.

Observe, please, that the sugar industry in the Philippines has labored under the following restrictions not effective in any district producing sugar for the American market:

First. For the 10 years from 1899 to 1909 Philippine sugar was not admitted free of duty into the United States market, but paid 75 per cent of the duty imposed on foreign sugar. This was a period of great progress in the industry in Hawaii, Porto Rico, and Cuba. There was no progress in the Philippines.

Second. The Chinese, the only available outside labor, is excluded from the Philippine Islands. The industry is based on local labor. In Cuba there was a steady flow of Spanish laborers. Later the industry was based on the importation of contract labor from Haiti, Jamaica, and so forth. This labor being deemed unsuitable to Cuban citizenship is required to be sent out of the country at the end of the contract and crop season. If labor in Cuba were restricted to the local supply, or to persons deemed by Cuba suitable to citizenship, other limitations on sugar production would be unnecessary.

In Hawaii dependence is on recruited contract labor from outside of the islands.

Third. Land and corporation laws: The restrictions placed by Congress in the organic law of 1902 on the disposition of public lands and limiting the activities of agricultural corporations have effectively prevented the use of public lands for the cultivation of sugar, and the restrictions on agricultural corporations have prevented the highly efficient cultivation of sugar customary in Cuba, Porto Rico, and Hawaii.

If these restrictions were effective in those islands, the United States would be forced to struggle for sugar.

The act of Congress in question has received the approval of the Philippine government. The land law enacted by its legislature in 1919 continued the public-land restrictions, and the corporation law continues the provisions limiting the activities of agricultural corporations.

Prior to American occupation sugar held a prominent and at times a leading position in the agriculture of the Philippines. A considerable area of the land had been exclusively devoted to the cultivation of sugar cane for several generations. Not unnaturally, in the effort to overcome the depressed condition in the Philippines following the insurrection, the Philippine Commission looked to the development of the sugar industry.

It attempted to secure from Congress, by annual recommendations a modification of the land laws with this largely in view. It attempted to secure a liberalization of the corporation laws. Nothing was accomplished in either of these two directions.

To the credit of the commission no effort was made to evade the plain intent of Congress. Outside capital for the sugar industry during the period of commission government was therefore out of the question.

The improvement of the sugar industry required improvement in agricultural methods, and every effort was made to secure this and the establishment of modern sugar mills. This latter required capital, and the capital was not available.

The Secretary of the Interior, whose department included the bureau of agriculture, urged that the government, at its own expense, for the educational advantage thereof, construct a modern sugar mill. This was not deemed practicable because it injected the government into the sugar industry and because the government itself was struggling with inadequate funds to meet the many demands on it.

Governor General Forbes in 1911, in his message to the legislature at its opening, recommended that he be "authorized to purchase bonds of companies organized by proprietors of sugar estates in Provinces where there are considerable numbers of sugar haciendas, for the purpose of assisting the owners thereof in building sugar centrals, under terms and conditions which will amply secure the government in the matter."

Similar efforts were made later, and legislation was enacted by which private investments in sugar centrals would be guaranteed a reasonable income.

No sugar mill was ever erected in the islands as a consequence of the efforts in this direction.

Congress has also felt the need of assisting the industries of the islands. By the act of 1902 it authorized the admission of Philippine products, including sugar, into the United States on the payment of 75 per cent of the duty. Had there not been a number of handicaps to which reference has been made, this might have assisted the sugar industry. It, however, had no such effect, and the several administrations in the islands and in the United States supervising the islands urged a reduction of this 75 per cent to 25 per cent. In 1906 a bill passed the House of Representatives by a large majority which would have done this, but the bill did not reach a vote in the Senate. In 1909, on the expiration of the 10-year period from the ratification of the Spanish treaty, Congress provided for the admission, free of duty, into the United States of 300,000 tons of Philippine sugar, and in 1913 Congress, in its tariff act, provided for the free admission of sugar without limit into the United States.

The foregoing indicates briefly the efforts of Congress and of the Philippine Government to stimulate the sugar industry in the islands.

Due to the public land and corporation laws, to which reference has been made, the Philippines did not, even with the free admission of sugar into the United States market, attract at once the investment of outside capital. The Mindoro Sugar Co., which represents the pioneer effort of American capital in this field, has not been a success. The mill on this property was erected in 1910. It has not at any time proven profitable, and is now being administered by one of the banks in the islands, to which it is heavily indebted.

The first successful modern mill was erected at San Carlos in Occidental Negros by Hawaiian capital. This San Carlos Milling Co. began to operate in 1914. It has been and continues to be a successful investment. The mill was placed in a district which had long been devoted to the cultivation of sugar cane. The mill did not in any way enter into the agricultural field other than by advice and suggestion. It milled the cane of the planters in the district, and these planters are still the owners and administrators of their property.

This was followed by the construction of several mills, principally by residents of the islands who owned sugar estates. Generally these were small mills of a type which has been abandoned in Cuba, Porto Rico, and Hawaii as unprofitable.

The relatively important development of modern sugar mills in the islands began in 1916 through the operations of the Philippine National Bank. Of the 36 mills now operating in the islands, the following owe their construction exclusively to the Philippine National Bank, a bank practically owned by the Philippine government, and the funds used were funds of the Philippine government. The possibility of this was due to the prosperity of the islands during the war and to the exceptional conditions which permitted the utilization of this money. These mills are: Bacolod-Murcia Milling Co., Binalbagan Estate (Inc.), Isabela Sugar Co. (Inc.), Ma-ao Sugar Central Co., Talisay-Silay Milling Co., Central Bearin (Kabankalan), Central Palma, and Pampanga Sugar Development Co.

The first five of these companies are still heavily indebted to the bank. The total investment of the bank amounted to something over $24,000,000, and the amount still due from the five first enumerated centrals is something over $15,000,000.

Of the total centrifugal sugar produced in the islands in 1927 of 567,000 metric tons, 219,000 was produced by these centrals, the existence of which was entirely due to the Philippine National Bank.

It will be recalled that the Philippine National Bank became seriously involved financially when the government in the period of depression following the postwar boom found it necessary to demand the return of certain of its deposits from the bank. In 1921, when General Wood and Governor Forbes made an examination of the situation in the Philippines, they employed the far eastern representatives of Haskins & Sells to report on the Philippine National Bank, and this report incidentally included a report by the company's expert on the sugar investments of the Philippine National Bank. This report estimated a loss on these investments of $7,000,000, and in rehabilitating the bank the government provided over $5,500,000, estimated to be the losses from these investments at that time.

The Mindoro Sugar Co., which erected the first modern sugar central in the islands in 1910, has not up to date shown any profit on the investment, the company being at this time in the hands of Philippine banks.

On the other hand, there are centrals in the Philippine Islands that have operated at a profit, but these centrals very generally are not engaged in the cultivation of sugar cane, but simply in milling cane secured by contractual arrangement from planters.

It is important to note well the result of the activities of the Mindoro Sugar Co., because it is the outstanding and only case in which a large mill has been erected in the Philippine Islands in a district theoretically well suited to the cultivation of sugar cane, but in which sugar cane had not been cultivated over a long period of years. Any future mill in the Philippine Islands must be similarly erected, because the mills now in operation in the Philippines cover adequately the territory which has been heretofore devoted to cane culture. Progress in the industry for some years will result from improved agricultural methods. There is no doubt that such improved methods will increase the amount of sugar produced in the islands.

This is the hope of everyone who has the interest of the islands at heart, and it is obvious that a great deal in the way of improvement can be done. That this improvement will be slow is a natural result of the methods of farming in the Philippine Islands.

As stated, with two or three exceptions, the centrals are not engaged in the cultivation of cane. In most cases the centrals own only the land necessary to their operation, the land in general being owned by the planters, whose families have owned it for generations. The cane is cultivated by these landowners or by their tenants. In practically all cases the cultivation of cane in the Philippine Islands is done exclusively by Filipinos.

In Hawaii, Cuba, and Porto Rico it has been found that efficient cultivation requires the ownership of large tracts of land, and the cane is in great part cultivated administratively by the central or a company subsidiary to the central. Where there was a large number of independent farmers it was found extremely difficult to introduce modern methods of culture, improved varieties of cane, or efficient methods of financing. In Cuba and Porto Rico the small independent cultivation of sugar cane has practically disappeared. In Hawaii it probably never existed.

It is not desired to go into the social value of the Filipino method, but it is necessary that we understand that the method in the Philippines, however socially beneficial, is not the method which in Hawaii, Cuba, and Porto Rico has resulted in great and economical production of sugar cane, and it is reasonable to suppose that under the Philippine method the high efficiency of cultivation in these other territories will be attained slowly if it is ever attained.

When we speak of the profits of producing sugar in the Philippine Islands we should clearly distinguish whether we are referring to a sugar central cultivating no cane but operating under a milling contract, or the landowners cultivating cane on their own property, or tenants of such landowners cultivating cane, or even landowners who lease their lands.

Occidental Negros is the greatest sugar-producing Province in the Philippine Islands, and under the customary contracts existing there the landowner gets 12 per cent of the total cane produced, the central 45 per cent, and the tenant 43 per cent. If the landowner cultivates his land, he receives 55 per cent of the cane.

It is entirely possible and not unusual that the central and landowner may operate at a profit and the tenant, who actually produced the sugar cane, may operate at a loss. A continuance of such a loss, however, necessarily involves the planter and the central if the latter are engaged in advancing to the tenant. This is also customary.

As is well known, there has been in recent years something approaching a crisis in the Cuban sugar industry. Those engaged therein have naturally sought various forms of relief. As is usual in such cases, some of the suggestions would probably, if adopted, afford little or no substantial improvement in present conditions.

Under date of September 21, 1927, a circular under the caption, "The Future of the Philippine Sugar Industry," was given wide distribution by the United States Sugar Association, 81–83 Beaver Street, New York. The heading of this circular showed that the executive committee of the association was composed of the following gentlemen:

George A. Zabriskie, chairman; Frederick B. Adams, president Cuban Dominican Sugar Co.; E. H. Costello, vice president Czarnikow-Rionda Co.; Thomas A. Howell, director Cuban-Dominican Sugar Co.; George E. Keiser, president Cuban-American Sugar Co.; Frank C. Lowry, president Lowry & Co. (Inc.); Walter E. Ogilvie, director Cuba Cane Sugar Corporation; M. E. Rionda, vice president Czarnikow-Rionda Co.

The spirit of the circular is, I think, briefly set forth in the following quotation:

"The United States can hardly be called a natural market for Philippine sugar. We have ample supplies nearer home. These sources are:

	Tons
Porto Rico	559,473
Hawaii	714,000
Domestic beet	801,246
Cuba	4,500,000

"(Without crop curtailment it is possible for Cuba to make 500,000 to 1,000,000 tons more.)

"This gives us a total supply, without any Philippine sugar, of 6,574,719 tons.

"The annual consumption of the United States is running at approximately 5,600,000 tons, refined, so that we have enough available from the above-named sources. Therefore it is clear that it is only by displacing this other supply that Philippine sugar can come into the United States."

Why these gentlemen did not add the exportable sugar produced in Santo Domingo, Haiti, and other near-by countries is not apparent. There is no doubt that at present ample sugar is produced nearer home than the Philippine Islands, but this has little to do with our obligations to the Philippine Islands, and would be a poor justification for the destruction of what must necessarily be one of the principal industries of the islands.

It is noted, however, that in this article, which is an argument for restricting to 500,000 tons the amount of sugar that may enter from the Philippine Islands free of duty, there is no suggestion that the entry of this sugar free of duty from the Philippine Islands affects in any way the sugar industry under the American flag. There is every indication that those responsible for the circular had no such thought. It is, however, very concisely set forth in the article:

"As we now admit Philippine sugar free of duty, while Cuban sugar is required to pay a high tariff rate, naturally the Philippine sugar is able to displace the Cubar sugar."

This is the only effect which the admission of Philippine sugar under the present conditions has in the American market.

Briefly, the total production of sugar in the Philippines affects in no way the price of sugar, and this is true likewise of the production in each of the Territories under the American flag. In recent years the production of sugar in Louisiana has been cut in half. This has in no way affected the price of that sugar. Recently a hurricane was reported to have destroyed one-third of the Porto Rican sugar crop. This had no effect on the price of Porto Rican sugar or on sugar in the American market, which, instead of a rise, as a result of other conditions, declined in value.

Sugar produced under the American flag commands in the market of the United States a price based on the price of Cuban sugar and increased by the tariff which that sugar must pay on entering the United States.

These gentlemen were interested that there should be left in the United States market a place for 5,000,000 tons of Cuban sugar, or, possibly, 6,000,000 tons.

It would be difficult to produce a more convincing proof that Philippine sugar coming in free of duty does not affect the price of sugar produced under the American flag than is the omission of the contrary statement from this circular. Surely such an obvious argument, if the facts justified it, would not have been omitted.

By the treaty of Paris, terminating the Spanish War, the Philippine Archipelago was ceded to the United States and Spain relinquished all claim of sovereignty over and title to Cuba. The United States, occupying Cuba on this relinquishment of sovereignty by Spain, proceeded to establish therein as rapidly as possible an independent government and relinquished its sovereignty to that Government.

The relations of the United States to the Philippines, its own Territory, over which it exercises unqualified sovereignty, and to the independent Republic of Cuba are naturally entirely different.

The United States negotiated with Cuba a trade convention, under which preferential tariff treatment was given by each country to the products of the other. This convention by its terms (Article XI) "shall continue in force for the term of five years from date of going into effect, and from year to year thereafter until the expiration of one year from the day when either of the contracting parties shall give notice to the other of its intention to terminate the same."

Congress may legislate for the Philippines in tariff and other matters as it sees fit, and the resulting legislation shall be in effect so long as Congress desires. Congress, however, is without authority to continue the present trade relations with Cuba after the expiration of one year from the day when that Republic gives notice of its intention to terminate the same.

Against unfair treatment in American legislation Cuba may protect herself under the terms of the treaty. Against unfair treatment in congressional legislation the Philippines have no such remedy; in fact, have no remedy.

This power of Congress imposes on it an obligation which would not be imposed by any treaty, an obligation of benevolent, considerate treatment which it has always given to the Philippine Islands and which is the source of the greatest pride to our people. It is not to be believed for a moment that this treatment will not be continued.

However liberal Congress may have been to the Philippines, illiberal treatment of Cuban sugar is certainly not evident from the result. With one-fourth the population of the Philippines, Cuba to-day produces eight times the sugar produced in the Philippines, and the United States market still procures nearly three-fifths of its sugar from Cuba and approximately three-fortieths from the Philippines. This, gentlemen, is after 30 years of American sovereignty.

The United States Department of Commerce Yearbook for 1928 says:

"The sources of our sugar supply in recent years, while varying considerably from year to year, may be divided roughly as follows: Domestic production, one-fifth; imports from our insular possessions, one-fifth; and imports from foreign countries, three-fifths. Domestic production has shown comparatively little change during the past decade, but imports from our insular possessions and from foreign countries have substantially increased."

It will be observed at once that those conditions which call for curtailing crops and other steps to take care of an exportable surplus do not apply to the sugar industry in the United States. Not only do we not have an exportable surplus, but we are the largest importers of sugar in the world. The domestic producers are not approaching a condition in which they can supply the demand for sugar. The price of sugar in the American market still continues to be the price of Cuban sugar, plus the duty which Cuban sugar must pay on entering the United States market. This, of course, is a general and approximate, but accurate, statement.

One-eighth of the sugar which we bring into the United States comes from the Philippine Islands. This sugar has no appreciable effect on the market. The excluding of this sugar would mean the bringing in of an equivalent amount of Cuban sugar, and the price of sugar in the United States to the domestic producer would continue to be approximately the price of Cuban sugar, plus the duty on Cuban sugar on entering the United States.

Before consideration is given to any act which would discourage the production of sugar in the Philippines, it might be well to consider the conditions in the Philippines and in other territory which is now producing sugar for the American market.

An important element to be considered is the one easily fixed, of area and population:

	Square miles	Population	Production (in tons)
Porto Rico	3,435	1,384,075	550,000
Hawaii	6,449	285,576	714,000
Cuba	44,218	2,899,000	4,508,521
Philippines	114,600	11,244,867	577,390

It is observed at once, comparing the territories exterior to the continental United States which furnish its sugar, that sugar production in the Philippine Islands has not been developed, even approximately, as it has been in Hawaii, Porto Rico, and Cuba. The production of sugar per capita is far smaller in the Philippines for the area of the islands is far smaller, and it constitutes by far a lesser per cent of the export products. In other words, the Philippine Islands to-day is in a far better position than any of these territories in the matter of diversification.

This is shown not only with reference to the export products but it is more markedly shown with reference to the production of a local food supply. The Philippine government has devoted itself more to increasing the production of rice than to the increased production of sugar or any other article.

In the calendar year of 1928 there was imported into the Philippine Islands rice to the value of $1,074,885. In fact, the importation of rice into the Philippine Islands has been reduced from 37 per cent of the total imports in 1903 to less than 1 per cent for the calendar year 1928. On the other hand, in Cuba rice, corn, and wheat flour constituted approximately 10 per cent of their importations in 1927.

It is important to note also that while Porto Rico, Cuba, and Hawaii have increased largely the production of sugar, due to the advantages which sugar from this source receives in the United States, the exportation of sugar from the Philippine Islands is relative to other exports not so great as it was in the Spanish domination of those islands, and the total quantity produced is still materially less than double the greatest production in the time of Spain.

When viewed as a whole, the outstanding fact is that the Philippine Islands produce to-day less sugar per capita, less sugar for its area, and a less percentage of its total products in sugar than does any sugar producing external territory tributary to our market. Obviously, therefore, if there is to be a curtailing of the production of sugar, it should not begin with the least of the offenders, if it be an offense to produce a product so natural to these territories. A requirement that the Philippines should not produce more sugar per capita than is produced in any of these territories, or more sugar for its area, or a larger percentage of its total products in sugar, would not affect in any way the actual trend of production in the Philippine Islands.

The first and perhaps a conclusive reason why the United States should do nothing in its tariff legislation to slow up progress in the Philippine Islands is that based on the employment of the people.

The Hawaiian sugar producers, to keep up their present production of sugar, employ at present approximately 26,500 Filipinos, and recruit annually in the Philippine Islands approximately 7,000 Filipinos for the cane fields of Hawaii. Some of these men remain in Hawaii, others return to the Philippine Islands, and quite a number add to the numbers of Filipinos on the Pacific coast, which has been a source of complaint by American labor on the coast. It would certainly seem that we should not take the position that the Filipinos, to produce sugar, must migrate to Hawaii.

The Cuban interests, who are at present the largest producers of sugar, admit that no more sugar can be produced with the Cuban people, but if the American market will, at a paying price, absorb Cuban sugar then the Cuban interests may import Haitians and labor from the other West Indian islands. In other words, increasing the production of Cuban sugar does not mean a peculiar advantage to the Cuban people, but an advantage to the holders of stock in Cuban sugar properties and possibly an advantage to seasonal labor imported for the cane fields, labor of a type which the Cuban does not desire to include in his citizenry.

In Porto Rico the situation is different. The laborer of the sugar fields is a Porto Rican, but at present all Porto Rican land available for the production of sugar is so utilized.

The beet-sugar producer in the United States and the Louisiana producer of cane sugar are in different positions. Their industry is, and should be, highly protected. The market of the United States absorbs many times the total of their production. While they may be, with propriety, interested in the tariff, their interest can not, with propriety, extend to the sources from which the people of the United States secure the sugar which they themselves can not produce. In other words, the sugar industry in the United States may urge a necessary tariff, but having secured the tariff they can not, with propriety, urge that other people be prohibited from producing a natural product.

The interest of the Philippine Islands calls for the diversification of its products. The Philippines at present produce Manila hemp (abacá) and the production may not be increased without a lowering of the price below the cost of production, due to the fact that there is a constant and adequate supply of Manila hemp for the purposes for which it is used. If there be an increased production prior to an increase in the purposes for which it is utilized, the industry in the islands will suffer.

The islands are among the largest producers of copra and coconut oil. This industry, in so far as the production of coconuts—that is, the agricultural end of the industry—is concerned, is being steadily extended. The coconut-oil industry is on a competitive basis and has passed through several crises.

The Philippines produce tobacco and manufacture cigars for home consumption and export and cigarettes largely for home consumption. The agricultural end of this industry is fostered and efforts are being made to improve the quality and quantity of tobacco produced.

The great agricultural product of the Philippines is rice, and there has been a continuous effort to improve the methods of cultivation and to increase the quantity produced. It looks to-day as though the Philippines had reached the point where an adequate home supply of rice could be produced. The effort of the Philippine government should be directed to maintaining this position with reference to rice, to increase the production of other food products, including a further development of the animal industry, and to diversify, to the extent possible and fairly profitable, the production of other tropical products. It has taken to heart the position of other agricultural territory in the Tropics which has been favored by the American tariff in the matter of sugar, and is careful not to overdevelop sugar at the cost of other products.

The Statistical Bulletin of the Philippine Islands for 1927 gives the following as the area cultivated to the five leading crops (the area is given in hectares):

Rice	1,807,060
Corn	561,430
Coconuts	500,110
Abacá (Manila hemp)	480,150
Sugar cane	237,350

It is quite impossible to give even approximately the cost of the production of sugar in the Philippine Islands. Even where this industry is highly developed its cost varies from year to year and with the efficiency of cultivation and milling.

The average production cost on seven sugar estates in northern Occidental Negros was found to be 2.9367 cents per pound. This corresponds to an average cost in Cuba of 2.4966 cents per pound.

The freight rate to New York of Philippine sugar is approximately two and one-half times the freight from Cuba. It should be noted that the seven haciendas in northern Occidental Negros taken are those exceptionally favored, and that the average cost throughout the islands would be far greater.

I have dwelt but little on this because the cost of producing sugar varies so greatly with the amount per acre produced. In the Philippines the average yield of centrifugal sugar is 2.03 short tons per acre. The highest yield is on the land tributary to the San Carlos mill, where the production is 3.3 short tons per acre. The yield on land producing for muscovado mills averaged but 0.86 short ton per acre. It will be observed that the maximum does not approach the yield of sugar elsewhere. This is due to the agricultural methods and to the very limited use, and sometimes nonuse, of fertilizers. There is no doubt that these yields will be increased, and any increase in the total production of sugar in the Philippines in the near future will be due entirely to that.

As stated, 36 modern mills are operating in the Philippine Islands. Fifteen of them produce each less than 5,000 tons per annum. Of the 21 larger mills, which are comparable to the mills in other sugar-producing territory from which we get our sugar, one operating since 1910 is now in the hands of the banks; five of those constructed through the efforts of the Philippine National Bank are still indebted to the bank in the total sum of $15,000,000. It is true that these centrals were floated without capital available to the stockholders.

As will be noted from the quotation from Governor Forbes's message to the Philippine Legislature in 1911, the hope of the Philippine government has constantly been to develop a sugar industry in the islands in which the mill would be owned by the planters supplying the cane thereto—would, in fact, be a cooperative farmers' mill. If the mills tributary to the bank are enabled to pay off their indebtedness to the bank, this will have been brought about with reference to more than one-third of the sugar-producing territory in the Philippines.

This is very different from what is happening in the West Indies in the sugar industry and is deserving of the encouragement which has been given it by the admission of its products into the United States. On the other hand, any curtailment of the present privileges would mean the absolute failure of this experiment, the success of which would redound to the credit of our Government in the Philippine Islands.

On a recent visit to the Philippine Islands I was impressed with the fine spirit of the people throughout the islands, with their deep appreciation of the many benefits extended to them by the United States, by their fine spirit of cooperation with the government established there, and with the Governor General. There was a spirit of hopefulness everywhere. Politics was subordinated to a keen interest in economic welfare of the people. There existed a spirit in the Philippines of which any American could be proud, and the pride would be the greater when this spirit was contrasted with that existing generally in the Far East. The fact that we had been coworkers in creating this mutual understanding and hopeful spirit could not but be a source of pride. The prestige of the United States in that part of the world and in all parts where our labor in the Philippines is known is an asset which we could not, if it were appreciated, think of giving up, and yet, without the most liberal treatment of those islands, we will have departed from the policy which has earned us this prestige and will merit its loss. Furthermore, we will lose it.

Governor General Stimson is quoted as saying when the threat of limiting the Philippine sugar to be admitted into the United States free of duty was brought to his attention:

"No words can adequately express the depths of my feeling on that subject, because the attempt to restrict freedom of trade between the islands and the United States represents about the worst possible backward step that could be taken in American policy. It would mean going back to those old doctrines of colonial relations of 300 years ago, which held that the colonies of a country existed solely for the benefit of the mother country and could be exploited at will by that country. It would mean going back to a doctrine which caused the withering up throughout the centuries of the flourishing colonies of Portugal and Spain and would have done it for Great Britain if it had not been for the American Revolution.

"Now, I can not believe that any such backward step will be taken by America to-day. The American flag stands to-day not only for individual freedom but for freedom of trade for all people under that flag; and so long as we retain these islands under that flag we are in duty bound to give them the advantage of trade with the home country. Not only would it be wrong to do otherwise, but how foolish would it be from the standpoint of American policy.

"At this time America is engaged in an attempt to cultivate trade relations in the Orient, where trade relations to-day can only be cultivated through the cultivation of a confidence in American character and justice, and they can only exist when people believe in America's reputation for fairness. Just think what it would do to that attempt on the part of America to cultivate oriental trade if our rivals could turn around and point to an attempt at unfairness and injustice to our own people under the American flag in these islands."

The granting to Philippine products free admission into the United States market is in accordance with the principle which, to the extent practicable, has guided Congress since our taking over those islands. It has been enunciated as the only logical result of our sovereignty by both majority and minority of the Committee on Ways and Means of the House of Representatives. Nobody is more competent to enunciate a policy in regard to trade than this body. The result of the application of this policy has been most advantageous to the people of the islands. It has created in those people a spirit of hopefulness and a feeling of affection and gratitude to the United States. It has set up a model for the treatment of dependencies for all times, showing that the treatment of dependent peoples is not to be guided by the selfish interests of a country, but largely by what is best for the dependent peoples.

We have, in a manner, by legislation, entered into an agreement with these people. Section 301 of the existing tariff provides for the admission into the markets of the United States of Philippine products and continues:

"Provided, however, That in consideration of the exemptions aforesaid, all articles, the growth, product, or manufacture of the United States, upon which no drawback of customs duties has been allowed therein, shall be admitted to the Philippine Islands from the United States free of duty."

That is, we give ourselves a right in the market of the Philippine Islands, not arbitrarily and because Congress has the power so to do, but justified by the treatment which we give to the products of the Philippine Islands in the United States.

There is no suggestion that we should give up the privileges that we now have in the Philippine market. There is no suggestion that cotton textiles from the United States in excess of a certain limit should pay duty on entering the Philippine Islands.

Until such time as we shall have materially built up the Philippine Islands the advantages will be on the side of the Philippines, intentionally so and properly so, but we do receive very material benefits—benefits to our shipping, benefits to our banks in the United States which are the custodians of the funds of the Philippine government, and benefits to all of our industrial interests who ship their products in part to the Philippine Islands.

I have mentioned incidentally cotton textiles, which is one of the largest imports into the Philippine Islands, and the Philippines receive more cotton textiles from the United States than does any foreign country, however great, with which we deal.

The present arrangement has well been called one of "enlightened selfishness" on our part.

One has little difficulty in showing that the free admission of Philippine sugar into the United States market does not injure any producer under the American flag. There has been a great deal of loose talk on this subject, however. There is always a disposition to say that where there is so much smoke there must be some fire. Against this, however, we now know that a very effective smoke screen may be laid without fire. In this particular case there is no fire. There is absolutely no merit in the contention of any producer of cane in Louisiana or of beets in Utah that he is injured by the importation into the United States of Philippine sugar under present conditions or any conditions that will come in the near future.

HON. CHARLES E. WINTER

Mr. LEAVITT. Mr. Speaker and Members of the House, the western part of the United States must depend for its representation not on numbers or the power within the House which comes from large delegations. It must depend upon devotion. We have had in the House of Representatives from a great State of the West for three terms a man who has represented the West in the fullest and most complete sense, a man who understands the vital problems of the West and who has been an able and effective laborer for its interests as well as those of the entire Nation He is now going from among our number.

It would not be proper for us to let him leave this Chamber and the membership of this House without paying to him our sincere tribute of appreciation, the tribute of regret that he is going from us, the hope that the years to come will be years of rich reward, and that he will come back again to public life in a way to continue the representation of the great western country, as in the past. The man to whom I pay a western tribute together with that of all our Members is Judge CHARLES E. WINTER, of Wyoming. [Applause.]

FAREWELL AS A MEMBER

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair takes great pleasure in recognizing the gentleman from Texas [Mr. CONNALLY].

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the House, I have always considered it an honor to speak to the House. Noting the face of the clock, I shall not have much time in which to say just a word in parting. I have counted it a distinction to be a Member of this House for the past 12 years. During that time our country has passed through stirring and momentous periods. During that time I have had the pleasure of serving with Members of this body who, in character and ability, are not surpassed by those in the governmental service of any other country on the globe, not surpassed by those in any other branch of the Government of the United States. [Applause.]

As the time approaches for leaving this body I do so with a distinct sense of regret. This is the popular body. I can not believe that there is elsewhere in Washington any body in which the associations are as warm and as lasting as are those formed in this Chamber. [Applause.]

Since I have been a Member of the House I have been, as some of you perhaps have suspected at times, a partisan. [Laughter.] I have been a partisan without apology, because I believe that the Congress of the United States supplies a great forum of public opinion and that here, in the crucible of debate, ought to be fought out for the benefit of the people the political questions and the political issues that are to determine the course of the Government of the United States. Having political opinions, and expecting to have them in the future, I have not hesitated to utter them here in this House.

I know that important events are pressing for attention. Noon is almost here. I rose to express my deep sense of indebtedness to the membership of this House for the lasting friendships and for the associations of the past. I know that in the years that are to come you will meet the responsibilities and duties which fall to your lot as ably and as patriotically as you have met them in the past, and when you fulfill that measure of duty there need be little fear as to the future of the Republic. I bid you an affectionate farewell as a Member of this House.

However, at least for the next six years, I shall be a Member of the Senate, and I hope to continue contact with the Members of this body. I thank you very much. [Applause.]

HON. JAMES T. BEGG

Mr. NEWTON. Mr. Speaker, I rise to add just a word of appreciation for the privilege of having served in the House here and in the committee with two very pronounced partisans. You have just heard from one, the gentleman from Texas [Mr. CONNALLY], who is about to go into another body. We shall miss his partisanship, but we shall miss even more his good fellowship, his courtly manners, and his polished phrases. [Applause.]

It was also my privilege to serve on the Committee on Foreign Affairs with another great partisan, the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BEGG]. [Applause.] I think you will all agree with me that we shall miss the partisanship of that sturdy fighter, the gentleman from Ohio. Having the courage of his conviction he is powerful in debate, forceful and convincing in argument. Strong and sturdy fighter that he is, his fighting is always done aboveboard and in the open. In addition he is always willing to stand up and take blows just as he is willing to give them. I am sure that we all hope in the interest of the country that sometime later our colleague, genial friend, and comrade in arms, JIM BEGG, will come back to the House. [Applause.]

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States, which was read, and referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia, and ordered printed:

To the Congress of the United States:

I transmit herewith for the information of the Congress a communication from the judge of the Juvenile Court of the District of Columbia, together with a report covering the work of the juvenile court during the year ended June 30, 1928.

CALVIN COOLIDGE.

THE WHITE HOUSE, March 4, 1929.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT—PRESIDENTIAL APPROVALS

A message from the President of the United States, by Mr. Latta, one of his secretaries, communicated to the House in writing that the President had approved and signed the following acts at the Capitol to-day, March 4, 1929:

H. R. 12666. An act for the relief William S. Shacklette; and

H. R. 13929. An act to provide for the enlarging of the Capitol Grounds.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

TARIFF ON HIDES AND LEATHER

Mr. BEGG. Mr. Speaker, during the closing weeks of Congress Members have been receiving petitions protesting against any tariff on hides or leather. These petitions on their face seem to come from the retail dealers in shoes throughout the country.

It so happens that an association called the Shoe Leather Dealers' Association, 16 Bridge Street, New York City, headed by Monroe Einstein, president; Frank I. Hecht, vice president; F. L. Kraemer, treasurer; and L. M. Real, secretary, formed themselves into said association for the purpose of furthering propaganda against tariff on hides and leather. The following letter was sent to the retail shoe dealers throughout the United States, together with copies of blank petitions similar to that which is printed hereafter:

NEW YORK, N. Y., January 22, 1929.

To the Shoe Retailer:

A danger exists that Congress may put a tariff on hides and shoe leather, which are now on the free list.

If this new tariff goes into effect, you will have to pay more for your shoes, and you know it will not be an easy matter to pass this increase on to your customers.

At present there are only enough hides raised in the United States to manufacture about one-half the shoes worn by the public.

It is therefore very much to your interests to see that hides and leather are kept on the free list.

You can help prevent the passage of this proposed tariff by signing the inclosed petition—and by having your customers sign it also—getting as many names as you can, and then filling in the name of your Congressman and mailing it to him at Washington, D. C., using the inclosed stamped envelope, on or before February 15, 1929.

Twenty thousand letters and petitions, like this one, are being mailed to shoe dealers all over the country, and we wish to impress on you the importance for immediate action on your part.

When you send the petition it also might be advisable for you to write a personal letter to your Congressman, saying that any duty imposed on hides and leather will increase the cost of shoes, and this will mean loss of sales, less profits, and less customers.

Put these petitions on your show cases now! Instruct your clerks to get as many signatures as possible! Remember they must be mailed before February 15, 1929.

Respectfully yours,

SHOE LEATHER DEALERS' ASSOCIATION,
F. L. KRAEMER, Treasurer.

P. S.—Be sure to fill in the name of your Congressman, your congressional district, and your State, on the top of the petition in space provided. On the envelope merely write the name of the Congressman. If you do not know offhand who your Congressman is, make it your business to find out immediately.

We, the undersigned, retail shoe dealers, with our customers, respectfully request that you vote against any change in the present tariff on hides and leather used in the manufacture of shoes.

We realize that any duties assessed on such leathers must increase the price of shoes. This will certainly lower sales for the retailer and increase the cost to the consumer.

You will notice there are no facts accompanying any of this material, simply the flat statement that to put a tariff on hides and leather will increase the price of shoes and curtail the sales. If that is so, I would like to have the Members of Congress ask this association why it is that during the past year hides depreciated in price 46 per cent, with no decrease in the price of shoes but rather an increase.

I undertook to find out the personnel of this so-called shoe leather dealers' association, and for the information of the Members of the House I shall have printed in the RECORD a letter received from Mr. W. V. Anderson, assistant cashier of the National Bank of Commerce in New York City:

NATIONAL BANK OF COMMERCE,
New York, February 6, 1929.

Mr. ARTHUR T. GODING,
Assistant Treasurer Armand Schmoll (Inc.),
41 Park Row, New York.

DEAR MR. GODING: We are informed that the Shoe Leather Dealers' Association was formed a few months ago to fight the new tariff laws on the importation of leather which was begun by the Republican Party. Their funds have been raised entirely by donations and they are not soliciting members. There are very wealthy men behind the association and they are not seekers of credit. The association will terminate as soon as they have done their best to modify the trade laws. They say that in reality they are fighting for the consumer, for if leather is cheaper shoes will also be cheaper. Mr. Monroe Einstein is president, and he has various other connections, the principal of which being J. Einstein (Inc.). Mr. Frank I. Hecht, vice president, is also president of one of the largest shoe shops in Paris. Mr. F. L. Kraemer, treasurer, has for a long while been a customshouse broker, dealer in freight of all kinds. Mr. L. M. Real, secretary, has been in the leather business for a long while.

Trusting the above answers your inquiry, we remain,

Very truly yours,

W. V. ANDERSON,
Assistant Cashier.

At this point I want also to have inserted in the RECORD a letter sent out to the sales representatives of the American shoe industry. This letter hardly needs to be commented upon, it is so preposterous and distortive of the truth.

THE NATIONAL SHOE TRAVELERS' ASSOCIATION,
Boston, Mass., February 1, 1929.

To the Sales Representatives of the American Shoe Industry.

GENTLEMEN: The American shoe industry is faced with a very strong movement to impose a duty upon hides and skins.

Such a duty must mean higher prices for all leather and shoes. Higher prices for any commodity inevitably spell fewer unit sales. Therefore the effect of such a duty upon our industry would be disastrous.

We feel that some of the representatives from certain districts have a misconception of the influence of such a duty upon their constituents.

We further feel that the sales representatives of the shoe industry, through their routine travels, have the opportunity to do much in pointing out the economic effect of a duty on hides and skins to the farmer, for whose supposed benefit this duty is requested.

We are inclosing a brief pamphlet pointing out some of the facts, which will amaze many of us. We urge you to use every method in your power to propagate every argument at your command to relieve this pressure for a duty on hides and skins.

We emphasize the fact that there is very little time left for effective work, and that any work to be effective must directly or indirectly influence the opinion of Congressmen and Senators who now favor a duty upon hides and skins, or bring pressure to bear upon them from their own constituents.

It seems impossible that a farmer who is acquainted with all of the facts on this subject would insist upon such a tariff. We feel that its benefit to him will be doubtful, while at the same time it will seriously injure one of the Nation's most important industries, with an attendant economic effect upon all people who sell the wage earners in the shoe industry. This naturally would have a serious effect upon the farmers' sales to general industry. Such a principle sufficiently multiplied amongst many industries would so reduce the farmers' market as to make prosperity impossible for him under any conditions.

We would be very glad to send to you, or to any addresses that you might designate, any reasonable quantity of these pamphlets which you might request.

Please address your requests to T. A. Delany, Secretary National Shoe Travelers' Association, 429 Statler Building, Boston, Mass.

Cordially,

(Signed) A. F. BANCROFT,
Chairman of Sales Division of National Boot and Shoe Manufacturers' Association, Tariff Commission.
J. FRANKLIN MCELWAIN,
Chairman Tariff Commission of the National Boot and Shoe Manufacturers' Association.

Here are a few facts I should like to give to the Members of the Seventy-first Congress:

Are not hides and calfskins much lower in price to-day than they were in 1912, while the prices of shoes are 80 per cent higher than they were then?

If the price of shoes fluctuates with the price of hides and leather, as stated by this Shoe Leather Dealers' Association, how do they explain this disparagement?

One year ago light packer cowhides sold at 24 cents per pound. Now they are selling at 13 cents a pound, a slump of 11 cents, or 46 per cent.

Raw calfskins sold a year ago for 29 cents a pound and to-day the same grade of calfskins sells for 18 cents a pound. A slump of 11 cents, or 38 per cent.

What has happened to the prices of shoes? They have certainly not decreased. Generally speaking, they may have remained stationary.

This shrinkage in the prices of calfskins reflected in dollars means what to the producers of hides or the farmers? The average cowhide weighs 50 pounds. That makes a shrinkage of $5.50 per hide. There were 14,000,000 cattle slaughtered last year in the United States. The loss on hides alone would be five and a half times 14,000,000, or $77,000,000.

There were 11,000,000 calves slaughtered in this country last year. A calfskin averages about 10 pounds, which would make a loss of $1.10 per skin, or a total loss of more than $12,000,000 on calfskins. Take the loss on cowhides, $77,000,000, and add to that the $12,000,000 loss on calfskins, and we have a total loss to the farmers of $89,000,000. When I say loss to the farmers, I mean that, whether the farmer slaughtered the animal or the packer slaughtered it. The value of the carcass plus the value of the several by-products are all reflected in the price paid the farmer for the animal on hoof.

Now, the question arises naturally, if the producers of hides, or the farmers, received last year $89,000,000 less for hides than they did the year before, did the buyers of leather products, shoes, and so forth, save that? If this so-called Shoe Leather Dealers' Association can offer any evidence to show that the masses of the people who buy shoes paid $89,000,000 less for their commodities last year than previous, there might be some justification for their claim that to put a tariff on hides would increase the prices to the ultimate consumer. Mr. L. J. Wilbur, of Swift & Co., said over the radio on January 26 of this year that every loss of hide value was deducted from the price paid to the farmer for the animal. I quite agree with that statement; hence the only conclusion to be drawn is that agriculture received $89,000,000 less last year for this one item of their production than they should have received by reason of a lack of a tariff. That statement could not stand alone unless supported by some import facts.

Let us look into the importations. There was imported into the United States in the year 1928, last year, $44,000,000 worth of leather or 41 per cent of the total consumption. We find that 54,000,000 square feet of calf and kip leather alone was imported into this country last year. I am anxious for the Members to get this statement. While the price of raw hides decreased 46 per cent last year the importations of leather products in volume have increased 587 per cent from 1923 to 1927, inclusive. Can any Member of Congress who believes in the principle of protective tariff say that in the face of the above figures the farmer is being adequately protected on one of his products where protection could easily be given.

From what countries have these importations come? Austria, Belgium, Czechoslovakia, Denmark, France, Germany, Netherlands, Switzerland, United Kingdom, and Canada.

Notice in one particular class of importations what happened. In 1913 we imported $127,735 worth of calf and kip leather. In 1928 we imported $14,000,000 worth of similar grades.

What has been the effect on business in this country in face of these facts? We have invested in the leather business in the United States approximately $300,000,000. In 1925 and 1926 that industry lost heavily. In 1927 the business earned 0.8 per cent on their investment. Of all the major industries we have, the calf-leather industry is in about the worst financial condition. For the information of Congress I will list a few of our industries with the percentages of their earnings:

Agricultural implements	9.5
Automobiles	23
Construction materials	11.55
Chemicals	13
Copper and brass	5.43
Cotton goods	1.67
Iron and steel	6.73
Packing	5.66
Sugar	4.3
Calf leather	.8

Another effect on the calf-leather industry has been a decrease in the employment of about 10,000 people or a falling off of an annual pay roll of $73,000,000. These 10,000 people of necessity must have sought employment in some other line of activity as well as contributed to the line of the unemployed.

Compare the wages paid in the leather industry, the calf and kip leather industry in the United States, with that of their competition. In that industry in this country we pay 54 cents per hour. On a 10-hour-a-day basis it makes $5.40 per day. In Germany similar labor is paid 25 cents per hour, or $2.52 per day, while in Czechoslovakia this labor receives 17 cents per hour, or $1.73 per day.

Now, by applying just the rules of common reason for a minute and granting that a leather laborer in Germany or Czechoslovakia can make as many square feet of leather in 10 hours as similar laborers can in the Ohio Leather Co. factory at Girard, Ohio, and by assuming for the sake of the illustration that one man working in a leather factory can make 100 square feet in 10 hours, whether he works in Ohio, Germany, or Czechoslovakia, we find the labor cost on these 100 square feet of leather in the United States to be $5.40, in Germany $2.52, and in Czechoslovakia $1.73.

When the factory salesman calls upon his trade to sell calf leather he must necessarily quote higher prices on American-made leather. That answers itself. The salesman representing the American plant must in quoting his price for leather keep in mind that $5.40 is paid to the laborer for every hundred square feet; while the German has only a $2.52 labor cost to care for, or 50 per cent less; and the Czechoslovakian has but $1.73, or 66⅔ per cent less labor cost.

So one readily concludes there is only one decision to make for the American Congress—either furnish protection to the calf-leather manufacturers in this country or say by their refusal that they are willing to surrender that great industry to our competition, that in Germany and Czechoslovakia in particular.

Knowing as I do the desire of the Republican Members to furnish adequate protection to American producers to offset the difference in cost of labor for their competitors operating in countries having available cheap labor, I am confident that the Seventy-first Congress will recognize the necessity for a tariff on calf and kip leather, as well as leather products.

NATIONAL ORIGINS

Mr. JENKINS. Mr. Speaker and ladies and gentlemen of the House, by way of extension of remarks I shall attempt to answer some of the arguments advanced by the opponents to the national-origins system for establishing quotas in the session of March 3. It is to be regretted that a discussion of almost any immigration question excites personal and national animosities. The reason for this is that the immigration question is intensely human. It deals exclusively with humanity and the personal rights and privileges of human beings and their families.

The discussion of the resolution under consideration in the session of the House on March 3, 1929, was on a high plane and was singularly free from personalities. The question was of great importance. Sufficient time should have been given for its consideration. There is hardly any justification of the program of having it called up on the Sabbath and on the day before adjournment and passed upon with only about one hour's total discussion.

To make this discussion logical I must refer to the resolution again and thereby repeat in substance a part of my remarks made on the floor when the resolution was under discussion. This resolution sought to postpone for another year the going into effect of the national-origins provisions of the 1924 immigration law. This provision of the 1924 law would have gone into effect in July, 1927, had it not been postponed one year by a resolution of Congress. Later it was postponed another year. The same procedure is attempted again. The first postponement was taken because the census authorities having charge of the matter had not completed their investigations to their own satisfaction. The second postponement was for the same and for other reasons that did not go to the merits of the question. The census authorities have now completed their investigations and have presented their findings to the President. Doctor Hill, the census expert, says in his testimony taken before the Senate Immigration Committee on February 4, 1929, and speaking of the accuracy and sufficiency of the national-origins survey:

The CHAIRMAN. Then the second postponement which was made was equally valuable, was it not?

Doctor HILL. In the way of studying and checking our figures; yes. I have more confidence in them now than I had a year ago.

The CHAIRMAN. You have more confidence in them now than you had a year ago?

Doctor HILL. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. Within another year do you think you might have still more confidence, or less?

Doctor HILL. I doubt it.

The CHAIRMAN. Sir?

Doctor HILL. I think we are about as near accuracy as we can get.

It is therefore very clear that a postponement can not be justified upon the claim that more accuracy may be secured by further investigation. A thorough investigation has been made. Then, how can it be justified? It can not be justified except upon the theory that the national-origins system is vicious and should not be put into effect. That it is vicious is denied by most restrictionists and by all or nearly all patriotic organizations in the country. If it is vicious, it should be repealed and not postponed. There was strategy in the plan to postpone rather than to repeal, for more votes could be had for a postponement than for a repeal. This was the first step in a movement seeking the repeal of the law. Why repeal the law? This brings us to the merits of the matter. We are, therefore, in effect, involved in a controversy to see if we should not repeal a law duly passed by Congress and approved by the President without putting that law into effect, although we were not asked to vote for repeal. To refuse to put a law into effect that has been passed with all the formality incident to the passage of laws is a very serious matter. Until the law is repealed it is in full force and effect. Congress having adjourned without repealing or postponing the law leaves it in full force and effect. Further procedure in the program to prevent the law from going into effect will be watched with interest.

That the position of the American Legion may be made clear on this proposition, and in reply to statements made in the former discussion of this question, as shown by the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, I hereby insert copy of resolution passed by the American Legion in its annual convention:

SECTION 1. Whereas it seems a proper function of the American Legion to voice its attitude toward nonpartisan questions of public interest and concern, to the end that life and government in the United States may be improved: Therefore be it

Resolved by the American Legion in convention assembled at the tenth annual national convention, San Antonio, Tex., October 8 to 11, 1928, That we favor and recommend continuance of the method of restriction upon immigration in the 1924 immigration law with its fundamental national-origins provision, so that American citizenship and economic prosperity may be maintained at the highest possible level.

That the correct attitude of the Sons of the American Revolution on this great question may be had, I am inserting a portion of a letter received by me from Mr. Frank B. Steele, secretary general of the national society:

The attention of the officers of the Sons of the American Revolution has been called to a statement made in the debate on the national-origins resolution on Sunday, March 3. I wish to say in reference to this statement that at the national congress of the Sons of the American Revolution held in the city of Washington, D. C., May 20 to 23, 1928, the report of Hon. Josiah A. Van Orsdel, chairman of the committee on immigration of the National Society of the Sons of the American Revolution, contained the following statement:

"Your committee, after investigation, regards the national origins law as the key to the solution to the immigration question and recommends that the National Society of the Sons of the American Revolution, by the adoption of this report, place itself on record as strongly supporting this law. It has practically the unanimous support of all other patriotic organizations in this country, and we believe that our society should no longer hesitate to take a firm stand in this matter."

This report was unanimously adopted by the congress of the National Society Sons of the American Revolution and was published in the official bulletin of the society, entitled "The Minute Man," which is sent to every member of the society for his perusal and information.

It goes without saying that no plan of restricting immigration will be entirely satisfactory to all of those restricted. In our program of restriction we have already determined that those best qualified to fit into our body politic should be favored and those least qualified to advance our standards of life and citizenship should be held back. This test should not be applied in any spirit of unkindness or injustice. Those physically unfit are excluded, regardless of their nationality. Smaller quotas are granted to countries whose customs and laws and whose background is different from ours. Larger quotas are given to those countries whose institutions most nearly resemble ours. This theory is well understood and accepted. The trouble does not come from countries whose institutions are different from ours, but from the countries that closely resemble us in many ways. Under the census of 1890 plan Germany and the Irish Free State and the Scandinavian countries are granted quotas that are considered by many as out of proportion to quotas granted to other countries when the total population of the nation is considered. On the other hand, many people claim that Great Britain, Scotland, and North Ireland are granted a larger quota under the national-origins plan than they are entitled to when the total population of the nation is considered. The difference in quotas as provided under these two systems is so great as to cause serious consideration. The two plans are very different. One must be more equitable than the other. The 1890 plan is based on the foreign-born population exclusively. The native born is not considered. This is a serious objection. If only foreign born are to be considered, why not permit immigration on the basis of all foreigners who have ever come into the country? The selection of any particular census would favor or discriminate against some countries, for immigration from the different countries has come in waves at different periods. The national-origins plan seeks to ascertain the number of blood stock of the various nationalities in the country. This plan is absolutely right in theory. The only objection that can be raised to it is that the scientists may not be able to arrive at exact figures. The plan is fair. The other plan is more than fair to some nationalities and discriminatory to others. Therefore it is not fair. If the national-origins plan is fair in theory, our only concern should be to see that it is not unfair in practice. That it reduces some quotas and increases others as established by the 1890 plan only proves its efficiency. At the same time, when it reduces some quotas it is only natural that those affected would complain.

If the present plan is inequitable, it is inevitable that some must lose if the inequalities are to be overcome. It is not a question of who is superior or who is inferior. It is a question of who is favored now and who is discriminated against, and if those who are favored will relinquish these favors so as to equalize the quotas. It is a question of doing justice between peoples, all of whom are on an equality as to desirability. Those to whom has been assigned the task of establishing this equality are above suspicion. This being recognized by all, their work should be approved by all and accepted by all, and this troublesome question disposed of.

It has been said many times that the quota system based upon a small group of foreign born enumerated in the United States in 1890 is established upon definite and precise statistics. Nothing is in reality further from the truth. I call your attention to the reports submitted to Congress in 1924 by the Committee on Immigration of this House, and I can assure you, that, although the tables printed therein were derived from official sources, you will have great difficulty in finding any coincidence between the quotas assigned to any country comprised within the scope of the bills to which they relate. For example, let me point out that the most significant thing about the statistics which were before Congress in these reports of 1924 is that they have no relation whatsoever to any quota which has been assigned to any country based on the 1890 census, as proclaimed by the President subsequent to the act of 1924.

Let me illustrate this fact by pointing out to you, that in Report No. 350, presented by the chairman of the House committee to this body on March 24, 1924, the quota credited to Great Britain and North Ireland was 41,772, on a basis of 2 per cent of the census of foreign born in the United States, as enumerated in 1890; whereas the quota proclaimed by the President after the passage of the act was 34,007, a decrease of 7,765, or 22.8 per cent. In the case of Germany, the quota assigned was 45,229; and now, as you know, the quota credited to Germany under the plan now in force is 51,227, an increase of 5,998, or 13.2 per cent. In the case of the Irish Free State, the estimate before Congress of the quota for this nation was 20,886, but now under the quota schedule as proclaimed by the President, the Irish Free State gets 28,567, or an increase of 7,681, or 36.7 per cent. Were it desirable for me to prolong this phase of my discussion of the quotas I could point out to you other quotas in the list which vary from those now in force by over 92 per cent. I venture to say, if you try to verify the figures which I put before you, that you will find nothing accurate or precise in the quota system based upon the census of foreign born in the United States as enumerated in the census of 1890.

Let me quote to you what Doctor Hill has to say on this point from the record of testimony before the Senate committee on March 15, 1928:

Most people, I believe, have the idea that the 1890 basis rests upon exact figures, but that is rather far from being the case, because the 1890 census does not show how many people there were in the United States in 1890 who were born in that portion of Europe which is now Czechoslovakia. That had to be estimated. It does not show how many people there were in the United States in 1890 who were born in that portion of Europe which is now Yugoslavia; that had to be estimated. It does not show how many people there were from that portion of Europe which constitutes the present Germany, or the present France, or the present Irish Free State; all through that had to be estimated. The law contemplates that. It provides that where there have been transfers of territory the number of people born in the transferred territory shall be estimated. So there is a pretty large element of estimate in the 1890 basis.

The same thing is true with all the new countries created by the war—Poland, Lithuania, Latvia, Estonia, and Finland; in fact, Doctor Hill goes on to say:

In making the 1890 allocation, as there was not very much time for careful study, the committee adopted rather arbitrarily the assumption that the immigration from the original country had been spread evenly through the parent country—say that 10 per cent of the population had been transferred from one country to another it was assumed that the transfer took with it 10 per cent of the immigration. That was the assumption we made in arriving at the quotas on the 1890 basis.

Now, when the committee of experts came to make the apportionments on the national-origins system, they only used such estimates as a last resort. Doctor Hill specifically says that if the committee could get better data and they usually did, they made use of such data.

The 1890 census of foreign born as a basis for a quota system is established on estimates. Before the quota law was established in 1924 immigrants returned to their native lands much more frequently than they do now, and the foreign-born population changed greatly from year to year. New immigration coming in would be from different countries, depending upon the tide of immigration moving at that time.

But to return to the figures. The House committee in 1924 said in its report, No. 350, it was the purpose of the bill then reported to maintain the racial status quo in the population. When Doctor Hill was asked last year, Does the distribution of quotas based on the 1890 census reflect with any accuracy the proportion of nationalities that now exist in the United States, he said, "No, indeed; it does not." And in response to a question as to the fairest way to all nationalities of apportioning the quotas, he replied that no proposition brought to his attention seemed fairer than the national-origins plan.

The stock argument that the 1890 census base apportions the immigration between northwestern and southern and eastern Europe justly was only sustained as an approximation of the truth by the analysis of the population which some Members of this House are now attacking. Let me add that the discriminatory features of the 1890 census of foreign born as a base, if it had been adhered to as a permanent method of apportioning the quotas by the House in 1924, would have prevented the passage of permanent restriction upon immigration at that time. I venture to say that no immigration act based on discrimination against large sections of our people can be permanent or a successful democracy maintained by establishing race solidarities in our midst. The opponents of national origins are making mountains out of molehills. They are asking you to perpetuate discriminations running as high as 100 per cent to avoid errors which may not reach 5 per cent. Any man and any party tying themselves definitely to such a proposition incurs a grave responsibility to the Nation.

BRIG. GEN. LLOYD M. BRETT

Mr. PORTER. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following address delivered by me at the unveiling of the monument to Brig. Gen. Lloyd M. Brett at Arlington, September 23, 1928:

It is, indeed, fitting that we should lay aside our usual labors and journey here from our homes in many States of the Union to pay this tribute of respect and esteem to our beloved dead.

Brig. Gen. Lloyd M. Brett has "crossed over" the border into eternity. A great American, a great soldier, has passed into history.

This modest monument—in keeping with his character—which the Eightieth Division of the American Expeditionary Forces is dedicating to his memory to-day was erected with funds contributed by the "boys" he commanded. I say "boys" because that is the way he always affectionately referred to his soldiers.

Brig. Gen. Lloyd M. Brett was born in Maine and was graduated from the West Point Military Academy in 1879. He was married on the 7th day of February, 1887, to Elma Wallace, of Montana.

After graduation from West Point he was assigned to active duty on the western frontier. In less than a year Congress voted him the Congressional medal of honor, an unprecedented distinction, the highest Congress can give a soldier, the citation reading:

"For most distinguished gallantry in action against hostile Sioux Indians near O'Fallons Creek, Mont., April 1, 1880, by fearless exposure and dashing bravery, cutting off the Indian pony herd and greatly crippling the hostiles, while second lieutenant, Second Cavalry."

He served continuously on the frontier until 1897, participating in many Indian campaigns and skirmishes.

He took part in the Santiago campaign during the Spanish-American War, and after the fierce fighting there was made provost general of the American Army.

On the 7th day of July, 1898, he had the distinction of being selected by General Shafter as commander of the 100 picked men of our Army to receive the surrender of the Spanish Army, and later the surrender of Santiago de Cuba. For gallantry in action under fire at the Battle of El Caney, July 1, 1898, he was cited and recommended for the brevet of major.

From the Santiago de Cuba campaign he was transferred to the Philippine Islands, where he was an active participant in skirmishes which suppressed Philippine insurrection. On his return from the Philippines he was assigned to National Guard duty in Washington for five years. General Harries, his commanding officer, wrote of his services:

"You have had many predecessors as adjutant general, and some of them have been of the best, but no one has rendered such uncommonly useful service as you have; no one has given so freely of himself, capable at every point, whether in the office or in the field, an officer and a gentleman in the highest sense of that combined term, a loyal friend whom I shall always hold in the highest esteem, you have more than filled every expectation."

General Brett was also, for more than six years, superintendent of the Yellowstone National Park, a duty very different in all its essential features from that of straight soldiering. The Hon. Franklin K. Lane, then Secretary of the Interior, wrote:

"I never saw a more soldierlike man, or one who by tradition and attitude is more of a soldier."

In 1916 he was relieved of duty in the Yellowstone National Park and ordered to the Mexican border. On the conclusion of this service his commanding officer, General Bell, indorsed his efficiency report as follows:

"Excellent service as a brigade commander of Cavalry."

On August 5, 1917, he was ordered to Camp Lee, Va., and shortly thereafter was sent to France.

He entered the World War a colonel, but throughout the entire war commanded a brigade as a brigadier general, where, physically and mentally active, forceful and quietly fearless, he made a record of which the Republic is proud.

General Pershing said:

"The services of Brigadier General Brett have been of a very high order. During the World War he served with great ability."

He received at the close of the World War the exceptional honor of the distinguished-service medal, the citation:

"For exceptionally meritorious and distinguished services. He commanded the One hundred and sixtieth Infantry Brigade with particular efficiency in the markedly successful operations resulting in the occupation of the Dannevoux sector in October, 1918. In the actions near Immecourt and Buzancy in November his brigade broke the enemy's resistance. Due to his masterful ability and brilliant leadership these operations proved a crowning success."

The Republic of France made him an officer in the Legion of Honor and gave him the croix de guerre, with palm. The citation from the French Government:

"He commanded the One hundred and sixtieth Brigade and made of his brigade a choice unit, through which he broke the stubborn resistance of the enemy in October and November, 1918."

His long experience in Indian warfare, on the Mexican border, in the Spanish-American War, the Philippine insurrection, and his military skill enabled him to so command as to reduce his casualties to a minimum. Many a veteran of the Eightieth Division owes his life to the audacious genius of Lloyd M. Brett.

On his return from the war he said:

"The thing that I'm most proud of is that my men did so much and lost so little. Now that I am back in America, I do not have to hang my head in shame in the fear that any lives were lost needlessly. We pride ourselves in achieving such big results in our engagements at a minimum cost of human life. There was not a life wasted needlessly or sacrificed through tactical blunders. I think that our record of killed during the months of fighting, considering the character of the fighting they took part in, was lower than any other unit in the American Army. The fighting in the Argonne was the heaviest of the war.

"I feel that I can face every father and mother of the boys with a clear conscience. I never asked any of my men to do anything that I would not have one of my sons do if he were in the regiment. War means sacrificing human life, and I am thankful to God that our casualties were low—yes; remarkably low—considering the character of the fighting the men took part in."

He was retired from the Army as a colonel in February, 1920, having reached the retirement age of 64, after a continuous service of over 41 years which, for exceptional, meritorious, and distinguished performance of duty, has few equals in the records of the United States Army.

In February, 1927, the Congress, by unanimous vote, in grateful recognition of his services to his country, restored him to the rank of brigadier general, which he had held during the World War.

After the war he was elected commander of the Eightieth Division Veterans' Association and reelected in 1921 and 1922. On his retirement he was made honorary life president of the association.

He died in the city of Washington, after a brief illness, on September 23, 1927, leaving to survive him his widow and two daughters—Mrs. Lloyd B. Diehl and Miss Helen Brett. He was buried here in Arlington, the hallowed grounds dedicated by a grateful Republic to her heroic dead, with the high honor due a soldier of his rank.

I first met General Brett at Camp Lee, Va. I early admired him as a soldier and loved him as a man. Our friendship was of the enduring kind. It was a privilege to call him "friend." He was a man of fine physique and manly bearing. He had a lofty but not haughty air. Nature had endowed him with good health, a brilliant intellect, and a heart that always throbbed with tender solicitude for the welfare of "my boys."

He had an unconscious dignity that singled him out from his fellow men—not for criticism, but for admiration. His gentleness, modesty, and patience were so marked that he excited no envy. He was polished, not by art, but by nature.

Marcus Aurelius Antoninus said:

"I learned self-government, and not to be led aside by anything, and cheerfulness in all circumstances, as well as in illness; and a just admixture in the moral character of sweetness and dignity, and to do what was set before me without complaining."

This was General Brett's philosophy of life. He was my ideal of American manhood.

We dedicate this monument to him. He dedicated to us a greater monument—a life of faithful, distinguished, and patriotic service. The monument he dedicated to us will long survive the one we dedicate to him.

His great soul has taken flight. He is gone, save his memory. This we shall cherish to the end, with the assurance that in the shadowy line between time and eternity, in the glimmer and gloom of the deepening twilight, he beheld a glorious dawn.

HON. DANIEL R. ANTHONY, JR., OF KANSAS

Mr. AYRES. Mr. Speaker, I wish to say something of my distinguished colleague, DANIEL R. ANTHONY, who is voluntarily retiring from Congress. I am confident that every Member of Congress on both sides regret that the condition of Mr. ANTHONY's health was such that he did not seek reelection.

His devotion to his congressional duties and his loyalty to his State and Nation and his fairness with his colleagues have won for him the admiration and respect of all regardless of party affiliations. During his service in this House he has distinguished himself as a member of the Military Affairs Committee and then as a member of the Appropriations Committee.

Our colleague, Mr. ANTHONY, is of a distinguished family. His father, Daniel Anthony, sr., was one of the noted Kansas pioneers and was known as a fighter with unlimited courage. It was such men as Dan Anthony, sr., who fought it out with those who were determined to make Kansas a slave State. At that time Kansas was a border State, and it took men with stout hearts and iron nerves to withstand the kind of warfare then conducted. There are many things I might say concerning the father of our colleague, who helped to make the history of the Sunflower State.

Susan B. Anthony, the distinguished aunt of our colleague, was the champion of equal suffrage, labored and fought for this cause for over a quarter of a century, a cause which finally won and is a part of the Constitution of the United States.

DAN ANTHONY, Jr., who has served his State and Nation so well in Congress for the past 20 years, is also a man of vision and courage. Although a partisan he never allowed his partisanship to override his judgment, nor did he permit it to cause him to think any the less of a personal friend who might differ with him. His record in Congress shows that he always fought hard for what he believed was right.

For the past eight years it has been my good fortune to be associated with him on the Committee on Appropriations. After a 20-year service in this House he has at last reached the position which he has so well earned of being chosen chairman of the Appropriations Committee, only to have to surrender it because of ill health. He has fought many political battles in the old first Kansas congressional district, and for the past two years he has been fighting the hardest and greatest battle of his life—that is, to regain his health—and I know that it will be good news to the entire membership of the House to know that he is winning the fight. He leaves us with all of his colleagues hoping and praying that within the near future he will be enjoying the same good health as of old.

UNVEILING OF THE STATUE OF DR. EPHRAIM M'DOWELL

Mr. GILBERT. Mr. Speaker, under leave granted to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I insert the remarks I made at the unveiling of the statue of Dr. Ephraim McDowell in the Capitol on Sunday, March 3, 1929, at 2 p. m.

The matter referred to is as follows:

Mr. President: Reverently, in the presence of these mighty shades, we, commissioned by the proud Commonwealth of Kentucky, consign to this Hall of Fame two of her sons worthy to be placed here among the immortals.

From the selections here we are persuaded that a partiality exists among men for those who have distinguished themselves in combat either on battle field or in legislative forum.

Kentucky bows to none in the prowess of her warriors. "The dark and bloody ground" was both a description and a prophecy. Chivalry and romance brighten every page and tragedy darkens every chapter of her history. The adventures of Boone, Kenton, Harrod, and Logan are the inspiration of every American boy. The daring of Clark at Vincennes, Shelby at Kings Mountain, Johnson at Tippecanoe, Taylor at Monterey, and Morgan on his raids thrill all who love men of blood and iron, valor and action.

Kentucky's statesmen have been as able in peace as her soldiers have been mighty in war. Menifee, Wickliffe, Crittenden, Beck, Carlisle, Breckinridge, and Clay assumed commanding influence in the councils of the Nation. After Clay, of whom you have just been so eloquently told, had, with one hand on the shoulder of the southern slaveholder and the other on the shoulder of the northern abolitionist, averted the Civil War for a generation, it was Kentucky that, in those dark days of fratricidal strife, gave unsparingly and impartially of her sons to both sides and gave Abraham Lincoln to the North and Jefferson Davis to the South, each to guide the destinies of a separated nation. Pennsylvanians fought side by side for the North; Tennesseans fought side by side for the South; Kentuckians fought face to face, some for the North, some for the South.

Kentucky's list of eminent divines includes Bascom, the greatest Methodist orator; Broadus, the greatest Baptist scholar; Breckinridge, the greatest Presbyterian theologian; Campbell, the great founder of the Disciples; and Spalding, the greatest of Catholic historians.

As these great statesmen and preachers swayed the Nation with their eloquence, Prentice and Watterson lashed it with the power of their editorials.

Kentucky's jurists have been as outstanding as her statesmen. The learned and classical opinions of Robertson, Miller, and Harlan have been read and followed in the courts of the world. Kentucky to-day leads the States in the number of justices of the Supreme Court of the United States. She has two, which is more than have 42 States combined.

What giants in the court room were Davies, Marshall, Hardin, Goebel, and O'Dougherty!

Did poets ever sing more sweetly than her sons, Stanton in the Moneyless Man and O'Hara in the Bivouac of the Dead?

Her painter was the matchless Jouett, her sculptor the incomparable Hart.

Oh, Kentucky, the mother of genius, had your sons dwelt elsewhere their praise would have been heralded by a thousand messengers. As the name America is an injustice to Columbus, so in this very hall has your own son lost the credit that was his through your modesty. Why have you not sung of your doctors? In your starry heaven of achievement here is your brightest constellation.

When the tread of the warrior has passed on, the hurrahs and shouts are hushed, the strains of martial music have died away, can be heard the sob of the widow, the wail of the orphan, the groan of the dying as pestilence and famine stalk through the land.

What a relief to leave the scene and enter with the doctors into a field of human service, aiding to rise, not to fall; helping to live, not to die. In this field have your sons surpassed all the rest. You have had five presidents of the American Medical Society, which is many more than any other State. What soldiers of daring, what masters of skill, what giants of brain were these men of mercy.

This is a fitting time to mention a few of your greatest—Brashear, McDowell, Dudley, Drake, Yandell, Gross, Blackburn, Sayre, McMurtry, Matthews, Gilbert, McCormack, and Abell. Two of these performed successfully feats never before accomplished in all the world. Doctor Brashear was the first surgeon in the world to have the courage and the skill to amputate the leg at the hip joint. Doctor McDowell was the first surgeon in all the world to cut into the abdominal cavity and remove an ovarian tumor. He is the father of ovariotomy and the pioneer in abdominal surgery. Doctor Brashear's feat was performed in 1806, Doctor McDowell's on December 13, 1809, both in the backwoods of Kentucky. I have never held proximity to brick and mortar necessary to greatness.

"What though on common fare they dined,
Wore hodden grey and a' that.
Give fools their silks
And knaves their wine;
A man is a man for a' that."

Doctor McDowell was born November 11, 1771, in Rockbridge County, Va., son of Samuel and Mary McClung McDowell. He was married to Sarah Shelby, daughter of Gov. Isaac Shelby. He was the ninth of 12 children. His ancestry were Scotch on both sides. Though a Virginian by birth, he was a Kentuckian from childhood, having moved to Danville when only 13 years of age. Kentucky was then a wilderness and that now splendid city of Danville was a pioneer village of 300 people, nestled in the forests of oak and poplar. His father, Samuel McDowell, was judge of Kentucky's famous land court, and of sufficient affluence to educate Ephraim in the universities of America and Scotland. Edinburgh was then the medical center of the world, and to the great university there young McDowell was sent. His inspiration, however, was received at the feet of a private tutor who fired his imagination with the possibilities of removing diseased female organs from the vital cavities of the human body. This was Dr. John Bell, of Edinburgh, who dreamed of, but never attempted, these operations.

Perhaps it was the backwoods setting, the heroic environment, the very necessity of the thing, that gave Doctor McDowell, then recognized as the leading physician and surgeon of the South and West, that undefinable resignation of mind and soul that precedes an entry into the unknown. Columbus was the most skillful navigator of his time; he had studied deductions from all the known facts; he was inspired by a resigned faith. McDowell possessed the same qualities of mind and soul, and as Columbus sailed into the unknown areas of an uncharted sea, McDowell entered into the unknown secrets of a human life.

The circumstances were these: Jane Crawford, a woman in the prime of life who lived in Greene County, Ky., was suffering what were supposed to be the pains of childbirth. As time and suffering went on without apparent progress, Doctor McDowell was called into the case and rode horseback 60 miles through the wilderness to her bedside. A thorough diagnosis, an explanation to the attending physicians preceded the ordeal of telling the unhappy woman of her fate. It was fully explained to her that those pains, similar to labor pains, came from an ovarian tumor, that they would increase until death, shortly, would relieve her of her agony. Such then was the unhappy state of suffering womanhood.

Doctor McDowell in that crucial situation rose to sublime heights. Here was the problem whose solution Bell had dreamed of, McDowell was called upon to meet. Had he been in Philadelphia, then the medical center of the United States, learned doctors would have cautioned against his rashness; would have explained that the woman would in all probability not survive the operation; that he, having caused her death in a foolhardy attempt to do that which never before had been attempted, would naturally be censured as a man and probably disgraced as a physician, and he having shifted responsibility might have faltered.

Who will contend that the backwoods did not play a part in this achievement; that a kind Providence, who tempers the wind to the shorn lamb, did not arrange that this woman should be the bravest of her race to meet the most daring and skillful surgeon of the age.

Doctor McDowell told her that he would, if she desired, remove the diseased parts with the knife; that it had never been done before; that death would follow failure; that she must come to Danville and submit to the ordeal without even a local anesthetic, for even morphia was then unknown.

In a few days she came on horseback, 60 miles, every step an agony. Do you daughters, with the comforts and luxuries of to-day realize and appreciate the hardihood, bravery, and sacrifice of your mothers? Are you proud of this great heroine of the backwoods? The operation was performed, success crowned the effort, and 40 years were added to the life of this one woman. It has been calculated that to now at least 30,000 years of pain have been in this way saved suffering womanhood.

O Napoleon, where are your achievements? Every year of life you took from man this physician has added to woman. Oh, victories of war, how much greater tower the victories of peace!

Some would give to Jane Crawford an equal part of glory in this event. Surely in courage she bears the greater part, but McDowell added to courage knowledge and skill.

When the intelligence of this great accomplishment reached the universities of Philadelphia and Europe it was sarcastically dismissed as untrue and impossible, but three repetitions by this wonderful physician prior to 1820 brought apologies and recognition.

Doctor McDowell was unassuming and kindly, always interested in the smallest concern of his associates. He was criticized for lack of dignity and reserve by those who know not that simplicity is the companion of greatness.

McBeath's masterpiece of fame—

"Do dreams of fame thy restless soul engage?
With sword or pen thou canst inscribe thy name
Upon the brow of Envious Time himself
And bid defiance to his blighting breath;
But thou must find 'round thy human heart
An adamantine wall, impregnable alike
To love's sweet smile or pity's tear,
On the altar of thy purposes lay
Freedom and ease and rest and calm content—
The joys of home, hope, happiness, and heaven;
And when thou'st reached the lonely mountain top
And stand at sunset by the glittering thing
For which thou'st left the peaceful vale below,
Thou'lt find the brightness that had lured thee on
Above the dear companionship of men
Was but a mocking gleam of chilling light
Reflected from some bleak and icy cliff
That frowns above eternal fields of snow"— never applied to him.

Greatness must ever be accorded men, measured by their supreme accomplishment—Poe not by his intemperance but by his Raven; Bunyan not by his dissoluteness but by his Pilgrim's Progress; Clark not by his sullenness but by his capture of Vincennes; and McDowell not by his indifference but by his ovariotomy.

These great accomplishments measure the capacity of the man—

"Like some tall cliff that lifts its awful form,
Swells from the dale and midway leaves the storm,
Though rolling clouds around its breast are spread,
Eternal sunshine settles on its head."

May I add my humble judgment to that of the able committee who selected Henry Clay and Dr. Ephraim McDowell and to that of the Kentucky Legislature who approved their finding that among all Kentucky's noble sons and daughters these should represent her here and these statues, like their lives, both remind us—

"We can make our lives sublime,
And departing leave behind us
Footprints on the sands of time."

SIXTH ANNUAL SHENANDOAH APPLE-BLOSSOM FESTIVAL

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. Speaker, perhaps no better use could be made of the privilege to extend my remarks in the RECORD than to call attention to the annual apple-blossom festival, which has become a part of the life of the Shenandoah Valley of Virginia.

The sixth annual celebration will be held at Winchester during the coming May on a day hereafter to be named. Nothing has attracted such general attention to the growth of the South and of the State of Virginia in general and of the Shenandoah Valley in particular as these magnificent annual pageants.

Of all agricultural developments in the South, none has compared with the apple orchard in this beautiful section of the State of Virginia.

The apple orchards have developed into a tremendous industry, and we claim that no better apples are grown than in this valley.

But the valley is not only famous for its orchards as an industry. Its scenic beauty thrills the heart of the visitor as a panorama which is unrivaled in nature's most artistic handiwork. Highly improved highways pass through this section from every center of population. Seven splendid up-to-date highways come into Winchester like spokes into a hub.

In addition, the railroad facilities are excellent. The Baltimore & Ohio and the Pennsylvania have connecting lines entering the city. The Southern and the Norfolk & Western and the main line of the Baltimore & Ohio are in close contact with the town. Bus lines circulate to all points of the compass. Washington and Baltimore have direct bus lines, and busses run down the valley and up the valley and across the valley—north, south, east, and west.

Of peculiar interest is its history. In ante Revolutionary times George Washington had here his headquarters in connection with Lord Fairfax. His office headquarters is still pointed out to the tourists. From here Braddock departed for his defeat at Fort Duquesne, now Pittsburgh, from the disaster of which he was rescued by Washington. Here are the remains of the fort built by Washington as a protection after the defeat. It was from Winchester he was sent as a representative in the House of Burgesses.

Here Daniel Morgan lies in a neglected grave, and the home he built with his Hessian prisoners is still a handsome homestead. From Winchester or its vicinity departed Roger Clarke and Joseph Bowman to win for America at Vincennes the great Northwest section of this country.

In the Civil War great battles were almost a daily instance. Stonewall Jackson and his foot cavalry, some of whom are still living, made the Valley famous in history. Sheridan made his historic ride from Winchester 20 miles away. At New Market the Virginia Military Institute cadets won undying fame. At Kernstown Jackson met his first and last repulse. At Cedar Creek Sheridan ended his historic ride. In this vicinity are some of the great educational institutions of the South. The University of Virginia, founded by Jefferson; Washington and Lee University, founded by Washington and rejuvenated by Lee; and the Virginia Military Institute, and many other institutions of hardly less renown.

In this vicinity are some of the greatest natural phenomena, which attract tourists from all over the civilized world, among which I may mention the Shenandoah Caverns, Endless Caverns, Luray Caverns, the Grottoes, and Natural Bridge.

Within 20 miles of Winchester begins the proposed Shenandoah National Park, which in the next year or so will be, or should be, a reality and which will be the Nation's great playground.

Last May at the fifth annual festival, which in many respects was a duplication of previous ones on a larger scale, 100,000 visitors flocked to Winchester. On the first day 12,000 children, from sections far and near, marched through the streets of Winchester keeping step to the music of scores of bands. In the afternoon the beautiful Miss Mary Wise Boxley was crowned queen of the festival by Gov. Harry Flood Byrd. At the coronation her court included 60 princesses and 200 flower girls in beautiful costumes. On the second day of the festival a parade was staged which required two hours to pass the spectator and was over 6 miles long. It included 200 floats and nearly 50 bands, among which appeared Captain Benner and his famous Navy Band.

For the coming festival preparations are being made to surpass those of the past in splendor and brilliancy.

There will be two days of pageantry; dozens of bands, both military and civil, of national reputation will participate.

On the first day the queen of the festival surrounded by beautiful princesses and flower girls will be crowned in the stadium of the Handley School. Thousands of school children artistically costumed will parade. The children participating come from Virginia and near-by States.

On the second day scores of artistic floats will parade, accompanied by scores of military organizations. The Baltimore & Ohio and the Pennsylvania Railroads take an active part in the parade and always have an interesting program.

Automobile routes lead through the orchards amid the blossoms of thousands of trees.

An artistic program will be mailed to anyone who will write for one to Mr. J. V. Arthur, director general.

In the name of the people of the Shenandoah Valley of Virginia I extend an invitation to the Members of Congress and the public to visit this most beautiful of all valleys when by nature she is robed in her choicest apparel and is arrayed in unparalleled loveliness. Amid beautiful scenery, thrilled by the history of the Nation in critical eras, the air redolent with the aroma of the blossoms, the visitor will witness spectacular pageants portraying the struggles of the past and the magnificent developments of the present and the glorious promise of the future.

All who honor the festival with their presence will receive a cordial welcome, and I venture to predict will rejoice in the glories of the occasion.

HON. E. B. HOWARD AND HON. F. B. SWANK

Mr. McKEOWN. Mr. Speaker, to-day two of Oklahoma's most able Representatives will leave this House—Hon. E. B. HOWARD, of the first district, and Hon. F. B. SWANK, of the fifth district.

The House of Representatives is one place where men are measured by their ability. Wealth, fame, and influence make no difference in this House as to the estimate made of its Members. A Member must win his spurs, and he wins them upon his willingness to work and his ability to master the intricacies of legislative procedure.

It necessarily follows that years of service and experience with the attendant acquaintanceship with the Members of the House equips a Member for a more successful and efficient service.

Hon. E. B. HOWARD, although not permitted to enjoy a continuous service, has demonstrated his ability to render material service to his district and to his State, and he is recognized as a hard-working Congressman.

Hon. E. B. SWANK has been able to win the affection and esteem of his colleagues in the House on both sides of the aisle and has won the respect of all for his strong moral views. He has rendered great service to the farmers of the country through his position on the great Agriculture Committee of the House.

The House will miss both of these gentlemen, and their friends in the House wish them success in all their future endeavors.

THE REINDEER INDUSTRY IN ALASKA

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. Speaker, this statement from the Department of Agriculture, office of information, with the accompanying bulletin, For the Information of State and Municipal Health Officers, State Conservation Commissioners, Fish and Game Commissions, and for the Information of the General Public, sets forth the status of Alaska reindeer meat with reference to the Federal meat inspection act.

It will be noted that—

No contagious disease has ever been encountered and no reason has appeared why the sale or use of reindeer meat should require Federal, State, or municipal inspection for the detection of disease.

STATUS OF REINDEER MEAT MADE PUBLIC BY FEDERAL COMMITTEE

A statement on the status of reindeer meat under the Federal meat inspection act by a joint committee of the Department of the Interior and the Department of Agriculture on the reindeer industry of Alaska was made public yesterday (February 8).

The statement was prepared to make clear to State and municipal health officers, conservation and game commissioners, and the general public that reindeer are not included in the Federal meat inspection act, but may be received into the United States and shipped interstate, and that when marked for identification they may be received and handled in Federally inspected plants. The statement was made for the joint committee by a subcommittee, consisting of Paul G. Redington, Chief of the Bureau of Biological Survey; Dr. J. R. Mohler, Chief of the Bureau of Animal Industry; and Dr. William Hamilton, assistant chief of the Alaska division of the Bureau of Education. Following is the full text of the statement:

JOINT COMMITTEE OF THE DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR AND THE DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE ON THE REINDEER INDUSTRY OF ALASKA

WASHINGTON, D. C., February 8, 1929.

For the information of State and municipal health officers, State conservation commissioners, fish and game commissions, and for the information of the general public

The reindeer industry of Alaska was initiated by the Federal Government in 1891, and during the decade 1892–1902, 1,280 reindeer were imported from Siberia. The herds now number more than 500,000 animals. Congress now appropriates money each year for the development of the industry, and this money is expended under the direction of the Bureau of Education, Department of the Interior, and the Bureau of Biological Survey, Department of Agriculture.

Alaska now maintains large herds of reindeer, and reindeer meat and by-products are being shipped into the United States each year by the Bureau of Education and private owners.

Reindeer are not included in the Federal meat inspection act, but reindeer meat may be received into the United States and be shipped interstate, and when marked for identification may be received and handled as such in Federally inspected plants. It may also be used in the preparation of United States inspected and passed meat and meat-food products when such articles are appropriately labeled.

The Government has maintained experimental stations in Alaska and keeps in touch with the main herds of reindeer. No contagious disease has ever been encountered, and no reason has appeared why the sale or use of reindeer meat should require Federal, State, or municipal health inspection for the detection of disease. However, State or municipal inspection may be appropriate to determine whether the reindeer meat may have become spoiled due to improper storage or handling. The reindeer has for many centuries been a domesticated animal and not subject to game laws.

For the joint committee:

PAUL G. REDINGTON,
Chief, Bureau of Biological Survey,
Department of Agriculture.
J. R. MOHLER,
Chief, Bureau of Animal Industry,
Department of Agriculture.
WILLIAM HAMILTON,
Assistant Chief, Alaska Division, Bureau of Education,
Department of the Interior.

VETERANS' HOSPITAL FOR WESTERN NEW YORK

Mr. MEAD. Mr. Speaker, I desire to discuss the subject of the legislation contained in H. R. 15921, a bill to authorize an appropriation to provide additional hospital, domiciliary, and out-patient dispensary facilities for persons entitled to hospitalization under the World War veterans' act of 1924. Hearings were held on this legislation by the subcommittee on the hospital building program of the World War Veterans' Legislation Committee. At this point I shall insert as part of my remarks a copy of H. R. 15921:

A bill (H. R. 15921, 70th Cong, 2d sess.) to authorize an appropriation to provide additional hospital, domiciliary. and out-patient dispensary facilities for persons entitled to hospitalization under the World War veterans' act, 1924, as amended, and for other purposes

Be it enacted, etc., That in order to provide sufficient hospital, domiciliary, and out-patient dispensary facilities to care for the increasing load of mentally afflicted World War veterans, and to enable the United States Veterans' Bureau to care for its beneficiaries in Veterans' Bureau hospitals, rather than in contract temporary facilities and other institutions, the Director of the United States Veterans' Bureau, subject to the approval of the President, is hereby authorized to provide additional hospital, domiciliary, and out-patient dispensary facilities for persons entitled to hospitalization under the World War veterans' act of 1924, as amended, by purchase, replacement, and remodeling, or extension of existing plants, and by construction on sites now owned by the Government or on sites to be acquired by purchase, condemnation, gift, or otherwise, of such hospitals, domiciliary, and out-patient dispensary facilities, to include the necessary buildings and auxiliary structures, mechanical equipment, approach work, roads, and trackage facilities leading thereto; vehicles, livestock, furniture, equipment, and accessories; and also to provide accommodations for officers, nurses, and attending personnel; and also to provide proper and suitable recreational centers; and the Director of the United States Veterans' Bureau is authorized to accept gifts or donations for any of the purposes named herein. Such hospital and domiciliary plants to be constructed shall be of fireproof construction, and existing plants purchased shall be remodeled to be fireproof, and the location and nature thereof, whether for domiciliary care or the treatment of tuberculosis, neuropsychiatric, or general medical and surgical cases, shall be in the discretion of the Director of the United States Veterans' Bureau, subject to the approval of the President.

SEC. 2. The construction of new hospitals, domiciliary facilities, or dispensaries, or the replacement, extension, alteration, remodeling, or repair of all hospitals, domiciliary facilities, or dispensaries heretofore or hereafter constructed shall be done in such manner as the President may determine, and he is authorized to require the architectural, engineering, constructing, or other forces of any of the departments of the Government to do or assist in such work, and to employ individuals and agencies not now connected with the Government, if in his opinion desirable, at such compensation as he may consider reasonable.

SEC. 3. For carrying into effect the preceding sections relating to additional hospitals and domiciliary and out-patient dispensary facilities there is hereby authorized to be appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $10,000,000, to be immediately available and to remain available until expended. That not to exceed 3 per cent of this sum shall be available for the employment in the District of Columbia and in the field of necessary technical and clerical assistants at the customary rates of compensation, exclusively to aid in the preparation of the plans and specifications for the projects authorized herein and for the supervision of the execution thereof, and for traveling expenses, field-office equipment, and supplies in connection therewith.

SEC. 4. The President is further authorized to accept from any State or other political subdivision, or from any corporation, association, individual, or individuals, any building, structure, equipment, or grounds suitable for the care of the disabled, with due regard to fire or other hazards, state of repair, and all other pertinent considerations, and to designate what department, bureau, board, commission, or other governmental agency shall have the control and management thereof.

During the hearings Frank Williams, of Buffalo, N. Y., representing the department of New York of the American Legion, appeared before the committee and explained in detail the great need for additional hospital facilities in the western end of New York State. Mr. Williams, a disabled veteran himself, whose record is numbered among the most heroic of those who served in France, is in a position to know the situation with regard to hospital facilities in the western New York district. He is the chosen representative of the American Legion, and among other things it is his duty to investigate and bring to the attention of the authorities the claims of disabled ex-service men. I quote here excerpts from his statement before the committee:

Mr. Chairman, Mrs. ROGERS, and gentlemen, in representing the department of New York in presenting to you the situation of veterans' hospitals, I desire to say that this is not a new proposition. It has been on our program for several years. I have a folder that I dug out of the files, which is five years old. It contains a lot of information, and I thought I would put that in, too, with my own knowledge of what the situation is. As you know, we have two regional offices in New York State; one is situated in New York City and the other office is at the extreme end of the State, Buffalo, where I happen to reside. At the present time there is a waiting list for tuberculosis patients. I am referring now, of course, to the Buffalo end of New York State, the regional office taking care of 32 counties. In Erie County of New York State, where the Buffalo regional office is located, we have 32,000 veterans. We have in close proximity to the regional office quite a number of large towns; in 60 miles we have Rochester, the third largest city in the State; in about 120 miles we have Syracuse, the fourth largest city in the State. In other words, I am trying to bring out the point that in requesting additional hospital facilities, as a general hospital, for New York State, it is largely to take care of western New York, where the Buffalo regional office is located, the veterans applying in person for hospitalization, as well as through mail and through the contacts at Rochester, Syracuse, Binghamton, etc., where Veterans' Bureau representatives are located.

We have no general Veterans' Bureau hospital in New York State at all, and the distance that we have to send them, from Rochester, Syracuse, and particularly from Buffalo and Niagara Falls, or any of the towns around the regional office, works a hardship, as you have heard here before, because of the fact that they have to travel a distance of 400 miles, or even a greater distance, to get into a general hospital. I have in mind now the 76 cases that are hospitalized at the present time from the Buffalo regional office. We had this proposition in our recommendations that were made at our last national convention. The New York State Department has authorized me, the State commander, to come down here with a view of asking for a hospital for the western part of New York. We feel, knowing as we do, and knowing as I do, what the situation is, coming in contact with the veterans in the Buffalo regional office, that there is a great need. There have been a great number of cases wherein it has worked a hardship, because when they find out the distance that they have to travel, the attitude of the Buffalo regional office being, "All we can offer you is to go down to Brooklyn," the veterans will not accept it.

The result is that we do not inform them because I do not want them to accept it, and then go away embittered because they can not get into a Government hospital which is open at the present time. We are a very patient people up there, and that is why this need has dragged on for years. It is no more acute now than it was three or four years ago, but it is acute. In our city department we are particularly fortunate there in having administered through the American Legion $100,000 worth of relief a year. That takes care of but one county in that part of the State, and I have the figures here to show that they hospitalized over 1,000 World War veterans last year that went into the city hospital, put in either as city cases or as county cases through the American Legion relief bureau.

We are not asking for a hospital for Buffalo but a hospital to take care of half the State that is not provided for now. My observation is that at the present time there are quite a number of veterans who could go into such a hosptial and it would take care of the western part of

New York State; it would take care of men who are now not being cared for, because of the fact that they will not or can not go into the hospitals away off down in Brooklyn.

I also quote from a communication received from Douglas I. McKay, department commander of the American Legion, which explains the attitude of his State organization relative to the construction of a general hospital in western New York and to additional hospital facilities in other parts of the State:

Additional Veterans' Bureau hospital facilities in New York State are sorely needed. Every available hospital is overcrowded, patients are awaiting hospitalization, and the load is increasing. Our last State convention went on record for a 500-bed hospital for the northwestern part of the State, where, as matters now stand, it frequently occurs that patients have to be transported from 400 to 600 miles in order to be hospitalized on Long Island.

Our State hospital and welfare committee, after careful investigation, found the situation so aggravated, because of the increased number of cases entitled to hospitalization, that unless additional facilities are provided many can not be cared for. That committee recommended a 500-bed hospital for western New York, a new 1,000-bed mental hospital, and a new 200-bed general hospital in New York City. Director Hines has accepted these figures subject only to some minor reduction in size.

It seems to take approximately four years from the passage of legislation to the occupation of the bed by the patient and, therefore, we feel that unless the pending legislation is passed at once hundreds of veteran patients will be unhospitalized for lack of facilities.

Even the chairman of the committee conducting the hearings, the Hon. ROBERT LUCE, of Massachusetts, recognizes the necessity for added hospital facilities in western New York. I quote from the hearings a statement made by the distinguished chairman with reference to this particular hospital question.

I am frank to say that any study of the map would lead an unprejudiced man to think that you have a better case than some that have been presented to us in the past, and perhaps some that are being presented to us now. I do not know whether it is my duty to encourage any other locality to press for recognition, but it seems to me that western New York has been lost in the shuffle.

I include also in my remarks a statement giving the existing facilities in district No. 2, which embraces the States of New York, New Jersey, and Connecticut.

With the lone exception of the United States marine hospital, which is not a veterans' hospital and is at times filled with patients sent there from other sources, all of these institutions are located in the far eastern end of New York, an average distance of approximately 400 miles from Buffalo and the Niagara frontier. A study of these figures clearly indicates the need of a general hospital for the care of the veterans in the western end of district No. 2. When this hospital is constructed it will to a degree relieve the congestion now existing in the other hospitals of this district.

Shortly after the termination of the World War an effort was made to locate a hospital in western New York. A site was secured and offered to the Government without charge. This site was located in what is called Cascade Park at Springville, N. Y., which is but a short distance by rail or highway from Buffalo, Rochester, and cities located along the lake shore from Buffalo to the Pennsylvania State line. Both the city of Buffalo and the State of New York have placed their stamp of approval on this locality by establishing hospitals of their own within close proximity to the site which was then offered to the Federal Government. However, that offer was rejected by Colonel Forbes, the then Director of the Veterans' Bureau, although a number of my colleagues and I urged his favorable approval. At the present time we are not interested in any particular site as we are willing to leave the selection of the location to the Federal Hospital Board, to the Director of the Veterans' Bureau, or to any other representatives of the Government. Conditions, however, demand that something be done for this large district now without proper and adequate hospital facilities. The American Legion, after a thorough investigation, has indorsed and recommended the immediate construction of a hospital in this end of the State, and I join most heartily in their recommendations. I trust this legislation is only temporarily delayed by the action of the present Congress in failing to favorably adopt the measure, and it is my sincere hope that the next regular session of Congress will adopt without delay this very necessary and meritorious measure.

EDUCATIONAL ORDERS

Mr. HOFFMAN. Mr. Speaker, in proportion to national wealth guarded, the United States maintains the smallest standing army in the world. Considering population, the United States has a regular army even smaller than that of Germany as allowed by the treaty of Versailles, and that treaty was specifically designed to render Germany impotent as a military power.

Before the World War we were accustomed to speak of preparedness as if our national defense was based solely upon our ability to mobilize and train troops. Once in the war, however, we found that our capacity to organize and train the Nation's man power far exceeded our ability to arm and equip the troops. We found that, in spite of the fact that many of our industries had been manufacturing arms and munitions for the belligerent nations of Europe prior to our entrance in the conflict, we were dismally deficient in our ability to produce the articles of ordnance so vitally necessary in the successful prosecution of a war.

In 1917 and 1918 we felt the truth of the statement that hastily improvised preparation is needlessly wasteful of human life and unnecessarily expensive. With the lessons of the war still fresh in our minds, why should we not direct our best thoughts and effort to the reinforcement of the weak spots in our national defense?

It is to-day recognized that the training of industrial soldiers is no less important than the training of those men who may be called upon to do the actual fighting in the event of a war. We are definitely committed under national-defense legislation to the preparation of the latter group. We have our reserve organizations, our civilian military training corps, and other activities that prepare the Nation's man power for military service. We spend comparatively large sums in teaching our men and boys how to bear arms; we refuse appropriations to prepare for the furnishing of the arms and of munitions of war in the event of the calling of these peace-time trained soldiers to the colors.

The bill before us (H. R. 450) provides a simple and rather inexpensive method for the training of our industrial soldiers, a plan under which our industries in times of peace may be prepared for war-time production. Briefly it will give not oftener than once in three years to private plants which may appear to be especially adapted to the purpose educational orders for small amounts of selected types of noncommercial articles of ordnance. Under this program there will be prepared in our industries a nucleus of men skilled in the production of the particular type of munitions required. The necessary tools, dies, jigs, and gauges will be available; our plants will be able to get speedily into production in the event of a war. The conversion from peace to war time production will be smooth and rapid, and the movement to the field of adequate munitions may be the controlling factor in winning a war.

Instead of this legislation being a "war incubator," as has been suggested, it will prove to be cheap national insurance. It is a direct, common-sense plan for the industrial mobilization of the Nation, which, coupled with the procurement plans of the War Department, will go a long way in the perfection of our national defense.

The placing of these educational orders is not possible under existing laws. It may be said, in reply to the arguments advanced on the floor, that our system of expending public funds will be impaired by failure to require the Secretary of War to award contracts for the manufacture of groups of material to the lowest bidder, that such a provision would destroy the very purpose of the legislation. Low bids, under the competitive system, might be received from concerns which have no interest in the Nation's defense program, but would merely utilize such orders to fill in during periods of depression. Conformity to such requirements would often mean the placing of orders with plants that would receive no allocation of work in the event of an emergency. And again, as has been pointed out by the Secretary of War, other concerns which have the experience necessary would compete, and it would be necessary to place manufactures with them without advantage to the United States.

Members of the House who are fearful that the placing of educational orders will either result in a retrenchment of activities at the various Federal arsenals, or that they will result in diverting to commercial industries orders that might well be filled at the arsenals, should be assured that there is nothing of this kind contemplated. The industrial mobilization plans provide for meeting the war requirements of the Nation with our arsenals as well as with various commercial plants. The arsenals are given schedules that will utilize their maximum capacity, but these will by no means meet our requirements, for the arsenals, in general, can make only from one-half of 1 per cent to 10 per cent of the various items required in a war of major effort. The Government arsenals are vitally necessary in our scheme for national defense and for procurement in an emergency, and it is the first concern of the Ordnance Department to care for these arsenals, keeping the plant in first-class condition and maintaining a nucleus of trained personnel.

With our commercial plants scrapping their ordnance facilities, with their munitions-manufacturing personnel disbanded, and with the art of such manufacture acquired during the war practically extinct, it is estimated that it will take our industry from 6 to 18 months to produce the munitions required at a necessary rate. Our reserves are inadequate, as General Ruggles has pointed out in the committee hearings, to bridge this gap. The most sensible method of doing this is by, under the bill before us, training selected commercial concerns in time of peace in the manufacture of these vital munitions so they can get into quantity production earlier, and before our reserves are exhausted.

Let us give our careful thought to this measure. The indications are that it will not be enacted at this session, but I am impressed by the thought that the Members of Congress who will study the plan closely will be insistent upon its passage early in the next session. They will find that it is designed to save lives and money; that it will, as my colleague from New Jersey [Mr. FORT] has said, bring to the aid of the Government in times of peace the genius of our great commercial industry for the development of our ordnance, and that it will, too, be a most effective guaranty of continued peace in the United States. When it is known that we are prepared to supply our great and splendid man power with a timely and adequate supply of munitions as they are needed, it is my belief that no nation or combination of nations will care to run the risk of drawing us into a war against them.

The need for this legislation is effectively set out in this letter from the Chief of Ordnance, which I submit for the RECORD:

Hon. HAROLD G. HOFFMAN,
House of Representatives, United States,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. HOFFMAN: In reply to your recent request, I am glad to be able to give you further information with respect to the kind and amount of ordnance weapons and supplies which our arsenals will be able to manufacture in an emergency.

The total amount of each and all of these technical and noncommercial weapons and supplies which our armies would require in event of war has been carefully calculated. The amounts needed over and above those now in the hands of troops or held in reserve have been set up as requirements. The general statement has been made that our arsenals have a capacity only sufficient to manufacture from one-half of 1 per cent to 10 per cent of these noncommercial articles and supplies, depending upon the particular article. This general statement is correct. The requirements for war will have to be manufactured partly in arsenals but largely in selected commercial plants after war has started. The arsenals can get into production on those articles they have been selected to manufacture quite quickly because the full equipment for such manufacture is on hand, and the workmen are trained. But it will take, under present conditions, from 6 to 18 months for commercial plants to get into similar production, and in the meantime our reserves of many essential items will be completely exhausted, even when these reserves are augmented by the relatively small number of articles being manufactured at our arsenals.

Generally speaking, our ordnance arsenals are prepared to manufacture, within the limits of their capacity, all these special articles of noncommercial type. But, because of their small capacity for manufacturing certain articles which are required in very large amounts, it has been found most economical and wise to plan to manufacture at these arsenals, to the maximum limit of their capacity, only those articles which they are best fitted to manufacture, and the production of which articles in commercial plants would give the greatest difficulty. In many cases the articles to be manufactured at our arsenals are those which will be vitally necessary in the early stages of a war.

Coming now to our general requirements, the number of the vital weapons and supplies needed are so large that our arsenals have the capacity to manufacture only a very small fraction of our requirements. We give here a few illustrations to indicate the general situation:

75-mm. field-gun ammunition: The available supply of loaded ammunition for this gun is constantly being depleted without replacement so that the situation with reference to this item of ammunition is constantly growing worse. At the present time there is available sufficient loaded ammunition to meet the requirements of the first 13 weeks of a war, and unassembled components which only become available gradually because of the slowness with which assembling facilities will become available. There is therefore at the present time a prospective deficit beginning in the fourth month of a war, the expected supply from all sources being from one-third to one-half of requirements from the third to the ninth months of the war. Of the 75-mm. gun ammunition apportioned to all sources, totaling 7,911,000 rounds as the maximum to be produced in any one month, Picatinny Arsenal is expected to produce only 150,000 rounds, or something less than 2 per cent. Frankford Arsenal is to assist only in the production of minor components for these items, its capacity being otherwise used.

155-mm. howitzer ammunition: The situation with respect to 155-mm. howitzer ammunition is approximately the same as for 75-mm. gun ammunition as far as reserve and production is concerned. Of the 155-mm. howitzer ammunition apportioned to all sources totaling 1,922,000 rounds as the maximum to be produced in any one month, Picatinny Arsenal is expected to produce only 7,500 rounds, or something less than four-tenths of 1 per cent. Frankford Arsenal will produce no complete rounds as such, but will produce 25,000 shell per month, or about 1.3 per cent of the shell needed.

It should be understood that the above two types of ammunition are only two out of a large number of types which must be provided.

The part which Picatinny Arsenal and Frankford Arsenal play in the whole ammunition program is better visualized by a statement that Picatinny and Frankford together will produce approximately 100,000 complete rounds per month of all calibers out of a total maximum monthly apportionment of 26,023,000 rounds, and in addition Picatinny will load 92,000 more rounds.

Picatinny and Frankford together, therefore, will produce less than four-tenths of 1 per cent of the ammunition apportioned for manufacture, and in addition Picatinny Arsenal can load less than four-tenths of 1 per cent more of the total apportioned. The deficits must be met by production in commercial plants, none of which at present have equipment to make this ammunition, or trained personnel.

Artillery: Requirements under this heading in the order of difficulty of manufacture include recoil mechanisms, guns, carriages, and accompanying vehicles. They also include a large variety of complicated instruments used for the observation of fire, the measurements of angles and distances, and for the laying of artillery in azimuth and elevation. Qualitatively, Rock Island and Watertown Arsenals can produce recoil mechanisms, carriages, and vehicles. Watervliet Arsenal can make the guns and Frankford Arsenal the instruments. Quantitatively, however, the requirements are so large that only a very small percentage of the total load can be placed on these establishments, the remainder having to be done by commercial plants.

The plan therefore is to give Rock Island Arsenal practically all the recoil mechanisms, these being very difficult to manufacture. Watertown will take a small part of the recoil-mechanism requirements and a large share of the heavier and more complex carriages. A few of the recoil mechanisms and most of the carriages and vehicles must be obtained from commercial sources. Spare parts required in relatively small numbers for existing matériel will be produced at the arsenals.

Those required in large numbers or pertaining to major items procured commercially will be assigned to outside companies.

In general Watervliet Arsenal will be given orders for guns which are needed soonest and for which it already has jigs, tools, fixtures, etc. Guns required later or for the replacement of existing types will in general be ordered from commercial sources. Due to recent simplification, the new type guns can probably be manufactured by outside concerns in less time than could the old type. However, the arsenal can make the latter with less delay than either it or the civil establishments could manufacture the new models. In general, Watervliet Arsenal will make approximately one-fifth of the guns (barrel and breech mechanism) required, the remainder being made in commercial plants.

The plans for Frankford Arsenal contemplate complete responsibility for all optics (lenses and prisms), regardless of whether the metallic parts of instruments are made there or not. Frankford in turn will procure most of these optical elements from commercial sources, reserving its own manufacturing facilities for those used in limited numbers or of special characteristics.

The following list shows some of the items that must be manufactured in commercial plants at present almost entirely unequipped or trained for such work, the amounts in round numbers being the requirements for the first 24 months of an emergency:

75-mm. guns	7,000
75-mm. carriages	5,000
105-mm. howitzers	1,500
105-mm. howitzer carriages	2,000
155-mm. howitzers	300
155-mm. carriages	400
3-inch antiaircraft guns	1,700
3-inch antiaircraft carriages	1,000
155-mm. guns and carriages	800
75-mm. Infantry mortars and carriages	3,600
Light tanks	10,000
Heavy tanks	1,800

Aircraft machine gun, fixed, caliber .30: The reserve stock of these guns is 2,217 less than the estimated total requirement for the first month of war. The total estimated requirement for 24 months is 30,597. Due to the fact that the total capacity of the Government's only small-arms plant, Springfield Armory, will be required in connection with the manufacture of rifles and other articles, these machine rifles will have to be procured from private manufacturers.

Small-arms ammunition: The total procurement requirement for .30-caliber small-arms ammunition for the first 24 months of an emergency is approximately 6,000,000,000 rounds. The estimated total capacity of the Government's small-arms ammunition plant, Frankford Arsenal, is approximately 1,000,000,000 rounds. The remaining 5,000,000,000 rounds must be procured from private manufacturers.

Other small-arms matériel, for which there is no arsenal capacity and which must be manufactured after declaration of war in commercial plants, at present almost entirely unprepared for such work, include the following:

Tank machine guns, caliber .30	10,000
Antiaircraft machine guns, caliber .50	8,000
Steel helmets	6,000,000

The above gives the general situation as to the proportion of manufacture which will have to be undertaken at arsenals and commercial plants in event of war.

It should be particularly noted that in many items vitally necessary to the waging of war there is a period of months between the time when our reserves of these items are exhausted and the date when production in commercial plants and arsenals can meet the requirements. This is because of the time necessary for commercial plants to procure, manufacture, and install the necessary tools, dies, jigs, fixtures, and gauges for manufacture of the article and train their labor in the art of manufacture, which is necessary before production can start. The purpose of the bill for educational orders (H. R. 450) is to eliminate or greatly reduce the time consumed in this preparation for manufacture, thus greatly reducing or eliminating the period when our troops will be without these vital supplies.

Very sincerely,

C. C. WILLIAMS,
Major General, Chief of Ordnance.

REPORT OF COMMITTEE TO NOTIFY THE PRESIDENT

Mr. TILSON. Mr. Speaker, your committee, appointed on the part of the House to join a like committee on the part of the Senate, to wait upon the President and inform him that the Congress has completed its work, reports that it has performed that duty. The President sends his congratulations to the House upon the work that it has accomplished, and bids us say that he has no further communications to make to the Congress.

NATIONAL CAPITAL PARK AND PLANNING COMMISSION

The SPEAKER. Under the act approved June 6, 1924, amended by the act of April 30, 1926, the Chair appoints the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. ZIHLMAN] as a member of the National Capital Park and Planning Commission.

HON. FINIS J. GARRETT

Mr. TILSON. Mr. Speaker, this day marks the termination of a very notable career in the history of the House of Representatives. Just 24 years ago there came to this House a young man from one of the western districts of Tennessee. He was not heralded by any fanfare of trumpets, nor was there apparent other evidence of an unusual character indicating that a potential national figure was there in the making. Like others who have achieved the greatest genuine success he began modestly and developed slowly, but to-day he rounds out a most enviable record of nearly a quarter of a century of noteworthy service, one-third of it as the leader of his party in the House.

Every Member of the House not only honors and respects, but admires and loves FINIS GARRETT. He has shown himself a man standing foursquare to every wind that blows, himself without variableness or the shadow of turning, and withal a real statesman. For four years he and I have faced each other across the middle aisle of this Chamber, the respective leaders of opposing parties, but in all this time there has never been a single word, not even a thought, of unkindness or even misunderstanding, much less of anything approaching rancor or bitterness. In fact, our relationship throughout has been characterized by the closest and most intimate personal friendship. Nor have I waited till the day of his departure to throw bouquets, but in private as in public, in season and out of season, have praised his worth and work, believing that a public servant of this kind should receive his just mead of praise.

As he takes up a new task in a new field on to-morrow, I am sure that the best wishes of every Member of this House will go with him in his work on the bench, which his character and professional attainments will adorn, and continue with him throughout his life, which we all hope may be a long and happy one.

Mr. Speaker, I am sure that every Member of the House would be sorry if we adjourned to-day without hearing a parting word from our very good friend, our deservedly honored colleague, the distinguished minority leader, Mr. GARRETT. [Applause, the Members rising.]

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker and my colleagues of the House of Representatives, this is an occasion when it might be quite proper for me to say some things of a personal nature or carrying a personal flavor; and yet I shall not do that, because if I were to attempt it I realize that I would display an emotion which, while I certainly would not be ashamed of it, nevertheless would not be of interest to the House.

I do wish that it were possible for me to express individually to each Member here the deep feeling of appreciation I have of the courtesies which have been shown me during my long term of service.

I have served here for almost a sixth of the life of this Republic. I came here imbued with certain conceptions as to the nature of the Federal Government in its relation to the States and the people thereof. Briefly stated, ever since I knew anything about our governmental systems at all it has been my opinion that the fundamental purpose in the formation of the Federal Government was that through its strength the States might be enabled to live, and that to the States the people should look for most of the laws that are to govern them. In other words, those governmental things which can be done by the States should be done by or through the States, and the function of the Federal Government is only to do the things which the States can not do. [Applause.]

By that conception I have stood through four and twenty years.

So standing it has resulted that I have opposed many legislative proposals here which I would have been glad to see the States adopt, each acting for itself, but which I did not regard as coming within the scope of proper Federal activity.

Of course, those who take that position are frequently referred to as "reactionaries" and are likely to find themselves described as "anachronisms." Nevertheless, I think it is the right position in the interest of human liberty.

It has often occurred to me that in the greatest strain through which this Nation ever passed—that of the war of secession—in the final analysis of motives, paradoxical as it may seem as a matter of first impression, each side was fighting for the same fundamental idea.

The South, believing that local self-government was endangered by certain political conditions that had arisen in the Nation, fought to secede; the North fought to maintain the Union on the theory that only by its maintenance could the States, the source of local self-government, be permanently maintained.

Time does not admit of my pursuing the thought and illustrating as I should like to. I can only say that I leave, as I came, with the fixed conviction that the end of liberty is to be served only by a proper division of and respect for the functions each government should perform.

I have been the recipient of constant courtesy, not only from my party associates but from those of the opposition as well. The majority leader [Mr. TILSON] in his graciousness and fineness symbolizes his party in so far as its treatment of me as temporary spokesman of the minority is concerned, and by thanking him I thank his party associates.

My colleagues, ladies and gentlemen, I bid you a fond adieu with the fervent prayer that richest blessings may rest upon you and each of you.

I come now to the performance of my last official act as a Member of the House of Representatives.

RESOLUTION OF THANKS TO THE SPEAKER

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. COLLIER] will please take the Chair.

Mr. COLLIER assumed the Chair as Speaker pro tempore.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I offer the resolution which I send to the clerk's desk.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The clerk will report it.

The clerk read as follows:

House Resolution 351

Resolved, That the thanks of the House are presented to the Hon. NICHOLAS LONGWORTH, Speaker of the House of Representatives, for the able, impartial and dignified manner in which he has presided over the deliberations and performed the arduous duties of the Chair during the present term of Congress.

[Applause, the Members rising.]

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, it is a most happy thing to me that I am able to offer that resolution in behalf of the minority, expressing the feeling and the heart of the minority. The Speaker of the House of Representatives—while exercising, as he should have exercised, with earnestness and with vigor, that high party leadership which inheres in the office with which he has been honored—has been uniformly fair, always loyal to the integrity of the rules of the House, just in every decision made and has been an honor to the Chair. His name will stand in the list of the great Speakers of this great body. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. COLLIER). The question is on agreeing to the resolution offered by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GARRETT].

The resolution was unanimously agreed to. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. My colleagues, time and the state of my voice will not permit me to say more than just a word, and that is to try to express to you, which words could not do, the great gratification I have in this renewed exhibition of your confidence and esteem, and to thank you for it.

If there is any regret I have in looking toward the future it is that I will no longer be associated on this floor with my valued and very dear friend of nearly a quarter of a century, the retiring minority leader. [Applause.]

I have never known a man in public life whose sturdy patriotism, whose ability, and whose wonderful command of the English language I have more greatly admired. [Applause.] I rejoice, though—and this is some balm—that succeeding him will be another friend of mine, a valued friend of a quarter of a century, a rather timid and retiring man, it is true [laughter], but one whose abilities as a leader are unquestioned.

And now as the time approaches for us to proceed to the other Chamber I can simply say this, I thank you one and all from the bottom of my heart. [Applause.]

ADJOURNMENT SINE DIE

Mr. TILSON. Mr. Speaker, before making the next motion, which will be the last one of this Congress, I wish to express my sincere thanks to all my colleagues on both sides of the middle aisle of this Chamber, for the uniform kindness and cooperation shown in connection with my work here as floor leader. It is an exacting task as well as one of responsibility. A single Member, were he unmindful of his own responsibility, might easily make the path which the floor leader of this House must travel a much more difficult and unhappy one without violating strictly parliamentary proceedings. None of you, my colleagues, has done this, but on the contrary all have cooperated with me, and the result has been the orderly dispatch of the public business without friction or undue delay. This courteous treatment of me I personally appreciate.

We are now to separate for a brief period. I wish for each of you just the kind of vacation each heart desires, provided it be the kind that will prove to be best. You have earned and richly deserve it. As we separate you carry with you not only my best wishes, but my earnest hope that when the recess is over you will return physically fit for the work that is ahead of us, and filled with the high purpose to help make the Seventy-first Congress the greatest in worth-while service of all our history.

Mr. Speaker, I now move that the House adjourn sine die.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The House stands adjourned sine die.
